

BY ANY BEANS NECESSARY

JENNA BRANDT

BY ANY BEANS NECESSARY

The Coffee Loft Series

JENNA BRANDT

Copyright

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, organizations, places, events and incidents are either products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Locale and public names are sometimes used for atmospheric purposes. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, actual events, or actual locations is purely coincidental. All rights reserved.

No part of this book may be reproduced, or stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without express written permission of the author, except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical reviews and certain other noncommercial uses permitted by copyright law. For permission requests, email jenna@jennabrandt.com.

Text copyright © Jenna Brandt 2023.

Cover copyright by Jenna Brandt

Contents

Chapter 1

Chapter 2

Chapter 3

Chapter 4

Chapter 5

Chapter 6

Chapter 7

Chapter 8

Chapter 9

Chapter 10

Chapter 11

Chapter 12

Next Book in the Coffee Loft

Sneak Peek of Small Town Start

Also by Jenna Brandt/Jennifer Branson

A Note from the Author

Acknowledgments

About the Author

Join My Mailing List and Reader's Groups

Praise for Jenna Brandt

I am always excited when I see a new book by Jenna Brandt.

Lori Dykes, Amazon Customer

Jenna Brandt is, in my estimation, the most gifted author of Christian fiction in this generation!

Paula Rose Michelson, Fellow Author

Ms. Brandt writes from the heart and you can feel it in every page turned.

Sandra Sewell White, Longtime Reader

For more information about Jenna Brandt visit her on any of her websites.

Signup for Jenna Brandt's Newsletter

Visit her on Social Media:

www.JennaBrandt.com

www.facebook.com/JennaBrandtAuthor

Jenna Brandt's Reader Group

www.twitter.com/JennaDBrandt

<http://www.instagram.com/Jennathewriter>

*Dedicated to my husband, Dustin, Badge #5654, who inspired me to create this series.
You're not only my heart and soul, but my own personal lawkeeper.*

Chapter One

The Coffee Loft hummed with the early morning rush, the scent of dark roast and cinnamon teasing the air. Above the chatter, the espresso machine hissed a steamy serenade while Michelle Kenney flitted between customers like a sunshine yellow butterfly among flowers. Her laughter danced above the clink of cups, her blonde bob bouncing to the rhythm of her movements as she continued to serve up smiles and cappuccinos.

“Morning, John. The usual?” she chirped, sliding a steaming mug across the counter to a bleary-eyed regular. He grunted an affirmative, his smile creeping in as he took his first life-affirming sip.

“Best part of waking up,” John mumbled, tipping his hat before shuffling off to his corner nook.

“Isn’t it just?” Michelle agreed, though her own eyes betrayed a weariness that no amount of caffeine could mask. She poured another cup, the warm porcelain familiar in her grasp, but her mind was elsewhere—stuck on last night’s disastrous date.

“Another one bites the dust, huh?” teased Emily, her part-time barista, as she caught Michelle’s eye from behind the coffee grinder.

“Ugh, don’t remind me.” Michelle forced out a chuckle, leaning against the counter. “I swear my dating profile must have ‘hopeless’ stamped across it.”

“Or ‘adventurous enough to experiment with potential disasters,’” Emily quipped, delivering an Americano to a waiting customer.

“Ha, that’s one way to put it.” Michelle rolled her hazel eyes, tucking a stray lock of hair behind her ear. The bell above the door jingled, announcing another patron seeking refuge in her caffeinated haven.

“Welcome to The Coffee Loft,” she called out reflexively, her smile back in place like a well-worn mask. The new arrival nodded, eyes glued to their phone, as they joined the queue.

“Maybe I should just become a hermit. Start a new trend, single and definitely not ready to mingle.” She grabbed a rag, wiping down the already pristine counter with more vigor than necessary.

“Or you could start collecting cats now, get ahead of the curve,” Emily suggested, earning herself an exaggerated groan from Michelle.

“Thanks, but I’ll stick to coffee beans, not feline beings,” Michelle retorted, tossing the rag aside and preparing for the next order.

“Good choice. You’re more of a people person anyway,” Emily smiled, and Michelle couldn’t help but return it, genuine warmth seeping back into her weary bones.

“Can’t argue with that,” she admitted, then winked. “Now, let’s turn these grumps into morning people, one cup at a time.”

“Roger that, boss.” Emily saluted playfully before turning her attention to the next customer in line.

Michelle took a deep breath, letting the rich aroma of coffee grounds anchor her. Maybe her romantic escapades were less romcom and more cautionary tale, but here, within these walls, she was the queen of her domain, serving joy one latte at a time. For now, that was all the love affair she needed.

As the early morning rush continued, the Coffee Loft was a symphony of clinking mugs and the murmur of morning conversations. However, it did little to keep Michelle's mind from returning to her disastrous date from the night before. She poured another cappuccino, the frothy heart atop the dark brew mocking her own love life. The guy from last night – what was his name again? Ryan? Ronan? – had been a walking disaster in human form, believing he was some kind of reincarnated Viking. Complete with a braided beard and all.

“Hey, Michelle, you’ve got that look again,” Emily teased from behind the espresso machine. “Rethinking about starting your cat collection again?”

Michelle chuckled despite the sting of truth in her friend's jest. “I might be one bad date away from adopting a whole litter.”

“Spinsterhood isn't for you. You make too good a cup of joe to ever be left on the shelf.” Emily winked, handing over the next coffee order.

“Thanks, Emily. But if I am destined for it, I'll revolutionize it. I'll start a blog, ‘Diaries of a Dateless Barista.’”

“Ha, I'd subscribe to that.” Emily chuckled, then turned to greet the next customer.

As Michelle handed over a black coffee to Mr. Henderson, she heard the familiar, boisterous voice of Mrs. Shomacker punctuate the air from the back of the line.

“Can you believe it? Jeff Parker, of all people,” Mrs. Shomacker's tone carried a mix of scandal and relish.

“Jeff Parker? The bartender from The Rusty Hinge?” her friend, Mrs. Balster, questioned with disbelief.

Michelle's grip on the ceramic mug tightened, curiosity piqued despite herself. Still, she remained mute, knowing she didn't have anything nice to say about the man. He'd bruised her ego plenty when he burned her badly a year ago.

“Yep, that Jeff,” Mrs. Shomacker said, loud enough for neighboring towns to hear. “Apparently, he’s turning over a new leaf, starting with investing in a more respectable career.”

“Turning over a new leaf,” Michelle muttered under her breath with a frown and a shake of her head. Jeff Parker—Hero’s most notorious commitment dodger of anything serious—was, as far as she knew, only good at leaving a trail of exasperations and eye-rolls in his wake.

“Michelle, dear, did you hear about Jeff?” Mrs. Shomacker now stood before her, eyes gleaming with the juicy tidbit.

“Uh, no, Mrs. Shomacker, can’t say that I have,” Michelle replied, maintaining her professional smile while already steadying herself from the gossip that was sure to spill forth.

“Well, let me tell you…” The older woman leaned in, oblivious to the growing line behind her.

“Actually, Mrs. Shomacker, would you mind if we chatted after the rush?” Michelle interjected, gesturing to the others waiting patiently for their caffeine fix.

“Of course, dear, of course,” she nodded, collecting her coffee with a huff and retreating to a nearby table with her friend. They continued to buzz like bees over the latest nectar of neighborhood news.

“Saved by the bell, or should I say, the queue?” Emily quipped, sliding a fresh tray of pastries onto the counter.

“Something like that,” Michelle replied, shaking off the lingering thoughts of dating mishaps and small-town gossip. “Next,” she called out cheerily, ready to move the line along.

The aroma of freshly ground coffee beans wafted through the Coffee Loft as Michelle expertly navigated the mid-morning rush. Her hands moved with a practiced grace that made the complicated dance of milk frothing and espresso pulling look easy. Her blonde bob bounced with each step she took, her hazel eyes sparkling as she handed over another perfectly crafted latte with a flourish.

“Double espresso, please,” came a voice from the line, but Michelle’s attention was snared by snippets of conversation drifting from the corner table where Mrs. Shomacker held court.

“Jeff Parker as a cop...can you imagine? With a dog, no less.”

Michelle nearly dropped the mocha in her hand. What on earth could make Jeff Parker want to stop serving drinks and instead make people serve time behind bars? She glanced sideways, trying to eavesdrop without making it obvious. A German shepherd called Winston is his partner, Mrs. Shomacker told her friends. Michelle shook her head slightly, thinking, Jeff Parker, of all people, a K9 handler.

“Michelle?” The customer at the counter waved a hand to catch her distracted gaze.

“Sorry about that. Double shot caramel macchiato on its way.” She forced her focus back to the espresso machine, tamping down the grounds with more force than necessary.

“Jeff’s always been good with his fists, not so much with care and commitment,” she muttered under her breath, steaming milk until it screamed for release.

“Did I hear you say something about Jeff Parker?” asked the customer, a regular who seemed all too eager to jump into the local gossip pool.

She shook her head, knowing that talking about someone wasn’t a good look. “Here’s your order,” Michelle told the gray-haired woman as she handed her the cup. “Have a nice day.”

“So, you might have been able to avoid talking about the news with Mrs. Collins, but you have to dish to me your thoughts on Jeff’s new vocation,” Emily pressed.

“Looks like he’s trading in his cocktail shaker for a handcuff key,” Michelle jested with a shrug. “Cheers to a new career path.”

“You can’t seriously tell me you believe that Jeff Parker is giving up his life behind the bar for a life putting people behind them?” Emily questioned with a quirk of her eyebrow.

“I know, right? I just can’t picture him with a dog either,” Michelle replied, flashing a quick grin before sliding a cup of coffee across the counter to her next customer.

“Maybe the dog will teach him a thing or two about loyalty,” Emily joked, handing a different customer a pastry.

“Or the other way around,” Michelle quipped back, laughter bubbling up despite the absurdity.

She moved to the next order, but her thoughts were still swirling with images of Jeff and this mysterious Winston. Was there more to Jeff than late-night brawls and smirking dismissals? Had she missed something, or was it that she wasn’t motivated enough for him to change? That idea stung in a way she hadn’t expected, and she quickly tried to push it away.

“Skinny vanilla latte, please,” said the next customer, breaking into her internal thoughts.

“Coming right up,” Michelle responded, but as she pumped syrup into the cup, her mind wandered. Why did Jeff, with his careless attitude, deserve a loyal companion while she was still alone? She couldn’t help but feel bitter, knowing she had more nurturing in one pinky finger than he did in his entire body. As she handed her next customer his drink with a forced smile, she did her best to push her frustrated feelings aside.

“Here you go, enjoy,” she added routinely, plastering on her bright smile like armor against the confusing news.

“Thanks,” the regular said before taking off for a corner table.

Hoping to busy herself with chores, Michelle made her way around the coffee shop. She made sure to wipe down all the tables before the next batch of caffeine seekers arrived. When she approached Mrs. Shomacker’s table, she looked up with a wide grin. “Finally ready to hear the most interesting part about the Jeff Parker news?” The older woman didn’t wait for Michelle to respond. Instead, she continued on without missing a beat. “The dog he was assigned already saved a kid lost in the woods when he was just a puppy. That was why he was put in the search and rescue program.”

“Really?” Michelle’s eyebrows shot up in surprise despite herself.

“Yep. Turns out, a true hero’s partner is coming to our Hero, Texas.” Mrs. Shomacker nodded in approval, then turned back to Mrs. Balster and Mrs. Collins to go on about the details of the pup’s rescue, leaving Michelle to ponder on her own.

“Hero’s partner, huh?” she whispered, half exasperated, half impressed, as she returned to the counter. Could a leopard—or rather, a roughneck bartender—really change his spots? That was the true question that needed answering.

“Hey, Michelle, you’re zoning out again. Order up,” Emily called from the other end of the counter.

“Right, sorry,” Michelle snapped back to action, her mind still wrapping around the idea of Jeff with a badge and a German shepherd partner. Guess we’ll just have to see how this plays out, she thought to herself.

She turned back to her customers, ready to face the rest of the day with a steamer in hand and her signature smile, all the while wondering if perhaps she’d underestimated the man who once topped her list of dating disasters.

Chapter Two

Jeff Parker, his brown hair and brand new academy uniform tousled from his K9 partner Winston's incessant morning play, stumbled into the Coffee Loft with the gait of a man who hadn't quite adjusted to his new four-legged shadow. The German shepherd at his side was more whirlwind than dog, and Jeff's grip on the leash was white-knuckled. It was as if he were holding onto the last shred of his sanity.

"Easy there, buddy," Jeff muttered under his breath, scanning the shop for the least chaotic spot to order his much-needed caffeine fix.

"Jeff, come join us," Mrs. Shomacker's voice cut through the hum of coffee grinders and indie music.

He glanced over at the older woman and pressed his lips together in apprehension. Getting caught up in her gossip was the last thing he needed, considering if he didn't hurry, he would be late for his first day at the academy. He wouldn't have even stepped foot in the Coffee Loft in the first place if it hadn't been for a long weekend with his furry companion. He was exhausted and needed caffeine to make it through the day.

With a heavy sigh, he waved to Mrs. Shomacker and called out, "I need to get my coffee to go so I won't be late." He turned toward the counter, deciding it would be the fastest way to get out of there.

That's when he realized he was going to have to deal with his ex. Michelle was handing over a coffee to a customer, her smile as bright and clear as the day they first met back in high school. Her blonde hair caught the early light streaming through the windows, and her hazel eyes sparkled with a mischief that belied the fine lines etched in her brow.

"Hey, Michelle. Can I get a black coffee to go?" Jeff's order was rushed, the leash in his hand jerking as Winston made a lunge toward a pastry display. "Sorry, still getting this guy used to—"

"Small town life?" she finished for him with a chuckle, filling a cup with hot coffee before stepping out from behind the counter. She was in her element among the coffee beans and scones. He suspected her laughter was the secret ingredient that kept locals coming back day after day.

"Something like that," Jeff mused, but before he could elaborate, Winston made a break for it, charging toward a tower of artisanal coffee bags.

"Whoa, Winston," Jeff's voice rose in alarm, but it was too late. The display wobbled dangerously, then cascaded down just as Michelle reached out with a steaming cup meant for Jeff.

"Hot coffee incoming," she warned, but in vain. The dark liquid sloshed over the front rim, bathing the floor—and Jeff's shoes—in a warm, fragrant flood.

"Oh no, I'm so—"

"Sorry? Yeah, me too." Jeff watched the chaos unfold, heat creeping up his neck as he awkwardly bent down to help Michelle right the display, their hands brushing in the process. It was electric, the connection unmistakable even amid the disaster.

"Your shoes..." Michelle bit her lip, stifling a laugh as she surveyed the damage.

“Least of my worries,” Jeff said, trying to force a smile. His thoughts swirled, memories of their time together threatening to surface, but he shoved them away. Now wasn’t the time.

“Looks like someone needs a crash course in canine calamity,” she quipped, her tone light but her gaze heavy with an unspoken history.

“Or a vat of coffee,” Jeff shot back, meeting her eyes for a split second before looking away. They were treading familiar ground, the kind where laughter edged too close to something deeper.

“Let’s get you cleaned up.” Michelle motioned toward the restroom. “First-day jitters?”

“Feels like it,” Jeff admitted, following her lead. The weight of the leash in his hand was a reminder of the responsibilities waiting for him beyond these walls. Responsibilities that felt far heavier than a spilled cup and a toppled display.

“Hey, Michelle?” He paused at the bathroom door, Winston finally standing still beside him. “Thanks.”

“Sure thing, Jeff.” Her smile didn’t waver, but it didn’t reach her eyes either.

“Guess I better go tackle the clean-up,” Jeff said, though every fiber of his being wanted to linger in the safe harbor of her presence.

“Let me know if you need anything,” she encouraged before returning behind the counter.

With one last nod toward his ex, Jeff pushed through the door. The click of Winston’s claws on the tile echoed beside him like a countdown to all the uncertainties ahead.

Jeff twisted the faucet, cold water splashing onto his hands as he scrubbed at the coffee stain blossoming on his shirt. Winston whined softly, nudging Jeff’s leg with his snout, sensing the tension in his partner’s movements.

“Bad enough, you’re sabotaging my first impression without bringing up old memories, buddy,” Jeff muttered to the dog, who tilted his head in confusion. Of course, he knew old memories have a way of doing that. His mind drifted back to the day he ended things with Michelle a year ago. He’d done it through a text like a coward, using the lamest excuse ever; telling her that he couldn’t imagine a life filled with endless line dancing and karaoke.

Jeff shut off the water and reached for a paper towel. He dabbed futilely at the wet fabric, aware that Winston’s gaze was fixed on him. “I wasn’t expecting that, you know,” Jeff mumbled to the German shepherd. “Our spectacularly unplanned combustion, but I also shouldn’t have been surprised by it. We never had a problem with chemistry. That was always there. It was about the fact I couldn’t give her what she wanted, so I decided to ditch before she got too invested.”

He knew it wasn’t right, but it hadn’t stopped him. It never did, and it was the reason he was still single. Not that he had time to date now that he was starting to train at the search and rescue academy.

“Yep, just another testament to my impeccable knack for ruining a good thing.” Jeff gave a dry chuckle, tossing the soggy paper towel into the trash. Winston, sensing the shift in mood, barked once, short and sharp.

Jeff patted his leg, signaling Winston to follow him as he made his way out of the restroom. The cool metal of the door handle felt comforting under his palm, a stark contrast to the emotional turmoil rolling inside him.

“All right, buddy,” he said, looking down at the dog, “let’s go show them what we’ve got.”

“Were you able to get everything under control?” Michelle called out as he re-entered the main part of the shop.

He nodded. “Though I’m not sure how long it’s going to last.”

“Just remember, you need to deal with one disaster at a time,” she told him as she handed him another coffee to go.

“Got it. One disaster at a time,” Jeff echoed as he took the offered beverage. “Hear that, boy? We’re on disaster duty.”

Winston barked with an enthusiasm that made Jeff laugh despite himself. With a final pat on his canine partner’s head, he braced himself for the day ahead as they stepped out into the bright sunlight. Jeff cast a backward glance at the Coffee Loft, the bell above the door still chiming from his exit. Michelle stood on the other side, coffee-stained apron and all, with a look that suggested she might just believe in letting go of the past—or at least in the humor of awkward run-ins with exes.

“Come on, Winston,” Jeff muttered, tugging gently on the leash. The German shepherd was planted firmly on the sidewalk, nose twitching as it traced the intricate tapestry of scents that Hero had to offer. The academy wasn’t far, just a short walk to the edge of town, but if Winston refused to cooperate, it was going to feel like the longest walk off a short plank. “We don’t have time for this, buddy.”

The K9’s response was to sniff a lamppost with increased interest, tail wagging obliviously.

“Disaster duty means being punctual,” Jeff reminded the dog, checking his watch.

Ten minutes until he was officially late. That wasn’t how he wanted to start his first day at the academy. Danny and Hunter would never let him hear the end of it.

“Seriously, Winston, we gotta hustle.” He pulled a little firmer this time, trying to infuse authority into his tone.

Winston finally lifted his head, brown eyes meeting Jeff’s own in a stare that said, ‘I go where I please.’ He took a few steps forward before spotting a squirrel and yanking Jeff sideways.

“Whoa, easy.” Jeff staggered, nearly losing his grip but managing to hold onto the German shepherd’s leash. He could practically hear Michelle’s laughter lingering in the air. It was like an echo from their past when things had been simpler, lighter—before he'd messed it up with a lie so thin it was transparent.

“Okay, okay,” Jeff conceded to Winston, who seemed determined to make a mockery of his attempt at discipline. “How about a compromise? You walk nicely now, and later, we’ll chase all the squirrels you want.”

Winston barked sharply, the sound piercing the quiet morning. To Jeff, it sounded suspiciously like canine laughter.

“Deal, then.” Jeff edged forward, coaxing the dog into movement. This time, Winston complied, albeit with a few more sniffs en route.

As they walked, Jeff’s mind drifted back to Michelle again. He couldn’t shake the image of the way her hazel eyes had held his gaze, the corners crinkling with suppressed amusement. Chemistry, despite everything, sparked between them like a faulty wire—a little dangerous, a lot compelling.

He wondered how she was after all this time. He imagined her line dancing late at night, her laughter echoing through the private garden behind the Coffee Loft. He wondered if she ever thought about him. If she ever regretted how things ended between them.

“Probably not,” he muttered to Winston, who looked up at him with a confused expression. “I was never going to be what she needed.”

They turned the corner, and Jeff could see the academy in the distance, a large brick building that housed the hopes and dreams of many like him.

“You ready, Winston?” he asked, looking down at the dog. Winston wagged his tail, his eyes bright with excitement. “New beginnings, right?” But the question mark to both inquiries hung heavy, tethered to doubts and what-ifs.

Jeff took a deep breath, squaring his shoulders. “Let’s just get through today without any more disasters,” he told Winston, hoping the universe wasn’t eavesdropping. Because, with the way things were going, he could use a little cosmic leniency.

Winston seemed to sense the urgency now, his strides matching Jeff's. They reached the academy doors with minutes to spare. Jeff pushed them open, stepping inside with a blend of relief and trepidation.

"Made it," he breathed out, a smile threatening to break free—until Winston decided to halt abruptly, nose down, tail up.

"Not again," Jeff groaned, realizing that disaster duty was more than just a figure of speech when it came to life with a K9 partner like Winston.

"Come on, buddy, let's not do this again," he begged as the seconds ticked by. "I'll give you any treat you want when we get back home tonight."

Winston didn't budge, and it only made Jeff more furious. He glanced down at his watch. Great, officially late. On his first day. How could it get worse?

Winston then did the most unexpected thing. He bolted toward the door of the classroom, causing it to swing wide open with unintended force. The obstinate bundle of fur and muscle made his grand entrance with Jeff trailing right behind him. The leash in Jeff's hand was pulled taut; a lifeline stretched to its limits.

"Easy, Winston," Jeff hissed, though his command fell on deaf ears—or perhaps defiant ones.

"Whoa, looks like someone's eager for class," Danny quipped from the front, his grin spreading across the room like wildfire.

"Or maybe just eager to leave his handler behind," Hunter chimed in, clearly unable to resist the jab.

Jeff shot them a look that could sour milk, but it was no use. Their laughter rippled through the room, a wave of mirth at his expense.

“Control your partner, Parker,” Charlie Buckworth called out from beside his two best friends, clearly not amused like the rest of them.

“Trying,” Jeff gritted his teeth, pulling back on the leash as Winston sniffed vigorously at a stack of textbooks, perilously close to toppling them. “Winston, heel.”

“Guess that’s one way to make an entrance,” a voice muttered from the front. Jeff didn’t need to look to know whose voice it was—Hunter’s jesting tone was unmistakable.

“Part of the training,” he shot back, trying to inject some levity into the moment. His attempt at humor felt as shaky as his grip on Winston.

“Training the dog or you?” Hunter’s retort was quick, slick with sarcasm.

“Both,” Jeff admitted under his breath. He gave another tug on the leash, and finally, Winston complied with a grudging step forward.

“All right, everyone, let’s settle down,” Danny announced, but the smirk playing on his lips betrayed his authoritative tone.

“Sorry about the...uh, disruption,” Jeff said, his face hot enough to fry an egg on. He guided Winston toward the back of the room, hoping to become part of the furniture—a coat rack, maybe, or a particularly large potted plant.

“Nothing to see here,” he murmured to Winston, who seemed utterly unrepentant. The canine simply plopped down, tongue lolling out as if he hadn’t just caused a minor spectacle.

“Sure, nothing to see except for your grand performance,” Hunter added, unable to resist one final poke.

“Sit tight, Winston,” Jeff instructed, more a plea than a command. He sank into a chair at the back, wishing it would swallow him whole. The last thing he needed was negative attention on his first day.

Let’s hope the rest of the day is less eventful, Jeff thought, stealing a glance toward the front. New beginnings, he reminded himself. As he sat there feeling the weight of every pair of eyes, he couldn't help but wonder if some beginnings were meant to start with a bang—or in his case, a crash.

Chapter Three

Just like every morning, the Coffee Loft buzzed with the morning rush. The scent of freshly ground beans mingled with the sound of milk frothing and cups clinking. Michelle perched behind the counter like a queen surveying her kingdom, serving up smiles and caffeine with equal zest. Above her, the loft's exposed beams, a small nod to the building's history as a turn of the century mercantile, gave the space a cozy embrace, while the gentle hum of conversation provided the soundtrack to her domain.

“Man, you wouldn't believe it,” Jeff's voice carried over from a corner table, cutting through the morning mayhem. His lanky frame was hunched over a cup of coffee that looked too small in his large hands.

“Hit me. How bad could it be?” Hunter leaned back in his chair, the image of casual ease with a smirk playing on his lips.

“Bad? I'm talking 'stepping on a rake' kind of day. You know, the kind that smacks you right in the face,” Jeff groaned, his thick head of brown hair flopping as he shook his head.

“Sounds like my first date with Avery,” Hunter quipped, earning a chuckle from Danny.

“Come on, don’t leave us hanging,” Danny prodded, his sureness evident even in the tilt of his head, his short brown hair catching the light. “We were there for the end, but we didn’t get to witness the beginning.”

“Let’s just say my time here yesterday was less...heroic than I would have preferred. Working with that dog is like trying to herd cats. Cats with sharp teeth and a taste for bartender flesh.” Jeff’s exaggerated grimace drew a hearty laugh from his friends.

Michelle couldn’t help but eavesdrop from her post at the espresso machine, the steam whistle a cover for her prying ears. She remembered all too well the sting when Jeff had blindsided her with the breakup. A part of her savored witnessing his misfortune because of it, yet as she watched him now, noting the way his shoulders drooped and a softening around his brown eyes she hadn’t seen before. She couldn’t help it when a bit of sympathy sneaked its way into her heart.

“Everyone has off days, man. Just dig into that grit I know you have deep down. You’ll get there,” Danny said, slapping Jeff’s back in encouragement.

“Yeah, just avoid any actual rakes,” Hunter added, his blue eyes twinkling with mirth.

“Har har,” Jeff muttered, but there was a small smile tugging at his lips, one that seemed sincere, almost vulnerable.

Michelle felt something tug inside her chest—a blend of compassion and curiosity. Had yesterday’s encounter been a catalyst for this introspection? He appeared more grounded, a stark contrast to the Jeff she’d dated a year ago.

“Hey, if you can survive Michelle’s glares, you can survive anything,” Hunter teased, earning an eye roll from Michelle, which didn’t go unnoticed by Jeff.

“True. Her coffee’s strong, but her scorn? That’s lethal,” Jeff replied, his gaze flickering toward Michelle, a silent acknowledgment of their shared history passing between them.

A sense of familiarity washed over her. She found herself wondering about the man he had become, the one she saw sitting before her now. It would have been easy to overlook the subtle changes that had taken place over the past year if she hadn't been looking. It almost made her wish things had gone differently between them, at least, until she remembered how he dumped her so unceremoniously through a two-line text of all things.

"I don't know about that. Jenesa and Avery have become good friends with her. She's a pretty great person," Danny pointed out. "It's all you if you get on her bad side."

"I know," Jeff agreed, his voice softer than before. "She was always too good for me, and I only proved that by how I ended things between us."

"If I didn't know any better, I would think that sounds like regret, Jeff," Hunter pointed out.

"Can't undo the past, so it really doesn't matter. Besides, I have to admit her coffee is something special, and at least now I can finally come back in here and get a cup again."

Michelle couldn't help but blush a little at the unexpected compliment, her heart thumping in her chest. She remained quiet; however, pretending that she didn't hear the conversation, she was pretty certain Jeff knew she was listening to.

"Well, we better get going if we don't want to be late for the second day," Danny said as he stood up and stretched, prompting his K9 partner to jump up from the floor.

"Today is the first day we teach practical skills in the testing grounds. You better be ready," Hunter warned Jeff as he joined his friend with his own canine companion. "It's going to be grueling."

"Then I better finish this cup before we go," Jeff said as he threw back the last of his coffee before jumping up to place the cup in the dish receptacle above the trash can. "I'm going to need all the help I can get."

Jeff stood there with Winston at his side. His posture was less of a swagger now, more of a contemplation. Michelle found herself oddly invested in whether this change was genuine or another shift in the winds of Jeff Parker's ever-fluctuating personality.

Okay, so he's thinking. People think, she rationalized to herself, but there was a niggling sensation that urged her to keep watching—to see if the growth she glimpsed was real.

“Focus, Michelle,” she whispered, turning her attention back to her work.

Yet, as Jeff's friends made their way to the door with their K9 partners by their sides, and it was just him alone against the backdrop of her coffee shop, Michelle's resolve wavered. Without fully understanding the impulse, she found herself calling out to him. “Hey, Jeff.”

He turned toward her, surprise etching his features. Jeff's eyes met hers, and for a moment, his gaze lingered on Michelle, a hint of curiosity in his eyes. “Yes?” he replied, his voice softer than she had ever heard it.

Michelle felt a flush creeping up her cheeks, but she held his gaze, determined to see this through. “I, uh, I just wanted to say that I'm glad you're back. And I hope, well, I hope you liked the coffee.”

Jeff smiled a genuine, warm smile that transformed his face. “I do. I really do. It's the best coffee I've had in a long time.”

Michelle felt a ridiculous surge of pride and happiness at his words. “I'm glad. Good luck today,” she said, her voice steady despite the sudden fluttering in her stomach.

“Thanks, Michelle.” His voice was vulnerable, lacking the usual bravado. “Means a lot.”

“Doesn't mean I'm not still mad at you,” she added quickly, the words tumbling out before she could stop them.

“Wouldn't expect any less,” he chuckled, the sound reaching her across the distance, disarming her with its sincerity.

“Go on, get out of here,” she teased, though her heart wasn’t quite in it. “Don’t want you to be late because of me again.”

“Wouldn’t dream of it,” he replied, a half-smile playing on his lips as he turned to leave.

“Idiot,” she murmured to herself, but her heart wasn’t in that either. There was a warmth spreading through her, unbidden and unexpected. It left her questioning everything she knew—or thought she knew—about Jeff Parker and about herself.

The bell above the door jingled, signaling the departure of her ex as he reached his best friends. They breezed out the door with their trio of canines, their banter fading into the morning air. Michelle stood rooted behind the counter, a cleaning rag forgotten in her hand, pondering the subtle shifts in the man she once thought she knew so well.

Michelle busied herself with wiping down the already gleaming counter, her movements robotic as she kept a side-eye on Jeff, who lingered just outside the shop. The morning sunlight caught in his tousled brown hair, casting a halo of warmth that belied the coolness she once felt from him. She shook her head slightly, chiding herself for noticing.

“Really?” she muttered under her breath, her hands pausing their circular dance on the countertop. “Watching him like some angsty teen with a crush?”

“Everything okay, Michelle?” a regular called out, snapping her back to the present.

“Perfect, Tom. Just daydreaming about...pastries,” she said, flashing her best customer-service smile.

“Make sure you’re baking and not brooding,” he joked before sipping his coffee and burying himself back into his newspaper.

“Brooding’s more Jeff’s thing,” she replied quietly, her gaze slipping back to her ex, who was now disappearing out of sight.

The bell above the door jingled again, and Michelle looked up, hoping to see Jeff returning, but it was only the wind making its way through the shop. She sighed, turning her attention back to the pastries and the routine of her day.

As the morning wore on, Michelle found herself increasingly distracted. She'd catch herself staring off into the distance, her thoughts consumed by Jeff and the strange warmth that had taken root in her chest. It was uncomfortable, this feeling, like a shoe that was a size too small. She wanted to kick it off, to go back to the way things were before when she knew exactly where she stood with him.

But as much as she wished it so, she couldn't deny the pull she felt toward him. It was like a magnet, drawing her in despite her best efforts to resist. She found herself watching for him out of the corner of her eye, hoping to catch a glimpse of him as he passed by the shop, perhaps on his lunch break.

The door opened again, this time with a rush of loud voices and the smell of teenage drama. Michelle braced herself, knowing exactly what was about to happen.

"Hi, welcome to the Coffee Loft," she greeted them with a smile plastering on her customer service face.

The group of teenagers didn't even look up; each one fixated on their phone screens while talking loudly amongst themselves. One of them finally glanced her way and rattled off the complicated names for their drinks.

"I want a venti double shot caramel soy latte with extra whip and drizzle," he said, his tone dripping with attitude.

Michelle fought the urge to roll her eyes. It always seemed like teenagers came in just to order the most complicated version of the trendiest drink they could think of.

"And I'll have a grande matcha green tea Frappuccino with almond milk and no whipped cream," another one chimed in quickly before turning back to her friends.

Michelle bit her tongue, resisting the urge to correct their pronunciation or lecture them on the importance of knowing where their food comes from. She took a deep breath and started typing in their orders, trying not to let their entitled attitudes bother her too much.

After repeating back all their orders correctly, despite some initial confusion due to them all having similar names, Michelle handed over their receipts and smiled at them. “Your drinks will be ready shortly.”

She wasn’t surprised when not a single one of them thanked her. Michelle couldn’t help but be amused as she watched them struggle to find seats together, acting as if it was the end of the world. As Michelle watched the group of teenagers bicker over seating arrangements, her thoughts drifted back to Jeff, who had captured her attention. She wondered what he was doing at that very moment and if he ever thought about her the way she thought about him.

Just as she finished the teenagers’ drinks and handed them out, the door opened again, this time with a soft chime that signaled the arrival of another customer. Michelle looked up, hoping to see Jeff, but instead, she saw Miss Betty and Miss Wilma, two older women with kind smiles and gentle eyes.

“Good afternoon, dear,” Miss Betty said, her voice like a soft breeze on a summer day. “I’d like a small drip coffee, please.”

“I’ll have the same,” Miss Wilma echoed.

Michelle smiled back, grateful for an easy order after all the commotion with the gaggle of teens. “Of course, coming right up.”

As she prepared the women’s coffee, Michelle couldn’t help but feel a sense of warmth and comfort in their presence. It was a stark contrast to the energy of the teenagers, who were still arguing over whose turn it was to buy the next round of drinks.

“Here you are, Miss Betty,” Michelle said, handing the woman her coffee with a smile. “Is there anything else I can get for you today?”

“Now that you mention it, I was hoping I might be able to set you up on a date with my grandson,” Miss Betty gently offered. "I'm telling you, my grandson would be perfect for you," the older woman insisted with conviction. "He's a hardworking young man with a good head on his shoulders."

Miss Wilma chuckled. "And I suppose my grandson isn't good enough for her?"

"Please, your grandson is too busy chasing after every pretty face in town," Miss Betty retorted playfully.

The two women continued their banter, debating over which one of their grandsons would make a better match for Michelle. As they chatted, Michelle couldn't help but feel a mixture of amusement and awkwardness at being the topic of discussion.

Deciding it was best if she politely turned them both down rather than let it go on, she gently said, "Thank you, ladies, but the Coffee Loft keeps me far too busy to date either of your grandsons right now."

"Oh, I see," Miss Betty murmured with disappointment. "Well, if you change your mind, do let us know."

As Michelle refilled the sugar and creamer containers, she couldn't help but overhear Miss Betty and Miss Wilma continue their conversation at the next table.

"Do you think she has someone special already?" Miss Wilma asked in a hushed tone.

Miss Betty leaned in closer as if sharing a secret. "I heard she has her eye on that former bartender who's attending the search and rescue academy now."

Michelle felt her heart skip a beat at the mention of Jeff. She tried to appear nonchalant as she continued her work, but inwardly she was shocked and, if she admitted it, a bit thrilled that they were discussing him.

Just as Miss Betty and Miss Wilma were about to continue their discussion, the door opened again. This time, it was Jeff himself who walked in with Winston right by his side.

"Speak of the devil," Miss Betty whispered excitedly to Miss Wilma.

Jeff smiled at them both and made his way over to the counter, where Michelle stood frozen in surprise.

“Hey there,” he said with a charming smile. “Can I get an iced coffee please?”

Michelle’s mind raced as she tried to compose herself before responding. She quickly grabbed a cup and started filling it with ice. “Of course,” she replied smoothly. “On break from the academy?”

Jeff nodded. “I had just enough time to get down here and grab a coffee before I need to head back.”

“You’re becoming a regular around here,” she observed as she placed the lid on his cup.

“What can I say? I’m addicted to your coffee,” Jeff replied, his eyes meeting Michelle’s for just a moment longer than necessary.

Michelle felt a blush creeping up her cheeks as she handed him his drink, and he flashed her a grin that made her heart race. “Well, I’m glad to hear that,” she said, trying to keep her voice steady.

Jeff took a sip, his brown eyes never leaving hers. “Mmm, just as good as always,” he murmured, his voice low and sultry.

Michelle couldn’t help but feel a little self-conscious under his gaze. She glanced over at Miss Betty and Miss Wilma, who were both watching the exchange with wide eyes. She cleared her throat, trying to regain her composure.

“W-well, I hope you enjoy,” she said, turning back to the counter.

Jeff chuckled, handing her some money and then placing a hand on her arm. “Oh, I will. Trust me.”

A bolt of electricity shot through Michelle’s body as his fingers brushed against her skin. She couldn’t help but look up at him, her eyes locking onto his deep, captivating gaze as her heart skipped a beat at the feel of his touch.

Jeff gave her a final knowing grin before turning around to saunter out of the shop, leaving Michelle to stand behind the counter with a confused look on her face.

Her chest was heaving as she tried to catch her breath. She knew she couldn't let herself get too carried away, but she couldn't deny the flutter in her chest and the rush of adrenaline coursing through her veins. Her eyes shifted to Miss Betty and Miss Wilma, who were still staring at her with eager anticipation. She flashed them a small grin before refocusing on the espresso machine, grateful for the distraction it provided from their attention.

The bell above the shop door jingled as another customer walked in, breaking the tension in the room. Michelle took a deep breath, shaking off the lingering effects of Jeff's touch. She greeted the newcomer with a warm smile, grateful for the interruption.

As she expertly crafted the customer's drink, her mind was still racing with thoughts of Jeff. Her cheeks flushed a rosy hue as she recalled their conversation and his charming smile. She couldn't help but feel flustered and slightly breathless, even after he had left. The way his deep voice resonated in her ears and the way his piercing brown eyes locked onto hers had left a lasting impression.

Miss Betty and Miss Wilma were still watching her, their expressions curious and expectant. Michelle couldn't help but wonder what they were thinking. Were they imagining a future date on the horizon the way she was? Michelle felt her cheeks grow warm at the thought as she smiled to herself, feeling a sense of excitement and anticipation for the next time Jeff came into her shop for a cup of coffee.

Chapter Four

The neon sign buzzed like a trapped fly against the window, casting an otherworldly glow over Jeff's brooding figure. His third rough day in a row had muddled into a haze of lukewarm beer and the distant cheers from a football game he couldn't muster the energy to care about.

"Rough day, huh?" the voice slithered through Jeff's fog of self-pity, accompanied by the cloying scent of too-sweet perfume.

"Something like that," he muttered, not bothering to look up from his glass.

"Want some company?" the barfly perched on a neighboring stool, her red lipstick a slash of defiance against the dinginess of the bar.

Jeff finally glanced at her, taking in the too-tight black dress and hopeful glint in her blue eyes. "Thanks, but no thanks." His voice was a gravel road—short and likely to jostle a person if they weren't careful.

"Your loss, handsome." She huffed, her disappointment puffing around her like a disappointed cloud as she wobbled off to find another mark.

He watched her go, the familiar tug of temptation gnawing at his resolve. Old Jeff would've said yes before she'd even finished her sentence. The new Jeff didn't want to wake up one morning, staring down the barrel of what-could-have-been with nothing but stale memories for company.

"Still determined to turn over a new leaf?" Greg's voice came from behind the bar, a smirk audible in his words.

"Something like that," Jeff grumbled again, spinning the beer coaster between his fingers.

"Looks painful," Greg observed, polishing a glass with a rag that had seen better days.

"Feels it too," Jeff admitted, his gaze lingering on the door as if it promised salvation.

"Got plans, then? Going to charm the world with that crooked nose and your dubious wit?" Greg chuckled, the sound echoing hollowly in the nearly empty bar.

Jeff had taught the younger man everything he knew, never realizing that he was going to be his replacement once he quit working at The Rusty Hinge.

"Maybe I will," Jeff shot back, the ghost of a smile playing on his lips. "Can't be worse than this."

"Hey, don't knock it. This—" Greg gestured grandly to the dimly lit room. "—is the stuff dreams are made of."

"But the dreams get stale. Trust me," Jeff grumbled. "Give it a few years." He pushed off from the bar, feeling the weight of every mistake he'd ever made dragging at his heels. There was a life out there beyond these sticky floors and the bottom of a glass, and he was going to do whatever it took to find it.

"Where you headed?" Greg called after him, but Jeff didn't turn back.

"Anywhere but here," he said simply, stepping into the cool night air, leaving behind the comfort of familiar shadows.

The clang of the bar's back door shutting behind him was like a definitive period at the end of a long, rambling sentence full of regrets. Jeff stood for a moment, his breath visible in the night air, eyes adjusting to the stark difference between the amber glow of streetlights and the dim interior he'd just left.

“Jeff, hey, hold up.”

He turned to see Hunter jogging toward him with Avery in tow; her arm looped through his as they navigated the uneven sidewalk. Avery's laughter floated to him, a sound filled with genuine warmth.

“Didn't expect to see you out here,” Jeff said, stuffing his hands into his pockets.

“We're on dessert duty,” Hunter explained, his smile easy. “Avery's genius needs some last-minute ingredients.”

“Ah, the perils of culinary perfection,” Jeff quipped, glancing at Avery's sheepish grin.

“Exactly,” Avery chimed in, her green eyes twinkling. “But hey, we're not just here to raid the grocery store. We were actually hoping to run into you.”

“Planning a late-night intervention?” Jeff raised an eyebrow.

“Something like that,” Hunter answered with a serious undertone. “We wanted to invite you to church with us this Sunday.”

“Church?” Jeff echoed, the word feeling foreign on his tongue.

“Yep,” Avery confirmed. “It's...different, but good different.”

“Good different could be good,” Jeff mused, more to himself than them. Could hymns and sermons really scrub clean the tarnish of countless nights wasted?

“Come on,” Hunter encouraged, clapping Jeff on the shoulder. “What have you got to lose?”

“Besides my reputation as a heathen?” But Jeff felt the corners of his mouth twitch upward. “Sure, why not?”

“Great.” Avery beamed, her enthusiasm contagious. “We'll save you a seat.”

“Got it,” Jeff chuckled with a nod. The idea didn’t seem so preposterous now, not with these two lighting up the night with their easy banter. Maybe this was just the change he was looking for.

THE TALL WOODEN doors of the church loomed before him, somehow more intimidating than any bouncer he’d faced in his years of bar hopping. Inside, the air was filled with the scent of polished pews and quiet anticipation. Jeff slid into a back row, hoping Avery would understand if he wasn’t ready to sit close to the front. His gaze skimmed over bowed heads and clasped hands.

Then he saw her—Michelle, sunlight incarnate, blonde hair catching the stained-glass colors as she sat near the front. His heart did a strange leap, then settled into a rhythm that spelled trouble with a capital T.

“Quite the turnout,” he whispered to himself, watching as Michelle flipped through a hymnal.

Jeff took a deep breath, steeling himself for whatever was coming next.

As the choir began to sing, their voices soaring high above the congregation, Jeff felt a strange sense of peace wash over him. It was as if each note was a tiny stitch, mending the frayed edges of his soul. He watched as Michelle sang along, her lips moving silently, her eyes closed in rapture. He couldn’t help but be drawn to her, to the light that seemed to radiate from her very being.

The sermon was about forgiveness and second chances, about letting go of your past misdeeds and giving your life to God. The pastor spoke with a quiet intensity, his words resonating deep within Jeff’s chest. He found himself nodding along, his thoughts echoing the message. Forgiveness, he realized, was something he desperately needed.

As the service ended and the congregation began to file out, Jeff hesitated. He wasn’t ready to leave yet, not when he felt like he’d only just begun to understand. He watched as Michelle stood, her eyes meeting his for a brief moment before she turned and walked away. He couldn't resist; something about her pulled at him. It urged him to follow her, to learn more about this goodness that seemed to spill out of her at every encounter.

"Michelle," he greeted as he approached, trying for casual and landing somewhere closer to awkwardly hopeful.

"Jeff?" Her hazel eyes held surprise and something that might have been pleasure. "What brings you here? Didn't peg you for the church type," Michelle said, her eyebrow arched playfully.

"Neither did I." Jeff shoved his hands into his pockets and shrugged. "But I'm glad I came."

"Me too," she replied with a wide smile that made his heart seize with delight, and there it was—that spark of connection that couldn't be faked or forced.

"Enjoy the sermon?" She folded her arms over her chest, the corners of her mouth lifting in genuine curiosity.

"Actually...yeah." He nodded, surprised by his own admission. "It wasn't what I expected."

"Life's funny like that," she mused, her eyes twinkling with humor.

"Listen, about before..." He trailed off, rubbing the back of his neck, feeling the weight of his past mistakes.

"Jeff," she interrupted gently, placing a hand on his arm. "It's okay."

"Is it? I was a jerk." His words were blunt, unvarnished truth. "I wish I had handled things differently back then."

"Timing is everything," Michelle told him. "But for what it's worth, I always suspected the real reason. You weren't ready, Jeff. And that's why it was okay."

"Even so, I need you to hear me." He finally looked up, searching her face. "Because I've been wanting to say sorry for a while now. Just never knew how to or if I should."

“Apologies are like bandages,” she said, stepping closer. “Sometimes they help heal, and sometimes they’re just a temporary cover-up.”

“Then consider this a belated attempt at antiseptic.” He took a deep breath. “Michelle, I’m sorry—for using your hobbies as an excuse, for not being honest, for...everything.”

The apology lingered in the air between them like the remnants of a storm clearing. He let out a sigh of relief when she finally said, “Apology accepted, Jeff. But next time, skip the ridiculous excuses.” Her grin was genuine now, and Jeff felt a knot loosen inside him.

“Next time, huh?” He raised an eyebrow, allowing a sliver of hope to enter his tone.

“Let’s not get ahead of ourselves,” she teased with a laugh.

Jeff nodded, his eyes never leaving hers. “Yeah, maybe we can start over as friends. I’d like that.”

The words hung in the air for a few moments as if unsure if they’d been spoken out loud. Michelle studied Jeff as if searching for any hint of insincerity.

“I’d like that too,” she said, smiling genuinely. “Friends it is.”

“Thank goodness.” A wave of relief washed over him as he grinned in return. “I owe you a dinner out on me.”

“Deal.” Her laughter mingled with the clinking of keys and rustling programs as the congregation filed out as she reached out and shook his hand, causing a shot of electricity to scurry up his arm. Her eyes grew round with surprise as their eyes locked with acknowledgment of what just passed between them. “I’ll hold you to that.”

“Fair enough.” Jeff’s eyes crinkled with amusement, holding onto her hand a little longer than was actually necessary. “I’m good for it.”

“See that you are.” Her playful warning lingered as she gently removed her hand from his.

“Hey, Michelle,” a voice called out, slicing through their bubble. It was time to retreat before he made a fool of himself any further. As he stepped away, however, he didn’t expect to knock right into a man holding a tray of communion wafers. The tiny, circular crackers scattered to the floor like snowflakes, crunching underfoot as people continued to make their way out of the church.

“I am so sorry,” Jeff exclaimed, bending down to help pick up the fragments.

Michelle knelt down, too, and began to help gather the wafers. “No worries, Jeff,” she said with a smile, her eyes twinkling. “I think God will forgive us.”

As they stood up, Jeff couldn’t help but feel a warmth in his chest. Maybe Michelle was right. Maybe forgiveness was possible, even for someone like him. This was it. Time to dive off the deep end. He smiled, brushing a few lingering crumbs from his hands. “I was wondering—”

“Michelle, dear,” the interruption came like a thunderclap, shattering the moment.

Mrs. Shomacker. Jeff’s internal groan could’ve echoed in the high rafters. The woman bore down on them like a ship full sail.

“Did you hear about the bazaar?” Mrs. Shomacker clutched at Michelle’s arm, her voice shrill with excitement.

“Uh, no, I haven’t.” Michelle’s attention pivoted, the shift leaving Jeff adrift.

“Next Saturday. You simply must bring your delightful scones. The community would be so disappointed without them.”

“Sure, Mrs. Shomacker, I’ll make sure to—” Michelle began, but the older woman was relentless and didn’t wait for her to finish.

“And Jeff, dear boy.” Mrs. Shomacker now turned her beady eyes on him. “We need strong men to set up the tables. Can we count on you?”

“Uh, sure, I guess...” Jeff’s response was automatic, his brain still scrambling to recover from the lost opportunity.

“Excellent.” Mrs. Shomacker patted Michelle’s hand before bustling away, a tornado of enthusiasm and mumu dress.

“Looks like you’re roped in,” Michelle said, her grin teasing.

“Seems so.” Jeff tried to match her levity, but inside, frustration simmered.

“It was good seeing you here.”

“It was good seeing you, too, Michelle.” There was a sincerity in her words that resonated with him, a genuine kindness that he hadn’t experienced from her in a long time.

“Anyway, I should go help Mrs. Balster clean up.” She gestured toward the back of the church where volunteers were gathering up hymnals.

“Right.” Jeff nodded, feeling the moment slip through his fingers like sand. “About what I was going to say...”

“Can it wait? I really do need to go help, but I’ll see you around, okay,” Michelle told him before turning away, leaving Jeff with a sense that something new was on the horizon for them.

He knew he couldn’t let himself get too carried away. After all, they had only just started talking again recently, and the seal on their friendship was only a couple of seconds old. Yet, the way she had looked at him, the way she had reacted when he touched her, he couldn’t shake the feeling that there was something there, something real and tangible. Maybe he was finally on the path to redemption, and maybe, just maybe, he’d end up patching things up with Michelle along the way.

“Man, you really missed your window there, huh?” Hunter’s voice snuck up behind him, ribbing him with a knowing smirk.

“Shut it, Hunter.” There was, however, no real heat in Jeff’s words. Just the slow burn of hope mixed with apprehension. He'd get another shot. He had to.

Hunter raised his hands in mock surrender. "All right, all right. I'll lay off. But you gotta admit, it's good to see you like this. You've been moping around for days."

His friend wasn't wrong. Things hadn't been going exactly smoothly at the academy for Jeff, and it was nice to have something to look forward to for once. "I know. But I don't want to rush things. I don't want to mess this up again."

Hunter clapped him on the back. "That's the spirit. Take it slow, but don't let this opportunity slip away. You've got a second chance, my friend. They don't come around all the time. Don't blow it."

Jeff nodded, feeling a newfound determination. He watched as Michelle moved around the room, helping volunteers and chatting with church members. He knew it wouldn't be easy, but he was ready to try his best to win her heart back. He wanted to show her that he was a changed man, that he was worthy of her trust and affection. He knew it wouldn't be easy, as old habits die hard, but he was determined to prove himself to her.

Chapter Five

Michelle maneuvered behind the counter like a conductor orchestrating a caffeinated overture, her blonde hair pulled back in a short ponytail, hazel eyes sparkling with an energy that defied the early hour.

“Triple shot, extra hot, no foam latte for Mr. Sleepyhead at table four,” she announced, placing the steaming mug on the counter with a flourish that earned a chuckle from the groggy recipient. “Maybe I should have made it a quad, though I think the surgeon general might have frowned upon that. Three’s already pushing it.”

As the door chimed again, she glanced up to see Jeff Parker stride in, his six-four frame and tousled brown hair impossible to miss. His nose, crooked from tales untold, added character to his ruggedly handsome face—a stark contrast to the delicate porcelain and polished wood of The Coffee Loft. Winston happily trotted right beside him.

“Morning, Michelle,” Jeff greeted, his voice a smooth baritone that seemed to stir the air itself.

“Jeff. Right on time,” she beamed, tapping her watch. “Your internal clock is more reliable than our ancient coffee grinder.”

“Can’t start my day without your magic potion,” he quipped, leaning against the counter, arms crossed, a playful smirk painting his lips. “Make me the special one from the other day.”

Michelle turned to craft his signature drink, a concoction of caramel infused courage with a dash of secret spices, adding little touches like swirls of syrup on top and extra sprinkles of cinnamon. As she crafted her final touch of a healthy helping of homemade whipped cream, she imagined him savoring each sip, perhaps thinking of her when the sweetness hit his tongue.

“Here you go—the ‘Parker Pick-Me-Up,’” she said, sliding the cup across the counter. Her special creations had become the stuff of local legend, whispered about in the same breath as juicy town gossip and magical snow on Valentine’s Day.

“Ah, Michelle,” Jeff sighed after his first taste, eyes closing in appreciation. “You sure know how to make a cup of joe feel loved.”

She watched his Adam’s apple bob with each gulp, her heart twinging a bit when she saw the bottom of the empty cup. “So, it passed the test again?”

“Passed? It sets the bar,” he chuckled, locking eyes with her. “Seriously, nobody does coffee like you do.”

“Thanks, Jeff,” she replied, feeling a blush warm her cheeks. Her thoughts raced—was it just the coffee he liked, or was there something more? Was he coming back to spend time with her? She sure hoped so.

“Anyway, I better head out. Big day ahead,” Jeff said, standing to leave. “Thanks for the fuel.”

“Anytime,” she murmured, disappointment clouding her gaze as she watched his retreating figure. He pushed open the door, sunlight framing him for a fleeting moment before he vanished into the day. Was he ever going to ask her out on an official date?

“See you this afternoon?” Michelle called after him, a hopeful lilt in her voice.

“Wouldn’t miss it,” Jeff’s response floated back, lifting her spirits as the door fell shut.

She let out a sigh, her fingers absently tracing the rim of his empty cup. The shop felt emptier without his presence. The afternoon couldn’t come soon enough.

As her day continued, the Coffee Loft buzzed with the mid-week rush. Amid the clink of cups and hiss of the espresso machine, a distinct chatter rose above the din.

“Harold Bernstein’s back in town,” cackled one of the gossiping grandmas, her voice at an unintentional shout due to a malfunctioning hearing aid. “And did you hear about his wife?”

“Cheated on him, the poor dear,” another added, the volume of her own aid betraying her attempt at discretion.

Michelle stifled a chuckle as she wiped down the counter, the grandmas’ conversation not as private as they believed. Harold Bernstein, high school valedictorian turned heartbroken divorcé, was back. That would stir the pot.

“Such a scandal,” the first grandma boomed. “In our little town.”

“Scandalous indeed,” Michelle muttered under her breath with a shake of her head.

“Can you believe it?” a third grandma interjected, loudly stirring her coffee. “With the yoga instructor, of all people.”

The circle of grandmas gasped collectively, sending ripples through their caffeinated beverages. In their animated state, however, disaster struck. A wayward elbow sent a latte flying across the room, splattering over the leather-clad arm of a burly biker sitting nearby.

“Hey,” the biker stood, his voice deep and thunderous, dark eyes drilling into the horrified grandmas. “This jacket was a gift from my mother.”

“Oopsie,” one granny squeaked, her hands fluttering to her mouth.

“Sorry, dear,” another added, frantically patting her pink-tinted gray hair as though that could undo the damage.

Michelle sprang into action, grabbing a clean towel. “I’m so sorry, sir,” she said, approaching the fuming man, who must be just passing through town since she’d never seen him before. “Let me help you with that.”

His scowl softened slightly at her earnest approach. “This better come out,” he grumbled, arms crossed as he watched her dab at the brown liquid.

“Trust me, I’ve got this,” Michelle assured him, her movements gentle yet efficient. “And your next coffee is on the house. Or a scone, if that’ll help ease the pain.”

The biker huffed a laugh, a smile tugging at the edge of his lips. “Make it a bear claw, and we’re square.”

“Deal,” Michelle replied with a grin, her heart rate decelerating. She turned to the grandmas, who were now whispering apologies at a much more reasonable decibel.

“Maybe keep the Harold Bernstein commentary to a low roar, ladies?” Michelle suggested good-naturedly.

“Of course, dear,” they chimed, nodding vigorously, their embarrassment evident.

“Besides,” she continued, leaning in conspiratorially, “I heard the yoga instructor’s side of the story, and let’s just say—it takes two to tango.”

The grandmas erupted in laughter, their attention shifting from scandal to speculation. Michelle’s quick wit had defused the tension, leaving the shop once again wrapped in a warm hum of camaraderie and the rich scent of coffee.

As Michelle went back to work, expertly cleaning the stranger’s jacket, the biker couldn’t help but admire her composure. She handled the situation with grace and humor, turning what could have been a disastrous encounter into a light-hearted moment.

“You know,” he said, his voice still gruff but less menacing than before, “I’ve been on the road for days. I could use a good bear claw and some decent company.”

Michelle looked up, her eyes meeting his. “Well, you’ve come to the right place. We’ve got the best pastries in town and the most interesting conversations.”

She finished cleaning the jacket, revealing a gleaming black leather beneath the almost stains, then gestured toward a table by the window. “Why don’t you take a seat? I’ll bring over that bear claw and a fresh cup of coffee.”

The biker nodded, taking a seat as Michelle bustled away.

Minutes later, Michelle returned with a steaming cup of coffee and a generous bear claw, the sweet aroma filling the air. She set them down in front of the biker, saying, “Enjoy.”

By the time Michelle was ready to close up for the day, she couldn’t be more relieved. It had been a long day filled with a never-ending supply of customers. To make it even worse, Jeff didn’t show up during his afternoon break, and his absence had put her in a funk. She knew she shouldn’t let herself get so attached to him, but she couldn’t help it. She missed him when he wasn’t around.

An hour later, Michelle made her way inside the local library. The evening breeze carried the scent of old books. She scanned the room, taking in the stacks of donated literature that towered like skyscrapers on the folding tables. Her gaze landed on Taylor Klein, who, with her hair twisted into a librarian’s bun, was directing volunteers with a finger pressed firmly against her clipboard.

“Michelle, over here,” a voice called out. It was Charlie, waving a hand above the heads of the browsing crowd, a brown Newfoundland by his side sitting as regal as a lion.

“Hey, Charlie,” Michelle greeted with a smile, approaching him and scratching Maximus behind his ears. “I brought some coffee shop mysteries. Figured they’d be right at home.”

“Perfect,” Charlie said, taking the bag from her. “Taylor will be thrilled—she’s somewhere around here alphabetizing donations by the minute.”

“Sounds like Taylor,” Michelle chuckled, turning away to navigate through the maze of bookworms.

“Michelle? It’s good to see you,” Jeff’s voice was unexpected, causing her to spin on her heel.

“Jeff?” she blinked in surprise, noting the stack of worn paperbacks in his arms. “You’re the last person I would expect to see at a book drive.”

“A few months ago, you’d probably be right,” he admitted with a crooked grin. “But Danny and Hunter roped me in. Said it was for a good cause. Plus, I figured it was time these guys found a new home.” He shrugged, gesturing to the books.

“Wow, that’s...really great of you,” Michelle replied as she watched him add his contribution to the nearest pile. “Never took you for a reader.”

“Hey, I can be full of surprises,” Jeff quipped, eyes twinkling.

“Clearly,” Michelle laughed, her curiosity piqued. She wondered what other secrets lay beneath his former bartender exterior. “What happened to you this afternoon? You didn’t come into the Coffee Loft like you usually do.”

He smiled sheepishly with a roll of his shoulders. “I had a rough day at the academy and decided to stay in and study instead of coming over. It was mentioned that I’ve been far too distracted lately.”

Was he implying that she was the cause of it? She didn’t want to get in the way of his new career, and she immediately felt bad. “Oh, I didn’t mean to be a distraction, Jeff. I know how important your career is,” Michelle said, concern etched on her face. “I hope I haven’t caused any issues for you at the academy.”

“No, not at all,” he assured her, his gaze steady. “It’s not you. Well, not entirely. I mean, you’re definitely a distraction but a welcome one. I just need to buckle down and focus, that’s all. It’s been a bit challenging. But I’m managing.”

Michelle nodded, understanding his predicament. “Well, if you ever need a break or someone to talk to, I’m here for you.”

I know how tough it can be to juggle responsibilities.”

“I appreciate that, Michelle,” he replied, a genuine smile lighting up his face. “I really do. And I’m glad I could help out here today. It’s a great cause, and I’m happy to support it.”

As they continued to chat, Michelle couldn’t help but feel a warmth in her chest, realizing that her feelings for Jeff were beginning to go beyond mere friendship. She was smitten with him, but there was no way she was going to admit that, especially when they hadn’t even been out on an official date yet.

Just then, Taylor approached them, her arms laden with books. “Hey, Michelle, I’m glad you met up with Jeff. He’s been a tremendous help, but now I can count on both of you.”

Michelle smiled with a nod. “Yes, we’ve been catching up.”

Taylor glanced between the two of them, her eyes narrowing slightly as if she sensed the tension in the air. “I’m glad you two are getting along so well,” she said, her tone carefully neutral. “I’ll leave you two alone for a bit. Let me know if you need anything else to help sort the books.” As Taylor walked away, Michelle turned her attention back to Jeff.

They shared a smile and then began putting the different book genres into piles. As they worked in comfortable silence, Michelle felt even more drawn to Jeff. Every now and then, she stole a glance at him, observing the determination in his eyes as he sorted the books. She admired his commitment to whatever he was doing, a testament to a strong character she hadn’t seen before.

“Hey, I was thinking,” Michelle began, trying to sound casual, “maybe we could grab dinner after this.”

Jeff looked up from the books, a surprised expression on his face. “I’d like that,” he said, beaming. “I owe you dinner, after all.”

Michelle couldn’t help but feel relieved and excited. Maybe, just maybe, they could take their friendship to the next level, and this could be the start of it.

As they continued to work, Taylor returned, looking between them with a knowing smile. “Looks like everything is almost sorted,” she said, her voice filled with warmth. “I can’t thank you two enough for all your help.”

Michelle and Jeff shared another smile before finishing up and grabbing their coats.

“You ready?” he asked as he reached out his hand to her.

“Where did you have in mind?” she asked in return as she placed her hand in his.

“Follow me and find out,” he said with a mischievous glint in his eye.

They left the warmth of the library, stepping into the cool night. The glow from the streetlights cast playful shadows on the sidewalk as they walked side by side.

“Okay, so there’s this new taco truck down the—”

“Watch out,” Michelle cried as Jeff narrowly avoided colliding with a skateboarder zooming past.

“Whoa, thanks,” he exhaled, rubbing the back of his neck. “Almost became roadkill. Not the kind of meat I had in mind for tacos.”

“Life on the edge,” Michelle teased, heart still racing from the near miss.

“Nothing says romance like a brush with death,” Jeff joked, and they both laughed, rounding the corner to find the taco truck parked just ahead.

“Let’s hope their food is less life-threatening,” Michelle teased.

“Here’s hoping,” Jeff agreed.

As they approached the taco truck, the scent of grilled meat and spices filled the air, making Michelle’s stomach growl in anticipation.

The line at the taco truck was longer than they expected, giving them a chance to catch up and enjoy each other's company as they waited. Jeff repeated a couple of humorous incidents from the academy, but their laughter was cut short when an overenthusiastic crow swooped down, aiming for the salsa station. A cascade of red sauce splattered across Jeff's shirt.

"Seriously?" he exclaimed, staring down at the mess in disbelief. "That bird has impeccable aim."

"Or terrible manners," Michelle offered, trying to stifle her giggles as she handed him a handful of napkins.

"Guess I'm wearing dinner after all," Jeff sighed, wiping at the stain. "You sure know how to pick 'em, Parker," he muttered to himself.

"Come on," Michelle said, nudging him gently as she grabbed their plates of tacos from the truck window. "Let's eat before anything else decides to attack us."

They sat down at a nearby picnic table, savoring the mouthwatering flavors.

"These are amazing," Michelle said, her mouth full of taco goodness. She watched as Jeff expertly folded his taco, taking a moment to appreciate his hands—strong, yet gentle, with just a hint of roughness.

"Delicious," Jeff declared, mouth full of food. "This was worth the assault."

"Agreed," Michelle smiled, her earlier nerves replaced by an unexpected sense of contentment.

"Next time, maybe we should wear bibs," Jeff suggested, eyebrows raised playfully.

"Or full body armor," Michelle countered, her laughter mingling with his.

As they continued to eat, their conversation flowed as easily as the salsa had from the crow-stricken station, the night unfolding with the promise of more shared smiles and unforeseen adventures.

Michelle couldn't help but feel a warmth spreading through her chest. Was it the spicy food or the growing connection between them? She couldn't be entirely sure, but the mixture of the two was intoxicating.

Jeff glanced over at Michelle, his gaze lingering on her lips as she licked a stray drop of sauce off her finger. "I'm glad you suggested going out to dinner," he admitted, his voice low and husky. "I've been wanting an excuse to spend more time with you."

Michelle's heart skipped a beat, the warmth in her chest intensifying. Was he implying what she thought he was? She couldn't be entirely sure, but she was willing to find out.

"Well, I wouldn't work a book drive with just anyone," she joked, her voice barely above a whisper.

Jeff chuckled, his eyes never leaving hers. "No, I suppose you wouldn't."

Michelle felt her heart pounding in her chest as she held Jeff's gaze. The tension between them was palpable, and she couldn't help but feel a sense of excitement build within her. She had been wanting to spend more time with him as well, but she hadn't been sure if he felt the same way until now.

"Okay, I have an idea," Michelle said, her hazel eyes sparkling with mischief in the dimly lit street as she brushed a strand of blonde hair out of her face. "How about we go line dancing at the Coffee Loft? Emily is setting everything up right now."

"Line dancing?" Jeff's thick brown eyebrows shot up in surprise. His eyes scanned Michelle's face for a hint of sarcasm. "You're not pulling my leg, are you?"

"Have you ever seen me pull anyone's leg?" She grinned, her upbeat nature undimmed by the earlier mishaps.

"Point taken," he laughed. "But, just so you know, my dancing skills might be a crime against humanity."

"Perfect. Mine too," she confessed with a giggle. "But that's what makes it so fun. Let's go commit some crimes together."

The back garden of the Coffee Loft, warm and vibrant, buzzed with the sound of country tunes and clapping hands. Boots stomped. Skirts twirled. Michelle led the way onto the dance floor, her movements confident yet filled with laughter.

“Follow my lead,” she shouted over the music, taking his hands.

“Isn’t it supposed to be the other way around?” Jeff asked, his voice tinged with amusement as he stumbled after her, trying to mimic her steps.

“Modern times call for modern measures,” she replied with a shrug, guiding him through the steps as the crowd hooted and hollered around them.

Jeff’s initial awkwardness faded as the rhythm took over, replaced by an infectious grin. They spun, they twirled, they laughed through missed cues and stepped-on toes. It was clumsy, it was silly, and it was...fun.

“Admit it,” Michelle said during a brief pause, “you’re having a good time.”

“Shockingly, I am,” he agreed, breathless but grinning from ear-to-ear.

Their gazes met—a moment of connection amidst the chaos—and something unspoken passed between them.

As the song ended, they joined in the applause, their cheeks flushed from exertion and excitement.

“Hey, Michelle?” Jeff’s voice was tentative now, a contrast to the bold bartender she’d come to know. “Can we...do this again sometime? Go out, I mean.”

“Like a date?” she teased, heart skipping despite the casual tone.

“Yeah, like a date,” he confirmed, scratching the back of his neck.

“Then, yes.” Michelle’s smile was genuine, wide. “Yes, we can definitely do this again.”

“Great.” Relief washed over his face. “It’s a date then.”

They lingered in each other's company. The connection they hadn't expected was growing stronger with every shared laugh and glance. The night had run its course, and it was time to say good night—for now.

Chapter Six

The morning light cascaded into The Coffee Loft, casting warm glows over the dark-stained oak countertops and the vibrant chalkboard menu. Jeff, under a mop of tousled brown hair, strode in with the day's first yawn still lingering on his lips.

“Morning, Michelle,” he said, sidling up to the counter with the easy confidence of a man who knew his coffee was already brewing. Winston sat obediently by his side, finally getting the hang of who was in charge.

Michelle, her blonde bob tucked behind her ears, flashed him a smile that could rival the sun's rays streaming through her windows. “One usual, coming right up.”

He leaned against the counter, watching as she worked the espresso machine like a maestro conducting an orchestra. Her hazel eyes held a spark as they met his. “Got plans tonight?”

“Only if you're making them,” she replied, her voice playful.

“Go out with me?” His request was casual, but his heart thudded with hope.

“Pick me up at seven?” She passed him his cup, fingers brushing his, sending a silent zing of anticipation up his arm.

“Seven it is.”

Before he could take a sip, a sudden commotion by the door snagged their attention. A small, elderly woman grappled with an oversized, rebellious umbrella that refused to collapse. Heaven knows why she had it open since there wasn’t a cloud in the sky. It snapped open, then shut, startling patrons nearby as it threatened to poke out eyes and overturn tables.

“Battle of the umbrella, round one,” Jeff quipped, the corners of his eyes crinkling with amusement.

Michelle chuckled, hands on hips. “I’ve got five on Mrs. Peterson.”

Jeff grinned, watching as the woman executed a deft maneuver, finally wrestling the umbrella into submission. “And the crowd goes wild,” he announced in a hushed, sportscaster-like whisper as a few customers clapped.

“Your commentary’s getting better. You should consider a career change,” Michelle teased, wiping down the counter.

“Ah, but then who would assist in finding all the missing umbrellas in the world?” he lifted his coffee in salute.

“Fair point,” she conceded with a laugh as she leaned down and handed Winston a homemade doggy treat from her glass canister.

Jeff savored a mouthful of the rich brew, letting the familiar bitterness ground him. The warmth spread, mingling with the flutter of excitement for tonight.

“All right, I better get going. Can’t keep those bossy instructors waiting.” He pushed off the counter, feeling lighter than when he’d entered.

“See you at seven,” Michelle called after him, her smile lingering in his mind as he pushed through the door.

“Seven,” he echoed, stepping out into the day, his stride buoyed by the promise of the evening to come.

The sun was already flexing its muscles in the clear blue sky by the time Jeff arrived at the academy. The dust from the dirt lot plumed around his boots as he made his way to the training field, a steely determination setting into his features.

“Morning, Parker,” Danny called out, leaning against the chain-link fence with Rambler sitting obediently at his side.

“Morning,” Jeff replied as he placed his duty bag down on the ground.

“Ready to kick some tail?” Hunter quipped, nudging Jeff with a grin.

“Only if Winston’s on board.” Jeff rubbed the eager canine’s head, who responded with an affectionate nuzzle against his hand. “You up for it, buddy?”

Winston barked once, sharp and confident—a good sign.

“All right then, let’s show ‘em what we’ve got.”

“Go get ‘em, but remember,” Danny interjected, “it’s about trust, not just commands.”

“Got it,” Jeff nodded, stepping into the designated starting area.

“Begin,” Charlie shouted to the group of trainees.

Jeff and Winston moved as one; the canine’s strides matched Jeff’s, their rhythm synchronous. Through the obstacle course they went, Winston leaping over hurdles, weaving through poles, never faltering, never breaking stride.

“Look at you two, poetry in motion,” Danny cheered, clapping his hands.

“Focus, Parker. You don’t want to mess it up at the end,” Hunter chided playfully from the sideline, Duchess staying loyally by his feet.

“Time,” Charlie’s voice boomed across the field as Jeff and Winston cleared the last jump.

“Outstanding work, Parker,” Danny commented, making notes on his clipboard. “Winston’s really responding to you well now.”

“Thanks, Instructor Bowman,” Jeff said, using the professional title since they were in front of others. Panting slightly, he scratched behind the German shepherd’s ears. Winston’s tongue lolled out in a doggy grin, and Jeff couldn’t help but share in his K9 partner’s joy.

“Let’s go over those scores,” Danny announced, his gaze sweeping over the group.

Jeff waited as they rattled off the scores of the other teams alphabetically, and when they finally got to him, he braced himself.

“Jeff and Winston,” Charlie began, looking up, “ninety-eight percent. Top marks.”

“Boom,” Hunter exclaimed, pumping a fist in the air.

“Way to go, man,” Danny slapped Jeff’s shoulder, a proud smile creasing his face. “I knew you had it in you.”

“Couldn’t have done it without Winston here,” Jeff said, his chest swelling with pride as he looked down at his four-legged partner. He barked as if he knew exactly what they were talking about.

“Looks like I’m celebrating twice today,” Jeff noted, winking at his friends.

“Twice?” Danny queried, raising an eyebrow.

“Got a date tonight,” Jeff said, a grin spreading across his face at the thought of seeing Michelle again.

“Ah, the lovely Michelle,” Hunter drawled. “Well, don’t let us keep you. Go prep for your big night. Earning top marks means you get off early today for the weekend.”

“Will do,” Jeff chuckled, giving Winston one last pat before heading off the field, a spring in his step that had everything to do with his high marks—and the evening ahead.

As Jeff walked home, his fingers danced over the screen of his phone with an eagerness that mirrored the pulse in his chest. A triumphant smile played on his lips as he texted Michelle, the sunlight glinting off the screen.

“Hey, aced my skills test with Winston. 98%,” he typed, the digits a badge of honor.

He hit send and waited for a reply. His heart did a little jig, and for a moment, all the sounds around — the distant barks from the academy, the rustle of leaves, even his own breathing — seemed to pause in anticipation.

Her reply came quickly, a ping that sent a ripple of excitement through him.

“Wow, Jeff. That’s amazing. We should definitely celebrate tonight.”

He could almost hear the lilt in her voice, envision her bright eyes sparkling with shared joy. It warmed him more than the coffee he’d had earlier, more than the afternoon sun streaming down on him.

“Looking forward to it,” he shot back, a grin tugging at his mouth.

“Me too. See you at the Coffee Loft?”

“Wouldn’t miss it.”

The phone went silent, tucked away as Jeff moved along the street. The town passed by in a blur of familiarity—quaint shops, the old library, kids on bikes. As he made his way to his front door, the gravel crunched underfoot, his strides confident and eager.

Jeff entered his studio apartment, already thinking about what he needed to do before he could get ready for his big date. Winston would need a good meal before being left alone for the night. He moved briskly to the kitchen, pulling out a can of high-quality dog food and filling a bowl with fresh water. With practiced ease, he opened the can and portioned the food perfectly, the rich aroma of meat and vegetables filling the air as he set it down. Winston’s tail wagged furiously, ears perked up, as he dove into his dinner, eyes closed in pure delight.

As Winston feasted, Jeff took the time to change out of his training clothes, choosing a crisp white shirt and a pair of dark jeans that seemed to match his newfound excitement. A quick glance at the clock made him realize that time was slipping away, so he gave Winston a pat on the head and led him to his kennel. It was a cozy space, lined with soft blankets and a few of Winston's favorite toys, ensuring that he would be comfortable and entertained during Jeff's absence. With a final "be good, buddy" and a click of the kennel's latch, Jeff was ready to head back out.

He decided to swing by a nearby flower shop before meeting Michelle, wanting to surprise her with a beautiful bouquet. The little store was filled with an assortment of colors and fragrances, and Jeff felt his spirits lift higher as he picked out a set of red roses. After all, they said romance, didn't they?

When Jeff arrived at the Coffee Loft, Michelle was already waiting, her blonde hair catching the glow of the streetlights like a halo. She leaned against the doorframe, a vision in an apricot skirt and a cream blouse.

"Hey there, top K9 handler," she called out, a playful edge to her words.

"Hey yourself, coffee queen," Jeff replied, closing the distance between them. He offered her the roses, which she gratefully took and brought to her nose.

Inhaling sharply, she sighed. "They're lovely. Thank you. Let me just hand these off to Emily since she's setting up for karaoke tonight."

"We can skip that one, can't we?" Jeff pleaded. "If you think my line dancing is bad, you don't even want to hear me sing."

"It can't be that bad," she challenged with mischief in her eyes. "But yes, we can skip it, at least for tonight, since we're celebrating your victory today." They shared a look, an unspoken recognition of his effort, her support, and the something that was simmering just beneath the surface. "Be right back."

Michelle slipped inside, and Jeff watched through the window as she handed the roses to Emily. A few minutes later, she reappeared, wrapping a scarf around her neck after slipping into her coat.

“Ready for our waterfront stroll?” he asked as she closed the shop door behind her.

“Lead the way,” she said, gesturing with a sweep of her arm.

They walked side by side, the hum of the town fading behind them, replaced by the lapping of waves and the cry of birds by the river. Their shadows stretched long on the pavement, two figures melding into one.

“Nice turnout today,” Michelle commented, pointing to the people passing through one of the busiest areas of town.

“Always is,” Jeff agreed, though his gaze lingered not on the other people but on her profile and the way the fading light kissed her peach skin.

“Your test...tell me everything,” she urged, her hazel eyes alight with curiosity.

“Ah, well, Winston was a champ. You know, for a dog with an attitude,” he joked, his chest still puffed with pride.

They laughed together, their footsteps in sync, creating a rhythm that felt like the beginning of something new, something good.

“Seriously, though, couldn’t have done it without him. Or you,” Jeff added, his voice softer now, earnest.

“Me?” Michelle feigned surprise, her hand brushing his arm fleetingly.

“Your coffee fuels miracles,” he quipped, bumping her shoulder gently.

“Is that so? Guess I’ll have to keep you supplied then,” she teased back.

“Please do,” he said, a promise in his tone.

“Deal.”

The waterfront opened up before them, a canvas of purples and oranges as the sun dipped low. A gentle breeze carried the scent of winter, and for a moment, they stood there, side by side, letting the world and its colors wash over them.

His heart pounded in his chest, the moment stretched out between them like a taut string. But then, she turned to face him, her hazel eyes sparkling under the fading sunlight. She looked up at him, her lips slightly parted, and he couldn't resist anymore. He leaned in, his heart hammering against his ribs, and gently pressed his lips against hers. It was a soft, fleeting kiss, the kind that left him yearning for more.

When they pulled away, they both stood there, breathless, their cheeks flushed. Michelle's hand was still on his arm, and she gave it a gentle squeeze, her fingers lingering on his skin. "I'm glad I could help," she whispered.

Jeff smiled, his heart swelling with affection. "Me too," he said, his voice husky with emotion. He took her hand in his, intertwining their fingers, and they walked along the waterfront, their shadows dancing on the pavement.

A few minutes later, they entered Walter's Seafood Restaurant. The clink of glasses and the murmur of conversations enveloped them as they sat at a corner table, menus in hand. A weathered wooden sign above the bar proclaimed "Today's Catch" in looping script. Jeff glanced over it, his stomach rumbling.

"Can't go wrong with the chowder here. It's famous for a reason," Michelle pointed out, tapping the menu.

"Lead with your best shot, right?" Jeff smirked, closing his eyes briefly to inhale the rich scent of seafood simmering somewhere in the back.

"Two chowders," she told the waiter with a wink. "And we'll both have a lobster roll. Can't beat the imported Maine lobster."

"Crab cakes, too?" Jeff suggested, remembering her offhand comment last week about her love for them.

"Spot on," she said, her smile reaching her eyes.

Dinner was a dance of shared stories and laughter. Jeff found himself speaking more freely than usual, enticed by Michelle's easy charm. Her laugh was musical, a sound he wanted on repeat.

"Your turn, spill," she said, dabbing her lips with a napkin after demolishing her crab cakes. "What's your biggest blunder nobody knows about?"

"Uh, okay. Once, I tried to bake cookies and set off every fire alarm in the building." He cringed at the memory, but it only made her giggle.

"Hero K9 handler scores zilch in the kitchen," she teased.

"Something like that," he admitted, grinning despite himself. "Which is why I'm glad I have you. I might never drink coffee or eat pastries again if I didn't."

He noticed her cheeks tinged pink as she smiled at him. "You give me too much credit."

"Not enough, by far," he assured her.

Dessert came—berry pie a la mode—and they split it, forks dueling playfully for the last bite, which Michelle graciously surrendered with mock defeat.

"Generous loser," he quipped, popping the morsel into his mouth.

"Remember that," she warned with a light tone.

Meal done, they ambled out into the night, side by side. The air had cooled considerably, carrying a hint of the winter's crispness. They walked slowly, no destination in mind except the end of the evening that neither seemed eager to reach.

"Thanks for dinner," Michelle told him, "but you really didn't have to pay."

"Oh yes, I did. It was a date, and I owed you anyway," he countered, pulling his hands out of his pockets, feeling the shift from playful banter to something laden with meaning.

"But dinner should have been on me; you aced your test. I should be thanking you for the honored company." She bumped into him lightly.

“Guess we’re even then,” he mused, though his heart hammered a different truth.

“Even Steven.”

Her apartment came into view, looming closer with each step. It was now or never.

“Michelle...” he began, voice trailing.

“Jeff?” she echoed, turning to face him, the porch light casting golden hues over her features.

“I’m not good at this,” he confessed, the words clumsy. “But tonight was...it was great.”

“It was,” she agreed, her gaze steady on his.

“Can I—” His question hung between them, unfinished yet understood.

“Please do,” she whispered.

He leaned in, hesitation giving way to certainty. Their lips met again, nothing tentative about it this time. The kiss was deep and powerful, and the world shrank to just the two of them, a pocket of warmth in the cool Texas night.

“Good night, Jeff,” she murmured against his lips as they parted.

“Good night, Michelle.” He watched her retreat into her apartment, the door closing softly behind her. He stood there a moment longer, a goofy grin plastered on his face, the taste of berry pie and new beginnings lingering sweetly on his lips.

Chapter Seven

The Coffee Loft buzzed with the cozy hum of morning chatter, but Michelle was somewhere between steaming milk and a daydream. In her mind's eye, Jeff's rugged smirk played on loop, his brown hair falling just so over a brow that suggested both mischief and mystery.

"Michelle, honey, you planning to serve that or audition it for a beauty pageant?" Mr. Henderson grumbled from his usual spot at the counter, breaking her reverie.

"Sorry, Mr. Henderson." She blinked back to reality, her cheeks warming as she pushed the cup over to him.

"Is this...a joke?" His voice scratched like sandpaper, his usual scowl now etched deeper into his weather-beaten face.

She glanced over at what should have been his black coffee. Instead, a frothy, pink concoction topped with sprinkles stared up at her like some kind of sugary abomination. "Your correct coffee's coming right up," she promised, trying to ignore how her pulse still danced to thoughts of Jeff. "This one's on the house."

"The next one better not be pink," he muttered, folding his newspaper with a snap.

As she turned to fix the mistake, shrieks echoed from outside. She peeked through the window just in time to see chaos unfold on the patio. A group of chickens—brazen little hooligans from a nearby farm—had descended upon the Coffee Loft’s outdoor seating like feathered pirates. They were pecking at pastry crumbs and darting under tables.

“Shoo, shoo,” Michelle shouted, darting out the door, apron strings flying. She chased the clucking invaders around tables where customers were now standing, balancing laptops and lattes in a comical ballet.

“Michelle, watch out,” Candace, her loyal regular and good friend, called out as a particularly plump hen made a beeline for a croissant.

“Gotcha.” With a swoop worthy of a K9 handler—oh no, not more thoughts of Jeff—Michelle scooped up the ringleader chicken, wings flapping indignantly.

“Back to your coop, ladies,” she huffed, shooing the last of them off with the help of amused patrons.

“Never a dull moment here, huh?” Miss Betty chuckled, brushing crumbs from her pantsuit.

“Free entertainment with every purchase,” Michelle quipped, her heart rate settling back into a rhythm that wasn’t dictated by thoughts of Jeff or his tousled hair.

“Thanks, Michelle,” Randy Turner waved, snapping a quick photo for the Hero Tribune. “Best chicken chase I’ve seen all week.”

“Anytime,” she replied with a laugh, though her smile didn’t quite reach her eyes as she collected the abandoned pastries. The last thing she wanted was to be made fun of in the local newspaper, but the owner was like a dog with a bone. If she protested, it would only make Mr. Turner want to make the story a bigger feature.

Michelle released the ringleader and swept the last of the feathery assailants out with a practiced flick of her broom, the door jingling in protest as it swung shut. She straightened up, rolling her shoulders to shake off the tension. The Coffee Loft was finally returning to its usual hum of caffeine-fueled tranquility.

“Chickens, huh? Never a dull moment with you, Shell,” said a faintly familiar voice behind her. “Guess it’s true; you really do run a tight ship around here.”

Startled, Michelle turned to find Harold Bernstein leaning casually against the counter, a smirk on his lips. His eyes—sharp blue and always too knowing—crinkled at the corners as he watched her.

“Harold.” His name caught in her throat like a sip of too-hot coffee. “I didn’t see you there.”

“Couldn’t miss the show.”

“Looks like I’ve got everything under control now,” she said, hoping her voice sounded more convincing than she felt.

“Always do,” he agreed with a nod.

“So, Harold, what brought you my way this morning?” she asked, tucking a stray lock of hair behind her ear.

“Business,” he replied, pushing off the counter to saunter closer. “And a bit of nostalgia, I guess. This place used to be old man Henry’s hardware store, right? And before that, it was the old mercantile from the 1800s.”

“Guilty,” Michelle confessed, leaning on her broom like a crutch. “I turned nuts and bolts into beans and brews.”

“Quite the transformation.” Harold glanced around, nodding appreciatively. “Looks good. Feels good.”

“Thanks,” she said, though the compliment settled uneasily, like whipped cream on hot milk.

“Speaking of transformations...” Harold hesitated, scratching his jawline. “I heard something last night, Shell. At the bar.”

“Oh?” Her stomach tightened, a premonition prickling at the base of her neck.

“Jeff Parker. He was running his mouth a bit...about you.” Harold’s gaze held hers, steady and unblinking.

“Jeff?” she repeated, the warmth in her chest cooling.
“What about him?”

“Let’s just say he’s more interested in polishing his badge than your heart.” Harold’s words were careful and measured.
“He thinks dating you might spruce up his rep.”

“His rep?” Michelle’s laugh was sharp, disbelieving.
“You’re joking.”

“Would that I were,” Harold murmured, his expression somber. “I’m sorry, Shell. You deserve someone who’s in it for you, not for what you can do for them.”

She opened her mouth and closed it. The air seemed thinner all of a sudden, her thoughts a swirl of coffee grounds at the bottom of a drained cup.

“Excuse me,” she mumbled, ducking past Harold, the broom slipping from her fingers and clattering to the floor.

“Shell—” Harold reached out, but she was already retreating, her mind filled with doubts louder than any chicken squabble.

As she pushed through the back door to the alley where the garbage cans stood like silent sentinels, Michelle leaned against the cool brick wall. Jeff’s laughter echoed in her head—not warm and joyful, but hollow, mocking. Could Harold be telling the truth?

“For heaven’s sake, Jeff,” she whispered to the empty alley, the hurt catching in her throat. “Why couldn’t you just be real?”

There was no answer in the rustle of the breeze or the distant sound of the town waking up. Only the echo of Harold’s words and the sting of betrayal, as bitter as over-brewed espresso.

The rest of the day passed in a slow blur. Michelle went through the motions of serving customers, her mind elsewhere. She found herself staring out the shop’s window, watching the townsfolk go about their business, and wondered how many of them were just like Jeff—interested in all the wrong things.

As the sun began to set, she made her way to the small park across the street. She needed to clear her head, to get away from the whispers and stares that seemed to follow her everywhere she went. Sitting on a bench beneath an old oak tree, she watched the children playing on the swings and slide, their laughter a stark contrast to her own melancholy.

She thought back to when she first reconnected with Jeff, how charming and attentive he had been. She had been flattered by his interest, but now she couldn't help but wonder if it had all been an act, a ploy to get closer to her for his own selfish reasons.

The more she thought about it, the angrier she became. How dare he use her like that? How dare he pretend to care about her when all he really wanted was to boost his own reputation?

As the sun dipped below the horizon, Michelle made a decision. She would confront Jeff and tell him exactly what she thought of him and his underhanded ways. She deserved better, and she was going to make sure he knew it.

With a newfound resolve, she stood up from the bench and began to walk back to the Coffee Loft. She would face Jeff, and she would make sure he understood the depth of his betrayal. She wouldn't let him get away with hurting her like this.

Michelle stormed into the Coffee Loft, her eyes scanning the room for Jeff, who should be arriving at any moment for his mid-day pick-me-up. She spotted him behind the counter, chatting with Emily. She marched over to him, her anger palpable.

"Jeff," she said, her voice low and dangerous. "We need to talk right now." Each word was a struggle, heavy with the weight of Harold's revelation.

He turned to her, a smile on his face. It quickly faded, however, when he saw the look of anger in her eyes. "Michelle, what's wrong?" he asked, his voice laced with concern.

“Don’t play innocent with me,” she spat, placing her hands on her hips as her face burned red with fury. “I know what you did. I know you were never really interested in me. You just wanted to use me to boost your own reputation.”

Jeff looked shocked, like he had been caught red-handed. “Michelle, that’s not true,” he stammered.

“Don’t lie to me,” she hissed, her hazel eyes searching his face for any sign of further deceit. “I’m not stupid. I know that’s what you were doing, that you were only with me to clean up your image.”

“Whoa,” Jeff stepped back, hands raised defensively. “Where’s this coming from?”

“Harold Bernstein.” Michelle’s voice was a whisper, but it carried in the silent space between them.

“Harold?” He scoffed, shaking his head. “You’re going to believe that guy over me? Didn’t he just come back to town because he ended up ruining his own marriage? You can’t trust a guy like that.”

“Are you saying it’s not true?” There was a plea hidden in her question, a desperate hope for denial.

“Look, I—” Jeff hesitated, his defensiveness morphing into frustration. “It’s not that simple.”

“Make it simple.” Her words were sharp, clipped.

“Okay, yeah, I want people to take me seriously as a handler. So what? That doesn’t mean I don’t care about you.” His tone was earnest, but there was something in his eyes that didn’t sit right with her.

“Doesn’t it?” she crossed her arms, feeling her heart break inside her chest.

“Come on, Michelle. You know this town, how people talk. It was never just about reputation.” He reached for her, but she stepped out of his touch.

“Wasn’t it?” Michelle’s thoughts were a whirlpool, sucking her down into a place where trust and love seemed like foolish indulgences.

“Look, Michelle, I’m trying here,” Jeff’s voice rose, the strain evident.

“Are you?” Her voice was barely above a whisper, but it cut through the tension.

“Fine.” Jeff threw his hands in the air, the universal sign of surrender—or defeat. “Clearly, you had already made up your mind before you even decided to talk to me.”

“You could have convinced me otherwise,” she snapped, her heart sinking as she watched the widening rift between them.

“Not my fault,” he muttered, shoving his hands in his pockets, his shoulders rigid.

“Same old Jeff,” she muttered with anger. She turned to leave for the backroom, but not before delivering one final blow. “I hope it was worth it because you just lost the best thing that ever happened to you.”

And with that, Michelle stormed out of the room, leaving a stunned Jeff in her wake. Her heart thumping like a fist against her chest as she tried to settle behind her desk, but try as she might, she couldn’t focus on her work. She sent a quick text to Emily that she was leaving for the rest of the day and headed out. She was not sure where she was going, except anywhere that Jeff wasn’t.

Her blonde hair, usually so carefully arranged, whipped about her face in the brisk wind, a tangible manifestation of the turmoil within.

“Maybe Harold’s right,” she murmured to no one, the sound swallowed by the rain that was now falling all around her. “Maybe I do deserve better.”

But as she turned a corner, her steps slow and uncertain, she couldn’t help but wonder if ‘better’ was just another word for ‘alone.’

An hour later, Michelle slumped into the worn leather couch at the Coffee Loft, its familiar creaks a small comfort. The scent of roasted beans and cinnamon wafted around her like a warm hug that couldn't chase away the cold knot in her stomach.

"Girl, you look like you've been through a tornado," Candace said, plopping down beside her with two lattes balanced in hand.

"More like a hurricane," Michelle corrected, staring into the caramel swirls of her latte as if it held answers.

Candace's black hair framed her face in gentle waves, hazel eyes sharp with concern. "Spill it."

"Jeff." That name was enough.

"Ah, the K9 Casanova," Avery chimed in, tripping over the edge of a rug as she joined them, sending croissants flying. Her auburn-highlighted hair bounced as she scrambled to save the pastries.

"Really, Avery?" Jenesa arched an eyebrow, elegantly crossing her legs beneath her tailored suit. She picked a stray croissant off the floor and dusted it off with a pearl-adorned hand.

"Five-second rule," Avery grinned sheepishly, placing it back on the tray.

"Guys, I'm serious," Michelle sighed, picking at the edge of a blueberry muffin without appetite. "He might have been... using me."

"Like a social ladder?" Candace quirked a brow.

"No, like a reputation polisher." Michelle's words were flat, weighted with hurt.

"Ugh, men," Avery groaned, her green eyes rolling dramatically. "Except for Hunter, of course. And Danny."

"And Luke," Candace added.

"Exceptions duly noted," Jenesa said dryly.

"My friend, Harold, told me about Jeff bragging at the bar. About how being with me is good for his image," Michelle confessed, a single tear betraying her as it slid down her cheek.

“Harold Bernstein?” Jenesa snorted. “I heard the rumors about him. Since when do you trust the guy who tried to sell kids oregano as ‘high-grade herbal refreshment’ when he was in high school?”

“True. I mean, I wonder if what he says about what happened with his marriage is even factual. No one’s even talked to his wife about it,” Avery pointed out, then winced as she knocked over a sugar dispenser with an elbow. “Oops.”

“Clumsy and insightful,” Jenesa smiled thinly, passing napkins to contain the spill.

“Look, Michelle,” Candace took her hand, “Jeff would be an idiot to play you. You’re amazing.”

“Totally,” Avery agreed, righting the sugar dispenser. “And if he is, we’ll kick his—”

“Let’s not resort to violence,” Jenesa cut in, but there was steel in her voice. “Yet.”

“I just don’t know what to believe,” Michelle murmured, pulling her knees to her chest.

“Believe in yourself first,” Jenesa advised. “Men come and go. But we? We stay.”

“Like glitter at a craft fair,” Candace quipped, attempting to lighten the mood.

“Or like a stubborn stain,” Avery added with a wink.

“Thanks, guys,” Michelle half-smiled, wiping her cheek. “But right now, I just feel...lost.”

“Then we’ll be your compass,” Jenesa declared, squeezing her hand. “Right, girls?”

“Right,” they chorused.

“Even if our sense of direction is crap,” Avery confessed with a wry smile.

“Speak for yourself,” Jenesa chuckled.

“Anyway,” Michelle’s gaze fell back to her untouched pastry. “I appreciate it. Truly.”

“Anytime,” Candace said, as they all settled into a silence filled with the subtle backdrop of clinking cups and whispered confessions, the three women a fortress around their heartbroken friend.

Chapter Eight

Jeff's fingers danced nervously over the screen of his phone, the contact name 'Michelle Kenney' highlighted and tempting. His thumb hovered over the call button, a physical manifestation of his internal tug-of-war. The academy's crest emblazoned on the wall opposite seemed to mock him from across the classroom, reminding him where his priorities should lie.

"Come on, Jeff. Focus," he muttered to himself, tossing the phone onto the desk as if it were scalding his hand.

He snatched up a crumpled textbook by its spine, forcing his eyes to trace the lines of text about advanced canine training techniques. Unfortunately, the words blurred together, each sentence an echo of Michelle's laughter or the soft cadence of her voice when she'd talk about her dreams for the Coffee Loft.

"Great, now I'm turning into a sap," he scoffed, raking a hand through his brown hair.

"Knock, knock." The door creaked open, and there stood Hunter with his ever-present smirk. "You studying, or are you brooding? Because that face you're making is definitely not the face of a future valedictorian."

“Ha-ha.” Jeff’s attempt at a smile felt more like a grimace. “Just got a lot on my mind, man.”

“Anything you wanna talk about?” Hunter leaned against the doorframe, an eyebrow raised in concern.

“Nothing that’s gonna fix itself by talking,” Jeff replied, his gaze sliding away to avoid the probing look from his friend.

“All right, if you say so.” Hunter shrugged, but his eyes lingered with unspoken questions.

Jeff’s hand betrayed him again, reaching out for the silent siren that was his phone. He scrolled through old messages from Michelle, each word a sweet stab to his chest. It would be so easy to type out a message, to try to mend the rift between them with a string of pixels and a prayer.

“Stop it, Jeff,” he ordered himself, locking the phone with a decisive click. He imagined Michelle’s hazel eyes, usually so bright and full of mirth, clouded with disappointment from their last conversation. “Too much damage,” he whispered, conviction waning.

“Seriously? Everything all right?” Hunter’s voice cut through his reverie, sharper now, laced with genuine worry. “You know I’m here for you no matter what. Even if you messed up.”

“Let me guess, Avery must have heard from Michelle about our latest fight.”

“She said...it was a bit of a doozy, and I should probably check-in on you.”

“I’m perfect,” Jeff lied smoothly, snapping the textbook shut. “Couldn’t be better.”

Hunter nodded, though clearly unconvinced, then finally retreated, closing the door with a soft click that sounded oddly final.

Alone again, Jeff let out a heavy sigh, the sound filling the emptiness of the room. His heart still hammered with the urge to reach out, to repair, to rewind. Yet the fear of causing further harm held him back, a self-imposed isolation that was both punishment and protection.

“Graduation first. Then...we’ll see,” he murmured to no one, trying to believe his own words. The thought of Michelle, however, just a text away and yet worlds apart, lingered stubbornly, a bittersweet note in the collage of his thoughts.

Two hours later, Jeff tried to get ready for one of the most important moments in his life. This was one of two final exercises that he needed to pass in order to make it through the academy successfully. The whining of dogs and the grass beneath his boots should have been enough to ground him, but Jeff’s thoughts were elsewhere. He sat on the edge of the obstacle course, his gaze absently following the other trainees and their canine partners as they ran drills. His mind, however, was a few miles away—on Main Street, at the Coffee Loft, where Michelle was brewing the day’s third batch of coffee.

“Parker, you’re up next,” Danny called out, clipboard in hand. His once-pristine academy uniform now bore the marks of a morning well spent training dogs and their handlers.

“Right, sorry,” Jeff mumbled, pushing himself off the bench.

“Hey,” Danny said, his tone lowering to something almost resembling tenderness. “You’ve been off your game lately. Anything you wanna talk about?”

“Nothing much to say,” Jeff replied, avoiding eye contact as he clipped the leash onto his partner’s collar. The German shepherd whined in protest, clearly sensing the turmoil in his handler’s heart.

“Because it seems like you’ve been dodging every place Michelle might be,” Danny prodded with a knowing look. “And that’s not like you.”

“Coincidence,” Jeff lied, feeling the weight of his words sink like stones in water.

“Uh-huh.” Danny’s skeptical eyebrow raised higher. “Care to explain why you went from top of the class to...this?” He gestured to the scoreboard where Jeff's name had slipped down several notches.

"Everyone has off days," Jeff countered, his voice tight as he guided Winston through the weave poles with less precision than usual.

"Off for nearly a week, you mean," Danny corrected, not unkindly. "Look, whatever it is, you gotta shake it off. This isn't just about grades; it's your future."

"Thanks for the pep talk, Coach," Jeff remarked dryly, but the humor didn't quite reach his eyes.

"Jeff," Danny leaned in, lowering his voice again. "I've seen you handle pressure before. You used to thrive on it back when we played football in high school. But this...avoidance thing isn't you."

"Really, I'm fine," Jeff insisted, offering a smile that felt as hollow as he knew it must look.

"All right," Danny conceded, though his gaze lingered with concern. "Just remember, we're here if you need to talk. And by 'we,' I include Hunter, Avery, Jenesa, and yes, even Michelle. Though I get the feeling she's the last person you want to talk to right now."

"Got it," Jeff replied, his throat tightening around the words.

"Good," Danny said, clapping him on the shoulder before moving on to the next student. "Because we're family, and family always has each other's backs."

Left to his own devices, Jeff sent his dog over the hurdles, but his performance was mechanical, perfunctory. He completed the course, ticking off the necessary tasks, yet his heart wasn't in it. Not anymore.

"Decent job," came the half-hearted praise from Charlie. "But I know you can do better than that."

"Thanks." Jeff forced a nod, but the words were empty, just like he felt. Everything seemed meaningless without Michelle to share it with.

“Seriously, what’s up with you?” Hunter asked, rejoining him.

“Nothing that’ll matter after graduation,” Jeff said, brushing off the question. His eyes flickered to the exit, considering escape.

“Sure,” Danny said, not buying it for a second. “But it matters now. And it’s affecting more than just your scores.”

“Let’s just drop it, okay?” Jeff’s voice was barely audible this time.

“Fine,” Danny relented, but his expression remained etched with worry.

As Jeff watched the others laugh and celebrate minor victories with their four-legged partners, he realized just how much he’d isolated himself. Avoiding the Coffee Loft and skipping church on Sunday, all to dodge the possibility of running into her. The irony was, in trying not to think about Michelle, she occupied more of his mind than ever.

By the end of the day, the sun was tipping its hat goodbye, streaking the sky with shades of orange and pink as Jeff trudged out of the K9 handler academy. His boots scuffed against the pavement, each step heavy with the weight of his own disappointment. He could almost hear his chances of graduating slipping away like sand through his fingers.

“Hey, Jeff,” Hunter called, jogging up to him, his black hair tousled from the day’s work. “You’re coming tonight, right?”

“Wouldn’t miss it,” Jeff lied, managing a half-smile. He didn’t want to go, but he also knew that he needed to keep in Hunter and Danny’s good graces if he wanted to make sure he graduated.

“Good.” Hunter clapped him on the back, his blue eyes bright with anticipation. “Avery’s cooking her famous lasagna.”

“Can’t wait.” The words tasted bland in his mouth, though he knew Avery’s food was top-notch.

“Seriously, you okay?” Hunter’s usual jovial tone was dipped in concern.

“For the final time, I’m fine,” Jeff snapped out, the lie sharper this time. He didn’t have the energy to keep defending himself.

“Okay, man. Just don’t bail on us,” Hunter said before heading back to the academy, leaving Jeff alone with his thoughts again.

Jeff opened the door for Winston to jump into his truck, then slid into the driver’s seat, gripping the steering wheel until his knuckles turned white. He should be studying, running drills, anything but wallowing in what-ifs about Michelle. Here he was, a puppet yanked by invisible strings of regret. He started the engine, the rumble a temporary reprieve from the silence of his own mind.

He made a quick detour home to change out of his uniform and slip into a pair of jeans and a black T-shirt. “You ready for this, Winston? I’m sure not,” he grumbled. He ran his hand through his hair before slipping his leather coat on and heading out the door.

With a heavy sigh, he pulled onto the road that led toward the Bumblebee B&B. Jenesa’s place was always welcoming, filled with laughter and the kind of warmth that seeped into your bones. Tonight, it felt like he was driving straight into the belly of a beast named Awkwardness.

A few minutes later, Jeff’s hand hovered over the doorknob, a reluctant sentinel at the threshold of the Victorian bed and breakfast. He could already smell the mingling scents of Avery’s cooking wafting out—a comfort that did little to ease the knot in his stomach.

“Hey, you made it,” Danny greeted him at the door, his brown eyes scanning Jeff’s face.

“Wouldn’t let you down,” Jeff pushed past the lump in his throat.

“Good.” Danny ushered him inside, the familiar scent of tomato sauce and garlic hitting Jeff like a wave, reminding him that even if he didn't feel like it, his body wanted him to eat.

He released Winston to go over to where Rambler and Duchess were playing with Hershey, Jenesa's pet monkey. The primate seemed to always manage to escape his cage at all the worst times, causing chaos around the B&B.

"Everyone's waiting in the dining room," Danny told him.

Steeling himself, Jeff followed behind his friend, only for the sight across the room to stall his next breath.

Michelle. She was here, perched on the edge of a chair, laughter spilling from her like sunshine breaking through clouds. The world tilted a smidge.

"Rats," Jeff muttered under his breath. His first instinct was a swift about-face, but before he could put thought into action, Jenesa was upon him.

"Jeff, you made it." Her voice was rich with something he couldn't place—satisfaction, maybe?

"I was told I had to come," he murmured, plastering on a smile as brittle as thin ice. As he looked at Michelle, now he knew why.

"That's right," Jenesa said, looping her arm through his. On his other side, Avery appeared all bright eyes with an expectant grin.

"You're here now," Avery chirped, snagging his other arm. "No backing out."

"Seems like I was the only one that didn't know what this was," Jeff wisecracked with resentment.

"Not exactly," Michelle muttered as her eyes landed on him, and her smile vanished. "It seems we both weren't told about the other one coming."

"This seems like we're—" Jeff didn't know what it was, but he didn't like it.

"It's just like we're—" Michelle sputtered out.

"Trapped," they both grumbled at the same time.

“More like an intervention,” Avery confessed with a wink, steering him deeper into the heart of the B&B.

“Intervention?” Jeff echoed, a note of panic threading his voice. How did he let himself get parent-trapped, but for friends?

“Shh, just calm down and walk,” Jenesa commanded, her lawyerly authority leaving no room for argument.

He allowed himself to be dragged, his feet trailing marks of reluctance on the polished wood floor. With each step, the murmurs of the room grew louder, a symphony of accomplices in what felt like his personal walk of shame.

“Let’s eat, shall we?” Jenesa suggested, ever the orchestrator, guiding them to the table where a feast awaited.

“Food’s great therapy,” Avery added, pushing a plate toward him. “Especially when I make it.”

“If you say so,” Jeff conceded, finding solace in the mundane task of loading his plate. It was easier than meeting Michelle’s gaze or untangling the mess of his emotions.

Chapter Nine

Michelle's eyes locked onto the last person she wanted to see. Jeff Parker, all six-foot-four of him, sprawled casually in a chair like he owned the place.

“Wow, look what the cat dragged in,” Michelle quipped, her voice dripping with sarcasm as she leaned against the table, arms folded. Her blonde hair fell in soft waves around her face, and her hazel eyes sparked with a hard light reserved just for him.

Jeff's head jerked up, his brown hair tousled, and his rugged nose twitching as if he'd sniffed out trouble. “Well, if it isn't the coffee queen herself,” he retorted, pushing back from the table, his posture stiffening defensively. “Sorry to spoil your perfect little kingdom.”

His words hung there, sharp as shattered glass.

“Is that an apology or an insult? Because honestly, I can't tell the difference with you.” Michelle's gaze followed him as he rose, every inch the belligerent bear awakening from hibernation.

“Neither. Why waste either on you,” he grumbled, striding toward the door. But before his hand could graze the handle, a high-pitched shriek pierced the air.

Hershey—Jenesa’s notorious troublemaker—barreled toward Jeff, his small furry form a whirlwind of chaos. Hershey planted himself squarely in front of the exit, his tiny hands raised like a traffic cop halting cars.

“Seriously?” Jeff exclaimed, reaching for the door again. Slap. Hershey’s hand connected with Jeff’s, a clear ‘no way’ in monkey talk.

“Ouch! What the—” Jeff snatched his hand back, eyeing the feisty spider monkey with wariness.

“Good luck getting past the monkey blockade,” Michelle mused, unable to suppress a smirk despite the tension still humming between them.

“Get out of the way, you furry little beast,” Jeff seethed out.

The standoff escalated when Rambler trotted over with a protective gait. His stance was cautious, ears perked, sensing his monkey friend’s distress. Then Duchess—the graceful border collie that belonged to Hunter—joined the fray, herding instincts kicking in as she circled the group.

“Rambler, heel,” Danny tried to command, but it was no use. The K9’s loyalty to Hershey was unwavering.

“Easy, girl,” Michelle heard Hunter call out to Duchess, but the dogs were already embroiled in their own animal kingdom dispute.

Then, the final canine entered the chaos. Winston joined his partner’s side, barking at the other dogs and monkey as if demanding they get out of the way.

“Great. Just great,” Michelle muttered under her breath, watching the animals circle each other, an interspecies dance of allegiance and protection.

Jeff made another feeble attempt to push past Hershey, but the monkey was having none of it, swatting again at Jeff’s hands.

“Back off, furball,” Jeff warned, but there was no threat behind his words, just a begrudging respect for the pint-sized guardian standing his ground.

“Looks like you’re outsmarted by a primate,” Michelle snickered as she came over to get a better look at Hershey giving it to Jeff. The corner of her mouth tilted upward as she admired Hershey’s gumption. “Though I doubt that’s very hard for him to do.”

“Right, because you’re so smart you believed an idiot that used to announce when he had to go poop,” Jeff challenged over his shoulder.

The cacophony crescendoed, a chaotic mess of growls and shrieks filled the Bumblebee. Michelle’s eyes darted from the tangled mass of fur and claws to Jeff’s wide-eyed expression as he half-heartedly attempted to calm the pandemonium.

“Winston, stop it right now,” Jeff’s voice barely broke through the noise, his command as effective as a single raindrop in a hurricane.

“Seriously, Hershey,” Jenesa’s exasperation was palpable as she scooped up the mischievous monkey mid-screech, her arms practiced and precise from years of wrangling more than just unruly animals.

“Ouch, Duchess, no herding humans,” Hunter’s voice was muffled somewhere amid the madness, his words punctuated by a yelp as the border collie nipped at his heels.

As things seemed to get worse, Michelle decided it was finally time to intervene. She reached out, her fingers brushing against Jeff’s arm in an attempt to pull Rambler away from Winston. “We need a game plan here, not—”

Her words were cut short as a jostling bump sent her careening into Jeff. Their feet tangled, and gravity took hold, sending them both crashing to the ground in a heap. For a moment, all was still.

“Smooth, Kenney,” Jeff murmured from beneath her, his lips twitching into a reluctant smile.

“Part of my charm,” Michelle retorted, the laughter bubbling up uncontrollably as she met his gaze. The tension that had been coiled tight between them unwound with their shared hilarity.

“Guess we’re floor buddies now,” he chuckled, the sound resonating beneath her where she lay sprawled across him.

“Seems fitting,” she giggled, pushing herself up to a sitting position, still caught in the contagious aftershocks of mirth. “Bed and breakfast or zoo?” Michelle quipped, brushing off her clothes as she rose to her feet, offering Jeff a hand up.

“Bit of both, I’d say,” Jeff muttered with a chuckle as he accepted her hand, pulling himself upright. His brown eyes held a glimmer of warmth as he steadied her stance. “Thanks for the save.”

“Anytime,” she replied, her voice lighter than it had been moments before. “Monkey, dogs, and tumbling acts,” Michelle added, a wry smile playing on her lips as she glanced around at her friends busy with their own aftermath tasks, “Just another day at the B&B.”

“Enough, you circus rejects,” Jenesa’s voice sliced through their amusement as she finally managed to secure Hershey in his cage. The click of the lock sounding like a judge’s final verdict.

“Okay, okay, back to base,” Hunter corralled Duchess, leading her toward the oversized dog bed, Danny and Rambler trailing behind with a chagrined Jeff and Winston in tow. The animals settled in, their energy spent, resembling furry angels rather than the instigators of the recent bedlam.

“Can we all focus on the real reason we’re here now?” Danny’s voice was steady but carried an undercurrent of urgency that drew everyone’s attention. “There’s something we need to discuss.”

“Spill it then,” Jeff said, scrubbing a hand through his hair, his eyes locked onto Michelle with an intensity that made her stomach flip.

“Harold Bernstein, that slimy toad from our past, has been playing us,” Hunter blurted out.

“Harold? But why—?” Michelle’s brows knitted in confusion, her thoughts a whirlwind trying to connect the dots.

“Turns out, he had this...thing for you back in high school.” Danny shifted his weight, glancing at Hunter as if seeking backup.

“Thing? You mean a crush?” The word felt foreign on Michelle’s tongue, laced with disbelief.

“More like an obsession wrapped in a crush, dipped in jealousy,” Hunter interjected, with a grimace that reached all the way to his usually confident eyes.

“Jealousy?” Jeff echoed, folding his arms defensively across his chest—a barrier that seemed more fragile now.

“Yep,” Hunter continued. “Danny caught wind of it. Confronted Harold. He confessed to slinging mud just to drive a wedge between you two.”

Michelle turned toward Jeff, searching his face for a reaction. His expression was a complex tapestry of shock, hurt, and something else she couldn’t place—maybe hope?

“Harold did this? Because of some stupid high school crush?” Jeff’s tone was incredulous, yet there was a softness creeping into the edges of his words.

“Apparently, some people never graduate emotionally,” Michelle mused, her mind racing with the implications. She could feel the coldness that had settled between them begin to crack, warmth seeping in through the newly exposed fissures.

“So, all this time...” Jeff trailed off, his gaze lingering on hers, searching, questioning. “All this time, it was just a game to him.”

Michelle’s heart pounded a rapid staccato against her ribs. The revelation sent waves through the room, leaving a silence that buzzed with unspoken possibilities. “Unbelievable,” she muttered, shaking her head slowly as if to clear away cobwebs of confusion.

“Believe it,” Danny confirmed, nodding once with conviction.

“Wow, talk about juvenile,” Jeff scoffed, though his tone carried more amusement than anger now. The absurdity of the situation seemed to bubble up between them, breaking the surface tension of past grievances.

“Guess Harold never got over not being voted ‘Most Likely to Succeed.’” Hunter’s grin was wry, bringing a collective chuckle from the group.

“Or ‘Most Likely to Sabotage Relationships,’” Jeff added, the corner of his mouth twitching upwards. His posture relaxed, and his arms unfolded, signaling a truce.

“Is it too late to update the yearbook?” Michelle joked, her laughter mingling with Jeff’s. The ice that had formed between them melted away, leaving behind the gentle flow of camaraderie and understanding.

“Never too late for a reunion redo,” Hunter quipped, his easy-going nature smoothing over any remaining awkwardness in the room.

“Reunion redo,” Michelle repeated to herself, the phrase rolling around in her mind like a sweet possibility. The revelation had shifted something crucial, realigning pieces that had been jumbled by miscommunication and deceit. Now, standing amidst friends and forgiven pets, she and Jeff were on the brink of something new—or perhaps something rediscovered.

The laughter echoing off the walls had dwindled to a soft murmur when Jeff leaned in, his voice a low baritone. “Michelle, can we talk? Just you and me, out back?”

She nodded, heart fluttering like a caged bird eager for release. They slipped away from the warm glow of the Bumblebee into the cool evening air that enveloped the backyard.

“Look, about everything—” they began in unison, then laughed, a single note harmonizing their mutual awkwardness.

“Jinx, you owe me a coffee,” Michelle teased, elbowing him gently.

“Only if it’s from the Coffee Loft,” Jeff quipped, a smile playing on his lips.

“Deal,” she said, her breath visible in the crisp night.

“Michelle,” Jeff started again, his eyes scanning her face, earnest and open. “I’ve been a fool. Harold’s shenanigans...I should’ve known better than to fall for that.”

“Jeff, we both got played.” She shrugged, her voice tinged with regret. “But here we are, right? Clearing the air?”

“Clearing the air,” he repeated, stepping closer. His warmth was a contrast to the chill, the space between them charged with possibility.

“Feels good, doesn’t it?” Her gaze lifted to meet his.

“Better than good,” he murmured, his hand finding hers, fingers intertwining naturally.

“Like coming home,” she confessed, her heart racing with the possibilities of what might come next.

“Exactly.” His thumb brushed over her knuckles, sending tiny sparks up her arm.

“Jeff?” She tilted her head, hazel eyes searching his.

“Yeah?”

“Kiss me, you big idiot.”

He did. It was a kiss that spoke of missed opportunities, of second chances. Soft and sweet, it was laughter and morning coffee. It was apologies whispered on the wind.

When they broke apart, Michelle’s laugh was light, free. “Shall we go back inside before they send out a search party?”

“Let them wait,” Jeff grinned, stealing another quick kiss.

“Okay, but just one more minute.” She rested her head on his chest, listening to the steady rhythm of his heart.

“Or two,” he agreed, wrapping his arms around her.

The cold air didn’t seem to affect them as they stood there, lost in their own world. Jeff’s heartbeat was soothing, a comforting rhythm that mirrored the calmness Michelle felt inside. She could stay like this forever, wrapped in his arms, feeling his warmth seep into her.

Eventually, they had to return to reality. With a sigh, Michelle pulled away, looking up at Jeff. His eyes were soft, filled with a warmth that sent her heart fluttering.

“I’ve missed this, Michelle,” Jeff confessed, his voice barely above a whisper. “I’ve missed us.”

“I have, too, Jeff. I have, too. Let’s try again.”

Jeff’s face broke into a wide grin. “I was hoping you’d say that because Michelle, I’m all in.”

“Okay, let’s go back inside and tell everyone the good news,” she said, taking his hand and guiding him back through the patio doors.

Before they made it to the dining room, however, he stopped. “There’s just one more thing I need to do.”

“Oh, what’s that?” she asked with a quirk of her eyebrow.

“This,” Jeff whispered as he leaned down, capturing her lips in a kiss that was full of promise and hope for the future.

When they finally broke apart, Michelle felt a warmth spread through her that had nothing to do with the house and everything to do with the man standing in front of her. “You can do that any time you like.”

“Good to know,” he murmured with a chuckle.

As they made their way into the dining room, their friends looked up, grins spreading across their faces as they took in the reunited pair.

“About time,” Hunter exclaimed with a clap of his hands.

“I knew it would work,” Avery praised.

“Perfect plan,” Jenesa added.

“Here’s to new beginnings,” Danny chimed in, raising his glass.

“New beginnings,” Michelle echoed, her smile never brighter.

“New beginnings,” Jeff agreed, his gaze locked on Michelle, full of promise and hope.

Together, as a reunited couple, they joined the table, laughter spilling over, forks clinking on plates, glasses raised—a symphony of camaraderie. At that moment, all was right in their little corner of the world.

Chapter Ten

“Jeff, this place is straight out of a fairy tale,” Michelle breathed, her eyes wide with childlike wonder as they stepped into the Garden Shed in Wilmont. The scent of old roses and earth mingled in the air, a fragrant welcome to what was once an ordinary cottage now transformed into a trove of enchantments.

“Wait until you see the back,” Jeff replied, a lopsided grin teasing his lips.

They meandered through the aisles, brushing past antique gardening tools and shelves heavy with potted greenery. At the rear of the store, a wooden sign whimsically painted with looping letters beckoned: ‘Enter our Garden.’

“Shall we?” Jeff gestured grandly towards the archway, his voice a playful mimicry of a medieval knight.

“Lead on, Sir Jeff,” Michelle played along, her laughter bright and clear as a silver bell.

The garden unfolded before them like the pages of a storybook. To their right, Mermaid Cove glistened with seashells and a small fountain, the sound of trickling water mimicking ocean waves.

“I always wanted to be a mermaid,” Michelle confessed, leaning down to admire a quote etched onto a sign.

“Mermaids have nothing on you,” Jeff remarked, watching her with an affectionate gaze.

“Flatterer.”

“Realist.”

They wandered from tale to tale, each section a loving tribute to the stories that had captivated countless hearts. At Alice’s Tea Party, they giggled over a Mad Hatter figurine, its eyes comically crossed.

“Care for some tea, my dear?” Jeff asked, striking an exaggerated pose beside the table.

“Only if it’s as mad as this party,” she teased back.

Snow White’s Cottage was next, complete with seven tiny benches and a welcoming glow from within. “Think there’s a handsome prince inside?” Michelle mused aloud.

“Only if he’s tending bar,” Jeff countered, tapping his nose with mock solemnity.

“Ah, so no competition then,” she said, a playful nudge to his side.

“None at all.”

Fairy Land was a riot of colors, flowers woven into arches and twinkling lights strung between branches. A wooden plaque whispered a secret, ‘Believe in magic.’

“Looks like your coffee shop on midsummer’s night,” Jeff remarked, knowing how Michelle transformed the Coffee Loft for themed evenings.

“Minus the caffeine rush,” she added, her eyes reflecting the shimmering lights.

“Who needs caffeine when you have magic?”

“Never say such a thing,” Michelle playfully chastised with mock horror.

Their next stop was Narnia, a lamppost standing sentinel amid frosted trees and a wardrobe door cracked open to the imagination.

Jeff took a step closer to the wardrobe, peering inside, half expecting a lion or a witch to greet him. “Shall we?” he suggested, extending his hand towards Michelle.

She hesitated for a moment, her gaze lingering on the frosty branches above them before she slipped her hand into his. “Lead the way, Aslan.”

The cold air enveloped them as they stepped through the wardrobe, the back of it leading to a snowy landscape that stretched out endlessly before them. A soft, white carpet of fake snow crunched under their feet as they ventured deeper into the unknown world.

A gentle breeze rustled the fur coats hanging inside the wardrobe, whispering secrets of this mysterious realm. Jeff noticed that Michelle shivered, but he suspected it wasn't from the cold as much as from the thrill of exploration. This was her kind of adventure, one where reality intertwined with fantasy.

They walked under the watchful gaze of the lamppost, its warm glow casting dancing shadows on the snow. The silence was broken only by the crunching of snow and their soft laughter, fueled by the magic of discovery.

Jeff stopped suddenly, his eyes wide with wonder. Michelle followed his gaze and gasped. There, right in front of them, was a majestic marble stag, its antlers adorned with ice crystals, its eyes filled with ancient wisdom. “Welcome,” it seemed to say without any words.

The climax of their journey was Hogwarts' Castle, stone battlements rising high, banners of the four houses fluttering in the gentle breeze.

“Always fancied myself a Gryffindor,” Jeff admitted, puffing out his chest in jest.

“Really? I had you pegged for a Slytherin,” Michelle teased, elbowing him gently.

“Ouch. That’s a low blow,” he said, feigning hurt, but the laughter in his eyes betrayed him.

“Only the bravest can admit where they truly belong,” she replied, “Remember, it’s our choices that show who we really are.”

“Then I choose this,” Jeff said, his voice lowering, his gaze locking onto hers. “Today, this moment, with you.”

“Best choice you’ve ever made,” Michelle whispered back.

Beyond the stone walls of Hogwarts, a hidden path wrapped in jasmine and ivy led them to a secret garden. Flickering fairy lights twinkled like distant stars above a quaint gazebo, nestled among clusters of wildflowers that spilled over the edges of their beds.

“Wow,” Michelle breathed out, her hand clasping at Jeff’s as they approached. The table under the gazebo was draped in a white linen cloth, fine china, and crystal glasses gleaming under the soft glow of hanging lanterns.

“Did you do all this?” she asked, her voice a mix of awe and curiosity. They moved closer, her fingers tracing the delicate patterns of the lace table runner.

“Guilty as charged,” he replied with a grin. He pulled out a chair for her, hoping the gentlemanly gesture wrapped warmth around her heart.

“Sit,” he urged, his eyes cradling hers.

She eased into the chair, the scent of rosemary and thyme from nearby planters floating around them. “It’s beautiful.”

“Only the best for you,” Jeff said, pouring sparkling water into her glass. The bubbles danced upward, racing to escape.

“But how did you find this place?” she queried, tucking a loose strand of hair behind her ear, her eyes fixed on him.

“Ah,” Jeff started, serving her a delicate portion of caprese salad with a flourish. “I overheard Taylor talking about it at the book drive. She said it was her favorite spot in all of Texas.”

Michelle nodded. “That makes sense. Taylor would love this place.”

“Yep, so I called the next day and made the reservations.”

“But that was way before the whole fiasco with Harold happened,” Michelle pointed out.

“Well, when things went...bad for a while, I called and canceled. And when we were back on track, I called and made them again.”

“Such care to keep it a secret,” she chuckled, twirling her fork. “Didn’t take you for the cloak and dagger type.”

“Only when it comes to impressing a certain someone.” His wink was playful, but sincerity anchored his tone.

“Mission accomplished,” she replied, her laughter mingling with the quiet symphony of the garden’s creatures.

As they chatted about their lives, the soft glow of fairy lights strung across the gazebo gave their meal an ethereal quality.

Michelle leaned back in her chair and smiled. “Jeff, this place...it’s magical,” she breathed out, her voice barely above a whisper. It was as if she were afraid to break the spell.

His eyes sparkled with delight, mirroring the twinkle of the lights above. “I thought you might like it,” he said, his hand reaching across the table to briefly brush against hers.

She smiled, taking a bite from her fork, savoring the mix of flavors. “This chicken is perfectly cooked. And the herbs... they’re grown here?”

“Yep. Farm to table, or garden to gazebo, I guess,” he jested, cutting into his own dish with precision.

“Chef’s kiss,” she joked, puckering her lips and miming the gesture in the air. Her laughter was light, like the notes of a piano in a jazz bar.

“Did you just chef’s kiss my date plan?” He feigned offense, but his grin betrayed him.

“Maybe.” She winked back at him. “But don’t tell Avery that this food rivals hers. She’ll never forgive me.”

“Your secret is safe with me,” he vowed, enjoying the easy banter.

They lapsed into a comfortable silence, the clink of silverware on plates and the hum of crickets filling the space between them.

“Tell me, Mr. Parker,” she said, leaning forward, elbows on the table. “What other covert operations have you been running that I should know about?”

“Ah, well, there was Operation Get-Michelle-to-Smile,” he confessed. “Involved a lot of corny jokes.”

“No need to pull out that arsenal. You can save it for a rainy day,” she told him with a smile. “You’ve already had a successful campaign,” she admitted with a mock-serious nod.

“Then there was Operation Learn-Everything-About-Coffee. That one is ongoing.”

“Sounds intense.”

“Very. Requires daily surveillance of the Coffee Loft.”

“Stalker much?” she teased, swirling her drink in her glass.

“Only in the most charming sense of the word,” he shot back, winking again.

She laughed, and Jeff couldn’t take his eyes off of her. Watching the effervescent joy bubble up inside her rivaled the sparkling water they were sharing.

“Okay, okay,” she conceded, raising her hands in surrender. “You’ve won me over, Agent Parker. Consider me impressed.”

“Good,” he said, satisfaction oozing from his voice. “Because I didn’t plan an exit strategy.”

“Smart man,” she murmured with a wink.

As they continued their meal, the quiet moments spoke volumes. Every shared glance, every laugh, added another layer to the evening—one that Jeff knew he'd tuck away in his memory like a cherished book to be revisited time and again.

Chapter Eleven

Laughter swirled through the evening air, mingling with the scents of fresh soil and blooming flowers from the garden dinner. The stars seemed to twinkle in amusement as Jeff led her by the hand, a playful glint in his eye that promised more than just the end of a meal.

“Where are we going next?” she asked, curiosity piqued.

“Surprise,” Jeff said, his voice low and teasing as they rounded the corner to find an array of easels set up under several sets of string lights, paintbrushes at the ready beside palettes splashed with vibrant colors. “Paint and sip,” he announced with a flourish, like a magician revealing his grand trick.

“Jeff Parker, you’re full of surprises,” she laughed, squeezing his hand.

“Wait till you see my masterpiece,” he boasted, but there was a comedic wobble in his confidence.

They each took their places before blank canvases, glasses of wine within arm’s reach. She watched him dip his brush into the blue, a childlike excitement dancing in his eyes. As they worked, hilarity ensued. Their brushes dabbed and swirled, but where majestic winter landscapes were intended, abstract blobs took form.

“Is that a snowman or a snowball fight gone wrong?” she teased, peeking at his canvas.

“Ha, yours looks like the snow apocalypse,” Jeff shot back, his nose crinkling in mirth, echoing the scars of past brawls.

“Shut up, I’m channeling my inner Picasso.”

“More like Pic-oh-no,” he quipped.

Her laughter echoed off the walls, genuine and free.

With every stroke, with every laugh, the canvas began to look less like chaos and more like a representation of their shared joy. It wasn’t a winter landscape, but it was beautiful in its own unique way.

Jeff’s canvas, too, started to take shape. His snowman was no longer a blob but a figure with personality, a carrot nose, and a goofy grin. His snowball fight was now a whimsical dance of colors, a celebration of imperfection and fun.

She watched him for a moment. Jeff, so confident behind first a bar and now behind a badge, seemed almost bashful now under her gaze. It endeared him even more to her. This was what it felt like to be utterly charmed, wasn’t it? The romantic scenes from movies she loved paled in comparison to the real thing.

“Look at us,” she exclaimed, stepping back to admire their work. “We’re quite the artists.”

Jeff beamed, pride radiating from him. “We sure are. I can’t think of a better way to spend an evening.”

They clinked their wine glasses together, their laughter mingling with the night air, the stars above seeming to shine just a little brighter.

“Let’s exchange them,” she suggested between giggles. “As a memory of our artistic failure.”

“Deal. But it’s also a testament to an epic night,” Jeff added, handing over his ‘creation’ with mock solemnity.

Their fingers brushed during the exchange, sending a spark through the cool night air. She held up his painting, squinting one eye. “You know, with the right lighting and enough wine, this could be...passable.”

“Hey, yours will have the place of honor. I plan to donate it to the bar. Scare away the rowdies,” he grinned, pride mingling with affection.

“You wouldn’t dare?” she questioned with apprehension.

He seemed tempted to let that threat simmer, but after a moment, he shook his head. “Of course not. I plan to keep it in my apartment as a memento of the perfect date.”

“Phew, I was actually thinking of taking mine back for a minute.”

“Nope, it’s mine,” he told her, placing it under his arm for protection.

“Oh dear, you didn’t think before you did that,” she gasped, pointing to the wet paint dripping down his brown sweater.

Jeff glanced down and chuckled. “Guess not. We should probably clean this up before we leave.” Then, glancing at her painting, he added, “Sorry about your masterpiece.”

“I guess it’s not going anywhere now besides the trash can,” she teased with a sigh.

He looked down and shrugged. “Actually, it looks like a lot of abstract pieces I’ve seen over the years. I think it might have improved it.”

“Oh, you.” She reached out and playfully punched his shoulder. “Stop it.”

“Never,” he told her as he pulled her toward him and leaned down and placed a kiss on her lips, soft at first, tentative, then it deepened with a hunger that had been simmering beneath shared jokes and playful banter. It was a kiss that spoke of rekindled flames and new beginnings.

“Let’s get you cleaned up,” she said breathlessly as she leaned over and grabbed a handful of towels. She worked magic and got the paint off his sweater before they abandoned their easels and walked toward his truck, the gravel crunching beneath their feet.

He opened the door for her, but before she climbed in, Jeff caught her hand, pulling her close. He stole another quick kiss before shutting the door behind her.

As Jeff started the engine, her smile reflected in the dark window. It was hopeful, bright, and filled with the promise of what lay ahead.

The Coffee Loft pulsed with energy, a mix of caffeine and anticipation.

“What’s going on tonight?” Jeff asked as they pulled along the curb.

“Karaoke,” she announced with a wide grin.

“Oh no,” he grumbled, clearly wishing he hadn’t asked.

“Oh yes,” she told him with a mischievous grin. “Come on, Jeff. It’ll be fun.” She tugged at his hand, her laughter mingling with the chatter around them.

“Define ‘fun,’” Jeff drawled, arching a brow. His reluctance was a playful dance they both knew well.

“Fun, as in watching you murder a song in front of a crowd.” Her eyes sparkled with mischief.

“Murder’s a strong word,” he protested, but there was no heat behind it.

“Fine. Manslaughter.” She gave him an impish grin.

“Only because you asked so nicely.” He surrendered with a theatrical sigh, letting her lead the way to the karaoke signup sheet.

Twinkling lights hung from the rafters in the back area, casting a warm glow over the mismatched furniture. A microphone stood center stage, beckoning the brave or the foolhardy.

“Remember, you promised to be terrible,” she whispered as they queued up.

“Darlin’, I’m a man of my word.” The twinkle in his eye was as potent as the promise.

“Next up, we have Jeff,” Emily, who was acting as host for the night, announced, setting off a scattered applause.

Jeff ambled to the mic, his casual confidence a stark contrast to the quaking first-timer who’d preceded him. He scanned the crowd, his gaze landing on Michelle, who was wearing a grin that said they were in this together.

“All right folks, brace yourselves,” he warned good-naturedly, then launched into a rendition of “I Want to Know What Love Is” that was, indeed, fantastically awful.

Michelle clapped over her laughter, pride written across her face. Onstage, Jeff was all flailing limbs and off-key notes, a one-man comedy show. It wasn’t just funny—it was endearing, the way he leaned into the performance, fearless and free.

“Give it up for Jeff,” Emily reclaimed the mic, while the audience cheered their approval—or maybe their relief.

“See? Terrible.” Jeff swaggered back to Michelle, feigning arrogance.

“Adorably terrible.” She corrected, standing on tiptoes to plant a kiss on his cheek. “Your reward,” she teased, “for being a good sport.”

“Best prize ever,” Jeff praised, slipping an arm around her waist.

Later, as the night wound down, they left the laughter and music behind. The outside air was crisp, carrying the scent of impending winter. Jeff’s hand found hers, their fingers intertwining naturally as they approached the stairs leading up to her apartment above the Coffee Loft.

“Tonight was...unexpected,” he admitted, each step upward bringing them closer to goodbye.

“Unexpectedly perfect,” she countered, her voice soft with contentment.

At the top of the stairs, under a sky dusted with stars, they paused. He cupped her face gently, thumbs caressing her cheeks. Their breaths mingled, hearts beating a synchronized rhythm. Then, their lips met—a silent language of shared history and newfound hope.

“Good night, Jeff,” she whispered against his lips.

“Good night, Michelle.” His voice was raw with emotion.

“See you tomorrow?” Hope tinted her words.

“Tomorrow and every day after that,” he confirmed, the finality of their parting sweetened by the certainty of more tomorrows to come.

Neither of them went to move. They lingered in the embrace, a cocoon of warmth on the landing. Her head rested against Jeff’s chest, his heartbeat steady beneath her ear. The night hummed with the distant echo of karaoke tunes drifting from below, their laughter still clinging to the cool air.

“Is that what I think it is?” a voice boomed from beneath them. Mrs. Shomacker’s silhouette, a broad shape against the dim glow of street lamps, craned upward. A gleam of satisfaction in her eyes as if she’d caught a rom-com playing out live before her. “Does this mean you two are back together?” Her words cut through the quiet, sharp and nosy.

“Shh,” Michelle wanted to say, “let us have this moment.” Instead, their hearts answered in unison.

“Yes,” they exclaimed, voices mingling like their breaths had moments ago.

“Finally,” Mrs. Shomacker’s chortle rattled the evening air. “I’ll tell the church group.”

“Great,” Michelle muttered, rolling her eyes.

Jeff squeezed her hand, shared amusement sparking between them. “Nosy, old busybody,” he whispered, and Michelle snickered, the sound catching on the wind.

“Quiet, you two. I can hear everything,” Mrs. Shomacker called out with a mock sternness that couldn’t quite hide her chuckle.

“Guess we’re not as sneaky as we thought,” Jeff said, winking at her.

“Never stood a chance,” she agreed, her smile lingering, heart swelling with the simplicity of their rekindled connection, knowing that she would have a lifetime of tomorrows with Jeff from now on.

Chapter Twelve

The bell above the local diner's entrance chimed a welcome as Jeff, in his new Hero police uniform, held the door for Michelle. Her blonde hair caught the midday sun filtering through the glass. She flashed him a smile, her hazel eyes lighting up in that familiar way that never failed to make his heart skip.

“Look at him strut,” she teased, nodding toward the glossy German shepherd wearing his official K9 vest, trotting right alongside Jeff. “Winston's becoming more famous around here than you, Jeff.”

“Hey now, let's not forget who the handler is here.” Jeff chuckled, running a hand through his thick brown hair, which, indeed, had seen its fair share of scuffles after recently getting hired as a local police officer. He was also the head of their new search and rescue department, which included all of one person: himself. But that didn't bother Jeff. He was happy to be doing what he loved and the chance to stay in Hero with Michelle.

They slid into a booth, and Michelle scooted in close to Jeff, her shoulder brushing against his arm, sending a pleasant shiver down his spine. The waitress, a middle-aged woman with a beehive hairstyle that defied gravity, bustled over with menus.

“Same as always?” she asked, her pencil poised over her notepad.

“Actually...” Jeff glanced at Michelle, his grin growing, “...let’s switch it up today. We’re celebrating.”

“Is that so?” The waitress winked. “What’ll it be then?”

“Double cheeseburgers all around,” he declared. Michelle laughed, leaning her head on his shoulder.

“Going wild today, are we?” she quipped.

“Only the best for my girl and our top dog,” he replied, scratching behind Winston’s ears.

Their friends filled the rest of the giant booth. Laughter and conversation blending into a harmonious backdrop. Hunter slapped Jeff on the back, his wide grin a mirror of Jeff’s own.

“Man, I knew you’d whip that pup into shape, but you guys were fantastic at the demonstration today,” Hunter said, his voice booming in the crowded space.

“Couldn’t have been ready without Michelle’s late-night pep talks and gallons of coffee,” Jeff confessed, squeezing Michelle’s hand under the table. She squeezed back, her support as steadfast as ever.

“Cheers to our local heroes,” Danny raised his glass of soda, prompting a chorus of ‘cheers’ that rippled through their group of friends.

The food arrived: a towering platter of juicy double cheeseburgers, crispy fries, and frothy milkshakes. The aroma of grilled beef and melted cheese permeated the air, and Jeff’s stomach rumbled in anticipation. He hadn’t realized how hungry he was until that very moment.

As they dug into their meals, Michelle’s phone buzzed on the table. She picked it up, her eyes widening as she read the message. “Guys, you’re not going to believe this,” she gasped out in glee. “The Coffee Loft has been nominated by corporate for best coffee shop of the year.”

Everyone stopped eating and turned their attention to Michelle, their expressions a mix of surprise and delight. “That’s incredible, Michelle,” Avery exclaimed, her blue eyes sparkling with excitement. “You deserve it.”

Jenesa nodded in agreement. “Absolutely, Michelle. Your coffee is the best in town, and we all know it.”

Michelle blushed at the praise, her cheeks turning a soft pink. “Thank you, guys. I’m just happy to be nominated. I’m not sure I’ll win, but it’s an honor just to be recognized.”

Jeff squeezed her hand under the table, his grin wide and proud. “You’ll win, babe. I have no doubt about it.”

“I guess that means we made the right decision to use your beans for our coffee at the Bumblebee,” Jenesa stated with a smile.

“We’ll have to put out a sign next to our morning brew mentioning your accomplishment,” Avery added.

“Like I said, I haven’t won yet,” Michelle reminded them a second time.

“You’re a shoo-in,” Danny stated with a shrug. “So, no worries there.”

“Your coffee can’t be beat,” Jeff agreed with a nod. “I should know since I’ve managed to get addicted to the stuff.”

This caused everyone to erupt into laughter. As Jeff looked around, taking in the faces of those they loved, he realized he couldn’t be happier. Six months ago, he never would have thought this was the life he wanted, but as he felt his K9 partner’s warmth against his leg, he knew he’d finally found what he’d been missing all these years. He thought about the obstacles he’d overcome, the skepticism at the bar when he first mentioned wanting to become a K9 handler, the long nights of studying, and the countless doubts that Michelle helped him chase away. All of it was worth it to be right here in this moment, with his friends, loyal K9 partner, and the love of his life.

“Hey,” Michelle nudged him gently, bringing him back to the moment. “You’re getting all misty-eyed on me. What’s going on in that head of yours?”

“Just thinking about how lucky I am,” he admitted, his voice barely penetrating the noise of the diner.

“Good answer,” she smiled, raising her milkshake for a clink against his. “To us, to our town, to successes, and to whatever crazy idea we both come up with next.”

“Whatever it is, I know we’ll be right there making it happen together,” Jeff said, and he meant every word.

“Always,” Michelle affirmed, and they sealed their pact with a sip and an exchange of knowing glances—a silent promise to share the rest of their lives together.

An hour later, the sun dipped below the horizon, painting the sky in streaks of orange and purple as Jeff and Michelle meandered down Main Street after their celebratory dinner. Winston trotted alongside, his tail wagging contentedly.

“Race you to the Coffee Loft,” Michelle teased, a twinkle in her eye that matched the first stars appearing above.

“Ha, with Winston here? You don’t stand a chance,” Jeff laughed. He took off anyway, his K9 partner bounding ahead as if in on the joke, barking joyously.

Michelle sprinted after them, her laughter trailing like music through the quieting town. They arrived at the Coffee Loft, breathless, with Michelle playfully accusing Winston of being a traitor for not tripping Jeff up.

“Traitor? Hardly. He’s the best wingman ever. He was the one who ended up getting us to talk again.” Jeff grinned, ruffling the German shepherd’s fur.

Winston responded with an affectionate nuzzle against Jeff’s hand, his loyalty unquestionable.

“I suppose you’re right,” Michelle said with a nod. “Come on, let’s sit.” She motioned toward the bench outside her shop, still catching her breath.

They settled side by side, the evening's cool breeze whispering secrets only they could hear. Winston lay at their feet, a guardian of their shared solitude.

“Remember when this was all just a ‘what if’?” Michelle mused, resting her head on Jeff's shoulder.

“Feels like a lifetime ago.” Jeff's arm wrapped around her, pulling her close. “But I knew we'd make it.”

“Confident, weren't you?” She raised an eyebrow, playful accusation lacing her tone.

“Only because I had you.” He kissed the top of her head, the scent of her lavender shampoo mingling with the fresh night air.

“Sweet talker.” She leaned into him, her sigh content. “So, what's next for us?”

“More of the same,” Jeff decided. “Love, laughter...maybe a dog or two more?”

“Or three?” Michelle countered, her voice brimming with hope.

“Let's not get ahead of ourselves,” he chuckled. “One step at a time.”

“Agreed,” she said. “But whatever steps they are, we'll take them together.”

“Absolutely.” Jeff squeezed her hand, a silent vow. “Together.”

“Forever,” she whispered back, sealing their unspoken promise.

“I love you, Michelle Kenney,” he told her as he leaned over and placed a tender kiss on her lips.

The kiss lingered, soft and full of promise, before they finally pulled away, both smiling at each other in the dimming light. Winston, sensing their contentment, let out a soft whine and rested his head on his paws.

“And I love you, too, Jeff Parker,” Michelle replied with a soft smile. She leaned her head back on his shoulder, the simple gesture making his heart swell with love for this woman who had become his rock, his partner, his best friend.

As the last light of day faded, leaving them in the soft glow of The Coffee Loft's sign, Jeff knew this was just the beginning. Together, they would face tomorrow and all the tomorrows after that, and he wouldn't have it any other way.

THE END

WANT to know what happens next in Hero? Grab your copy of Small Town Sash and find out.

Next Book in the Coffee Loft

What do you get when you mix caffeine, a crush, and a secret together? – A MESS!

Madison ‘Thing One’ Petersen liked her coffee just like her men... tall, dark, strong, and in hot water! Unfortunately for her, the man that checked off every box on her list was none other than the tall jerk walking in with Michael, her twin.

Emmett Wilkes was being harassed by the most frustrating pest who kept bumping into him everywhere he went – including his favorite coffee shop. There was nowhere to hide in Yonder, Texas, it seemed - compounded by the fact that his best friend was her brother.

When an unexpected offer tenuously begins a fragile friendship between the (fr)enemies, could one small mistake bring down an entire empire in the making?

Grab your copy of May The Froth Be With You

Sneak Peek of Small Town Start

She was late. She, Jenesa Olson, the most reliable woman in the world and the veritable embodiment of punctuality, was actually late. She had never been late in her life. Well, almost never. Once, when she snuck in five minutes late when she was twelve years old, her father had gotten so mad at her she'd made an oath: never be late again. It had become ingrained in her DNA to always be on time. Yet...here she was, sprinting to her car like a mad woman. As the seconds ticked by, Jenesa's frustration skyrocketed. "Stupid, stupid, stupid," she reprimanded herself under her breath as she tried to juggle the awkwardly large cage in her hands. She nearly tripped four times from that cursed clicking noise of her stiletto heels, a situation that would have been comical if she hadn't been so livid.

A terrifying screech bellowed from the tiny prison, and she almost dropped it in shock. She rolled her eyes and gently rocked the cage to try and mollify the occupant. When the animal inside only wailed louder, she shifted the cage to her left hip and quickly reached her panic-stricken fingers into her handbag, fumbling to find her keys, only to be greeted by pockets full of lint and forgotten lip balm. "Really? Missing?

Now of all times. Terrific,” she mumbled in frustration. Where did she put them this time?

She clumsily dropped the cage onto the ground, its contents clanging and rattling against the sides. As she chucked her purse on the hood of her white Mercedes, the contents strewn out in a disorganized heap. This was wildly out of her comfort zone; how could she let this happen when her whole life was at stake? “You know better than to be late for the most important meeting of your lifetime. Your dad would be ashamed,” she muttered to herself, shaking her head in disbelief as she rummaged through the contents in an anxious frenzy.

From behind her, she heard some wildly-enthusiastic cat-calls and whistles, followed closely by a deep, male voice with a Southern drawl, “Lookin’ mighty fine today, ain’t ya, darlin’.”

Another man called out, “You might be able to get a ride with him.”

She felt her blood turn to ice and a shiver run down her spine. She stood still, dreading the inevitable. Oh great, she thought, that’s exactly what I need when I’m already late for an important meeting and I lost my car keys. Creeps hitting on me when I least expect it, like today of all days. Why did they even bother? This wasn’t the first time she had to fend off unwanted male attention, but she certainly wished it was the last. To top it off, it looked like today was the worst possible day for them to mess with her.

“Need some assistance?” a third man suggested, in a low, sultry voice that was uncomfortably close. She could feel his presence looming. His breath blasted her, giving her chills. “I’m quite handy, if you know what I mean.” This caused the other men in the group to erupt with laughter.

Her reaction, on the other hand, was far from positive. The suggestion made her stomach churn with revulsion. She took a deep breath, mustered up her courage, and spun around to confront them. Her long, brown hair swishing around her shoulders in an exaggerated fashion as she crossed her arms over her chest and raised an eyebrow. “Seriously? 1985 wants its crude pick-up line back. Why don’t you go find a time machine and travel back there so you can leave me alone?”

The three figures standing before her were a motley crew of grizzled gents, overflowing with muscles so big that their stubby t-shirts and jeans could barely contain them. One even had a belt buckle so big and flashy that it looked like an absolute miracle it stayed on his girthy waist. She took one look at them and knew right away that they were total troublemakers. They all looked like someone had stolen their candy, and none of them seemed remotely happy about her comeback.

The man standing closest to her gave her a dirty look. “Well my, my...that was mighty ruuude of you,” he drawled out mockingly, his face displaying an annoyed grin. “All we were trying to do was offer you a little help.”

“I don’t need help. I’m not a damsel in distress,” she snapped out.

“That’s what’s wrong with all you uppity city women. You walk around in your flashy form-fitting suits and spiky heels and expect men not to react. I mean, look, you’re even driving one of those fancy foreign cars that cost more than most people’s houses around here,” the second man complained.

“You’re just jealous I make enough money to buy it,” she retorted, though after she saw their angry scowls, she immediately regretted saying it.

“Doesn’t matter much if you can’t work it properly. That’s what’s wrong when a woman acts like she can do anything a man can do, but clearly, can’t,” a third man stated with a sneer as he gestured to the mess on the front of her car.

“Maybe we should teach her what a man can do.” Before she could move away, the man closest to her reached out and grabbed her roughly by the arm.

Her hazel eyes widened with fear as she tried to think what she was going to do to get out of the precarious situation.

Just then, an earsplitting screech echoed from behind her. She whipped her head around, her gaze quickly settling on the ground where her caged monkey had broken free. Out of the corner of her eye, she saw the small, brown figure darting towards the first man. Before she could even process what was happening, the little guy had already leaped onto him and began savagely biting and clawing at him in a wild fit of rage. The guy stumbled backward, flailing his arms as the monkey jumped around him like a frenzied conductor with a diabolical grin on his face. The mini band suit he was wearing only added to the hilarious irony as the monkey clung to the man's chest and beat on his head with his tiny fists. It almost looked like an outtake from an old Looney Tunes cartoon!

The guy let out a startled shriek and begged for her to get the animal off him, but his words were no use. The monkey was too determined to continue its mischievous rampage and merely cackled at him in response. Within moments, the man was able to shove the little beast off him and take off running in the opposite direction, his friends hot on his heels. The monkey enjoyed its victory, gleefully scampering back to its cage.

Jenesa couldn't believe it. Relief and gratitude mixed with a strange sensation of pride-and a touch of smugness flooded her veins. As she watched the men retreat, running like their tails were on fire, she thanked her lucky stars that her brave little monkey came to her rescue. Without his help, she might have been in big trouble-and not just the kind that 'a little monkey business' could fix.

She kneeled down and poked her head in the cage. "Thanks, Hershey. I don't know what I would have done if you hadn't had my back, literally."

Apparently, he was already done with his protection mode. He stuck his tongue out and turned his back on her. That's how it always went; one moment he was her best friend and the next mortal enemy. "Fine, have it your way," she grumbled as she stood up.

Urgency was gnawing at Jenesa as she quickly pushed her unsavory experience with the men out of her head. She raced to the hood of her car, feeling immense pressure to get to her meeting on time. Anxiously, she rummaged through the contents, a wild panic rising within her. Her heart leaped, and she almost cried when she spotted her keys in the side zipper compartment where she always kept them. “Of course,” she muttered as she snatched up her things and wiped away the lone tear at the corner of her eye. “Figures.”

A piercing screech echoed in the air once again. It was clear that Hershey was desperately trying to break free again and Jenesa was not in the mood to deal with it. She sighed heavily, knowing what she had to do. She grabbed her keys and flung open her trunk to grab a giant pink blanket. She swiftly stuffed the monkey into the backseat and covered up the noisy animal. Jenesa slammed the door shut and slung herself into the driver’s seat. Before Hershey could make another sound, she sped away to her destination.

After two contractors had walked off the job of renovating her bed and breakfast, she’d scrambled to find anybody else willing to do the job. She was meeting with the last contractor in the county, and if he refused to work with her, she would have to shut the doors before they were even open. Beginning the meeting by keeping him waiting was not the way to go about it. She hoped he hadn’t already taken off and left her high and dry. If Jenesa wanted to get her business back on track, she had to make sure this meeting didn’t turn into another disaster.

A shrill screech filled the car, causing Jenesa to jolt and the car to swerve wildly to the right. “What the—” She grumbled, shooting a glance over her shoulder at the backseat as another ear-piercing shriek echoed in the vehicle. Her sister, Bridget’s, abandoned monkey was making a racket as usual. Jenesa shook her head and reached into the backseat to gently wobble his cage. “It’s okay, Hershey, we’re almost back at the house.” Of all the things she was expecting when her little sister ran off to join a commune, inheriting a pet monkey wasn’t one of them. She sighed, resigning herself to yet another mess that Bridget had left her with. She had been picking up her sibling’s slack ever since their parents died ten years ago, and it seemed she was going to have to keep doing it.

Jenesa huffed under her breath as she scowled at the clock in the dashboard. It mocked her with its '10 AM' reading. "Perfect," she grumbled, "officially late." For a woman who prided herself on being fifteen minutes early to every appointment, this was a truly terrible predicament. Who knew she'd have to drive two towns over for a vet who was even willing to treat a monkey? As it turned out, after all her concerns about him croaking, all that happened was that the foul little beast got into her fruit bowl and ate more than his fair share.

She was already dealing with enough problems, yet she was now stuck with the responsibility of taking care of a mischief-making monkey while trying to fix up her B & B. Her last contractor had warned her that the old Victorian had too many problems to be able to be fixed, and it should just be torn down, instead. If she had only gone to Hero and inspected the property in person rather than purchased it online, sight unseen, maybe she wouldn't have gotten herself into this mess. She had given up a successful career as a corporate lawyer in order to follow her dream, only to have it come crashing down around her. With her entire life savings invested in this project, she had no choice but to make it work.

"Don't forget, you're a giant slayer," she reminded herself. "You slay giants for a living. No one is better at it than you." Her current giant may not be like the ones she fought back in New York City, but she could still slay anything that came her way. When she wore her custom-tailored power suit with the pearl earrings and necklace, and designer shoes with red bottoms, she felt just like David when he took down Goliath. That was the exact attitude she needed to overcome all the obstacles that had been thrown in her way and make her old Victorian the best B & B in all of Texas. Correct that, in all of the South. Heck, why stop there? She could shoot for the moon and aim for all of the United States if she pushed herself hard enough.

Jenesa heard her phone ding, and her heart shot into her throat as she expected to read a message from the contractor, saying he was done waiting at the B & B location. Breaking every law of the road, she grabbed her phone to take a peek.

What she saw, however, was a problem of an entirely different sort.

“Bounced check,” she screamed at her phone in disbelief, as she flung it on the passenger seat of her car, causing her phone to activate and the robotic voice of Siri to ask Jenesa what she needed. Hershey freaked out all over again, causing her to jerk the wheel a second time.

Then without warning, her car suddenly and violently slammed into something with such force that it came to an abrupt stop. The sound of metal crunching and glass shattering filled the air like a train colliding with a wall. The force of the impact threw her forward, her seatbelt digging into her shoulder and barely keeping her from hitting the steering wheel. The whole car shook and the engine died out in an eerie silence.

She looked through her windshield and her eyes widened. Behind the glass, a massive gray object had filled her field of vision. Her hands rose to her face as she tried to make out the details. It was solid and immovable, so large that her car appeared to be nothing more than a crushed ant under its tires. How on earth did this happen? She couldn't believe that she had crashed into another vehicle. One moment she was driving down the road, and the next she had suddenly slammed into a truck stopped on the road. She screamed and pounded the steering wheel with her slender fingers, causing Hershey to shriek in the backseat again.

Jenesa was still reeling from what happened when an irate man sprung from his truck, followed by a German shepherd. “What the heck is wrong with you? What possessed you to ram into a stopped car at a red light?” he bellowed, stomping toward her car. “You better get out here and make this right, pronto.”

She wasn't sure what she was more shocked by, the fact that she had been in a fender bender or that the other driver was now demanding a confrontation straight out of an old western movie.

To find out what happens next, grab your copy of Small Town Start right now!

Also by Jenna Brandt/Jennifer Branson

Most Books are Free in Kindle Unlimited

JENNA BRANDT'S CONTEMPORARY ROMANCE

Hero Search and Rescue

~sweet romantic comedy with a dash of suspense~

Come visit the small town of Hero, Texas where the neighbors or nosy, the B&B is supposedly haunted, and the new search and rescue academy's the talk of the town.

Small Town Start

Small Town Splurge

Small Town Smarty

Small Town Style

Small Town Sash

Small Town Slice

The Coffee Loft

~sweet romantic comedy~

From cold brews to cappuccinos and frothy frappes, there's something on the menu for every romantic comedy reader. Fake dates, meddling matchmakers, friends-to-lovers and so much more, each stand-alone story is the right blend of sweetness, guaranteed to warm your heart.

By Any Beans Necessary

First Responders of Faith Valley

~sweet romantic suspense~

Fall in love with a small Texas town filled with heroes willing to put their lives on the line for others. Brothers wearing the same badge, cousins fighting the same fire, paramedics saving citizens, all while trying to find their way to the perfect soulmate.

Saving His Reputation

(Free with Newsletter sign-up)

Arresting Her Heart

Sparking A Romance

Reviving Their Love

Guarding Her Secret

Rescuing Their Date

Mending A Broken Past

Igniting Her Feelings

Capturing His Attention

Defending Their Future

Disaster City Search and Rescue

~sweet romantic suspense~

Step into the world of Disaster City Search and Rescue, where officers, firefighters, military, and medics, train and work alongside each other with the dogs they love, to do the most dangerous job of all — help lost and injured victims find their way home.

The Girlfriend Rescue

The Billionaire Rescue

The Wedding Rescue

(Free with Newsletter sign-up)

The Movie Star Rescue

The Best Friend Rescue

The Ex-Wife Rescue

The Cowgirl Rescue

The Single Mom Rescue

The Pop Singer Rescue

The Army Ranger Rescue

The Boss's Baby Rescue

The Patriot Rescue

The Forgetful Princess Rescue

The Holiday Rescue

The Mistaken Identity Rescue

The Bombshell Rescue

The High Stakes Rescue

The Dark Water Rescue

The Thanksgiving Rescue

Wild Animal Protection Agency

~sweet romantic suspense~

Come be apart of the adventure, danger, and heartfelt moments with the Wild Animal Protection Agency, where brave men and women work alongside each other all over the world, to do the most risky job of all — rescue injured and endangered wild animals.

Rescue Agent for Dana

Rescue Agent for Sarah

Rescue Agent for Kylie

Rescue Agent for Josette

Rescue Agent for Margo

Rescue Agent for Penny

Box Set Books 1-3

Box Set Books 4-6

Complete Collection Box Set

Christmas in Sweet Bloom Texas

~sweet romantic suspense~

Community, small town values, and where wishes turn into miracles everyday.

A Wish for the Single Dad Sheriff

The Lawkeepers

~sweet romantic suspense~

A multi-author series alternating between historical westerns and contemporary westerns featuring law enforcement heroes that span multiple agencies and generations. Join bestselling author Jenna Brandt and many others as they weave captivating, sweet and inspirational stories of romance and suspense between the lawkeepers — and the women who love them. The Lawkeepers is a world like no other; a world where lawkeepers and heroes are honored with unforgettable stories, characters, and love.

Jenna's Lawkeeper books:

Contemporary

Lawfully Adored-K-9

Lawfully Wedded-K-9

Lawfully Treasured-SWAT

Lawfully Dashing-Female Cop/Christmas

Lawfully Devoted-Billionaire Bodyguard/K-9

Lawfully Heroic-Military Police

Lawfully Smitten-Christmas Workplace Romance

Lawfully Contemporary Box Set

Billionaires of Manhattan Series

~sweet billionaire romance~

The billionaires that live in Manhattan and the women who love them. If you love epic dates, grand romantic gestures, and men in suits with hearts of gold, then these are books are perfect for you.

Waiting on the Billionaire

Nanny for the Billionaire

Merging with the Billionaire

(Entire series on Audiobook)

BOM Box Set

Second Chance Islands

~sweet billionaire romance~

What's better than billionaires on islands? How about billionaires finding second chances at life, love, and redemption while on one.

The Billionaire's Repeat

(Free with Newsletter sign-up)

The Billionaire's Reunion

The Billionaire's Duty

The Billionaire's Christmas

SCI Box Set

Billionaire Birthday Club

~sweet billionaire romance~

An exclusive resort—for the billionaire who appears to have everything but secretly wants more. After filling out a confidential survey, a curated celebration is waiting on the island to make their birthday wishes come true!

The Billionaire's Birthday Wish

The Billionaire's Birthday Surprise

The Billionaire's Birthday Gift

BBC Box Set

JENNIFER BRANSON'S HISTORICAL ROMANCE

The Lawkeepers

~sweet historical romantic suspense~

A multi-author series alternating between historical westerns and contemporary westerns featuring law enforcement heroes that span multiple agencies and generations. Join bestselling author Jenna Brandt and many others as they weave captivating, sweet and inspirational stories of romance and suspense between the lawkeepers — and the women who love them. The Lawkeepers is a world like no other; a world where lawkeepers and heroes are honored with unforgettable stories, characters, and love.

Jennifer's Lawkeeper books:

Historical

Lawfully Loved-Texas Sheriff

Lawfully Wanted-Bounty Hunter

Lawfully Forgiven-Texas Ranger

Lawfully Avenged-US Marshal

Lawfully Covert-Spies

Lawfully Historical Box Set

Brides of Persimmon Pass Series

~sweet historical romance~

Meet the Brides of Persimmon Pass. Strong, brave women with hearts of gold each in need of a man to survive in the Old West. Enter the cowboys, ranchers, & deputies ready to take on the challenge of the rural town & the women in it.

Counting on the Cowboy

Gaming on the Gentleman

Doting on the Deputy

Relying on the Rancher

Flipping on the Farmer

Banking on the Businessman

Mail Order Mix-Up Series

~sweet historical romance~

Mail order bride books about women venturing out West to make new lives for themselves. What happens when they decide to take a chance on love along the way?

Mail Order Misfit

Mail Order Misstep

Mail Order Miscast

Mail Order Misaim

Mail Order Misplay

Mail Order Mister

Mail Order Mishap

MOMU Box Set

Widows, Brides, and Secret Babies

~sweet historical romance~

Mail order bride stories with a twist. What happens when a bride arrives pregnant or with a secret child?

Mail Order Miranda

Mail Order Miriam

Secret Baby Dilemma

~sweet historical romance~

Each mail order bride arrives with a baby or pregnant, and the prospective groom doesn't know until her arrival.

Mail Order Madeline

The Second Chance Brides of the Old West

~sweet historical romance~

When things don't go right the first time, these women find a way to a second chance happily-ever-after.

Discreetly Matched

June's Remedy

Becca's Lost Love

Hard to Please

The Civil War Brides Trilogy

~sweet historical romance~

During the bloodiest conflict on American soil, two families struggle in the South to not only survive but to thrive.

Saved by Faith

Freed by Hope

Healed by Grace

CWB Box Set

For more information about Jenna Brandt, signup for her Newsletter or visit her on any of her social media platforms:

www.JennaBrandt.com

www.facebook.com/JennaBrandtAuthor

Jen's Reader Group

www.instagram.com/jennabrandtauthor

www.youtube.com/@JennaBrandtAuthor

A Note from the Author

I hope you have enjoyed By Any Beans Necessary and plan to continue to reading all of my books including the rest of the books about set in this same town in the Hero Search and Rescue Series.

Your opinion and support matters, so I would greatly appreciate you taking the time to leave a review. Without dedicated readers, a storyteller is lost. Thank you for investing in my stories. If you would like more info, please join my newsletter and get three free books just for signing up for my Newsletter including Saving His Reputation, the prequel to First Responders of Faith Valley, centered on Ethan and Nicole's fake marriage turned real love romance.

A handwritten signature in black ink that reads "Jenna Bennett". The signature is written in a cursive style with a large, looped initial "J".

Acknowledgments

My writing journey would not be possible without those who supported me. Since I can remember, writing is the only thing I love to do, and my deepest desire is to share my talent with others.

First and foremost, I am eternally grateful to Jesus, my lord and savior, who created me with this “writing bug” DNA.

In addition, many thanks go to:

My husband, Dustin, and three daughters, Katie, Julie, and Nikki, for loving me and supporting me during all my late-night writing marathons and coffee-infused mornings.

My mother, Connie, for being my first and most honest critic. As a little girl, sleeping under your desk during late-night deadlines for the local paper showed me what being a dedicated writer looked like.

My angels in heaven: my grandmother, who passed away in 2001; my infant son, Dylan, who was taken by SIDS seven years ago; and my father, who left us six years ago.

To my ARC Angels and Beta Bells for taking the time to read my story and give valuable feedback.

And lastly, but so important, to my dedicated readers, who have shared their love of my books with others, helping to spread the words about my stories. Your devotion means a great deal.

About the Author

Jenna Brandt is an international bestselling and award-winning author who writes contemporary romance and specializes in creating hunky heroes with sterling hearts. She has her own bestselling series First Responders of Faith Valley, Hero Search and Rescue, Billionaires of Manhattan, and the Wild Animal Protection Agency. Additionally, she's created two best-selling multi-author series, The Lawkeepers and Disaster City Search and Rescue based off the life of her husband in law enforcement. Her books Waiting on the Billionaire and Lawfully Treasured in 2018, and Arresting Her Heart in 2022 were voted into the Top 50 Indie Books on ReadFreely.com as well as her book, The Billionaire's Birthday Gift, was a finalist in the "Best Book We've Read All Year" Contest in 2020.

She's been an avid reader since she could hold a book and started writing stories almost as early. She's been published in several newspapers as well as edited for multiple papers, and graduated with her Bachelor of Arts degree in English from Bethany College where she was the Editor-in-Chief of the newspaper. Her first blog was published on The Mighty website, Yahoo Parenting and The Grief Toolbox as well as featured on the ABC News, CNN Health, and Good Morning America websites. She's also a member of the American Christian Fiction Writers (ACFW) association.

Writing is her passion, but she also enjoys date nights with her hubby, cooking from scratch, watching movies on Netflix, reading books by her author friends, and engaging in social media with her readers. Her three young daughters keep her busy with Girl Scout activities, going to the mall, and playing at the park where they live in the Central Valley of California. She summers on the Golden Central Coast where she finds endless inspiration for her romance books. She's also active in her local church where she volunteers on their first impressions team and operates as the story curator for their media team.

She also writes bestselling historical romance under Jennifer Branson.

Join My Mailing List and Reader's Groups

Sign-up for my newsletter and get a FREE book and a FREE short story.

Join my Reader's Group, Jenna's Joyful Page Turners, and get access to exclusive content and contests.

Join my multi-author reader's group, Heroes and Hunks, for fun with some of your favorite sweet authors