Bad Boy New Adult Romance

Penny Reid

From the New York Times Bestselling Author Penny Reid

He is everything she doesn't want, so why does she want him so badly?

One week.

Private beach.

Invisible girl.

Jerk-faced bully.

What's the worst that could happen?

Kaitlyn Parker has no problem being the invisible girl, which is why she finds herself hiding in various cabinets and closets all over her college campus. Despite her best efforts, she can't escape the notice of Martin Sandeke—bad boy, jerkface bully, and the universe's hottest, wealthiest, and most unobtainable bachelor—who also happens to be Kaitlyn's chemistry lab partner.

Kaitlyn might be the only girl who isn't interested in exploiting his stunning rower's build, chiseled features, and family's billionaire fortune. Kaitlyn wants Martin for his brain, specifically to tabulate findings of trace elements in surface water.

When Kaitlyn saves Martin from a nefarious plot, Martin uses the opportunity to push Kaitlyn out of her comfort zone: spring break, one week, house parties, bathing suits, and suntan lotion. Can she overcome her aversion to being noticed? Will he be able to grow beyond his self-centered nature? Or, despite their obvious chemistry, will Martin be the one to drive Kaitlyn into the science cabinet of obscurity for good?

Atoms, Molecules, and Ions

QUIET, SILENT, MUTED, hushed, stilled, reticent... I moved my mouth, breathed the words—soundlessly—from my hiding place.

This game comforted me, calmed me, settled my nerves. Yes, recalling synonyms while anxious was a bizarre coping strategy, but it worked. And very little usually worked.

The voices from beyond the cabinet grew louder and were accompanied by the click of heels and the dull echo of tennis shoes. I held my breath and strained to decipher how many sets of feet were represented by the approaching shoes. I guessed two, also because only two voices were audible.

“...think that he’s going to want to fuck you? After what happened last Friday?” The words were a hiss emanating from an unknown male voice; I tensed at the use of vulgarity.

“I’ll get there late. If you do your job then he won’t even remember it,” came a feminine reply. The female was closest to my hiding spot in the chemistry lab cabinet; her words were, therefore, much clearer.

“Shit,” he said. I tried not to huff in disgust at his foul language as he continued. “I don’t even know how much to use. I’ve only used it on bitches.”

“I don’t know either. Just...double it. Martin is, what? Like, twice the size of the girls you usually dope out?”

I tensed again, my eyes narrowing. The name Martin, in particular, made my heart beat faster. I knew only one Martin.

Martin Sandeke.

Martin Sandeke, the heir to Sandeke Telecom Systems in Palo Alto, California, and smartypants in his own right. I also came from a notable family—my mother was a US senator, my father was the dean of the college of medicine at UCLA, and my maternal grandfather was an astronaut. However, unlike Martin's family, we weren't billionaires. We were scientists, politicians, and scholars.

Martin Sandeke, the six-foot-three modern day physical manifestation of Hercules and captain of our university's rowing team.

Martin Sandeke, unrepentant manwhore extraordinaire and kind of a jerk-faced bully.

Martin Sandeke, my year-long chemistry lab partner and all-around most unobtainable person in the universe—who I never spoke to except to ask for beakers, relay findings, and request modifications to the heat level of my Bunsen burner.

And by Bunsen burner I meant, literally, my Bunsen burner. Not the figurative Bunsen burner in my pants. Because I hoped Martin Sandeke had no idea that he affected the heat levels of my figurative Bunsen burner.

He did affect them. But, obviously—since he was cosmically unobtainable and kind of a bully—I didn't want him to know that.

"He's about two twenty, so...yeah. I guess," the male responded. His tennis shoes made scuffing sounds on the linoleum as he neared my hiding spot.

I rolled my lips between my teeth and stared at the crack in the cabinet doors. I couldn't see his face, but I could now discern he was standing directly in front of the cabinet, next to the unknown girl. Maybe facing her.

"But what's in it for me?" the cuss monster asked, his voice lower than it had been, more intimate.

I heard some rustling then the sloppy sounds of kissing. Instinctively, I stuck my tongue out and mocked gagging. Listening to public displays of affection was unpleasant, especially when lip smacking and groaning was involved, and most especially while trapped in a chemistry lab cabinet that smelled heavily of sulfur.

The next words spoken came from the girl and were a bit whiny. "Money, dummy. Martin's loaded—well, his family is loaded—and they’ll buy me off. All you have to do is give him the stuff tonight in his drink. I’ll take him upstairs, record the whole thing. Bonus if I get pregnant.”

My mouth dropped open, my eyes wide, unable to believe what I’d just heard. The awfulness, rustling, and lip smacking continued.

“You dope him and I’ll rope him.” The girl’s pleasure-filled gasps were audible and rather ridiculous sounding.

“Oh, yeah baby—touch me there.” These breathy words were accompanied by the sound of a beaker crashing to the ground and a zipper being undone.

I winced, scowled. Really, people had no manners or sense of decorum.

“No, no, we can’t. He’ll be here any minute. I need to leave,” the girl pleaded. I noted she sounded the perfect mixture of regretful and hurried. “You need to make sure he stays at the house for the party. I’ll be there at eleven, so give him the stuff around ten thirty, okay?”

The zipper came back up, the man backed into the cabinet. I jerked at the resultant bang of the doors. “How do you know where he’ll be all the time?”

“We dated, remember?”

“No. He fucked you. You never dated. Martin Sandeke doesn’t date.”

“Yeah, well, I know his schedule. He comes here on Fridays and does...hell if I know what with his ugly little lab partner.”

Ugly?

I twisted my lips to the side, my heart seized in my chest.

I hated the word ugly. It was an ugly word.

Ugly, unsightly, gross, misshapen, repelling... I mentally recited. For some reason, the synonym game didn’t help me this time.

“His lab partner? Wait, I’ve heard about her. Isn’t her dad an astronaut, or something?”

“Who cares? She’s nobody. Kathy or Kelly or something. Whatever,” the girl huffed, the heels of her shoes carrying her farther away. “Forget about her, she’s nothing. The point is you need to stay here and make sure he comes tonight, okay? I gotta go before he gets here.”

“Bitch, you better not be playing me.”

The girl responded but I didn’t catch the words. My back itched and while tucked in the cabinet, I couldn’t reach the spot. In fact, it would be a difficult spot to reach even if I were standing in an open field. Also, my mind was still reciting synonyms for ugly.

I didn’t think I was ugly.

I knew my hair was unremarkable. It was long, wavy, and dark brown. I always wore it in a ponytail, bun, or clip. This was because hair, other than warming my head, served no purpose. Mostly, I ignored it.

I rather liked my eyes. They were grey. It was an unusual color I’d been told on more than one occasion. Granted, no one ever said they were pretty, but no one ever said they were ugly either. That had to count for something.

I was no supermodel in height or size, at five foot seven and a size ten. But I wasn’t Jabba the Hut either.

My teeth were reasonably straight, though I had a noticeable gap between the front top two. I was also pale—the color of paper my best friend, Sam, had once said. My eyebrows were too thick, I knew this. Sam—short for Samantha—often remarked that I should get them plucked, thinned out.

I ignored this advice, as I didn’t care about thick eyebrows so long as they never became a unibrow like my aunt Viki’s.

I glanced down at my comfortable clothes—men’s wide-leg, navy cargo pants with torn-off cuffs, worn Converse, and an oversized Weezer T-shirt. I might be plain, unremarkable, or even mousy. But it’s not like I was a horrible beast who turned people into stone with a single gaze. I was just...low maintenance.

That was okay with me. I didn't need attention, didn't want it. People, especially people my age and especially other girls, made very little sense to me. I didn't see the value in spending hours in front of a mirror when I could be playing video games, or playing the guitar, or reading a book instead.

But sometimes, when I was with Martin and we were calculating particulate levels, I wanted to be beautiful. Really, it was the only time I wished I looked different. Then I remembered he was a jerk-face and everything went back to normal.

I gave myself a mental shake and gritted my teeth. Straining to listen, I pressed my ear against the cabinet door and waited for signs the unknown male was still present.

The itch in the center of my back was spreading and I didn't know how much longer I could stand it. On the itch scale, it was quickly moving from aggravating to brain-exploding torturous.

But then the sound of shuffling footsteps approaching from the hall snagged my attention. They slowed, then stopped.

"Hey man. Whatsup?" said the mystery cussing fiend.

"What are you doing here?" Martin asked. I guessed he was standing at the entrance to the lab because his voice was somewhat muffled. Regardless, it made my stomach erupt in rabid butterflies. I often had a physical response to the sound of Martin's voice.

"Wanted to make sure you're coming to the house party tonight."

I heard more footsteps. They were Martin's. I'd know that nonchalant gait anywhere—because I was pathetic and maybe a little obsessed with all things Martin Sandeke. But the difference between my obsession with Martin and the other girls' obsession with Martin was that I had absolutely no problem admiring his finer features from afar.

Because Martin really was kind of a jerk.

He'd never been a jerk to me, likely because I was an excellent lab partner. We spoke only about chemistry—and he liked acing assignments—but I'd seen him in action. He'd lose his temper and then BOOM! he'd go off on whatever poor soul he happened to believe responsible.

If it was a girl, they'd leave crying after coming in contact with his razor wit (and, by razor, I mean cutting and wound inducing). He never called them names, he didn't have to. He'd just tell them the truth.

If it was a guy, he might only use words. But sometimes he used fists too. I'd been a witness to this once—Martin beating the crap out of a slightly shorter but also slightly broader jilted boyfriend of one of his one-night stands. At least, that was the rumor that went around after both of them were escorted out of the dining hall by campus police.

Martin was an equal opportunity jerk-face and therefore best avoided outside of the chemistry lab.

No one spoke for a moment; then, I stiffened when I heard Martin ask, "Where's Parker?"

That was me. I'm Parker.

To be more precise, I'm Kaitlyn Parker, Katy for short; but I doubt Martin knows my first name.

"Parker? Who's Parker?"

"My lab partner."

"I thought your lab partner was that girl, the one—"

"She is a girl."

"Her name is Parker?"

I knew Martin was close now because I heard him sigh; his next words were clipped with impatience. "What did you want again?"

"The party tonight—you're still coming, right?"

"I already told you I'd be there."

"Good. Because I'm counting on you to be my wingman." The mystery speaker's voice started to fade. I guessed he was leaving, having secured what he came for.

“Yeah, whatever,” was Martin’s offhanded response.

“I’ll see you tonight, bro. You better come, I’m serious.”

Martin didn’t respond. I guessed the unknown male finally exited because, after a silent pause, I heard Martin release a very audible huff. It was heavy, exaggerated, and flavored with exasperation; of note, I’d heard him employ this sigh once before with a girl who followed him into our chemistry lab. I never wanted to be on the receiving end of that sigh—so far so good.

Meanwhile, I was still in the chemistry cabinet and the itch of the century had spread to my shoulders and stomach. I was likely going to go crazy if I didn’t scratch it within the next ten seconds. It felt like I was being repeatedly stung by a legion of fire ants.

During those ten seconds I debated my options.

I could stay in the cabinet, wait for Martin to leave, go quietly insane, then send him an anonymous note about the conversation I’d overheard.

Or, I could burst forth from my hiding place, scratch my itch, look like the doofus I was, then hope he’d forget as I regaled him with details of the conversation I’d overheard.

In the end it didn’t matter, because the cabinet doors were abruptly opened. A whoosh of fresh air followed and I found myself face-to-face with Martin Sandeke.

His eyes were blue and exceptionally beautiful. They reminded me of blue flame. Well, usually they were lovely, at present they were narrowed and sharp, and focused squarely on me. Beginning with my eyes, they moved down then up, ending where they started.

He was truly a magnificent specimen. All broad shoulders and narrow hips, with the thick muscular thighs of a rower. His brown hair was streaked with blond—likely due to all his time on the water and in the sun.

I wasn’t used to this—him looking at me, standing so close—thus, combined with my normal female palpitations, I couldn’t quite draw breath for several seconds.

At length he said, “Parker.”

“Sandeke.”

“What are you doing?”

“Uh...” I released the breath I’d been holding and unthinkingly arched my back, reaching behind me to scratch my itch.

Maybe it was the effect of his eyes and unavoidable handsomeness, or maybe it was because I’d seen him rip girls to shreds and was therefore a little afraid of a potential non-chemistry related conversation. Or maybe it was the itch between my shoulder blades, because without thinking, I blurted the truth, “I was hiding in the cabinet.”

His brow furrowed, but his gaze relaxed slightly, his confusion plain. “Why are you hiding in the cabinet?”

I reached over my shoulder, stretching my arm, and tried to reach the itch with my left hand instead of my right. This didn’t work.

“Why does anyone hide in a chemistry cabinet?” I shrugged, mostly because I hoped the movement would help me get to the itch.

He lifted a single eyebrow and grabbed me by my upper arms, pulling and lifting me like I weighed next to nothing. He set me safely on the ground.

Martin’s hands on my arms sent a bolt of girly awareness to the pit of my stomach. It was paired with belated embarrassment at being found as a burst of heat spread from my chest to my neck.

He still gripped my arms when he asked, “Do you hide in the cabinet often?”

“Sometimes,” I said distractedly, my jaw clenched, willing the mortified blush to recede.

“Is this an everyday thing?”

“No. Only on special occasions, like when strange people arrive to plot your demise.” I twisted out of his grip, reached for and failed to find the spot needed to secure relief.

“Plot my demise?” His eyes darted over me again, I could tell he was studying my movements. “What are you doing?”

“Trying to reach an itch between my shoulder blades.” My elbow was in the air now, my hand down the neck of my shirt.

Martin’s eyes widened then blinked. Without a word he stepped forward into my personal space. Before I could comprehend what was happening, he’d backed me into the lab table and I was trapped. Martin was against me, his arms wrapped around my body, his hands slipped under my T-shirt to the center of my back, and then his fingers itched the unreachable space between my shoulder blades.

At first I tensed because... MARTIN SANDEKE’S ARMS ARE AROUND ME. HIS HANDS ARE UNDER MY SHIRT. HIS BODY IS PRESSED AGAINST MINE!

OMG. WTF? BBQ!

But then, my brain’s very understandably stunted fan-girl reaction to his movements was quickly eclipsed by the blissful relief of an itch scratched.

I melted in his arms, my forehead resting against his chest, and I moaned my satisfaction.

“Oh, yes, God. That’s the spot... Please, don’t stop,” I murmured, obviously out of my mind. But it felt so good. So very, very good. Like sinking into a hot bubble bath after walking a mile through a nor’easter.

Martin didn’t stop.

Well...not precisely.

Rather, over the course of a full minute, he ceased using his nails, and instead began caressing and massaging my back with his fingers and hands. I realized too late that his head had dipped to my neck and his lips were against my ear, his hot breath tickling me and sending delightfully dangerous shivers down my spine, and down the backs of my legs to my toes.

“Did I make it all better?” he whispered, then bit—yes, bit!—my neck, like he was tasting me.

Then he bit me again.

I sucked in a breath and my eyes opened—even as my body instinctively arched toward him. Reality burst through the delightful fog of his ministrations like one of those disturbing and jarring windup jack-in-the-box clowns.

After one and a half semesters of virtually nothing but mundane academic interactions, I was in the chemistry lab with Martin Sandeke and his hands were roaming, liberal, and greedy. His face was tucked in my neck. I was trapped against a lab table. Our bodies were intimately connected.

And I'd just moaned.

What the hiccup was going on?

I raised my palms to his chest and made to push him away. This only caused his hands to still, now on the curve of my waist, and his grip to tighten. He plastered our fronts together more completely.

“Um...” I cleared my throat, found my voice unsteady. “Yeah, yeah—all better,” I croaked.

He laughed. Actually, it was more like a lazy chuckle.

One of Martin's hands slipped up my back and under the strap of my bra, where the itch had been, his fingers splayed wide. The other went to the clip on my head and released the spring. My hair fell like a curtain and I felt him wrap his hand around the thick length.

I pushed him again, tilted my head to the side and away, feeling breathless. “I'm all better now. Thanks for the help. Services no longer needed.” Everywhere he touched sent ripples of awareness and heat to my core.

My attempt at escape was a failure, because, as soon as I pressed against him in earnest, Martin tugged my hair, encouraging me to tilt my chin upward.

Then he kissed me.

And—damn, damn, damn—he was a good kisser.

More precisely, since I had grossly limited experience in the kissing department, he was what I imagined a good kisser would kiss like. The kind girls fantasize about. The guy who just takes what he wants, like he's hungry and you're on the menu, but somehow makes it epic for both parties involved.

No preamble, prologue, or preface. Just urgent, fervent, worshipful kisses, one right after the other. I had no choice but to wrap my arms around his neck, stand on my tiptoes, and try to kiss him back. Because, honestly, the way he held me, the way he growled when our tongues met, the way his mouth moved over mine—he demanded it.

Also, in the recesses of my mind, I realized that this entire situation was completely preposterous. Likely, he was drunk, or tripping on acid, or was playing some kind of joke.

One day I would persuade my grandchildren to gather 'round while I put in my good dentures—the ones with no space between my two front teeth—and I would tell them for the millionth time about how Hercules had once accidentally kissed me in the chemistry lab at my Ivy League University.

The need for air eventually required our lips to part, though we separated only inches. If I inclined my head forward our noses would touch.

I opened my eyes as wide as they would go and glanced at his, where I found his gaze alternately moving between my lips and my eyes. I also noted I wasn't the only one breathing heavily.

I said and thought in unison, my voice just above a whisper, "What was that?"

His eyes stopped moving over my face and instead settled, held mine captive. They were heated and...hot and...intense. I was starting to understand why the blood of a thousand virgins had been sacrificed at his altar of sexual prowess.

I tried to swallow. I couldn't.

"That was necessary," he finally said. Actually, he growled it.

"Necessary?"

“Yes. That needed to happen.”

“It did?”

He nodded once and bent as though he were going to do it again. I stiffened, my hands moved instantly to his chest and I thwarted his advance—because, if he started kissing me, it was surely a sign of Armageddon. Also, I was so far out of my comfort level, I was in an alternate dimension.

“No-no-no-no.” I twisted my head to the side, braced my hands against the imposing wall of his chest. “We’re not doing that again. I don’t kiss unobtainable boys, it’s one of my life rules.”

He tugged my hair—I’d forgotten that he’d wrapped his hand around it—and bodily pressed me against the black-topped lab table. His other arm, still under my shirt, wrapped completely around me.

“Yes. We’re doing that again.”

“No. We’re not. We’re not doing anything unless it involves measuring the composition of trace elements in surface water.”

“Parker—” His hand left my hair and slipped under my shirt again, spanning my side and stomach.

“You can’t switch lab partners in the middle of the semester.”

“I just did.”

My fingers moved to catch his wrists because his hands were on their way to second base; I successfully intercepted his northward progress. “Nope. I don’t do that.”

“Do what?” He nuzzled my neck and whispered against my skin. He must’ve known that nuzzling was going to cause my insides to melt. I imagined he’d conducted methodical experiments into the fastest way to female self-lubrication.

“I’m not one of your easy girls, or even difficult girls.” My voice wavered, so I cleared my throat. “I’m not even really a girl. I’m more like one of the boys. Think of me like a boy.”

“It’s true. Do you kiss boys? Because, if not, then I think you must have me confused with someone else.”

His movements stilled and a long moment passed. Then his hands fell away, he stepped away, and I slumped slightly forward—a weird mixture of feeling bereft and relieved.

“You’re a lesbian.” He said the words as though they explained a mystery he’d been trying to solve for years.

My eyes shot to his. He was four feet away and I found him watching me with a dawning of... something. If I didn’t know any better it looked like disappointment and frustration.

I swallowed, successfully, licked my lips, then shook my head. The irony of his confusion not lost on me.

My first and only boyfriend had been gay. I just didn’t know it while we were dating throughout high school.

I was still trying to catch my breath when I responded, “No. I’m not gay. I’m just...not interested in you that way.”

This was true—because I’d witnessed his path of devastation with my own eyes.

This was also a lie—because I was most definitely interested in him that way, just not the after part where he would say it was meaningless sex, make me cry, and tell me to get over it.

His eyebrows jumped a fraction of a centimeter at my softly spoken declaration.

“Not interested...,” he repeated.

I stepped to the side, scaling the length of the table, and reached for my bag. I hefted it to my shoulder, escape now the only thing on my mind. His slightly narrowed eyes followed my movements.

“I know, right?” I tried to sound self-deprecating, which wasn’t difficult because I truly meant my next words. “Who am I? I’m nobody.”

“You’re not nobody,” he countered. “Your mother is a senator and your grandfather was an astronaut.”

I cringed. I hated it when people brought up my family. “Just because my family is famous, doesn’t mean I’m somebody.”

He shifted forward and said with a surprising amount of vehemence. “Exactly! That’s exactly right.”

“I know, right?” I readily agreed. “See, I’m ordinary. And you’re you and I’m sure you’re used to the deafening sound of underwear hitting the floor every time you enter a room. But I don’t do that kind of thing, even for Hercules. Sure, I’ll think about the possibility later when I’m safely alone in bed, but I never cross-pollinate fantasy and reality.”

“When you’re alone in bed?”

I didn’t acknowledge his words because...mortification.

Instead, I said, “I’m not a fast and loose girl. I’m a slow and steady girl. Who knows when or if I’ll ever cross the finish line?”

He blinked at me, at my deluge of words. I didn’t even try to read his expression because I was so focused on walking backward out of the room.

“You’re leaving?” he asked.

“Yep.” I threw my thumb over my shoulder. “I’m going to go now. And don’t worry about the experiment. I’ll come in over spring break and finish it up. And when I see you after the break, everything will be back to normal. We can forget this ever happened. We shall never speak of it.” My voice cracked on the last word.

“Parker—”

“Kaitlyn—” He took two strides forward as though he were going to stop me, but halted at the sound of crunching glass underfoot. He glanced at his feet, noticing for the first time the broken beaker on the floor. “What the hell?”

I seized the opportunity afforded by his split attention and bolted out of the room.

In fact, I ran down the hall like an insane person and slipped into the elevator just before it closed. I even jogged back to my dorm, didn't begin to relax until I crossed the threshold of the keycard access area, climbed the three flights to my room, and locked the door behind me.

I tossed my bag to the corner of the tiny space, threw myself backward on my bed, and rubbed my eyes with the base of my palms. The scene in the lab played over and over behind my closed eyelids—him touching me, kissing me, scratching the impossible itch.

It wasn't until several minutes later that I realized I'd forgotten to tell him about the dastardly plot I'd overheard.

The Atomic Theory of Matter

“I CAN’T BELIEVE you agreed to this.”

“Shut it, Sam.”

I tucked my long, straightened-with-a-flatiron brown hair behind my ears. Self-consciously, I smoothed the skirt of the little black dress she’d talked me into wearing, annoyed—for the twentieth time—that the hem of the skirt ended mid-thigh.

“You look hot, hooker. Just own it.” Sam nudged my elbow with hers and I grimaced.

If someone had asked me twelve hours ago how I’d be spending the first Friday night of spring break, I would have told them I’d be curled up in my bed against fluffy pillows, sipping tea, and eating shortbread while reading.

I would not and could not have fathomed I’d be on my way to a fraternity party dressed in lace-topped thigh highs, a black dress, stiletto heels, with my hair down, and wearing makeup.

That’s right. Makeup. On my face. With glitter eye shadow.

Also, my eyebrows were plucked. Plucked! Gah!

I rolled my eyes and huffed like the disgruntled recluse I was. I would rather shop for a bra than go to a fraternity party, and that was saying a lot.

“Oh, come on, Katy. There was no way we could get into the party wearing band T-shirts and men’s pants. This is a skirts-only party.”

I’d been educated earlier in the evening that a “skirts-only party” is a fraternity party where all the girls are required to wear short skirts. Upon hearing this news I briefly considered leaving Martin to his fate. In the end, my conscience wouldn’t let me.

Jerk conscience. Always making me do things.

“You act like getting dressed up is torture,” she continued. “You look hot.” Sam, who I suspected had been waiting for a chance like this since our freshman year of high school, didn’t sound at all sorry for me.

“I don’t look hot. I look ridiculous.”

“Shut it.”

“A hot babe. And guys are going to be wanting some of that.” She pointed at me and flicked her wrist, indicating my bosom and backside. “Especially ’dat ass.”

I grumbled, but made no other audible response. Inwardly, I cursed myself for the hundredth time that I’d failed to warn Martin about the plot I’d overheard in the chemistry lab earlier. If I’d just kept my wits about me I would be curled up with a book now instead of walking toward a den of iniquity dressed like a girl.

Even though we were still two blocks away, I could hear the sounds of the party. My neck felt stiff and my hands were clammy.

The plan was quite simple. I would find Martin, explain about the plot and what I’d overheard, then we would leave. Sam wasn’t a frat party kind of girl either. Yes, she liked to get dressed up, but she called sorority girls “sorostitutes” and fraternity guys “fratilos.” She labeled them “group thinkers” and claimed they suffered from a herd mentality.

She was kind of judgey that way.

I hadn’t given sororities or fraternities much thought because...no point.

“I still don’t get why you don’t have his cell number. He’s your lab partner, right? And he was your lab partner last semester too?” Sam tossed her blonde curls over her shoulder.

Sam was a little shorter than me and was attending the University on a tennis scholarship. She was determined to get into Harvard Law and, therefore like me, she was focused, spent very little of her time looking for ways to sow oats. Her all-business attitude made her an ideal best friend and roommate.

“I just don’t. I don’t have his number.”

“Why not?” she pressed. She’d asked me this question several times as we were dressing—or, rather, as she was dressing me.

“Because,” I responded again, wiping my palms on the dress.

“Because why? What if you needed to get in touch with him about a project?”

“I’d leave him a note.”

“A note? Where? When? How?”

“No. It’s not like that. I’ll leave a note if I can’t make it on Fridays and he does the same. Or, if I’ve finished something without waiting for him, that kind of thing.”

“But why didn’t he want you to have his cell—”

I stopped walking and faced her. “He tried to give it to me, okay? He tried last semester to exchange numbers and I didn’t want to. Can you just drop it?”

“You wouldn’t take Martin Sandeke’s number?” she asked, as though the words I’d just spoken made no sense.

“That’s correct.”

“But...why the hell not? He’s...he’s...he’s Martin Sandeke!”

“Because he’s Martin Sandeke. That’s why I wouldn’t take it.” I started walking again, my toes protesting the movement.

“Katy, you’ve been crushing on Martin Sandeke since the first week of class two years ago when you stalked him outside of physics, before you even knew who he was.”

“That’s because he’s physically beautiful and pleasing to the eye,” I mumbled.

“He tries to give you his phone number and you don’t take it. Why did you do that? Explain it to me.”

“Because, you know me, when I get drunk—even though it’s only happened twice—I drunk dial! I called Carter the last time it happened.”

Carter was my high school boyfriend who never seemed interested in physical intimacy unless we had an audience. Since he was my only boyfriend, I figured this was normal. We’d parted as friends.

But last year I left him a drunk message asking him why he never tried to sleep with me. When I woke up the next morning, and everything came flooding back, it took me three weeks to return his call.

When I finally did, he informed me that he was, in fact, gay. Additionally, he had appreciated my willingness to be his beard in high school. He also assured me that had he not been gay, he would have tried to get in my pants early and often.

It all sounded like pity.

Worst conversation ever.

Sam stopped me again with a hand on my elbow. “That was last summer and Carter is ancient history.”

“Can we just get this over with?” I pleaded, not wanting to talk about Carter or about my stunted romantic history.

Sam released an audible breath. “Katy, you’re beautiful and desirable—”

“Oh my God, no more teasing. I’m wearing the dress, aren’t I? I even let you put makeup on me.”

“I’m not teasing you. I’m trying to get you out of this perpetual funk you’re in. You hide yourself behind baggy clothes and eyebrows so thick they could be mustaches. Carter is a lovely person but he shouldn’t have used you like that. Now you’re all skewed in the head.”

“Can we not talk about this?”

“Only if you promise to get Martin’s number tonight.”

I shook my head, shifted on my feet. “I will not. I don’t want to drunk dial Martin Sandeke a few months from now. He won’t give me pity, he’s vicious. He’ll laugh in my face and make me cry.”

Sam tsked, rolled her eyes, and started walking again. “Fine. Whatever. Go through life repressing your sexuality because one boy—one stupid boy who was confused—used you to hide his own inner turmoil.”

“Thank you.”

I let her snarky comment slide because we were on the same block as the fraternity house.

It was what one would expect from a fraternity house at an Ivy League school. Large, several stories, classically painted, manicured lawn littered with red solo cups and drunk partygoers. The mass of bodies—standing, sitting, leaning—spilled out the front door, down the sweeping staircase, and onto the grass.

At the entrance to the house stood two very large men. Actually, I got the distinct impression they were bouncer dudes. Both were dressed in fraternity polo shirts and their necks were as thick as my waist. They were chatting up a group of five, tall, sylphlike girls. Their eyes scanned both Sam and me when we mounted the ginormous wraparound porch.

In front of us, two girls in jeans and a guy—also in jeans—began crossing the threshold of the house.

“What do you think you’re doing?” One of the big dudes held his hand out and halted their progress.

The shorter of the two jean-clad girls shrugged and faced the big dude. “Goin’ to the party.”

The second big dude tipped his chin toward Sam and me. “You can go in, girls.”

Sam pushed me gently on my shoulder and we moved around the group stalled at the entrance. Once inside, Sam and I wove through bodies; I had no idea where we were going or how I was going to find Martin.

Looking around, I started to feel a bit better about my dress. It was black cotton, sleeveless, and shorter than I thought appropriate, but it was modest in comparison to some of the dresses and miniskirts we saw as we entered the gigantic entryway.

I did not, however, feel better about the crowd. People, people everywhere; dancing, making out, arguing, drinking, laughing. Even given the mammoth size of the foyer, the crush felt suffocating.

“Excuse me.”

I stepped to the side to allow three tall and handsome guys brush past. They looked almost interchangeable—intentionally long brown hair cut in the hipster style, tanned skin; two of them had brown eyes, the other one had blue. They were wearing fraternity polo shirts and all three slowed, their eyes moving over Sam and me with plain interest.

The last of the guys stopped; he grabbed my hips, then issued me a very cute and flirty grin. “Hey, who are you?”

I opened my mouth to respond that I was nobody and that he shouldn’t go around touching people without their permission, but Sam tugged on my hand and inserted herself into the conversation. She had to semi-yell in order to be heard over the surrounding music and voices. “We’re looking for Martin Sandeke. Is he here?”

The blue-eyed one of the trio huffed a laugh and shook his head. “Get in line, sweetheart.”

Sam tipped her head to the side, narrowed her eyes at him. “Listen, we’re not staying. This is his lab partner, she needs to speak with him about the class. Do you know where he is?”

The three boys exchanged confused looks; the one with his hands on my hips leaned forward to my ear. “You’re Sandeke’s lab partner?”

I nodded, finally finding my voice. “Yes. Both semesters. It’s really important that I speak to him about, um...a project we’re supposed to be doing over the break. Also, I’d really appreciate it if you would remove your hands.”

He blinked at me, frowned, then removed his hands and took a step back—or as much of a step back as he could manage in the crush. “You really are his lab partner?”

His eyes seemed to search my face with interest. In fact, all three of them seemed to be looking at me a little funny. I smoothed my hand down my skirt again and was thankful for the dim lights. Under their triple-handsome-perusal, I knew I was blushing uncontrollably.

“She is, she’s the astronaut’s daughter,” the one with blue eyes finally said, as though he’d just realized and therefore, recognized me. He said it as though I were a celebrity.

This was aggravating.

I pressed my lips together before muttering, “He’s my grandfather.”

“I’m in Professor Gentry’s class too.” Blue-eyes extended his hand, captured mine; his expression was probing and tinged with respect as it moved over my face. “You look really different outside of class. Did you do something different to... your face?”

I thought about responding that I’d be happy to do something different to his face, like punch it, but Sam spoke first.

“So, can you three amigos take us to Martin?” Sam seemed to dislike this last question about my face just as much as I did, because her tone held moderate aggravation. “We don’t have a lot of time.”

This was a true statement. It was already 10:10 p.m. and I knew, based on my eavesdropping, that the “drugging” would occur sometime around 10:30 p.m.

Mr. Blue-eyes nodded, still holding my hand. “Sure, sure. Follow me.” He tugged me forward.

Mr. Brown-eyes, the one who felt comfortable putting his hands on my body, winked at me as I passed. “Find me later, we’ll have some fun.”

His companion hit him on the back of the head and I heard him say as we left, “Not likely, dumbass.”

“I’m Eric,” Blue-eyes tossed at us over his shoulder. “Stroke is this way.”

“Stroke?”

“Martin is Stroke.” Eric turned briefly to explain. We made a chain, the three of us, as we wove through bodies of scantily dressed females and grabby frat boys. “He’s eight seat in the boat. It’s called the stroke seat because it sets the stroke rhythm for the rest of the boat. So we call him Stroke.”

I gritted my teeth through the jostling, ignored the body parts that pressed against me—or outright palmed my anatomy.

Martin was called Stroke. Somehow that nickname fit.

Eric led us to a staircase where another bouncer dude stood. He nodded once to Eric and smirked at Sam and me. I deduced he thought we were on our way to engage in a throupling (a threesome coupling). This, of course, caused my blush to intensify.

Jerk conscience.

I struggled to climb the stairs in the heels, almost asked Eric to stop so I could remove them. I was so busy debating whether or not to take off my shoes that I almost collided with Eric’s back when he stopped in front of a pair of overly large double doors.

“He’s in here.” Eric turned, tilted his head, then let go of my hand to push open the door.

“Thanks.” I nodded once and gripped Sam’s hand tighter as I moved to enter.

“No. No. She stays out here.” Eric shook his head and motioned to Sam.

“What? Why?”

“Only one girl at a time, unless both are invited.”

I glanced at Sam and imagined I wore a similarly stunned expression.

“Excuse me?” Sam asked. “What is he? A sultan? Does he have a harem?”

Eric smirked, his eyes moved over Sam with simmering appraisal. “I’ll keep you company, cupcake.”

“No thanks, dildo,” she responded.

This only made his grin widen, though he said, “You’re safe with me. I promise the only thing I’ll do to you is stare at you.”

She glowered. He narrowed his eyes mockingly, though his amusement and enjoyment at the exchange was obvious.

“I’m not worried about me,” Sam explained. “I don’t trust your boy around my girl, not in this house.”

Eric’s gaze moved over my dress; his grin waned, softened, like he knew a secret about me.

“Kaitlyn will be safe. But if she’s not out in fifteen minutes we’ll go rescue her together.”

I didn’t like what his words inferred or what they implied. I wasn’t a damsel. I wasn’t going to need rescuing. If anyone was a damsel in this situation it was Martin Sandeke. I was rescuing him, he just didn’t know that yet...

I addressed Sam, my voice lowered. “I’ll be fine. Martin’s not going to do anything. I’ll just tell him about the, um, the assignment and then I’ll leave.”

Sam was teetering, still undecided. After a prolonged moment she blurted, “Oh, all right.” Then she shifted her gaze to Eric. “But I’m timing this. I have a watch.” She held up her wrist so he could see the evidence of her timepiece.

“Noted,” he said with a large smile, then held his hands up as though he surrendered.

Before I lost my nerve, I turned the handle to the door and opened it—only glancing back once at Sam before I stepped in and shut it behind me.

The Periodic Table

I DON'T KNOW what I expected, but it wasn't a pool table.

I hovered at the entrance to the room, just inside the small alcove, and watched as Martin and three other guys good-naturedly knocked the cue ball around with their pool sticks.

No one noticed me at first and this allowed me time to chant my synonyms silently.

Unsteady, uncertain, nervous, anxious, worried, panic...

Then the thought popped in my mind, Even though you don't feel calm doesn't mean you can't be calm. This was something my mother had said often when I struggled with childhood angst, frustration, and disappointment. These words were an excellent mantra now.

I wasn't concerned for my safety, but I was concerned. I'd gone through life hiding in cabinets; I was perfectly happy to continue this practice once this task was over. I just had to get it over with first.

Propelled by this determination—to cross this task off my conscience's list and go find a nice, safe cabinet to hide in—I gained a step forward and cleared my throat.

One of the guys was mid-laugh and I wondered at first if they'd heard me. But, eventually, four sets of eyes swung to my position, though I tried to focus only on Martin.

“Uh, hi. Hello.” I gave the room a little wave.

Martin, like the rest, looked at me like I was a stranger. However, I felt all pairs of eyes sweep up and down in a way that made me feel like I was a car, or a horse—one they were thinking about riding.

Heated anxiety seized my chest, tightness spread into my stomach. I balled my hands into fists and took another step into the room, further into the light.

“I’m looking for Martin.” I kept my eyes on him; at six feet away, he was the closest to my position.

Recognition had not yet registered when he replied sounding both bored and irritated, “What do you want?”

“It’s me. Um, it’s Parker. Kaitlyn Parker. I was hoping I could speak with you for...a...minute...about chemistry?” I bit my lip, waited for his reaction.

Martin visibly stiffened, blinked, and flinched when I said my name. His eyes—now focused and narrowed—moved over me once more, this time with obvious and renewed interest.

“Parker?” He took a step forward and laid his cue stick on the table; he sounded and looked baffled.

I nodded and hazarded a glance at the others. They were alternately watching me then turning their heads to watch Martin’s reaction.

“Everyone out,” Martin interrupted, his voice a bit too loud for the space. It was a command.

To my surprise, his three companions set down their pool cues on the table and shuffled out as instructed, and without delay.

One or two of them caught my eye as they left, their expressions plainly curious but none of them spoke. Martin’s gaze never left my face; he seemed to recover quickly from the surprise of my arrival. The line of his jaw grew hard, and the muscle at his temple ticked.

I didn’t know what to make of the gathering storm in his eyes so I ignored it and attempted to think of a word to use in my synonym game. I also tried not to look at his lips.

I tried and I failed.

I couldn’t help it; the memory of his kiss—our kiss—arrived like a tsunami, flooding my body with something heated and tight. I felt overwhelmed by it, surrounded on all sides. I knew what he tasted like, how he sounded when he growled, what his hands felt like on my bare skin.

I tried not to shiver and failed at that too.

The door clicked behind me, but, to me, it sounded like a gunshot—because it signaled that we were alone. I gathered a breath and tucked my hair behind my ears. I needed to focus on reciting the speech I'd practiced in my head for the last five hours.

Then I could leave, my conscience could piss off, and this would all be over.

Ignoring the goosebumps he'd ignited with his scorching glare, I did my best impression of calm and said, "So, the reason I'm here—"

"Let me guess." He crossed his broad arms over his broad chest, his broad shoulders stiff and straight, and leaned his hips, which were narrow and not broad, against the pool table. "Your level of interested has...changed."

I squinted at him. "What?"

"You've changed your mind about me." The way he said the words, deadpan and caustic, led me to the conclusion that he thought I was there to beg for more kisses, entrap him with my feminine wiles.

Little did he know, I possessed no feminine wiles. Only the willies and the heebie jeebies.

I squinted more. I was feeling flustered. He wasn't supposed to talk. He was supposed to listen.

"No. It's not that at all. It's about the cabinet."

He scoffed, like he didn't believe me. "Nice dress."

I glanced down at myself, my hand automatically lifting to my abdomen. "Uh, thanks. It's borrowed."

"Really?" He said really like he didn't really believe me.

"Yes. It's also a little too short, I think." I tugged at the hem, wishing it longer. "I was told I wouldn't be allowed in without a skirt."

His attention moved to where my hands were now fiddling with the edge of the dress and lingered there. Martin straightened from the pool table and crossed to where I stood—his steps unhurried, his gaze leisurely skating up my body. Again, I felt like a horse being perused for a ride.

“You could always take it off, the dress, if it makes you feel uncomfortable.”

A full-on, fire-alarm embarrassed flush rose to my cheeks. He stopped just in front of me. His eyes were shamelessly resting on the swell of my breasts with a suggestiveness that completely crossed the appropriate line.

It was so beyond appropriate it was...

It was...

It was inappropriate.

I gathered a slow breath, hoping to steady myself, and stomped down the rising wave of indescribable sensations plaguing my sensibilities—some pleasant, some not so pleasant.

“Listen,” I said through a jaw mostly clenched. “I overheard something when I was in the cabinet, before you arrived, and I thought you should know. That’s the only reason I’m here.”

His eyes flickered to mine, still hard, disbelieving. He was standing just a foot or so away and I’d tilted my chin upward to meet his glare.

After a pause, during which he studied my face, Martin said, “Go ahead, gorgeous. Enlighten me.”

“I heard two people walk into the room. So, I panicked and, yes, I hid in the cabinet. But, in my defense, I was already in there pulling out the reticulation equipment. Anyway, two voices—one female, one male—and they came into the lab together. Whoever the guy was when you walked into the lab, that was the same guy I overheard. The girl wanted the guy to drug you.”

Martin’s eyebrows bounced upward then pulled low when I said the word drug. I didn’t want him to interrupt me again so I spoke faster.

“She said she wanted him to drug you. They scheduled it for ten thirty tonight and he is supposed to make sure you stick around at the party. She said she would arrive at eleven then take you, drugged, up to your room and video tape the two of you. Then she said something truly disturbing—not that the rest of it isn’t already disturbing—but what she said next kind of blew me away because I didn’t know people could be that cold and calculating with no regard for basic decency.”

“What did she say?” he asked, his tone impatient. His eyes were still hard, angry, but the severity wasn’t focused on me. I didn’t appear to be the target—praise Bunsen and his burner!

“She said that if she got pregnant then it would be ‘a bonus.’”

Martin’s mouth opened then closed and his glare moved from me to the floor. He was visibly stunned. I watched his beautiful face as he processed the information, took the opportunity to examine him in a way I’d never allowed myself to do before.

He was painfully handsome. I kind of knew that before, but I really saw it now.

My chest hurt a little as I studied his features: square jaw, strong nose, perfect shape and size for his face, high cheekbones, like he had Cherokee or Navajo ancestry. Paired with his blue eyes, he was striking. I understood my previous reluctance to gaze at him directly. It was called self-preservation.

I tore my eyes from him and his exceptional form. I tried not to notice his decidedly swoony body—the way his jeans hung on his hips, the way his thighs filled out the jeans—and glanced over his shoulder.

“Well. That was what I needed to tell you. So, I guess I’ll be ___”

“Why should I trust you?”

My eyes moved back to his and I blinked at this question, because the answer was obvious. “Uh, what?”

“How do I know you’re telling me the truth?”

“Why would I lie?”

“What do you expect in exchange?”

“Exchange for what?”

He shifted on his feet just a fraction of an inch closer. However, that fraction brought with it a menacing cloud of suspicion and unpleasantness.

For someone so beautiful, his expression was surprisingly ugly.

“What is it that you want? What are you hoping to gain? Is it money?”

My mouth fell open and my nose wrinkled again, this time in outrage. I looked at him, really looked at him—and this time I wasn’t seeing the outer façade of blinding beauty. What I saw was a guy who was bitter, jaded, and maybe a little desperate—for what, I had no idea.

Finally I said, “What is wrong with you?”

His eyebrows shot up. “What’s wrong with me?”

“Yes,” I countered, my hands coming to my hips. “What is wrong with you? I came here to help you, the least you could do is not act like a jerk-face.”

“Jerk-face?” he shot back, his eyes growing both hot and cold. “You show up here, looking like that, and you expect me to believe you’re not after something?”

“I already told you, jerk-face, it’s a skirt party! I wouldn’t have made it through the door if I hadn’t been wearing this stupid dress, jerk-face. If you don’t like how I look, jerk-face, then you can go yell at your stupid sorority brothers.”

“You mean fraternity brothers.”

“Sorority, sorostitute, fraternity, fratigalo—whatever! It’s all the same to me.”

“So I’m supposed to believe that you have no ulterior motive? If this is true then why didn’t you tell me all of this at the lab?” He gained another half step forward and, since I refused to back down, only inches separated us.

“Because you scratched my itch and then you kissed me—both of which freaked me out because neither of which are in the course syllabus for laboratory experiments this semester. And, furthermore—”

I didn’t get to finish because the door opened behind me and a voice I recognized called into the room. “Hey Stroke—dude, why are you up here? I brought you a drink. Some of my special hunch punch.”

I’d turned toward the sound of the voice and stumbled a step backward. Martin’s arm wrapped around my shoulders, bringing my shoulders to his chest as the owner of the voice leaned halfway in—two red solo cups extended.

The guy, about two inches taller than Martin—therefore, very tall—walked through the door after a short pause. Behind him I could see Eric standing with Sam. They both peered into the room and I noted Eric’s face was apologetic as he glanced at Martin.

I tried to step forward but Martin’s arm tightened, held me still.

The stranger’s clear blue eyes moved from me to Martin, then back again. “Hey—Eric said you had company so I brought one for both of you.”

I knew his voice because it was him. The cuss monster from the lab.

I felt Martin’s chest expand on a slow inhale, his fingers were digging into my arm; it wasn’t painful but it was pointed, firm, meant to communicate a message—don’t move.

“Thanks, Ben,” Martin drawled, but the edge in his voice was glacial and he made no move to accept the cups.

Ben gave me a stiff smile, his eyes lingering on where Martin’s arm was wrapped around me, then he raised both cups. “You two should have a toast. Come down to the party.”

“Leave the drinks and go,” Martin said.

Ben frowned, glanced at the two cups and cleared his throat. “You should come downstairs, this is epic—” “Go,” Martin repeated.

This time Ben nodded once and set the cups on a table by the door. “Sure, sure. I’ll come back in a bit to see if you need any more.” He held his hands up and backed out of the room, his eyes completing another once over of my body before he closed the door.

I exhaled the breath I’d been holding and, just for a moment, allowed myself to lean against Martin.

“That was him. That was the guy—I recognize his voice.”

I felt Martin nod, his chin and cheek against the side of my hair. We stood—still, quiet—for a long moment, then he turned me to face him. Both of his hands moved to my waist and he backed me against the pool table.

His eyes, guarded, but also tempered with curiosity, searched mine. I still saw desperation in his features and it still perplexed me. I didn’t touch him. Instead I braced my hands on either side of my hips where my body met the pool table.

At length he asked, “What do you want?”

I swallowed then responded, “I’d like to leave.”

He shook his head slowly. “That’s not what I meant. What do you want from me?”

I shrugged. “It would be great if you could tabulate the findings from last week’s assignment, but I’m not going to hold my breath.” He never did the tabulations and analyses. It was annoying.

“Parker.”

“What?”

His eyes dipped to my mouth and his voice was the softest I’d ever heard it, almost coaxing. “Kaitlyn...”

I stiffened against the feelings associated with my name from his lips, spoken in gentle tones.

I averted my eyes and my voice was a little strained when I said, “Martin, I honestly don’t want anything from you. I’d like to leave so I can change into my normal clothes, drink tea, eat cookies, and read a good book in my dorm room.”

“Kaitlyn, look at me.”

Once again, my neck flushed and my arms broke out in goosebumps.

I tried to ignore both the blush and the goosebumps. “I also want for you to forget any of this happened so that we can go back to being lab partners.”

He was quiet for a long time, but I knew—even though I refused to meet his gaze—that he was studying me, examining me like I was something new.

Then he said, “Why do you hide?”

The words startled me so much that my eyes instinctively sought his, and this was a mistake. His gaze—now a lovely blue fire—was taking a survey of my face, as though he were memorizing every detail. It was alarming and my heart quickened.

I tried for a shrug but it likely looked like a poorly executed, convulsive shiver. “Why do you care?”

His gaze met mine then flickered to my lips. “You have fantastic lips.”

I half choked, my eyes widening. “You care because I have fantastic lips?”

“And your eyes. They’re grey. I noticed them first.” His voice was just above a whisper; he sounded as though he was talking to himself.

I cleared my throat, not really sure what to say. But it turned out I didn’t need to say anything, because he continued.

“Early last semester you wore a tank top and your hair was down. You kept pulling it off your neck.” He lifted his hand and brushed the backs of his fingers against my swell of cleavage, skirting the neckline of the dress, a soft caress. “I tried to get your phone number but you wouldn’t give it to me.”

“I give out my number as rarely as possible, it’s one of my life rules,” I said dumbly.

“The red pants, the tight ones that show off your ass. You tortured me, bending over to get supplies out of the cabinet. That isn’t very nice.”

My voice was unaccountably breathless. “The corduroy ones? I only wear those when all my other laundry is dirty.”

“You’re better at chemistry than me, you ace all the tests.”

“I like chemistry, and you don’t study like you should.”

“Haven’t you ever wondered why I come on Fridays?” His fingers curled around my neck and his thumb traced circles along the line of my collarbone. He encouraged my head to tip backward.

“So that we can get a jump start on the weekly assignment?”

He shook his head. “You.”

My eyelashes fluttered. “Me?”

He held me captive with both his heavily lidded gaze and his caressing hands. Martin leaned forward, and he brushed his lips against mine. It wasn’t a kiss. It was more like he was using his lips to feel mine, to enjoy my softness.

“You,” he whispered again.

My fingers gripped the wood on either side of my hips and I successfully fought a whimper. The tightness in my chest eased and twisted, my stomach fluttered, my breath coming shallow and fast.

My brain wasn’t quite working properly because he’d muddled it—with his words, hands, and lips of temptation. Therefore, in a paltry attempt to defend myself from his seduction onslaught, I blurted out one of my greatest fears where he was concerned.

“You’ll make me cry.”

His eyes widened a little, moved between mine. “I wouldn’t.”

“You would. I’ve seen it, I see how you treat girls.”

His hand at my waist tightened. “I wouldn’t do that to you. You’re not...I know you’re not like that. We wouldn’t be that.”

“I don’t trust you.”

He sighed, but not with impatience. “I know.” He nodded. “But you will.”

He dipped his head again, placed a soft kiss on my lips, just a hint of his tongue. It wasn’t enough. My hands lifted on their own and gripped his shirt, staying any retreat he might have planned. I didn’t do this on purpose. In fact, I didn’t know why I did it.

“Martin, I can’t—”

“You can.”

“I’m not—”

“You are.”

“You don’t—”

“I do.” He kissed me again and shifted his weight more completely against me. Martin crowded my space so that he filled every inch of it. Four of my senses were overwhelmed by him—the smell of his cologne, his hot and hard body against mine, the taste of his mouth, the low growl in the back of his throat when our tongues met and mated.

Briefly he drew his mouth from mine, and demanded, “Say you’ll spend the week with me.”

I blinked, started to protest. “Martin, this isn’t—”

He kissed me again, placed my arms around his neck, then his hands moved up my ribs and his palm cupped me through the thin material of my dress. His thumb drew tight circles around the center of my breast.

He growled, “Say it. Spend the week with me.”

I moaned, because...aroused.

He bit my lip, sucked it between his. I moaned again.

“You’re so fucking beautiful, Kaitlyn.” He breathed the words suddenly, like he didn’t mean to say them out loud, but they burst forth unbidden. “I want you to spend the week with me. Say yes.”

He kissed me again, quickly, then trailed wet, hot kisses over my jaw and behind my ear to my shoulder. He bit me—hard—and sucked on my neck in a way that made me squirm and my breath hitch; all the while his large hand massaged my breast and tortured me through the fabric. His other hand had moved to my bottom and pressed my center to his.

“Martin...” was all I could manage, because...really aroused. And, not that I was an expert, but judging by the hard length against my stomach, he was also really aroused.

“Please, say yes,” he breathed into my ear.

I said, “Yes...”

“Promise me.”

“I promise.”

To be honest, I said it but I didn’t mean it. In that moment, I said yes because he’d asked me to—and he’d used the word please and I didn’t want all the good feelings to stop—not because I had any intention of spending the week with Martin Sandeke, Hercules, jerk to women, and apparently king of seducing naïve and intimacy-starved virgins.

Regardless, my words seemed to be enough for Martin because he smiled against my skin and stopped talking. He also moved both of his hands from their shockingly effective ministrations and encircled me in his arms. His mouth moved back to mine.

This time the kiss was slow, less urgent, gentle, and sweet. It felt like a prelude, a beginning. When he lifted his head, I opened my eyelids to find him gazing down at me, his eyes alight—blue flames.

“I’ll pick you up tomorrow,” he said. His voice was different, softer, deeper...content.

“What?” I blinked at him.

“Be ready at eight.”

“Eight?”

“You don’t need to pack much.” He kissed my nose, released me from his arms, threaded his fingers through mine, and tugged me toward the door. “I hope you like private beaches.”

Enthalpies of Reaction

“WHAT ARE YOU going to do?”

“Nothing.”

I heard Sam shift in her seat causing the leather to creak. “What do you mean nothing? He’s expecting you to go away with him for spring break.”

I shrugged, staring out the window of Martin’s chauffeured car. That’s right. A chauffeured car, for a twenty-year-old college student. If I hadn’t felt so pensive I might’ve looked for the Grey Poupon Dijon mustard.

After my lapse in judgment against the pool table, Martin had navigated Sam and me to the back of the fraternity house while calling his driver on the phone. The man was at the back door by the time we arrived.

Martin pulled me in for a quick kiss—which was completely bizarre, provocative, and off-putting—then unceremoniously loaded us in, telling his driver to take us to our dorm.

Sam pumped me for information as soon as the door shut. I relayed the facts, which gave me an opportunity to recover a measure of sanity. In hindsight, I realized I’d been acting like a crazy person. Proximity to Martin made me lose my sense. I’d been senseless. Without sense. Not any sense. No sense.

Nonsense.

I spoke to the window rather than be faced with Sam’s anxious expression. “I mean, I’m going to do nothing. I can’t be held responsible for my reactions—what I say or what I do—when faced with a real life Martin Sandeke. He’s the man equivalent of a gun to the head, except without the fear for my life aspect. I’ll write him an email, tell him that he adversely affects my ability to function as a rational being. As such, our discussion this evening and all resultant agreements are null and void. I’m sure he’ll understand.”

I felt like I had stumbled into an alternate reality and was just now finding my way out of the rabbit hole.

Sam snorted. “Um, no. He’s not going to understand. And, I doubt he’ll take no for an answer. He’s kind of a bully that way, or least he has that reputation.”

This statement captured my curiosity; I turned in my seat to face Sam. “Wait, what do you mean? Does he—has he forced himself on—”

“No! God, no. I would never have teased you about getting his number if he forced himself on girls. That’s not what I meant. He wouldn’t need to do that in any case, as he has them lined up around the fraternity house with skirts up to their elbows, willing to bend whichever direction he prefers. I bet that’s why he was hiding upstairs. It must get exhausting at some point...” Sam trailed off and I got the sense she was speaking mostly to herself.

I frowned at Sam. “Rape isn’t about need, it’s about power.”

“Exactly. Sorry if I implied otherwise. Regardless, Martin Sandeke has a reputation for getting it on with a cornucopia of willing females.”

“Then what are you talking about? How is he a bully? Other than making females he’s slept with cry and getting into fist fights.” I listened to the words as they left my mouth, realizing that those two facts made him enough of a bully to be labeled as such.

“I just mean he’s used to getting his way, right? He has his own yacht. His. Own. Yacht.” She stared at me, her eyebrows raised with meaning. “If he wants something, it’s his. He doesn’t even ask, he just mentions it.”

I twisted my lips to the side and considered this information, not really understanding why it was pertinent to our discussion. “So? What has that got to do with me?”

Sam’s eyelids drooped with disbelief, but her eyebrows stayed suspended. “Have you not been paying attention? I saw the way he looked at you, the way he held your hand all the way to the car, the way he kissed you before we left. He wants you. Martin Sandeke wants you.”

I considered her, her words, and sighed. “I’m not a yacht.”

“No. You’re a girl. He’s had hundreds of girls. But he has only one yacht.” Then under her breath she added, “Well, he has only one yacht that I know of.”

“Sam, weren’t you the one pushing me to get his number?”

“Yes, but that was before I was told to stand outside while you went into his lair. That was before I saw the dazed look on your face when you emerged from the aforementioned lair. That was before I found out he wants you to go away with him for a week! I want you to get your freak on, but I don’t want you to get your heart broken.”

“I think you’re overreacting. You said yourself, he has them lined up around the block. I’ll politely decline his offer, and he’ll move on to someone else. There is no need to become hysterical.”

“I’m not hysterical and you are being purposefully obtuse.”

“Fine. I’ll sleep with him. I’ll call him tomorrow and tell him I want to get it over with. Then, by your logic, he’ll go away. Problem solved.”

Sam growled. “That’s not a good idea either.”

“Well, what do you want me to do?”

“You should tell him face-to-face that you don’t want to go. You should explain your reasons why and establish boundaries for future interactions. And you should have me there as your representative to make sure he doesn’t try to zap you with his sexy ray.”

“Zap me with his sexy ray?”

“You know what I’m talking about. I barely saw him and I’m feeling the effects. He’s got like an...electromagnetic pulse of sexy or something. So does his friend, Eric. They’re a menace. They shouldn’t be allowed in public.”

“That’s not how electromagnets work.”

“Whatever. You get my point.”

“We’re here.” The driver’s voice over the speaker interrupted our conversation and drew our attention to the view of our dorm outside my window.

I heard the sound of him exiting the car, presumably walking around to open my door.

Sam covered my hand with hers bringing my attention back to her. “Just think about what I said. Carter did a number on you, but his intentions weren’t hurtful. This guy,” she paused, her eyes moving between mine, “if Carter was a stick of dynamite, this guy is a nuclear weapon.”

THE CAMPUS EMAIL directory was public information within the school’s Black Board system. I could find any person’s email address by conducting a simple first name, last name, year enrolled search. However, since it was so easy to find a person’s email address, very few people actually used their on-campus email account, preferring Gmail or another alternative where spam wasn’t such an issue.

I knew this. I knew the chances of Martin actually receiving my email were minute. Regardless, I reasoned I would have the moral high ground if I sent him an email as soon as I arrived home. Then, when he showed up the next day and I was missing, I could point out later that I did—in fact—send him an email.

It wasn’t my fault if he didn’t check his email.

Martin,

I hope you are well.

I appreciate your offer to accompany you on your travels during spring break, but I’ve reconsidered my response. Upon gaining distance from the situation, I see that I made an error when I agreed to go with you. I simply have too much school work to do this week. As well, I volunteer at a women's crisis center as their resident desktop support. I do not want to leave without giving them proper notice as they count on me to be here when issues arise. Therefore, please accept my apologies. I'm sure you'll have no problem finding an alternative.

As well, I would appreciate it if our future topics of conversation were limited to chemistry (and only chemistry) from now on. See you in the lab.

-Parker

“What are you doing?” Sam asked as she walked into our room.

When we arrived back to the dorm, I'd gone to the bathroom first to wash my face and brush my teeth while Sam changed. Then, she went to the bathroom while I changed. But instead of changing, I pulled out my laptop.

“Nothing.”

She tsked, putting away her toiletries. “You're sending him an email. That's a mistake.”

“It doesn't matter if he gets it. I sent it. That's what matters.”

“That's not what I meant. You're giving him a heads-up. Now he'll be able to plan a counter attack.”

I glanced at her from the corner of my eye. “Counter attack? This is not some exercise from Sun Tsu's The Art of War, this is me rejecting his free vacation offer. What can he do?”

“You'll see.” She said this in a sing-song voice, switching off the light on her side of the room, and climbing into bed.

“Besides. I sent it to his school account. He probably won't even get it.”

“Then he'll show up tomorrow and you'll have to deal with him in person.”

“No. I'll be gone. He said he'd be here at eight. I'll leave at seven and stay at the library all day.”

“Coward.”

“Is a chameleon a coward because it can change its color? No. It’s evolved and awesome. I like to think of myself in a similar fashion. There is nothing wrong with having a strong sense of self-preservation.”

“Whatever. Do you want me to wake you up? I have tennis practice at six.”

“Nah, I’ll set the alarm on my phone.” I closed my laptop and tucked it next to our shared nightstand, then stood to dress for bed.

After changing, I grabbed my phone to set my alarm for 6:30 a.m. I wanted to be gone long before Martin or one of his people arrived. I usually woke up around 7:30 a.m., therefore the alarm was necessary.

Upon glancing at the screen of my cell, I noticed I had two missed calls from my mother plus a text message. It read,

Just got home. Call when you can. I’ll be up until 2.

My mother: senator, workaholic, efficient conversationalist, superhero.

Distracted by the message, I abandoned my alarm for the moment and dialed my mother’s number. It wouldn’t take long. Our discussions rarely lasted over three minutes. She answered after one point five rings.

“Kaitlyn. You have not communicated your plans for spring break. Is it your intention to join us in Monterey or are you remaining on campus?” my mother’s brisk, businesslike voice sounded from the other end.

She had an agenda and talking points for every conversation. Growing up, she would hand me a paper copy and ask me to follow along. When I was very young, she used pictures in place of words and we’d discuss things like: Three month review: Preschool. Scheduled: Haircut. Action plan required: Cleaning your room. Music: Interfering with scheduled playtime.

Before I left for college, if one or both of my parents were traveling, the family meeting would be conducted via conference call. Now we typically held the meeting via conference call due to my physical absence from home. Topics for discussion ran the gamut of Purchase Request: New Bike, to Family News: Your Grandmother has cancer, to Point of Concern: Time spent on music surpassing time spent on homework, to Scheduled Recreation: Yearly vacation options, to Kaitlyn News: Accepted to Harvard, Yale, Princeton, MIT, Caltech.

“I am remaining on campus.”

“Will Sam be present?”

“Yes.”

“Do you require any funds?”

“No.”

“Are you amenable to a visit with your father and me next Sunday? Brunch or lunch, Kartwell’s Deli.”

“Yes. Sunday. Brunch.”

Even now, family meetings occurred on Sundays. My father and I would submit agenda items to George, my mother’s PA (Personal Assistant) no later than Friday night. A draft agenda would be circulated Saturday afternoon for comment and the final version distributed Saturday evening. Attached to the agenda would be a copy of our individual calendars for the next month, updated weekly.

I’d fallen out of the habit of updating my calendar since leaving home. Agendas, schedules, and lists ensured we made the most efficient use of our time. I knew this. But my schedule only changed once a semester. My life was predictable, therefore I saw no need to send weekly updates.

“How is school?”

“Very well. How is work?”

To my surprise, she didn’t provide her typical rapid-fire response of, “It is what it is.” Instead, she paused then sighed and said, “Terrible.”

My mouth opened and closed, I could feel my eyebrows jump on my forehead. “Uh...care to elaborate?”

“My Net Neutrality measure is not progressing to my satisfaction in The House, the Telecommunications lobbyists are growing rabid, and the FCC is being difficult. I am frustrated.”

I immediately responded, “Net Neutrality is an important issue and worth the effort and frustration. You are doing the right thing.” Every once in a while I served as my mother’s cheerleader. Every so often she served as mine. These occasions were rare as we both believed in self-sufficiency unless circumstances were dire.

However, we loved each other. Neither of us were so austere as to withhold support when it was requested, but I appreciated and subscribed to her no-drama mantra. Energy should be spent on solutions to real problems—like the abysmal status of the US foster care system, or our strained foreign policy with Pakistan, or Telecommunications giants using Net Neutrality as a weapon against the public good—therefore, when she said she was frustrated it usually meant she was at her wit’s end.

“Thank you. I appreciate your words of encouragement and I value your opinion.” Her tone was softer. It was the voice she’d used when I was a kid and she’d read me the first three Harry Potter books before bedtime.

“Anytime.”

She then surprised me further by saying, “You know I love you, right?”

Again, my mouth did its little opening and closing dance before I blurted, “Of course. Of course I know you love me. I love you too.”

She told me every Sunday that she loved me. It was the last thing my parents and I would exchange on our conference calls even though it wasn’t listed on the agenda. A mid-week I love you hadn’t occurred since my parents dropped me off at University my freshman year.

I was about to push her for more details on the source of her stress, because she was obviously out of sorts and had me concerned, but before I could, her efficient tone was back.

“Please send George your updated calendar with a weekly update for the period of spring break. You do not have classes next week, as such the calendar is incorrect.”

“I will.”

“Thank you. Goodnight, Kaitlyn.”

“Goodnight, Mom.”

She clicked off first. I held the phone to my ear for several seconds before lowering it to the nightstand, then distractedly readied myself for bed.

My mom was the daughter of a physicist (my grandmother) and an astronaut (my grandfather). My grandfather was also a physicist in the Navy. She’d been an overachiever her whole life and believed in goal-focused structure. She was a superhero. She was my hero. Therefore, moments when she allowed herself to display vulnerability were distressing. It was like watching Superman struggle through a bout of kryptonite exposure.

I returned to my pillow and comforter, both of which I loved; they smelled like lavender, and were so cozy, poems should be written about their epic cozy wonder. I snuggled against their softness and willed away the touch of anxiety I felt about my mom’s strange behavior.

Eventually I fell asleep.

Basic Concepts of Chemical Bonding

“PARKER.”

Fingers were in my hair, brushing it away from my face. Then the fingers caressed a path over my shoulder, down my arm, and fit themselves around mine, squeezing.

“Parker... Time to get up. Time to go.” A mystery male voice reverberated in my head. It was a nice voice. It made my insides feel like a warm marshmallow, sweet and fluffy and melting.

I lifted my eyebrows but couldn't quite open my eyes; I asked in a sleep mumble, “Where are we going?”

“We're going to the beach.”

The words sounded faraway and my drowsy brain told me to ignore them. I began to drift.

“You're cute when you don't want to wake up.” The mystery voice sounded both growly and amused. I liked the mystery voice.

I also liked the word cute, but not as much as its alternates. “Adorable, captivating, charming, darling...”

“What?”

“Synonyms.”

“Okay. Come on, Cutie pie. Wake up.” The hand was on my face, cupping my cheek. I noted that it felt exceptionally callused. A thumb brushed back and forth, whisper light touches over my bottom lip, sending little shivers down my neck to my spine.

I opened one eye, managed a squint at the fuzzy form, and recognized the owner of the mystery voice. It was Martin Sandeke. And it looked like he was sitting on my bed. I couldn't quite make sense of it.

"What's going on?" I rubbed my eyes with the base of my palms, still someplace between my dreams and reality, but closer to dreams.

This was a dream. I was certain. It was a dream within a dream or one of those dreams that felt eerily real. Maybe, if I was lucky, I'd be able to control the action of the dream and spend some naked time with Martin Sandeke's superior physique without the danger of his personality ruining things.

"I'm picking you up for our trip." His hand settled on my bare thigh. The weight of it felt very real.

I stopped mid-eye rub, opting for motionless contemplation instead of a gasping shriek.

"Martin?" I asked to what I hoped would be an empty room.

"Yes?"

I jumped to a sitting position, my eyes flying open. "Oh my God, what are you doing here?"

Martin was sitting on the edge of my bed toward the middle. I stared at him; he was wearing dark, faded jeans, a white T-shirt, and a smile. He was so handsome I felt like filing a civil lawsuit against his parents, claiming punitive damages, pain and suffering to my psyche.

"I'm picking you up."

I reached for my phone to check the time. It was 7:00 a.m.

"What? What? Why? What?" was all I could manage, because my alarm didn't go off.

I had fallen off to sleep, but forgot to set my alarm... Gah!

So, Martin was one hour early and he was here. In my room. Sitting on my bed. Watching me like he wanted me for... things.

He leaned forward, his gaze on my mouth somehow both gentle and wicked. Horrified that he might try to kiss me first thing in the morning, I scrambled to my feet and ran off the bed, jumping from the mattress like it was a spring board. I'm sure I jostled him on my way.

I reached for my bag and pulled out my Wintermint gum, unwrapping three pieces, and shoving them into my mouth.

"It's seven," I said sloppily around the wad in my mouth.

"Yes. I'm early."

I glanced over my shoulder and found Martin Sandeke had stretched himself out on my bed, ankles crossed, leaning against my pillow, his laced together fingers resting behind his head.

Turning fully around, I aggressively chewed and stared at him. His eyes were moving up and down my body with a heated and slow appraisal. I glanced down at myself. I was wearing my Sponge Bob Square Pants tank top and sleep shorts. But I wasn't wearing a bra and my shape was easily discernable through the fitted shirt.

I crossed my arms over my chest and stiffened my spine. "How did you get in?"

"I have my ways..." He'd gone from appraising to ogling. He licked his lips. The action felt malicious. "Why don't you come over here?"

"I'm perfectly fine over here," I said primly, but the effect was ruined by the gob of gum in my mouth that was quickly losing its flavor. I reached for a napkin next to my food stuffs and daintily rid myself of the gum, tossing it into the trash two feet from my position. The nice thing about dorms is that everything is within reach.

However, I'd positioned myself on the side opposite the door. If I wanted to leave I'd have to walk by Martin on my way out.

Abruptly he said, "Bring the red pants."

"What?"

"When you pack, bring those red pants. I've been thinking about them a lot."

I sputtered, "I'm not bringing the red pants."

He shrugged, his hands still folded behind his head. “Fine. Don’t bring the red pants. Bring nothing.”

“I’m not bringing nothing, I’m not bringing anything!”

“Good. We’re in agreement.”

“That’s not what I meant. I’m not bringing anything because I’m not going.”

He squinted at me. “You promised.”

“Under duress.”

“I wasn’t holding a gun to your head.”

“No, just holding yourself to my body. That’s quite enough to put me in a state of duress.”

“My body places you in a state of duress?” Something wicked sparked behind his eyes.

“Of course. Of course it does. What a ridiculous question. Your body causes distress, disquiet, desolation, and puts me in a state of duress.”

He grinned, sitting up in the bed like he planned to stand up. “Maybe I’ll use it now.”

“Please don’t.” I held up my hand as though it could stop him. It didn’t stop him. He stood, reached for and closed the door, then whipped his shirt off. My mouth went dry. My heart thumped painfully. My girl parts forcefully made their opinion known.

Me want Martin flavored cookie! Me want cookie now!!

The sight was indecent because the sight immediately made me want to do several indecent things to him, around him, near him, on top, underneath, adjacent to—if it was a preposition, I wanted to do it with Martin.

“Ack! No!” I squeezed my eyes shut and covered my face with my hands. “Not the chest! Anything but the chest!”

“Anything?” I did not miss the wicked teasing in his taunt, nor did I miss the distinct sound of a zipper being undone.

“Okay, I lied. Shirtless is fine, just please, please, please don’t take off your pants.” I turned from him, still covering my face with one hand, and blindly reached for the door of the closet with the other. The closet ran the length of one wall and had sliding doors. I knew I would be able to fit inside. Maybe I could barricade myself until he left, or throw my shoes at him like missiles.

For the first time in my life I wished I owned spiky heels instead of mostly sneakers. I did have one pair of Doc Martins, however...

His pants hit the floor, the change in his pocket jingling on the descent, and I imagined he was now toeing off his shoes.

“For the love of Bunsen, please put your pants back on.” My voice sounded desperate because I was desperate.

I slid the closet door open just as Martin’s hands claimed my hips from behind. I stiffened because he pressed his bare chest to my back and his groin to my bottom. He was hard and I was soft, and I was convinced I was about to die of... something related to abrupt sexual desire. I released a tortured moan because I could feel his stiff thickness through his boxers—or briefs, or boxer briefs.

Unthinkingly I reached around me, my eyes still shut, and encountered the thin cotton of his boxer briefs just as he bit and kissed my neck. I yanked my hand back. “You’re in your underwear.”

“So are you.”

“Oh my God. Who does that? Why would you do that?”

“I’m launching a counter attack.”

“A counter attack? I haven’t attacked. You can’t launch a counter attack until the other person has attacked.”

“Fine.” Kiss. Bite. Tongue. Lick. “Then it’s a preemptive strike,” he said, hand under my shirt, on my stomach. Other hand over my shirt, kneading my breast.

Some instinct had me pressing my bottom backward and against him as I arched into the hand toying with my breast.

“You think I’m only interested in you for one thing. You’re wrong,” he whispered against my ear, hot breath spilling against my neck making me shiver, his hand on my stomach inching lower.

“This, what you’re doing now, how you’re touching me, does not give credibility to your words.” My breath hitched, my brain disengaging.

“You’re wrong. I’ll prove it to you.”

“I’m right. I’m right. I’m so, so, so right.” I sighed, my hands abandoning the closet door and reaching behind me to touch his body. My center ached. My stomach fluttered. My skin was on fire. Lust and madness had descended.

“You’re coming with me. There is nothing temporary about how I want you.” His thumb was tracing a circle around my nipple. He pinched it roughly, causing me to suck in a startled—yet delighted—breath.

He was so talented at this. So very, very skillful. His movements were expert, practiced. Meanwhile, I was fumbling, a creature of instinct, reacting to his proficient petting.

“Do you like this?” he asked, his voice sounding dark and lovely against the shell of my ear. “Does it feel good?”

I nodded.

“Do you want more? Say yes or no.”

“Yes,” I gasped. “So much yes.”

The fingers of his other hand delved into my panties, his long middle finger stroking my center. If I hadn’t been lost to lust and madness, I would definitely have been embarrassed by the state of my nether region.

I was sure the girls he was used to had porn-star vaginas—waxed, smooth, bleached for color tone consistency, surgically enhanced to make them appear less like a forest floor—but I was au naturel downstairs. I’d never had a reason to do anything beyond trimming the hedge for hygiene’s sake.

But I wasn't embarrassed. I was a little terrified and a lot confused, but mostly I was trapped in Martin's erotic haze. I was bucking against him because his finger had just entered me.

"Whoa!" I panted.

"Fuck," he breathed against the back of my neck, his teeth sharp as they bit my spine. "You are so tight. So fucking tight."

"That's because I'm a virgin and I'm aroused," I said unthinkingly on an exhale. "The vaginal canal swells when aroused."

His hands stilled—both at my breast and in my panties—though his penis seemed to push more insistently against my ass, as though raising its head and saying, Tell me more about this vaginal canal swelling of which you speak.

"What?" he asked, his tone sharp, exacting.

"It's true, it swells." I shifted restlessly when he remained motionless. "It also elongates."

"You're a virgin?"

It was my turn to hold still, a spike of some unpleasant sensation coursing through my body. I hadn't meant to admit that. I hadn't meant to ever tell him anything personal about myself, anything that could be tucked away and used to make me cry at some later date.

"Um...", I said, struggling to think of some way to hide that fact without flat-out lying.

Martin withdrew his hands and I felt the loss of him at my back; a few seconds later I heard the jingle of the change in his pants pocket. I closed my eyes again, my forehead hitting the closet door.

"Ah, barnacles," I whispered, my body cold and hot. I was tightly wound with both mortification and unspent sexual energy.

"You're a virgin," he said, this time not a question; it sounded like an accusation.

I nodded, took a deep breath, and glanced over my shoulder. He was buttoning his jeans, his expression thunderous. I glared at where his fingers gripped the waist of his pants.

“So what?” I said. If I pretended like it was no big deal maybe he’d believe me. “So what, I’m a virgin.”

Finished with his button, he pulled the zipper up with a rough yank. “So you’re a virgin and I’m not going to—” He growled, cutting himself off and reached for his shirt with a rough swipe. “I’m not a total bastard,” he said, this to his shirt.

I glared at him, disbelieving what he’d just said, what he’d just implied. “What does my being a virgin have to do with anything? All girls should be treated with respect regardless of whether or not they’re virgins. Being a virgin doesn’t make me any more or less worthwhile than a non-virgin. Your seduction logic is flawed.”

I winced at this and watched him pull his shirt on with jerky movements. Before I could recover from his harsh admission, he continued.

“But you being a virgin and you being Kaitlyn Parker makes me want to ensure our first time touching each other isn’t some grope session against the closet of a dorm room.”

“So if I hadn’t been a virgin, then we would...what? We would have just, just...” I couldn’t say the word fuck. I just couldn’t. Instead I rushed to finish. “You would have impaled me with your penis while I face planted against the closet?”

“God, Kaitlyn. No!” His protest appeared to be equally appalled and earnest. “I wanted to tease you until you agreed to come with me. I wasn’t going to let it go that far. Haven’t you ever fooled around before?”

I think he knew the answer before he finished asking the question, because his eyes widened with realization as the last words left his mouth.

No. No, I have never fooled around.

I didn't want to admit anything. Yet I couldn't help but look away, stare unseeingly at the foot of my bed. I belatedly realized my small evasive action told him everything. My hands balled into fists and I crossed my arms over my chest. The weight and heat of his gaze, what he must be thinking about me, made my skin feel three sizes too small.

"Damn it, Kaitlyn! Was I your first kiss too?" He sounded angry and his words made me jump.

"No. Of course not." My cheeks and neck were on fire. I tried to lift my eyes to his but couldn't manage any higher than his chin. "I've kissed someone before."

"Someone? As in, one other person?"

For some inexplicable reason, I felt like crying. Tears stung behind my eyelids and my throat felt tight.

I knew it.

I KNEW IT.

I knew he was going to make me cry. It's what he did. Therefore, I didn't answer him. I just blinked at the foot of my bed and pressed my lips together, focused on my breathing.

He sat down heavily on the edge of my bed, his elbows on his knees, running his hands through his hair, and I heard him exhale a dumbfounded, "Fuck."

I muttered, "That word is unimaginative."

"You're completely inexperienced." He said this to the room.

He was probably thinking, What is wrong with you that you've only been kissed by one other person? That you never made it past first base prior to yesterday?

"I've read books," I said dumbly, clearing my throat, safely past the threat of tears. "And watched a number of pornographic videos. I took extensive notes. I've also read several enlightening journal articles on pubmed about the physiology of the sex act. I probably know more about the logistics of it than you do. I'm not an idiot."

“No. You’re not the idiot,” he said. Again, he sounded angry. He bent to put on his shoes and I noted that his jaw flexed, and he was grinding his teeth.

I shifted uncomfortably on my feet. The instinct to hide was strong. I considered stepping backward into the closet and sliding the door shut. Maybe he wouldn’t notice. He’d just look up eventually and it would look like I’d simply disappeared.

I was about to put this plan into action when he stood abruptly. It startled me so I did a weird step forward then backward shuffle, similar to a jazz square. He crossed to me, his eyes fierce, his gaze intent. I retreated until my back hit the closet, lifting my chin to maintain eye contact.

“This is what is going to happen,” he said, his hands moving like he was going to touch me, but then he yanked them back at the last minute and stuffed them in his pockets. “Pack your things, you’re coming with me.”

I opened my mouth to protest, but he cut me off.

“You promised, Parker. You said yes and you promised.”

Not breaking promises was one of my life rules. If I made a promise, I kept it. Therefore I frowned at him and admitted nothing.

He studied me for a moment, his gaze growing thoughtful, introspective. His words sounded shaded with distraction as he said, “We’re going to take this slow. We’re going to start over and do this right.”

I squinted at him, my mouth doing its opening and closing dance. “What? What are you talking about? Take what slow?”

“You like me.” He said this matter-of-factly, with a hint of belligerence.

This statement did not answer my question.

“What?”

“You like me. You want to know me better.”

“I most certainly do not want to know you better.”

“I definitely want to know you better.” His gaze flickered down then up meaningfully.

I gaped at him because—hot hottie from Hotsvillie—the growly and intense way he’d said, I definitely want to know you better made my insides flare into a frenzy of wanting that wanted him to know me better.

My immediate thought was, Okay, let’s do that. Let’s just do whatever you want, just say everything using that voice, mmm-kay?

Because my mind was distracted, I didn’t understand his meaning, therefore I said, “I don’t like dates. They’re too sugary and stick to my teeth.”

His somber and fierce façade cracked, a small smile tugging at the side of his mouth. He leaned closer, resting his hand on the closet behind me, his face just inches from mine.

His truly magnificent eyes were bright with amusement and something else as they scanned my face. His truly magnificent lips formed a mesmerizing curve. His truly magnificent body was scant inches from mine, but touched me nowhere.

“Fine.” His voice was quiet and laced heavily with intimacy. “We won’t have dates on our dates. We’ll have tacos.”

“I like tacos.” I said this because I did like tacos, but I was also mesmerized by the voodoo of his closeness.

“Good. Tacos. Promise me.” He stuck out his hand.

His eyes darted to my lips and he licked his own, drawing the top one into his mouth and biting it. I think I fainted a little, which I know isn’t possible—one does not faint a little. But his sexy lip-lick-suck-bite thing may have caused a head rush.

I thought he was going to kiss me, because he was staring at my mouth in such a way that lead me to believe he was hungry...for my lips. He appeared to be struggling, warring with himself; I held my breath.

The five seconds he hesitated proved to be the undoing of the potential kiss, because we were unceremoniously interrupted by a shrieking Sam.

“What the hell is going on?”

“What are you doing?”

I slid my eyes to my right where surly faced Sam sat, flipping through her political science textbook pretending to study.

“You know what I’m doing,” I whispered.

“It’s the synonym game, isn’t it?” she whispered back, turning just slightly in her seat and dipping her head close to mine.

“What’s the word?”

“Oh. How many do you have so far?”

“Uh, seven I think, maybe eight.”

“Well...you need more than that.” Sam turned and glanced over her shoulder.

I had the window seat. She had the aisle seat. Therefore, the boys were behind her. I’d achieved maximum willpower and hadn’t looked at Martin for the last forty-five minutes. If this were a video game, I’d be on level one thousand, about to face the final boss, and my palms would be sweating with the anticipation.

My palms were sweating now.

Not looking at Martin every thirteen seconds was torture. He was so...lookable. And lookable wasn’t even a word. It should have been, because he was definitely it. Easy-on-the-eyes was the closest phrase I could come up with that would be synonymous with the non-word lookable. Maybe mesmerizing?

*Mesmerizing, hypnotic, irresistible, alluring, seductive...
Hmm...*

“Did you know that deductive and seductive are only one letter away from being the same word?” I asked.

Sam turned back to me and gave me a slight stink eye. “And conducive is conductive, but without a T.”

“Huh.” I nodded. That was interesting. I wondered how many –ductive words I could identify.

Sam continued on a whisper, “Are you ready to talk about it yet?”

“Talk about what?” I removed my eyes from her and stared at the vacant seat in front of mine. Since we were on Martin’s dad’s private plane, we had tons of space. Two seats were on each side of the aisle, and the plane had six rows with an open seating area in the back that included a bar, couches, and a big screen TV. In the front cabin, every other row faced backward which resulted in four seats facing each other.

When we boarded the plane, Sam insisted she and I needed all four of our seats and that neither Martin nor any of his boy-entourage were allowed to sit across from us. Since finding Martin hovering over me earlier in our dorm room, with clear intent-to-kiss posturing, Sam had been doing a lot of insisting.

Sam leveled me with a narrowed glare. “Don’t play dumb, Kaitlyn Parker. Why are we on this plane?”

I folded my arms on my knees and buried my head in my arms.

I felt her tugging on my hair, not hard, just trying to get me to sit up. I didn’t. A moment later she was leaning over me, whispering in my ear, “When I walked in on you this morning you were about to do something imprudent. Is that one on your list of synonyms for foolish?”

“No. I’ll add it to the list.” My response was muffled because I was hiding.

“Parker, why are we on this plane?”

I stared at the fabric of the jeans covering my legs within the dim cavern created by my head, arms, and hair. Blowing out a long, measured breath, I sat up slowly, straightening until my back was resting against the seat cushion again and my eyes were level with surly faced Sam.

I stared at her. She stared back, expectant.

“I promised him,” I said.

Her eyebrows bounced up then down. “You promised him? That’s it, that’s why we’re here? You promised?”

I nodded. “Yes. I promised him. I promised him last night and I promised him this morning and then you walked in and you freaked out and then he freaked out and then I thought about hiding in the closet, but I don’t own any spiky heels, so I just agreed. Okay? I just agreed so the freak outs and the name calling would cease and desist.”

Sam’s eyes were half-lidded and her continued surly expression told me she was not impressed with my answer.

But it was the truth...kind of.

When Sam walked in, she’d pitched a fit and started yelling at Martin. Really, she overreacted because she loves me. She was pretty nasty to Martin, called him some unpleasant names I won’t repeat, but I will say they are synonyms for whoreson.

Then Martin, who has no problem yelling at females, males, turtles, grass, and furniture, yelled back. Really, he was defending himself from her overprotectiveness and nasty name-calling. To his credit, he didn’t call her any names. Mostly he just told her to back off and to “mind her own goddamn business.”

I stepped in and tried to calm them both down. In doing so, I reassured Martin that I would be going with him—because I did promise him more than once—but only if Sam could go too. Eventually he overcame the shock of my request and agreed. Once he confirmed our destination would have a tennis court, Sam agreed.

Then he did something weird.

He gathered me up in his arms like I belonged there, gave me a swift, closed-mouth kiss, and said he’d wait for me in the hall. Then he left the room and stepped out of the suite area and promptly waited...in the hall...for me...for a full hour.

I felt like Scarlett O'Hara after she was kissed by Rhett Butler, confused and anxious and swoony and wanting it to happen again.

Sam and I had a brief argument after that, and by some miracle she agreed to come with me. Honestly, I don't think she felt like she had a choice since I stubbornly insisted I was going, and she lacked the time necessary to argue me out of it.

However, all the arguing and promising and name-calling aside, a large part of me was strangely excited about the trip. I was nineteen years old and the dodgiest thing I'd ever done was drink peach schnapps and drunk dial my ex last summer. I'd never thrown caution to the wind before. I'd never done anything this nutty and spontaneous. It was equal parts thrilling, terrifying, and confusing.

So...here we were. On the plane, with Martin, his handsome friend Eric from the fraternity party, and seven other dudes, most of whom looked like they'd stepped out of an Abercrombie and Fitch photo-shoot; except they had clothes on, unfortunately. Sam and I were the only females if you didn't count the two flight attendants.

We'd been briefly introduced to the boys upon entering the plane. Martin had referred to a few of them by a number first, then by first name.

Interestingly, they didn't seem to be surprised by our presence. I was also pretty sure they were checking me out, but not in the, I might hit that checking me out. More like a, Are you a Yoko Ono? checking me out.

As I shook everyone's hand I was surprised to see that one of the seven guys was Ben, the cuss monster from my time spent in the science cabinet. I couldn't fathom why Martin would have him come along, especially given the fact he'd tried to drug then extort Martin the night before.

Maybe they'd man-hugged it out.

Boys were just weird.

I made a mental note to tell Martin the entire conversation between Ben and the unknown female, because Ben had basically admitted to drugging girls. And there was really only one reason he could be drugging girls. He was Ben the rapist as far as I was concerned and I wanted nothing to do with him.

Sam and I took a seat in the front of the plane after introductions and left the males to their bonding.

I felt the mounting pressure of Sam's glare; she pressed her lips together in my general direction, looking displeased and surly.

"I can't believe we did this, I can't believe I let you talk me into this. How did that happen? How did we get here? And now we're going to some private beach in the middle of the Caribbean? This is crazy."

"It is kind of crazy." I shrugged, feeling shell shocked by the fact I was on this plane and all the circumstances leading up to this moment. Less than twenty-four hours ago I'd kissed Martin Sandeke—or rather, he'd kissed me. And then it happened again...and again. He'd placed his hands on my body like he had a right to do so, and I let him.

My skin still remembered his touch. Just thinking about his hands on me made my breasts feel tight and heavy, and my neck, back, and arms break out in goosebumps. I was warm all over and felt a little drunk with excitement and fear.

"But," I started, stopped, gave my head a quick shake, then began again, "but...it's okay. We're okay. We're together. If we get there and we don't want to stay we can leave."

"And go where? Do what? Swim to Jamaica?"

I shook my head, fighting back the swelling tide of Martin-inspired lust.

"No. I sent George, my mother's PA, a message. George knows the flight information, where we are. Worst case scenario, I call him and he arranges for us to leave. We're good."

Sam looked at me for several soundless seconds, then blurted, "You told your mother?"

“Of course. Well, technically I told her personal assistant, George. As the daughter of a senator I have to inform her any time I leave the country.”

“You don’t think she’s going to freak out?”

“No. Why would she? I’m using the buddy system. She knows where I am, and with whom, and for how long, and why.”

Although, I was still a bit uncertain as to why...

“You ladies need any drinks?”

Both Sam and I glanced up to find handsome Eric hovering in the aisle, poised at the precipice to our secluded island of four seats. Sam stared at him, like she was confused by his presence.

“What?” she asked.

“Drinks. Do you need any...drinks?”

“No. No drinks.” She crossed her arms and tilted her head to the side, her eyes narrowing as though she were inspecting him. “You’re shorter than I remembered.”

He returned her eye squint and raised her a smirk. “Maybe you’re suffering from altitude sickness. You should probably get up and walk around, stretch your legs.”

More squint staring ensued and now they were both smirking.

At length, Sam nodded and said, “I could stretch my legs.”

I eyeballed her as she quickly unbuckled her seatbelt and stood, all the while her gaze affixed to handsome Eric. His smirk became a grin when she stepped into the aisle and his eyes visibly brightened when she moved a tad closer to him.

“Let me give you a tour of the plane,” he offered helpfully like a boy scout. “You can lean on me if we experience any turbulence.”

“Sure thing,” she drawled, sounding surly and amused at the same time. “Lead the way, shorty.”

Eric rubbed the back of his neck and breathed a laugh as the two of them walked off together to the front of the plane. I craned my neck and watched them depart with borderline rapt fascination.

When Sam laughed at something Eric said I could watch no longer without labeling myself a creeper. So I relaxed—as much as I could relax—back in my seat and stared at my hands.

“Parker.”

I jumped at the sound of my name coming from Martin’s lips and turned to face him. I also, for reasons known only to my subconscious, balled my hands into fists and lifted them between us, like I was prepared for a fist fight or a boxing match.

He studied my defensive posturing and smirked, taking the seat Sam had vacated without asking permission. Meanwhile I glared at him, my mental wall up and prepped, though my hands fell back to my lap. I had to do this because...super-hot boy alert level ten thousand.

“Sandeke,” I said. I knew I sounded ridiculous, like I was greeting a sworn enemy, but I had to be on guard.

His gaze skated over my face then flickered to my hands, still fists on my lap. Then he gave my hands a smile. Apparently they amused him.

“Are you going to hit me?”

“I don’t know,” I answered honestly. “It depends on if you take your pants off again.”

“You’ll hit me if I take my pants off?”

“Yeah...I might give you a junk punch.”

He laughed, very loudly and very suddenly, and with the complete abandon that comes from being surprised. But his laugh was a radioactive seduction and had a half-life of infinity. I wanted him to stop laughing never. It made his eyes crinkle and his mouth curve in a sinful smile, showcasing his excellent dental hygiene regimen.

He also looked so different. He usually wore an expression of perpetual unimpressed boredom. Perpetual unimpressed boredom was a good look for him, a very good look. As were all the other expressions I'd seen, like distrust, mischievous amusement, thunderous anger, unveiled interest, etc.

But laughter...he almost looked happy. Happiness on Martin was a revelation of beauty and physical perfection married to excellent and infectious good-mood vibes. I let my fists drop. Less than a minute into our first interaction on this trip and my carefully constructed defenses had been virtually blown to bits.

I might as well wave the white panties of surrender.

"Oh, well. Barnacles," I said to nothing and no one.

His laugh gradually receded and his eyes flickered over me. "No more fists."

"Nope. There's no use." I'm sure I sounded despondent.

"So you think I could take you in a fist fight?"

"I think you could take me whenever." I shrugged. "If you wanted to, and I really only have myself to blame."

Martin narrowed his eyes, and they sharpened, surveying me. "You don't look happy about this."

"I'm not."

"Why not?"

I stared at him for a beat then freely admitted the truth. "Here is the problem, Martin. I feel like I like you."

The sharpness in his gaze softened and his mouth curved into a lazy, satisfied smile. "That doesn't sound like a problem to me."

"But it is," I pressed. "Because the feeling originates entirely in my pants."

Martin choked a shocked laugh, and leaned away from me.

I rushed to continue. "Hence the problem, you see? I know you as my lab partner who won't help me tabulate findings. And I also know you as a bit of a—and pardon the expression—as a bit of a manwhore who is not nice to the girls he sleeps with and who gets into fist fights, and who is somewhat bitter and jaded despite having the world at his fingertips.”

Martin clenched his jaw. His eyelids drooped into unhappy slits and he flinched just slightly. His long fingers tightened on his legs.

I ignored the outward signs of irritation, wanting to make him see reason. “We have nothing in common. You’re in a fraternity, go to parties on purpose, own a yacht, and are the king of the universe.” I pressed both of my hands to my chest. “And I’m an unapologetic nerd who thinks it’s fun to spend Saturday nights playing my guitar and writing music. I like arguing about Doctor Who episodes, and whether Samwise Gamgee or Frodo Baggins was ultimately responsible for the destruction of the ring. I play video games. I limit myself to three cookies, but then always cheat and have seven. Meanwhile you look like you’ve never had a cookie in your life. I’m a virgin and you’re only the second boy I’ve kissed... We just don’t fit.” I said this last part quietly, gently, hoping he’d see reason.

Martin’s face was devoid of expression, but his gaze moved from the tip of my chin to the top of my forehead, then back to my eyes.

He was smiling...sorta. But it resembled a grimace more than a smile. I watched his chest expand with a deep breath before he said, “You don’t even know me, how can you say we don’t fit? That’s not right, Kaitlyn.”

“I—”

“The way you describe me makes me sound like an entitled asshole.”

It was my turn to flinch, lean away. My cheeks heated and stung as though they’d been slapped. I gaped at him and his fierce blue eyes for a long stretch. When he said nothing more, just glared at me, I ducked my head and studied the armrest between us.

“I. I. I...you’re right,” I admitted on a sigh. “I don’t know you, not really. And you’re right that my conclusion we don’t fit is based on my observations and assumptions, which are clearly limited to empirical data sources.”

“I’m not suggesting marriage, Parker. I just...” He paused, though I felt his gaze on me and it felt heavy. “Look at me.”

I braced myself, then lifted my chin to meet his eyes. I expected to find a glower or a scowl. Instead I found his stare to be oddly earnest and searching.

“I’d just like a chance to know you.”

“But why?” I blurted, feeling offended on behalf of everything that was perfect and gifted and beautiful about him. “Why me?”

“Because you’re not intimidated by me.”

“Well, that’s wrong. I am. You scare me.”

“No, I don’t.”

“You kind of do.”

“No, I don’t. That feeling of fear and excitement? That originates in your pants. It isn’t about who I am, it’s about what I look like. I feel that for you too.”

My brain stumbled to grasp his meaning. I lifted an eyebrow, pursed my lips, and considered this statement.

He continued before I was finished considering. “You don’t care about my family.”

“I care about your family as human beings, but I don’t know your family,” I said defensively. “I’m sure if I knew them I’d care about them.”

“Exactly. That’s exactly right, except you wouldn’t. If you knew my family you wouldn’t care about them, because you’re smart.” The cloudy frustration in his eyes began to dissipate and he looked like my answer pleased him.

“That’s true. I am smart. But you are also smart, maybe smarter.”

“And honest.”

I paired a huff with dismissive snort-laugh. But then my expression sobered when I saw Martin was serious.

I swallowed with difficulty then cleared my throat. I couldn’t quite bear the weight and intensity of his stare, so I glanced down again at the arm rest. I’d learned from my mother that when someone gives you a subjective compliment—meaning one that can’t be disproven and is based on opinion—but that you find to be completely false, rather than argue, it’s much better to just say thank you, or I appreciate that and strive to be that compliment.

Fools fight compliments, she’d said, and sometimes other people see you better than you can see yourself.

So I quietly said, “Thank you,” to the armrest.

“You’re welcome.”

I tucked my hair behind my ears and wrestled to find the courage to look at him again. I made it as far as his neck.

“Are you going to give me a chance? Yes or no?” The way he spoke, with such severe directness, was off-putting and strangely alluring. He was entitled, or at least he came across that way, because all of his words were demands.

It also made me want to refuse what he was demanding.

“I’m...going to be open to the possibility of giving you a chance.” When I finished, my eyes flickered to his. I discovered him watching me with a narrowed stare and a little smirk. He was really too freaking good-looking, it was the un-fairness of the unfair.

“Is that the best you can do?” he challenged, leaning forward.

“No. But how you speak to me sometimes makes me want to withhold what you want.”

His eyes flashed and felt at once more penetrating. “How do I speak to you?”

“Like I owe you something, like you’re entitled.”

“That’s just confidence. I’m not going to be self-conscious for any reason, and I’m not going to fake it to make you feel better.”

His response was jarring, irritating, and oddly thrilling, so I volleyed back, “Maybe you should be. Maybe your confidence isn’t based on reality. Maybe you’re not infallible. Maybe you’re not always going to get what you want.”

He watched me as several long moments passed, his gaze growing increasingly inscrutable but somehow hotter. I held his eyes, maybe finding the courage because my feathers were ruffled.

“Okay,” he finally said. “I’ll try not to demand things of you... as often.”

“Good.” I felt strangely disappointed at this news, which made no sense. Did I enjoy it when he spoke to me like I was an underling assigned to obey his every whim? When I reflected on it I realized that maybe I did, because I certainly enjoyed rebelling, defying, and challenging his demands...

We stared at each other. I tried to look at him and his beautiful face with as much objectivity as possible. Who was this person? Who was Martin Sandeke really?

“Tell me something, Martin.”

“What do you want to know, Parker?” Again my question seemed to please him, his features softening and settling into amused—dare I say enthusiastic?—curiosity.

“What do you think about the Samwise Gamgee versus Frodo Baggins debate?”

His smile flattened just a little and for the first time since he sat down, Martin glanced away. He cleared his throat, picked at a spot on his jeans, then returned his gaze to mine. “I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

This admission made me smile, then laugh belatedly because he looked uncomfortable. Martin Sandeke looked uncomfortable and it was because he was out of his depth, specifically, he was out of his nerd depth, and being out of his depth looked adorable on Martin.

“Well, let me enlighten you,” I said with a bit of show-womanship, waving my hand through the air. I then turned toward him completely. I didn’t try to dim my bright smile. “There is this book, it is called Lord of the Rings and it was written by a linguist w-a-a-a-a-y back in the twentieth century.”

“I’ve heard of the Lord of the Rings.” His lips twitched but his tone was deadpan. I took this as a good sign.

“Ah, good. Have you seen the movies?”

“No.”

“But you’ve heard of the twentieth century? It came right after the nineteenth century.”

He didn’t respond, but his closed-mouth smile grew. His fathomless blue eyes were at half-mast, aquamarine, and glittering like the ocean at sunset.

“I’ll take that as a yes. Anyway, in this book there are different kinds of races—elves, orcs, humans, blah, blah, blah, dwarves—but also, there is this race of beings called hobbits. They are little, short of stature, and usually considered insignificant. They have furry feet and they like to smoke pipes and live quietly. In fact, they live very quietly. But they have several breakfasts daily, so...awesome. Anyway...”

Martin cocked his head to the side as though studying me. I didn’t know if he were actually listening or not, but his eyes were intent and focused, like I was providing him with a super important riddle he would have to solve at some point. It gave me fluttery butterflies in my stomach to have his complete attention like this. It also reminded me how much that area in my pants liked him.

“Anyway,” I repeated, trying to focus. “The whole point of the book is to destroy this ring, because the ring is very, very bad.”

“Why is it bad?”

“You’ll have to read the book, and don’t interrupt me. It’s distracting enough looking at you. You’ve already derailed my brain train with your face several times.”

Martin’s mouth pressed together more firmly and I got the impression he was trying not to laugh.

“Back to the story, ultimately—spoiler alert—the ring is destroyed by two of these hobbits.”

Both of his eyebrows jumped in surprise. “How did they do that? You said they’re insignificant.”

“Like I said, you’ll have to read the book for the specifics, but the crux of my question has to do with the two hobbits who destroy the ring—Frodo and Samwise. Frodo bears the ring. He carries it. But,” I lifted a finger in the air for emphasis, “Samwise is his trusted servant, and he is very trustworthy. He supports Frodo, he keeps Frodo from giving up. He even bears the ring for a short time. Plus there’s this bit at the very end that...well, you’ll have to read the book. So, the question is—who deserves the credit for the destruction of the ring? Who was stronger? Frodo or Samwise? The master or the servant?”

Martin frowned at me; I took it as a good sign because it meant he was actually considering the question. But then his frown started to worry me because his eyes grew cagey and guarded.

After a few minutes he asked, “Is this a test?”

I lifted an eyebrow at him and his tone. He sounded a little angry.

“What do you mean?”

“Just what I said, is this a test? If I answer incorrectly are you still going to give us a chance?”

Yep. Definitely angry.

It was my turn to frown. “Martin, it’s a conversation. We’re just having a conversation. This isn’t a test. You said, and I agree, that I don’t know you very well. This is my attempt to get to know you better.”

“But if I answer in a way you don’t like, what happens?”

I stared at him, my features likely showing my disorientation at his odd question. “Um,” my eyes flickered to the side, because I was trying not to look at him like he was a crackhead, “nothing? I mean, we talk about it, each reviewing our own opinions and providing support for what we believe. But then, we can always agree to disagree at some point.”

“Then after that?”

“I guess we could end it with a high five to show that there are no hard feelings...?”

His eyes narrowed at me, and he was looking at me like I was the puzzle; when he spoke next it was with an air of distraction. “That sounds nice.”

I frowned, considering him, considering his reaction to a simple question. It made me wonder whether or not Martin Sandeke had ever had a conversation before, one where he was allowed to disagree without being made fun of or punished for his thoughts, where it wasn’t a test.

I was about to ask him something along these lines when the pilot’s voice came over the intercom. He announced we were approaching the airport, and should buckle in for our final descent. Meanwhile, I blinked at Martin and a dawning and disturbing realization took root.

Martin Sandeke wasn’t used to freely voicing his thoughts and feelings...nor was he used to kindness.

Molecular Geometry and Bonding Theories

MUCH OF SAM'S surly mood dissipated after her fifteen-minute plane tour courtesy of the handsome Eric. I was both pleased and distressed by this turn of events. Since Sam's attention was redirected—or best case scenario, it was split between me and Eric—this meant she wasn't quite as focused on her role as my spring break chastity belt.

A very luxurious stretch limo picked us up. Inside the car, I sat next to one of the seven other guys; his name was Ray, and his parents had immigrated from Mumbai, India, when he was two. He was a biochemistry major, and he was five seat.

“Five seat?” I asked, my head titling to the side. “What do you mean five seat?”

Two more of the boys entered the limo, sitting on the bench across from Sam and Eric.

“Five seat in the crew boat. I'm a starboard,” Ray explained, flashing me a big smile when he saw I didn't quite understand what he meant. “We're all on the crew team together, in the same boat. I'm five seat, Martin is eight seat. He's the stroke at the stern, the back of the boat.” Ray lifted his chin toward one of the other guys. “That's our coxswain, Lee.”

I gave Lee a friendly smile. “What's a cocks-twin?”

Lee chuckled and shook his head. “It's pronounced cox-wain, not cocks-twin. Basically, I steer the boat and keep these guys from being lazy assholes.”

“Lee also gets to stare into Stroke's dreamy blue eyes all day,” Ray added with a grin. “You should probably be jealous.”

I shrugged my shoulders convulsively, feeling acutely weird and self-conscious. “What...I...we...it's...I mean...what are you talking about?” I sputtered as my hands did weird things, jerky movements in the air in front of me. “I’m not jealous. Why would I be jealous? I don’t even know the guy.”

Ray, Lee, Eric, and another of the guys whose name was Herc—who had obscenely large leg muscles—all lifted their eyebrows at me in unison.

“You’re his girl, right?” Lee glanced at his teammates as though to confirm his statement.

I felt Sam tug at my shirt but I ignored her. At that moment three of the other guys entered the car; I’d recognized two of them as the pair of brown-eyed frat boys who’d been with Eric at the party the night before. The taller of the two, Griffin, had been handsy with me at the frat house. The other one, Will, had hit Griffin on the back of the head as they’d walked away.

The other guy’s name was Tambor. He had blond hair, darker than Ben’s, longish with pale highlights likely caused by the sun. He had deep brown eyes and an exceedingly stoic face. He and Herc were the shortest and the stockiest of the boys at an approximate and measly six foot one.

“So...where does everyone else sit? In the boat, I mean,” I asked weakly, wanting to change the subject.

“As you know, Martin is stroke, which is eight seat.” Ray then pointed to Eric. “Eric is a starboard, seven seat. Ben,” he paused and looked around the inside of the vehicle. Ben and Martin were the only two not in the car yet. “Well, Ben who isn’t here is port, seat six. We’ve already established that I’m starboard five seat. Griffin is behind me, port four seat. Then Will, starboard three seat. Tambor, port second seat. Last but not least is Herc. He’s the bow, first seat, in the front of the boat.”

Ray nodded. “That’s right. Port and starboard have to do with the sides of the boat. My oar is rigged on the starboard side; whereas Martin’s, Ben’s, Griffin’s, and Tambor’s are rigged on the port side.”

I nodded, picturing a crew boat I'd seen on TV during the summer Olympics. Now, considering how Martin had originally introduced everyone on the plane—referring to each of them as a number first before their names—this made a lot more sense. Their nicknames were their seat assignments, with Martin called Stroke and Herc called Bow.

Martin entered the limo just as Ray finished explaining port and starboard. I noted that a hush fell over the occupants; everyone seemed to sit a little straighter, the guys looking to him as though called to attention.

His did a sweep of the interior as Ben entered through the other door and shut it. Martin's gaze paused on me, which sent heat to my cheeks and set off a buzzing in my stomach. Eventually he glared at Ray and his eyes narrowed by an infinitesimal margin.

Ray's answering smile looked cautious. "I'll just move over this way..." Ray scootched away from me, leaving plenty of room for someone to fill the void.

Martin followed Ray's movements with his eyes, stared at him for a beat, then ducked and crossed to the now vacant seat next to mine. Martin then cast a dark glare around the limo, almost like he was warning them off his Chinese takeout leftovers.

Meanwhile I pressed my lips into an unhappy line. I was unimpressed with the dynamic of unspoken, but clearly understood, possessiveness.

Even if I were Martin's girl—which I wasn't—there was nothing amiss with me sitting next to Martin's friend. I felt abruptly as though I'd just been peed on.

I didn't want to be peed on.

THE REST OF the journey was eventfully uneventful. The limo's journey to the marina was fifteen minutes. At the marina, men appeared—as though from nowhere—and loaded our belongings onto a boat. Then the men disappeared. The boat journeyed forty-five minutes to another, much smaller marina situated on a speck of an island.

At least it looked like a speck at first. Upon closer inspection, I estimated it was about four miles long and at least a mile wide. The lush tropical forests were dotted with obscenely massive luxury homes—some directly on the beach, some higher up on hilly cliffs. I counted seven as we circled to the dock.

We then loaded into five all-terrain golf cart-like vehicles, two per vehicle. I traveled with Martin, Sam traveled with Eric. We traversed a well-maintained dirt road to where I surmised we'd be staying for the next week.

I didn't bring up Martin's inappropriate behavior; this was for several reasons. First, drama repelled me. I didn't want to start a conversation on the topic when others could overhear. Therefore I just put up with his hovering and the way he would stare down the other guys when they'd enter my radius.

Second, I didn't know how to start the dialogue. What if I was imagining things? What if I was being overly sensitive? What if this was what normal relationships were like? If we'd actually been dating, I think I might have been able to navigate through the conversation, but we weren't.

“Why are you so quiet?”

I'd been wrapped up in my thoughts and started a little at his bluntly spoken question.

“Uh.” I glanced at him. He was splitting his attention between me and the road. “Because I'm thinking about something.”

“What are you thinking about?” he asked. As usual it sounded like a demand.

I tried not to read too much into the tone of his voice; maybe Martin didn't know how to ask nicely, another thing I didn't like very much about him.

“I guess because I don’t have much experience with boys, so I’m trying to figure something out.”

“What is it? Maybe I can help.” He nudged me with his elbow.

I shook my head, not ready to talk about it yet. “I’m not ready to discuss it. I need some time with my thoughts.”

His intelligent eyes flicked over me, his expression growing distant and impassive. At length he shrugged, grim-faced, and gave his attention wholly to the road. We didn’t speak again until we arrived at the house.

And by house I mean not a house at all. It was a behemoth.

Once inside I marveled at the opulence. The giant foyer steps were a blue marble, resembling turquoise, with inlay brass. A grandiose and gracefully curving staircase dominated the left side of the entrance, while a three-story single-paned window provided natural light and a breathtaking view of the ocean beyond. In the center of the space was a wide fountain with a surprisingly tasteful sculpture of a mermaid blowing water out of a conch shell.

Everything was overly detailed. The wooden carvings on the staircase had carvings. The brass inlay danced beautiful oceanic patterns over the floor. Glorious mosaics of blue and copper decorated the fountain.

It was all too much. It didn’t feel like a house, it felt like the lobby for a huge, swanky hotel.

When I realized I was gaping, I snapped my mouth shut and glanced at Martin to see if he’d caught my oddball display of horrified amazement. He had. He was glaring at me. Again.

I was starting to wonder if I’d imagined his laugh back on the plane and if he were capable of anything other than heavily-lidded severe stares. Don’t get me wrong, he still looked heavenly even when he was administering heavily-lidded severe stares, but that was only if one wasn’t the recipient of said stare.

I was on the receiving end now, his focus on me, and he looked unhappy.

Therefore I gave him a buggy-eyed nose scrunch, followed by a full-on weird face—tongue out, eyes crossed, teeth bared like a rabbit—and then refocused on his features to see if it had made any effect.

It had. Now he was looking at me like I was a crackhead.

“Parker, what are you doing?”

“Making a funny face in an effort to make you stop staring at me like I murdered your beloved goldfish. What are you doing?”

I was pleased to see his eyes lighten with something like confused wonder, but before he could speak, the sound of voices entering the house pulled my attention back to the massive doors. I opened my mouth to announce where we were, but the words never came because Martin put his hand over my mouth—abruptly but gently—bringing my attention back to him.

He put a finger to his lips in the universal symbol for shhh then fit his hand in mine and pulled me around the fountain, down a hall, beyond the massive, three-story window overlooking the sea, through a large living room with a giant fireplace—fireplace? On a tropical island? Rich people were crazy—and into a massive bedroom suite done all in sterile whites and shades of blue and sea-green.

He shut the solid teak door then backed me up against it, staring down at me, holding me in place with his eyes and the promise they held. My heart thudded painfully in my chest and I was drowning in his intense focus.

I opened my mouth again to say something, anything really, but it was lost because he was kissing me. The hot, urgent slickness of his tongue robbing me of my breath, his solid body against mine warming me beyond the humid stickiness of the tropics, permeating to my center.

We kissed and kissed then kissed some more. It wasn't until he tore his mouth from mine that I realized I was holding fistfuls of his hair and was on my tiptoes.

His forehead met mine and he growled, a low sound laced with frustration, before he said, “You are too fucking cute.”

“You too.”

He exhaled a disbelieving breath, and swallowed. “I’m cute?”

“As a button.”

He chuckled, stealing another kiss. “I wish we were here alone. I wish...God, I just want you to myself.”

A prickle of unease made the short hairs of my neck stand at attention. On one hand, it was a lovely thing for him to say. On the other hand, he’d just figuratively urinated a circle around me in his blatant display of caveman possessiveness. Maybe I was overreacting, but I had no baseline for comparison. This was all very, very new territory for me.

I needed time to think, away from his lips and mesmerizing looks.

Luckily, I was pretty certain this place had some nice closets.

“HE’S THE ALPHA male.” Sam said this from my bed where she lay with her arms and legs spread out. I was next to her, my arms and legs also spread.

We weren’t touching. The bed should have had its own zip code.

After my lovely kisses with Martin, he informed me that the gargantuan and beautiful suite was mine. The voices of our co-travelers grew louder, closer, and so he told me to stay put. He explained people would be bringing in my luggage as well as food. Then he left.

People did arrive with my bags. Again, random people seemed to appear out of thin air—an older man in a suit directed a younger man where to place my things. Then a woman about ten years older than me showed up with a tray of decadent food, sparkling mineral water, and asked if she could draw me a bath or arrange for a massage.

I politely refused both, but insisted on introducing myself to these apparitions. Ultimately I had to press them for names because at first they offered me only titles.

The older man was the staff director - Mr. Thompson.

The younger man was one of the groundskeepers - Peter.

The woman was the house manager - Mrs. Greenstone.

I tried to modulate my tone to offhanded and nonchalant as I asked how many other staff members were present at the house. After Mr. Thompson listed the cook, cook's aide, three other groundskeepers, and two maids, I stopped counting. The house staff outnumbered the guests.

Sam found me just as Mr. Thompson was taking his leave.

That's right, taking his leave...like some grand butler from regency England. I'd entered the bizzaro world of the obscenely rich where baths were drawn and leave was taken.

Now Sam and I were munching on the tray of food and staring at the vaulted ceiling. An immense, beautiful skylight showed me the late afternoon sky was a cloudless blue.

Sam continued voicing her theory while munching on grapes. "You know, like a pack of wolves. He's their alpha."

I grimaced and twisted my lips to the side to hide my expression, not that she was looking at me.

"That's silly," I said.

"No, it's totally not. They all...well...they all basically worship him, I think. Eric said that eight seat, Martin's position, is arguably the most important seat in the boat. He sets the rhythm for the rest of the boat, pushes them. Even Lee, who freaking steers the boat, follows his lead. They do what are called 'power tens' during practices and races. It's where they all row as hard as they can for ten strokes—well, Martin decides when and for how long. He's only a sophomore and he has the most coveted spot on the team, and he's team captain. The rest of the guys are juniors and seniors."

"Maybe it's because he's from such a fancy family," I said flippantly, because Sam was starting to make it sound like this stuff mattered. Granted, she was a competitive athlete, therefore I could forgive some of her wide-eyed expression and excitement in her voice.

Whereas I'd never understood sports and team dynamics. I'd tried playing soccer once; everyone was so serious about it. I kept thinking how silly it was to run around a grassy field, kick a ball into a net, and think of it as an accomplishment.

Finishing War and Peace, now that was an accomplishment.

"No, I asked Eric how Martin got his seat," Sam said, turning to face me, her elbow and hand propping up her head. "He said Martin has the best erg time—it has to do with the rowing machine they use, the ergometer or whatever it's called—and that he has the best form by far. Honestly, it's like Eric is brainwashed or has a crush on him or something. They talk about him like he invented the sport."

I shrugged, but my mind was caught on the "pack of wolves" metaphor, Martin as an alpha to a pack of hard-bodied rowers. It might explain why every time he spoke it sounded like a demand. As well, it explained the pack mentality in the limo and on the boat. He was younger than they were. I wondered if all his dazzling wealth had anything to do with why he was able to command their respect so completely.

I could feel Sam's eyes on me. I kept my attention focused on the sky.

After a while she said, "You are beautiful, you know."

My eyes jumped to hers and I automatically frowned, her earnestly spoken words catching me off guard.

"What you talkin' 'bout, Willis?"

She gave me a little smile then pushed on my shoulder. "You, being beautiful. You are beautiful. You don't focus on your looks or even seem to care about them, but you're really quite spectacular to look at."

I turned my head completely toward her and folded my hands on my stomach. “And you think this is why Martin is suddenly whisking me and my foul-mouthed friend off to private beaches? Because he thinks I’m beautiful?”

“Ha. Yes, he does...”

“But that’s not why, or that’s not all of it.”

“Then what is it? Why am I here?”

Sam was quiet for a minute, then asked, “Why do you think?”

I glanced over her shoulder, my eyes resting on the magnificent view behind her. The entire back wall of the suite was glass and overlooked the beach. The house was some feet above sea level. If I’d been standing I would see the white, sandy shore. But from this vantage point, all I saw was blue sky kissing the blue ocean at the horizon.

“I think,” I started, deciding to speak my thoughts out loud as they occurred to me. I needed to talk this through with someone and I needed to get out of my own head because I couldn’t get any further than, This makes no sense!

“I think he wants someone to be nice to him,” I blurted.

I brought Sam back into focus, saw her surprised expression, but then something like contemplation gripped her features.

I continued. “I think he’s tired of people judging him or making assumptions about who he is based on who his family is. I think he wants someone to be nice to him, like him, and show interest in who he is because he’s Martin, just Martin, and not because of who his family is, how much money he has...or what he looks like.”

“That sounds...well, actually, that sounds plausible.”

“I wonder,” I propped myself up on my elbow, facing Sam and mirroring her position on the bed, “maybe he really just wants a friend. I think I could do that for him.”

Her eyes narrowed on me. “I don’t think he wants you to be his friend.”

“But that’s what he needs,” I said, wrinkling my nose. “I think he trusts me because I don’t want anything from him. I think he just really desperately needs someone to talk to, someone who is on his side, and he’s confusing trust with...lust.”

Sam smiled her amusement, her eyes dancing over my face. “Or he’s confusing lust with trust.”

I rolled my eyes and fell back to the bed, again staring out through the skylight.

“But seriously,” she started, paused, then took a deep breath, “he’s kind of possessive of you, right? Like, how he stared down Ray in the limo. And I thought he was going to bite Griffin’s arm when he touched you while we were on the boat. It seems especially strange since you two aren’t even really together yet.”

Yet... O.o

“It is weird. I’m glad you said something because I wondered if I was just overreacting. And it’s all so fast.”

“No, not really. You’ve been lab partners for almost two semesters. From what you told me about your conversation with him against the pool table last night, for him, I think this relationship—in some form—has been going on for months, not hours. I suspect he’s been thinking about you far more than you realize.”

I covered my face with my hands. “How do I survive this? How am I going to get through this week? He needs a friend and all I can think about is doing very bad things to his body.”

“You’re starved for physical intimacy. He’s starved for emotional intimacy. Maybe you can help him and help yourself.”

“I don’t want to use him like that. I think his whole life people have been trying to use him.”

“I’m not talking about sex, Katy. I still don’t think you’re ready for that. You have a big heart and it would definitely get in the way of a no-strings arrangement. I’m just saying, there’s nothing wrong with fooling around a little with a guy you’re attracted to. Maybe...,” Sam reached for my hands and pulled them away from my face. She then lifted her eyebrows and gave me a pointed look. “Maybe you can help each other.”

Bond Polarity and Electronegativity

SAM SPENT THE night with me. Having her there helped. But despite the heavenly bed and the sound of the ocean in the background, I didn't sleep very well.

Sam and I hadn't joined the boys for dinner. Instead we opted to sit on the balcony overlooking the sea and study. This was my idea. I needed more time to think, to consider, to plan my next move with Martin. I was certain he needed a friend much, much more than he needed a girlfriend, now I just needed to convince him of this fact.

Mr. Thompson stopped by to check in and make sure everything was to our liking. I asked about having dinner in the suite and he said he'd pass the message along. One of the maids brought us dinner. Her name was Rosa and she reminded me of my paternal grandmother; her big smile was sweet and she promised us cookies if we ate all our vegetables.

She also brought me a note from Martin. In his scrawling, masculine, chaotic script it read:

Parker,

I'll be down at the beach tonight. Come find me.

-Martin

I was relieved he didn't come by or press the issue of me taking dinner in my room. I needed space and time and... basically all the known dimensions available to me, maybe even the assistance of invisible dark matter. I wasn't ready for a moonlight stroll on the beach with Martin yet. The sky had too many stars to be anything but fatalistically romantic.

After eating, Sam and I studied some more. I opted for the giant shower with seven heads—despite the fact the bathtub was the size of a small swimming pool—then worked on a term paper until midnight when we went to bed.

It was early when I woke, the sun just making an appearance and the light still soft and hazy. I pulled on my bathrobe and walked to the window, wanting to catch the purples and oranges painting the sky before it surrendered to blue.

I got my wish and then some. The view was epically spectacular. The white sandy beach and calm water called to me in a way I'd never experienced. Suddenly, I wanted to go swimming. Right that minute. I needed to leave the manufactured luxury of the big house. The genuine beauty of nature called to me.

I quickly changed in the bathroom, careful to lather myself in super high SPF, and grabbed two oversized beach towels.

I also packed a canvas bag with a leftover bottle of water from the night before, my current book, a big hat, sunglasses, and other beach essentials. I exited out the balcony door and picked my way down the path to the beach. The path consisted of ten stone steps and a hundred feet of the finest, softest sand I'd ever touched.

Once there I dropped my belongings, discarded my T-shirt, cotton shorts, and flip flops, and walked into the salt water. The water was crystal clear, the temperature cool and refreshing, and was nearly as calm as a lake. It felt like heaven.

For at least an hour I floated, swam, searched for shells, and just generally enjoyed the alone time with my thoughts in this beautiful place. When my fingers became prunes, I reluctantly abandoned the water for the shore.

I arranged one of the towels under the shade of a big palm tree and rolled the other towel into a pillow for my head. Then, I read my book, drying in the sea air, and lazing about like a lazy person. This was the kind of unscheduled relaxing I'd embraced since starting college.

I was maybe four pages into my novel when I heard the noise; it was a chant—faint then louder—of baritone voices. Lifting onto my elbows, I set my book to one side, holding my place with my thumb, and peered around for the origin.

Then I saw them. All nine of the boys—looking remarkably like men—out some distance from shore; far enough away I couldn't quite make out individual faces, but close enough I could plainly see they were all shirtless. And it ought to be noted that they should always be shirtless. In fact, they should be disallowed from wearing shirts...ever.

They were rowing, their boat flying over the water. I strained my ears and realized they were counting backward from ten.

I followed their progress, marveling at how they moved so quickly and with seemingly so little effort in perfect unison. I wondered what that must be like, being part of something so perfect, so harmonious. It was...well, it was beautiful.

The closest I'd ever come to something like that was playing my music, losing myself on the piano, or jamming with my Sunday night bandmates. But we weren't perfect. We were far from harmonious, however sometimes we'd have a good night where everything felt right and effortless, like we were flying on the music we'd created together.

Just as suddenly as the rowers appeared they were gone. The boat went around the edge of the cove and their chant grew fainter, farther away. I stared at the spot where they'd disappeared for a minute then reclined back on my towel, watching the horizon.

“Holy crap. That was something.”

I turned my head slightly and found Sam standing on the beach, her hands on her hips, and her attention focused on the bend of the cove. She was wearing an itchy bitsy bikini that showed how hard she worked on her tennis game.

“Hey, you there. Good-looking female,” I called to her. “Why are you up?”

“Because I bought this damn bikini last year and this is my first chance to wear it.” She sauntered over to where I reclined and spread out her towel. Her spot was somewhat in the sun, but I doubted she minded the opportunity to tan. I didn't want to take the chance of blinding someone, so I liked my spot in the shade. With my paper-white complexion, the glare off my thighs would likely burn retinas.

She turned to me to say something else, but then the chanting became audible again. Sure enough, the boat came back into view. Eight muscled rowers sweeping the water with their oars, Lee at the stern facing Martin. Their arms and shoulders flexing, their stomachs and backs rippling. The movement of their bodies was as mesmerizing as it was arousing. This time they were close enough I could almost see their facial expressions, see the sweat rolling down their necks and chests.

From where I sat, they looked stern, focused, maybe a little bit in pain, but still beautiful. Heart-achingly beautiful. My mouth went completely dry.

Sam and I watched them for almost a full minute before they flew past and were once more out of sight.

Then, she fanned herself. “Yeah. I am totally going to have sex with Eric. That was hot.”

I said nothing, because once again my dirty thoughts were at odds with what I knew was smart, with what I knew was right.

Martin needed a friend.

I would be that friend.

I would.

And my pants hated me for it.

THREE OF THE groundskeepers brought brunch down to the beach under the oversight of Mrs. Greenstone. And by brunch, I mean they transported what looked like the equivalent of a fancy outdoor restaurant down to the beach. A large buffet was spread out on a huge wooden serving table, and beautifully carved dining tables and chairs with deep cushions were set up on the edge of the water. A sideboard with china, crystal, linen napkins, towels, suntan lotion—and basically everything else one might want for the beach—was set out with practiced and aesthetically pleasing efficiency.

To top it all off, several large arrangements of tropical flowers were placed on the tables along with little packets of aloe set on ice to chill.

I glanced sideways at the opulence, feeling out of place with my modest, black two-piece that was three years old, my turquoise Walmart flip flops, and my gas station sunglasses.

To be honest, the excess repelled me in much the same way the size and luxuriousness of the house had repelled me when we first arrived. I wasn't against people being rich. Nor was I against people owning and enjoying nice things.

I guessed the problem was that everything was too big, too much, too shiny, too new, too sterile, too impersonal. I felt like all the real details that mattered—the smell of the ocean, the sensation of sand beneath feet, the soft sounds of the sea meeting the shore, the rustle of wind through the palms—were lost in the ostentatiousness of the house and its sprawling splendiferous shadow.

Where Sam and I had set our towels was a good two hundred feet from the fancy buffet and beneath the shade of a palm; however, the spot was clearly visible from the trail. We were both on our stomachs and reading when Herc, Ray, and Ben appeared from the house path.

Ray gave us a little wave and an amiable smile, Herc gave us a little wave that I imagined was friendly for him, and Ben gave us a leering look and no other acknowledgement. I silently wondered again why Martin had invited Ben as all evidence pointed to the fact he was an unsavory sort. The guys crossed to the impressive brunch spread.

No sooner had they made it to the tables did Eric and Griffin jog past. Eric skidded to a stop when he saw us and gave Sam a bright smile. Griffin lifted his chin and waved politely, then made a beeline for the food.

“I’ll be right back.” Eric held out his index finger to us in the universal symbol for give me a minute. “I’m starving.”

“Take your time.” Sam shrugged, and I saw she was doing her best to appear unaffected. “It’s not like we’re going anywhere.”

“Yeah. Good.” Eric’s eyes moved over her body—not in a leering, I’d-hit-that kind of way, but rather in a damn-you-must-work-out-and-I’m-impressed kind of way—his eyebrows doing an adorable double jump of appreciation as he scanned her. Then he shook his head as though clearing it and slowly turned away. In fact, his steps were almost halting as he walked to the buffet yet turned back and glanced at Sam twice.

Sam, however, was looking at her book. But I could tell she wasn’t reading. When he was out of earshot, she asked in a near whisper, “Did he look back?”

“Yes. Twice.”

“Excellent.”

I smirked and looked up at the guys. Unable to help herself, Sam lifted her eyes as well.

They hadn’t bothered yet with shirts and were still clothed in spandex shorts that ended just above the knee. Really, they should have been naked. Their outfits left nothing to the imagination.

I quickly refocused attention on my book, my cheeks red from sudden exposure to male fineness, but Sam gaped for a few minutes longer.

“Thank you, Katy. Thank you for being Martin Sandeke’s lab partner. Thank you for having no idea how amazing you are. Thank you for driving him wild with your clueless indifference. Just...thank you for this moment.”

I rolled my eyes behind my sunglasses and flipped onto my back.

“You’re welcome. Never say I didn’t get you anything, especially since there are four more shirtless rowers on their way.”

“I will die happy here, today, in this spot,” she sighed.

“In your puddle of lust.”

“Leave my puddle of lust alone. Get your own puddle.”

A few moments passed in relative silence, relative because the sound of the boys’ conversation drifted to us, though none of the words were decipherable. I was actually able to concentrate on my book for about ten minutes before we were interrupted.

“Hey, so what do you think so far?”

I turned my head and found Eric kneeling in the sand next to Sam’s towel, splitting his attention between both of us. I rolled to my side then sat up, pulling my knees to my chest. Sam, however, continued to lounge on the ground.

“It’s really nice,” I said with feeling, because it was nice and he was being nice, and it’s nice to be nice.

Then, because I wanted to say something more than just nice, I added, “The beach is exquisite. I’ve never seen this kind of sand.”

Eric gave me a friendly smile. “Yeah, this is our second year. Last year Martin brought us down for spring break and I’ve been looking forward to it since we left. I love this place.”

“I can see why,” Sam said, “it’s gorgeous.”

Eric’s gaze rested on her for a beat before he agreed, “Yeah, gorgeous...”

My eyes flickered between the two of them, obviously sharing a moment, and I tried not to make any sudden movements. I averted my gaze to the cover of the book I’d discarded and realized I had no recollection of what I’d been reading.

Eric was the first to speak, and he did so with a charming grin. “So, Sam. Would you mind helping me put suntan lotion on my back? I’d like to go for a swim but I’m sure the stuff I put on earlier is mostly gone by now.”

“Sure,” she responded immediately, then hopped to her knees, grabbed her lotion, circled behind him as they both stood, and applied a generous amount of liquid SPF and UV protection to his torso.

He was facing me, so Sam was behind him. Therefore I was treated to her facial expressions while she touched his body. At one point she mouthed the words Oh my God, her eyes growing large. I had to roll my lips between my teeth to keep from laughing.

After the longest lotion lathering in the history of forever, Sam moved to step away but he caught her hand.

“Want to go swimming?”

She nodded, a big smile on her face. All her earlier attempts to keep it cool must have melted away...for some inexplicable reason.

Without a backward glance or a wave or an, I'll see you later in my direction, the two of them took off for the ocean. I watched them go feeling a mixture of excitement on Sam's behalf, and worry, also on Sam's behalf. She obviously liked him a lot. And I supposed he was likeable enough. But neither of us knew him very well.

“Hey. Kaitlyn, right?” someone said from behind me.

I turned toward the voice at my back and found Ben—the cuss monster, would-be druggie, self-admitted rapist, and blatant leerer—hovering at the edge of my towel. My stomach tightened with trepidation.

“Yes. That is correct. I am Kaitlyn,” I said, not meaning to sound as robotic as I did but unable to help it. This guy wanted to hurt and extort Martin, and that alone was enough to make me dislike him with the heat of magma.

“Hey, so,” his eyes moved over me again, where I was curled into a ball on my towel, “I need help getting this stuff on my back.” He held up the bottle of suntan lotion Sam had just discarded.

“Okay...?” I peered at him, not understanding why he was telling me this.

We stared at each other for a beat. He was quite good-looking, very well built, very tall, and he made me exceedingly uneasy.

At length he huffed. “So, I need you to put the lotion on my back.”

My frown deepened and I shook my head. “Um, no thanks.”

“No thanks?”

“That is correct. No thanks.”

His eyes darted between mine and he appeared to be confused.

“You’re not going to do it?”

“Correct. I’m not going to do it.”

Ben’s confused expression morphed into a sneer. “What’s the big deal?”

I tightened my arms around my legs. “It’s not a big deal. I don’t touch people I don’t know, it’s one of my life rules.” The nice thing about having life rules is that you can make up new ones on the spot when it’s convenient. Not touching people I don’t know hadn’t been a life rule before this minute, but it was definitely on the list now.

“We’ve met.”

He stared at me for five seconds, but it felt like an hour, his pale eyes growing mean and angry. Abruptly, he blurted, “Why are you being such a bitch about this? I just need some fucking help here and you’re acting like a fucking bitch.”

I flinched at the words—even his expletives were redundant and unimaginative—and then pulled my gaze from his, opting to stare at the beach and wishing I’d forced myself on Sam and Eric. They were in the water, floating, talking, and probably not cussing at each other.

Even though you don’t feel calm doesn’t mean you can’t be calm. My mother’s words came back to me.

“Go away,” I said. My heartbeat and the pumping of my blood roared between my ears. My body was beyond tense, like it was bracing for a physical blow, and I felt abruptly cold and removed from my surroundings, like I was in a tunnel.

“Fine, fatty. I don’t want your fucking chubby-ass fingers on me anyway.”

I closed my eyes, waiting for the sound of his departure and trying to calm my heart. But he didn’t leave. I felt him hovering there, just beyond the little island of safety that was my towel. I was about to launch myself up and away to the water, when he spoke again.

I frowned my confusion—which had momentarily paralyzed me—but didn’t open my eyes.

But then Ben said, “Oh, hey Stroke,” just as I discerned a new set of footsteps approaching from behind me. Martin was walking over.

I exhaled a slow breath, my insides still feeling like icicles, and slowly opened my eyes. I kept my attention affixed to the shore as I didn’t want to look at this Ben person again, probably never.

“Hey,” Martin said from someplace nearby and over my shoulder. “What’s going on?”

“Ah, not much. Just keeping Kaitlyn company.” Ben’s voice was remarkably different, friendly, affable. “But since you’re here, I’ll just go grab some food. Do you want anything? Can I get you something?” Ben was obviously directing this solicitous question to Martin.

I wondered briefly if Martin should invest in a poison tester of some sort. I wouldn’t trust Ben with a snake I didn’t like, let alone to bring me food that wasn’t tainted with arsenic.

“No,” Martin said.

I nearly laughed, despite my brittle state. Martin’s simple no sounded like so much more than a no. It sounded like a warning and a threat, like a dismissal and a command. I was impressed how much disdain he'd managed to pack into a single syllable word.

"Okay, well..." At last I heard Ben's feet move against the sand. "I'm starving so I'm going to eat. See you two later."

I remained still even when I was sure Ben had left. I couldn't quite pry my fingers from where they held my legs tightly tucked against me.

Growing up, I'd struggled a bit with my size, but not in the way most people approach size frustrations. I struggled and worked to accept it. I wished I could be different, yet because I trusted my mother and her assurances there was nothing wrong with me or the way I looked, that the baby fat was normal for me and that my body would shed it eventually, I never fought against the rolls.

I was a pudgy kid and very, very short through most of my childhood; then, during my sophomore year of high school, I stretched out and grew four inches basically overnight. I grew another two inches in my junior year.

But I've never been lean and firm; rather, I've always been soft and curved. I did rather like the line of my waist, however, because it tapered dramatically beneath my ribs, then flared out again to my hips—an hourglass, my mother had said with a smile, defining it for me.

She told me I should be proud of my healthy shape and healthy body, and love and treasure it because it was mine. No one, she said, could tell me what to think of my body. If I let another person's opinion matter I was giving him or her control over me, and I had complete control over my self-image.

That's what she said.

But that wasn't the truth, not really. Because even though I knew Ben was a bottom feeder of the worst sort and his opinion mattered just as much as the coruscations in the sea, words like fatty hurt, no matter the source.

I felt Martin's eyes on me and I wished I had a shirt, a bathrobe, or a big plastic trash bag to cover the imperfections of my shape. Furthermore, I wished I'd junk punched Ben when I'd had the chance.

Martin moved, walking on Sam's towel and sitting next to me. I lifted my chin and kept my eyes on the horizon; I was not yet ready to look at him. I was still trying to gain control of my scattered feelings. I was also attempting to suppress the self-consciousness creeping from my chest to my throat and choking me. I was this awkward, pudgy girl, the color of chalk, sitting alongside a muscled and bronzed Greek god.

Martin stretched his long legs in front of him; he rested a hand behind me so his arm and chest brushed against the bare skin of my arm and back. The contact was a spark in my tunnel of frigid numbness. Then he leaned forward, nuzzled my cheek softly with his nose, and placed a gentle kiss on my jaw. Unexpectedly, I felt myself melt.

"Hey, Parker," he whispered, then kissed the hollow of my cheek. "What's wrong?"

I shook my head even as my body instinctively leaned into him, my shoulder resting against his chest. He felt good, solid, warm.

"Why is that guy here?" I asked.

Martin glanced over his shoulder to where his teammates were eating, then faced me again. "Did he say something to you?"

I cleared my throat then answered with another question, "Why would you invite him? After what he tried to do to you."

He exhaled softly, then brushed the back of his fingers down the length of my arm to my elbow; his eyes followed the path. He seemed to be studying my hand where it gripped my leg.

"Because he's strong and we, the boat, need him to win." His voice held an edge of ire, but I knew it wasn't directed at me.

I slid my eyes to the side, considered this news and Martin's expression. He didn't look happy about having Ben there. In fact, he looked angrily resigned. I got the impression he wasn't used to making compromises, and this one felt wrong and unwieldy.

“He tried to drug you,” I stated with a fervor that surprised me, feeling outraged on Martin’s behalf.

“I didn’t say I trust him. I said we need him. Trusting and needing someone are usually mutually exclusive.” Martin lifted his dazzling eyes to mine. This close I was startled to see they were the exact color of the ocean. Flecks of green, silver, and turquoise radiated from his pupil like a starburst.

“But sometimes, rarely...,” he started, stopped, his attention drifting to my lips briefly, “you meet someone you need, who you can also trust.”

He stared at me and I stared back, feeling muddled and disbelieving the implication of his words. He allowed me to struggle for a full minute, then he reached for my hand and pried it from my leg, holding it lightly, reverently.

“Kaitlyn, did Ben say something to you? Because if he did I’ll get rid of him.” Martin’s eyes narrowed by a fraction and his gaze grew penetrating, searching.

I gathered an expansive breath and turned from Martin’s probing stare. His obvious concern was doing strange things to me. His protectiveness didn’t feel like possessiveness, and I wondered how often I’d lamentably mistaken one for the other.

I didn’t want to lie. But if Martin could live with Ben trying to drug and extort him for the sake of team cohesion, then I guess I could live with a few nasty words.

Of course, there was the whole Ben drugging girls for undefined reasons issue...

I looked over the water as I spoke. “Martin, I didn’t tell you this on Friday when I saw you at the party, but you’re not the first person Ben has tried to drug. When he was talking to that girl, he made it sound like...like he’s been drugging girls for a while. That can really only mean one thing, right?”

I peeked at Martin and his scowl was fierce. He said through gritted teeth, “Thanks for letting me know. I’ll handle Ben. He won’t—” he stopped, exhaled slowly, “he won’t be doing that again.”

“But what about what he’s done so far?”

“I’ll take care of that too.”

“He’s so awful. He’s...he’s like ammonium dichromate with mercury thiocyanate. He’s the college boy equivalent of the bowels of hell.”

Martin’s smile was sudden and its unexpectedness seemed to take us both by surprise; he laughed lightly at my analogy, but he also looked concerned. “Hey, did he say something to you? Before I came over?”

“I don’t like him,” I said, then rushed on when I feared Martin would see I was being evasive. “He’s unpleasant and creepy and I don’t want to talk about him anymore. Let’s talk about chemistry.”

I felt rather than saw Martin’s small smile because he’d leaned forward and nipped my shoulder, his lips hovering against my skin. “Yes, let’s talk about chemistry. We have excellent chemistry.”

I leaned a tad to the side and away because his soft lips, sharp teeth, and hot mouth were overwhelming to my chest, stomach, and pants.

“I meant our assignment. I brought all my notes, I think we should start on the literature search this afternoon.”

“Na-ah.” Martin lifted his head, placed my hand on his thigh, and then gathered several stray strands of hair away from my face. He tucked them behind my ear. “We’re leaving. You and I have plans.”

“Plans? What plans?”

“I know a place where we can be alone.”

“Other than the fifty spare rooms back at the house?” I said, then immediately felt myself burn scarlet at the unintended insinuation. “Ah...I mean...that is...what I mean is...oh blast it.”

He watched me struggle under his suspended eyebrows, a whisper of a smile on his face, then cut in when I tried to hide my face in my arm. “No, the place I have in mind is better.

Lunch is packed. Come on.” He squeezed my arm then pulled my hand as he stood, tugging me with him. “We need to get going.”

I snatched my hand back and quickly covered myself with a towel.

I tried not to look at him, mostly because he was magnificent. Unlike the others, he was clothed in board shorts that ended at his knee. His shirtless torso was flawless and completely smooth. He looked like a golden statue, cast in hard relief by the sun, but warm to the touch. And that was just his torso! I didn’t trust my gaze to venture downward to assess the flawlessness of his legs...or elsewhere.

My heart and the area previously defined as “my pants” both twisted and tightened at the sight of his perfect body. I felt pinpricks and tingles all over and a little lightheaded as I turned away from him.

“Let me get changed first,” I mumbled without thinking. “I wish I’d invested in a burqa or a moomoo...”

Martin gripped the towel as I tried to wrap it under my arms, bringing my attention back to him.

His expression was again fierce, his eyebrows lowered in a frowny scowl. “What did you say?”

“Nothing.”

“What are you doing?” His gaze flickered to the towel then back to mine.

“Getting my things.”

He yanked on the towel and I held it tighter. His frown intensified. As he surveyed my face, I felt very much like I was being examined under a microscope.

Martin took three full, measured breaths, his hand now stubbornly fisted in the terrycloth, before he asked again through clenched teeth, “What did Ben say to you, Parker?”

“Nothing important.” I tilted my chin upward and shrugged. When he looked like he was going to press the issue further, I let go of the towel, letting the weight of it drop in his grip.

Martin looked troubled, but his attention strayed as though he were compelled, as though he had no choice but to look at my body. I tensed, fought the urge to cross my arms over my chest, and glanced at the sky, letting him look.

It didn't really matter. We were at the beach for Bunsen's sake! Sooner or later he was going to see me in a bathing suit. I repeated my mother's sage advice, If I let another person's opinion matter then I was giving him control over me; I alone had complete control over my self-image. I held still for as long as I could.

Then I heard him sigh. "Fuck me..."

My eyes darted back to Martin and I found him looking at my body with a mixture of pained hunger and appreciation. The profanity had slipped from his tongue like an odd caress.

"Excuse me?" I questioned, though I almost asked, Was that a request?

His gaze jumped to my face and he stepped forward, tossing the towel to the sand. He didn't touch me except to fit the fingers of my left hand in the palm of his right. "It's an expression, Parker. It usually means a person is surprised."

I squinted at him. "What's surprising? Is it my ghost-like skin? Does it scare you?"

I saw his mouth tugged to the side just before he turned from me and pulled me toward the house path. "No. Your ghost skin doesn't scare me."

"Is it—"

"You're fucking, goddamn gorgeous, Parker," he said roughly, a half growl, and without looking back at me.

Startled, I snapped my mouth shut, as a pleased and pleasant warmth suffused my cheeks, chest, and stomach. For the first time in my life I found I didn't mind the use of curse words.

Reactions in Aqueous Solution

I DIDN'T CHANGE clothes as I completely forgot that I wanted to change clothes. Therefore I continued to wear my relatively modest, halter-top, two-piece bathing suit on the ride from the house to this new and better place where Martin insisted we go...to be alone...

Being alone with Martin didn't freak me out at first. It felt like a very theoretical state of being; like being informed I was going to go become quark-gluon plasma (i.e. one of the theoretical phases of matter) or the winning contestant on American Idol. So, equally likely.

The truth was that my mind was slow on the uptake because everything was happening too fast. On Friday afternoon I was hiding in a science cabinet on campus. It was now Sunday afternoon and Martin was practically wooing me—insomuch as crazy handsome, billionaire, geniuses woo a girl—on a small island in the Caribbean.

I was not used to change and I was not good with surprises. The entirety of my past and all changes therein were well documented via the agendas prepared by George. I'd always had time to prepare.

But not this time.

Thus, I forgot to freak out until he was leading me by the hand down a sandy path and through a healthy amount of tropical underbrush. In his other hand he held a picnic basket. I glanced up and blinked at the broad muscles of his back and it abruptly hit me where I was and who I was with and what we'd done so far.

The kissing, the touching, the whispering, the shared moments and the heated stares. I'd made eye contact with him more in the last thirty-six hours than I had in the last six months as his lab partner. A shiver passed through me. Life was happening too fast.

I mumbled, “Fast, quick, rapid, supersonic, hurried...”

Martin glanced over his shoulder, his oceanic eyes sweeping me up and down. “What did you say?”

“Nothing.”

His eyes narrowed on me. “Are you okay?”

I lied, “Yes. Good.” Then deflected, “Where are we going?”

A glint of some devilry flashed in his gaze, curving his mouth to one side—devilry looked really good on Martin Sandeke—and he returned his attention to the path. “Just this place I know with a waterfall and cave. It’s part of the estate, so no one else uses it.”

“How nice,” I said, bending as he held a palm frond out of my way, and added conversationally, “we have a garage at my house. It holds a car and some of my dad’s tools.”

Martin glanced at me, equal parts amused and confused. “Oh?”

“Yes. And a hammock in the back yard.”

“Is that so...”

“Yeah.”

“So, no waterfalls?”

“No. But this one time, when it rained a lot, the gutter broke. That was similar to a waterfall.”

Martin laughed. I knew he was laughing because, though he was quiet, I saw his shoulders shake; and when he turned to look at me, his eyes were bright with humor and he was flashing a lethally bright smile.

“You’re funny, Parker.”

We walked another hundred yards or so in silence and I forced myself to study the surrounding landscape. The ground was sandy—light grey and white—and heavily littered with bleached shells. Tall palm trees provided the ceiling of the canopy. The path was littered with thick palm bushes and underbrush. All around us insects buzzed and hummed a constant symphony, and I could make out the faint sounds of rushing water. It grew louder the farther we walked but not overwhelming. The weather was warm, and would have been hot if we were in the sun and farther inland. But in the shade and so near the ocean, a cool breeze whispered over and cooled my bare skin.

Martin turned slightly, still holding my hand, though his attention was on a series of rocks before us that descended a stairway of sorts.

“Be careful here, just watch your step. It might be better if you do this barefoot. You’re not going to need shoes anyway.”

He released my hand, kicked off his shoes, and preceded me down the path made by the sandy boulders.

I, likewise, kicked off my flip flops and followed, keeping my attention on the trail. The sound of the rushing water increased exponentially as we descended. Then I stopped because Martin stopped, and I looked up and saw this place where he’d brought us.

And my mouth fell open.

He’d brought us to a very small cove, mostly shaded by palms and the surrounding rock face. It was about twenty feet in diameter. The crystal clear, turquoise water was mostly still, but rippled near the far end. Upon closer inspection, the cove appeared to be adjacent to a cave. The waterfall was unseen, but I heard it; I guess it must be behind the rock face.

It was like a little room, private, intimate, breathtaking.

I don’t know exactly how long I stood there gaping at the small natural loveliness of our surroundings. But I became aware of Martin’s gaze all at once, watching me; I darted a look at him, snapping my mouth shut.

“Do you like it?”

I nodded. “It’s...it’s stunning.”

He grinned, obviously pleased. He’d set the picnic basket down at some point on a shelf created by the curving rocks, leaving both of his hands free. Martin with two hands free felt a little dangerous. I glanced at his hands, my heart skipping.

“Come on,” he said, holding one of his dangerous hands out to me.

I accepted it, and he led us down into the water, his eyes holding mine. It lapped at my ankle, then calf, then we were submerged to our waists just three feet from the edge.

“How deep is this?”

“Uh, that’s an entrance to the cave where the waterfall is.” He indicated with his head to the far side. “It’s relatively deep over there, maybe fifteen or twenty feet. But on this side,” he pointed to my right, “it’s flat and about three or four feet.”

“Have you gone into the cave?”

He nodded, his eyes traveling over me. It was a slow perusal of my body that did things, unexpected things, like made me tremble, my stomach flip, and my nipples harden. The longer he stared the hotter and more intense his gaze grew. It felt like he was on the precipice of something, saying something.

I didn’t want him jumping off any verbal cliffs, so I interrupted him, pulling my hand from his, before he could speak. “What’s the plan, Stan? What’s the deal, Neil? Is there a schedule for the rest of this week? Anything I should be aware of? I remind you again and in all seriousness that I have two papers to write and a vector calculus test to study for. Also, again, you and I do have that lab assignment we need to prep. I have you trapped here, therefore I expect you to help with the literature search. Also, I have two books I’ve been dying to read.”

Martin wasn’t smiling, but his eyes were warm and interested.

“Do you always talk like that?”

“Like what? Like awesome?”

“Yeah, like awesome.” His tone was serious, verging on earnest.

I felt pleased by the compliment despite the fact I’d self-deprecatingly complimented myself and he’d merely agreed. Because I did want to be his friend so it was important to be honest. “Actually, no. Truthfully, you make me nervous so I’m a little more jumpy and vociferous than usual.”

“Vociferous. You have an excellent vocabulary.” He pushed himself backward a few feet and began treading water near the center of the cove. His eyes seemed to glow, reflecting the sea-green of the saltwater.

“Ah, yes. That I do. I’m a big fan of synonyms.”

He exhaled a soft laugh, peering at me like I was weird and wonderful. It made my smile widen.

“So, plan for this week? What can I expect?” I took small steps near the edge, not wanting to venture too close to Martin and his glowing eyes and dangerous hands.

“Well, team practice, like this morning. The waves are minimal on this side of the island because we’re basically set in the middle of a large inlet. The Gulf is like a big lake. We’ll be practicing and training in the mornings, so you’ll get your quiet time.” His voice was downright conversational. It was nice.

“Good.” I tucked my hair behind my ears, this news settled my nerves somewhat. If he was training in the mornings then I could use the time to prepare my friend attacks.

“But in the afternoons and evenings...,” he paused, licked his lips, his eyes flickering over me, “I want us to be together.”

This news halted my progress around the rim of the cove. Paired with the predatory glint in his eyes and the slight undercurrent of a mandate in his words, my insides felt like a jumble of knots...made out of magma. That’s right, magma knots. Perhaps if I hadn’t skipped breakfast my stomach wouldn’t have been so tumultuous.

“To have tacos?” Despite my best efforts, this question emerged somewhat high-pitched and breathless.

“Yes, tacos. And there will be parties and other things.”

Parties.

Parties?

What?

I frowned. I’m pretty sure I scowled. This reaction was instinctual. I hated parties. Hate.

“Parties?” I may have curled my lip in a miniature sneer.

“Yeah, on the island, at some of the other houses, friends of mine. You know, the usual college scene stuff.”

Usual college scene...just a bunch of billionaires’ kids and their friends. It sounded delightful.

“Yeah, no thanks.” I pulled my eyes from his, inspected the rocks. “I don’t go to parties. It’s one of my life rules.”

“Life rules?”

“Yes. Good ideas to live by.”

“You just made that up. Not going to parties isn’t one of your life rules.”

He was right, I had just made up not going to parties as a life rule, but he didn’t need to know that. Therefore I ignored his last comment and tried to act blasé. “I don’t want to go, but don’t let that stop you from going.”

“Parker.”

I sighed, then met his gaze.

“I want you to come.”

“No, thank you.”

He ground his teeth. “Kaitlyn, you promised you were going to give this a try.”

“I will...”

Once again he was giving me the severe stare down, likely because my weakly delivered I will didn’t even sound convincing to me.

Managing to swallow around the sudden thickness in my throat, I squared my shoulders so I was facing him.

“Here’s the thing, Sandeke. I am. I am going to give this a try. Despite my worries—”

“What worries?” He sounded exasperated.

I ignored his question. “Despite my worries and reservations, I’m going to give this the good college try. But I don’t even know how to dance. I can tango like a pro, but I don’t do the body wiggle weird thing. And isn’t that what the kids do these days at parties? Dance?”

He lifted an eyebrow at my excuse—obviously unimpressed—and with two fluid strokes moved to join me.

I stiffened, my eyes wide, and backed up a step at his advance. “What...what are you doing?”

“I’m going to teach you how to dance,” he said simply, already on me, reaching for my body.

I stiffened further, feeling unaccountably breathless as his big hands slipped around my waist and settled on my hips and lower back.

“But there...but we...but—”

“Shhh,” he said, pulling me closer. “Relax.”

“Create cold fusion,” I murmured in response, unable to relax and placing my hands nowhere, because placing them anywhere on Martin felt perilous to my well-being.

He glanced down at me, his eyebrows in a perplexed V. “What does cold fusion have to do with anything?”

“You tell me to relax, which is impossible. I tell you to create cold fusion, which is impossible.”

His answering smile was crooked. “You can’t relax?”

“No.”

“Why not?”

“You know why not.”

“Well, it might help if you touched me.”

“That will not help.”

“It might.”

“It won’t.”

“Touch me.”

I scowled at his chest, my hands still in the air at my sides.
Stupid perfect chest.

“Parker, if we’re going to dance you have to touch me.” He sounded amused and his fingers flexed on my bare skin. I felt the roughened calluses of his palms just before he released my body to grab my hands. He brought them to his shoulders, pressed them there, then returned his own to my hips. I didn’t miss the fact that his hand placement was now a bit more daring than it had been a moment ago, lower, closer to my bottom.

I swallowed thickly, glaring at my fingers where they touched his perfectly sculpted shoulder.

“Don’t you want to touch me?” he asked, his inflection daring, teasing, but also something else. Something hesitant and uncertain.

I lifted my eyes to his; they were guarded, his smile looked bracing, almost like a grimace, like he was preparing himself for bad news.

I sighed. I knew I sounded resigned and a little pitiful.
“Yes...”

His gaze thawed as it dropped to my lips. “Then you should... because I want you to.”

“I don’t know how,” I blurted.

“I’ll teach you.” His voice was low, soft, and held a promise.

“I’m not good at this.”

“We haven’t even started.”

“I don’t mean the dancing, I mean the touching. I’m pretty sure I’ll be good at the wiggle dancing once I apply myself, as I have excellent rhythm.” Heat was beginning to build in the space between us where we didn't touch; my stomach and his, his chest and mine. I had the sudden sensation we were magnetized, and I had to make my body rigid to keep from plastering myself against him.

“Why do you think you'll be good at dancing? You're very stiff, you need to loosen up.” He swayed his hips and mine to the left, then the right, then back, his movements measured and slow. I moved with him, trying to loosen up without succumbing to the magnetism.

“Because I used to ballroom dance and I play three instruments. Did you know that? And also the drums...so I guess four instruments.”

His eyes, which were still on my lips, flickered to mine and his eyebrows ticked upward with surprise. “Really? What else do you play?” He sounded interested.

“Guitar mostly. But also the piano and saxophone and the aforementioned drums.”

He smiled. I swear he'd been smiling so much it felt unnatural. Before now, I thought I'd seen him smile three times in the last six months and all three of those times the smile had been mean and hard because he'd been about to unleash a world of hurt on someone.

These were different smiles, relaxed and happy smiles. They were devastating and no less precarious to my wellbeing than his mean and hard smiles.

“I'd like to see that,” he said after a beat. “I'd like to see you play.”

“We can go back now and I'll show you. I think I saw a guitar in one of the rooms back at the compound.” I said “the compound” in a deep, weird voice, hoping to cut through the raging tension building between us, making it difficult for me to breathe.

I made like I was going to move away. His grip on me tightened, staying my attempted retreat.

“No.” He shook his head, the word sharp, and his eyes flashed with a warning. Then he brought me flush against him.

This was not a good idea. It drove all the breath from my lungs and I trembled, gasped, spikes of hot and cold rushing under the surface of my skin. I felt sensitized everywhere. Instinctively, my eyes shut, startled by the ferocity of the sensual, swirling, damning, overwhelming physical feels.

He half growled, half groaned then set me away, placing essential distance between us. My lashes fluttered open and I found him watching me with his jaw set and his eyes ablaze. His hands were on his hips and I saw his Adam's apple move with a thick swallow.

I shifted on my feet, not sure what to do with my arms. I decided to place them in the water at my sides. "Sorry."

"Why are you sorry?"

"I don't know. I guess I'm not sorry."

He growled, his eyes half closing, and he tugged a hand through his hair. He looked...frustrated.

His frustration made me frustrated because I didn't know why he was frustrated. I surmised based on his expression that I'd done something wrong, made some novice misstep, but I had no idea what.

I hated I was so clueless about boys. I didn't know anything about them other than what one can absorb from porn and pubmed articles. Otherwise they were a cornucopia of conundrums.

"What's going on?" I blurted, feeling lost and confused by the last sixty seconds, not to mention the last two days. My hands convulsively gripped my thighs in the water. "What are you thinking?"

His eyes lifted to mine and he stared at me, saying nothing, but his frustration was tangible. I could hear him breathe though, could see his chest rise and fall with his deep exhales. The longer he stared at me without saying anything the faster my heart beat; I felt like it was going to throw itself out of my ribcage.

Then he said, "Come here," causing me to jump a little, though his voice was quiet, almost lost amidst the combined sounds of the waterfall and the insect symphony. Even if I hadn't heard the words, I would have read the want—what he wanted—in his eyes. He looked a little wild with want.

I tried to take a deep breath but managed only a shallow inhale. Silently I obeyed, wading toward him until a foot separated us. I was glad my hands were in the water so he couldn't see them shaking, because they were shaking—just a little.

When I stopped, his gaze dropped to my body, to my chest, ribs, and stomach. My lower belly felt tight and my breasts heavy. Full. The force of his stare was physical—corporeal—and I shifted a half step backward under its intensity.

Maybe he thought I was going to turn and flee, or maybe he'd reached the limit of his patience. Whatever the reason, Martin closed the remaining distance between us. He gripped my waist again. This time the shock of sensation from Martin's rough calluses against my bare midriff sent a jolt to my center and up to my heart.

He held me firmly as though he didn't trust me to stay.

"I need to touch you."

"You are touching me," I whispered breathlessly, unable to tear my gaze from his.

Martin shook his head slowly, lifted one hand to the tie at my neck that was holding up my top. Without breaking eye contact, he tugged on the fastening, loosening, then releasing the halter. With a feather-light touch he brought the straps forward, the tips of his fingers on my neck and shoulder sending a shiver down my spine. His movements were slow and purposeful, and he didn't stop pulling, and his eyes never left mine.

He brought his other hand to the second strap, the backs of his knuckles brushing against the tops of my breasts—pulling, pulling, still pulling—until he delved with meticulously measured movements into the material of my bikini top and tugged it down with aching deliberateness, exposing my body.

His gaze dropped to my bare breasts and he blinked, his eyes half lidded, the rise and fall of his chest obvious.

Then he touched me with the backs of his hands and knuckles—my hardened nipples and the undersides of my breasts—until the top was lowered completely. My stomach twisted and my back arched on instinct. I was near panting now.

I felt crazed, overwhelmed, like I was on the precipice of a high cliff and needed to jump—I had to. I had no choice. I absolutely needed it. Whatever Martin was about to do, I needed it.

A small, helpless sound escaped my lips, something like a whimper, causing his gaze to sharpen and his body to sway toward mine. I realized his chest was rising and falling faster than it had been, and the sense he was close to a similar edge made me bold.

So I touched him.

It was just my fingertips against the hard ridges of his abdomen, but it made him flinch and release a growly sigh like I'd both hurt and pleased him.

“Kaitlyn...” My name from his lips was tight, choked, needy.

He shifted an inch closer; the water swirled around us. One of his hands slid back up my body and cupped me—reverently at first, like I was fragile—and his other moved lower, around my back, slipping into the fabric of my boy short bikini bottoms, inside, down, until he was gripping my bare ass with one hand and massaging my breast with the other, his thumb sweeping over the peak twice before pinching it.

I cried out, the spike of pleasure severe and unexpected and clearly wired straight to my core. My hands instinctively lifted to grip his shoulders and my back flexed, arching on instinct.

“Dammit.” His eyes half closed, and he brought me against him with a jerky movement, as though it were a reflex he couldn't control.

Suddenly he bent at his waist and his mouth was on me. He licked, kissed, and sucked my nipple into his hot mouth, then grazed it with his teeth.

“Ah! Martin.” My eyes drifted shut briefly and my hips bucked, my grip on his shoulders increasing. I felt taut and swollen and greedy for his touch, his hands, his mouth, his body.

“I have to touch you.” His voice rumbled. He circled the center of my breast with his tongue before drawing it between his lips.

“You are touching me,” I repeated, holding on to his neck and the back of his head, pressing him to my chest, and feeling a little insane.

“Not here,” he growled, his caresses growing more aggressive, insistent, forceful.

He bit the underside of my breast and my ribs like he wanted to consume me, his fingers on my bottom digging into my flesh, severe and punishing. He pinched my nipple again, this time harder, and it hurt, but it also felt necessary. Then his hand in my bikini moved from my bottom to my front, his fingers parting and entering me.

Martin straightened, then captured my lips with his just as I cried out my surprise. His tongue mirrored the stroking of his fingers. His free hand grabbed my ponytail and he roughly positioned me how he liked, tilting my head to the side, opening my mouth just as he was opening my center.

My nipples grazed his chest. I flexed my thighs, my stomach, and my back tight. My nails dug into his shoulders and back. His fingers were inside me and it wasn't the soft teasing he'd employed in my dorm room. This was rough, urgent, his fingers searching, uncomfortable and a little painful, but... God, it felt so good. So good. So, so good.

My body seemed to understand what my mind hadn't yet discovered and my hips rocked instinctively in time with his strokes. He bit my lip as I panted, his hot mouth moving to my jaw then neck as he yanked my hair, exposing the vulnerable expanse of skin to his teeth and tongue.

As though from a great distance, I heard him cussing and complimenting me. A steady stream of growled fucks and beautifuls and gorgeous and damns between clenched teeth, against my skin, hot breath spilling over my ear and neck. I became aware all at once that his erection was pressed against my hip and he was moving the hard length, rubbing against me, as I moved on his hand. My breath hitched as my stomach coiled tight. My jaw was tight. Everything felt tight and taut and close to breaking.

And then I did.

I broke.

In fact, I cried out.

Violent, sweet desolation tore through me, delicious spasms accompanied by fierce trembling. I was paralyzed by this vicious wave of beautiful destruction, strangling and releasing and suffocating me over and over. I became aware of his fingers stroking slower, softer, like they'd taken what they wanted and were now moving as a mere echo of their earlier urgency.

My body also instinctively relaxed without my telling it to do so, going almost limp. Martin's mouth was on my neck, sucking, licking, and biting. I felt his heart beating against my bare breast and its thunderous pace matched mine. My vision was blurry and I realized I wasn't breathing, so I gasped for air, swallowing a gasping breath as I buried my face below his neck, hiding.

I felt him shudder. His fingers inside my body, still stroking and petting—like I'd done something good and he was rewarding me with a gentle touch.

With plain reluctance, he slipped his hand from my bikini shorts and released my pony tail. At first I thought he was going to set me away again, but he didn't. He embraced me. His strong arms came around my body and he crushed me to him. Automatically I snuggled closer.

I wasn't confused. I was nothing other than my body. Blissfully satiated. My mind was completely blank, devoid of thought. I merely felt.

And everything about being in Martin's arms felt like bliss.

ONCE AGAIN, SAM and I took dinner in my room.

It took me a while to recover from...

MY VERY FIRST ORGASM!!!

That's how I thought about it in my brain.

MY VERY FIRST ORGASM!!!!!!!!!!

It was all capital letters, followed by a ridiculous number of exclamation points. In the past I'd tried to bring myself to satisfaction any number of times and always failed, which was why I'd done so much research about the sex act. I thought if I could read enough about the subject I would eventually find the key to...wait for it...

MY VERY FIRST ORGASM!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

I didn't expect it to render me speechless, but it did, and for several hours. Luckily and bewilderingly, Martin also seemed to require recovery time. Neither of us spoke afterward, not in the cove, not on the walk back to the golf cart, not on the ride back to the estate.

Although, some barrier between us had been shattered, because he seemed to feel at liberty to kiss me and touch me whenever and however he wanted, and I let him because I quite simply needed the post-orgasm reassurance and touching. It felt necessary and natural and I craved it.

Before wordlessly retying my halter, he lavished my breasts and shoulders with hot, wet kisses—fondling my body like it was his with which to play and explore as he liked. As we left the cove, he pulled me into his arms and kissed me until I was climbing him breathlessly. During the duration of the drive in the golf cart, he placed one possessive hand on my thigh, then caressed my bottom greedily as we walked to the house.

Once inside, he caught my hand and spun me around until we were pressed against each other from knees to chests, and he kissed me again, his hands smoothing down my neck, then shoulders, arms, waist, and hips.

When we finally separated, he wore a deeply satisfied smile and his eyes glowed like they had in the cove.

Then he spoke. “Go clean up. Take this.”

I glanced down at the basket he was holding. It was the picnic we hadn't eaten. I took it then returned my gaze to his.

“You should eat something,” he said.

I nodded obediently.

His smile grew. “Are you ever going to speak again?”

I blinked at him then shrugged my I don't know.

Speak? Speak? What was that?

He laughed, pulled me in for another hug, and kissed the top of my head. His eyes were happy as he sent me on my way with a low, “See you at dinner.”

But I didn't see him at dinner. I ate in my room with Sam because my mind caught up with what had happened while I took my shower. I felt the soreness between my legs and reality crashed over me like a tempestuous waterfall. The world came into sharp focus. I reached for the wall of the shower to steady myself.

His fingers hadn't been gentle, hence the soreness. And as I reflected on the events in the cove, I recognized that everything about him—his touch, his words, his kisses—had been dictatorial, forceful, and domineering. He may have given me my very first orgasm, but he'd taken something as well.

And he knew it. He'd known it while it was happening.

Adding to my confused state, I saw in the bathroom mirror that he'd left bite marks and hickies on my skin - two on my neck, and one on the underside of my right breast. They looked like evidence. Like they'd been placed there purposefully.

I needed time to marinate in the events, to accept it had happened, to decide what it meant, to figure out why I'd let it happen, and to determine whether it was a good thing or a bad thing.

I didn't panic. But I did remember that the blood of a thousand virgins had been sacrificed at the altar of his sexual prowess.

A cold lump gathered in my stomach, comprised of confusion and uneasiness, and I dressed in sweatpants and a large T-shirt.

Sam stopped by about an hour later—found me curled on my giant bed staring out the window to the sea. Though I knew she noticed the purple marks on my neck, she seemed to sense I didn't want to talk, and I was grateful when she suggested we eat dinner then study in my room. I'd brought my class-specific notebooks, to which I had an unhealthy attachment, therefore I was all for getting down to study town.

My notebooks were soothing to me. Just seeing my handwritten notes was like going back in time to the day of the lecture. They gave me confidence. They made me feel like I might actually be capable of acing tests. They were the brain-spinach to my Popeye the sailor man.

As well, I didn't really want to face Martin's teammates with hickies, obvious evidence of what we'd done. I wasn't regretful or embarrassed, but it felt private, sacred to me. I didn't want to share what had transpired with a room full of near strangers, especially with Ben the leering douche-bucket.

Therefore, Sam and I sat on the balcony and munched on salmon cakes, garden salad, and asparagus, between chapters and class notes of vector calculus and European history. At sunset we went for a walk on the beach. She told me about her day, wherein she swam with Eric then convinced him to play tennis with her.

Of course she kicked his ass.

I didn't ask her whether she liked him and she didn't ask me what was going on with Martin. In a lot of ways Sam and I were similar. When real, weighty feelings were involved, we both found vocalizing unformed thoughts difficult. I think we both needed time to figure out our own stuff before talking it through with each other.

During our walk we decided to share my giant bed again, so she went off in search of her PJs, while I grabbed the tray with our dirty dishes and wandered around the house in search of the kitchen. I needed tea, not to mention cookies.

In the kitchen I encountered the chef—a red-cheeked, red-haired, red-nosed woman in her sixties named Irma, and her aide—a similarly red-cheeked, red-haired, red-nosed forty-something woman, Tamra—who I suspected was Irma's daughter. They gently admonished me for clearing my own dishes then promised to bring me up tea, milk, and cookies. I asked for directions back to my room, and Tamra offered to show me the way.

Upon my request, she was showing me the most direct path, rather than the scenic route, as I suspected I would make several stealthy trips to the kitchen during my stay. I probed her for answers about the house as we walked, and learned it had been acquired by Mr. Sandeke senior—Martin's father—ten or so years ago. The staff came with the house. I also learned Tamra was divorced and childless, and had moved down to work with her mother some four years prior.

They lived at the house in staff quarters year round and fed the rest of the staff daily—most of whom were also employed year round. However, Mr. Thompson and Mrs. Greenstone were also responsible for several other extensive family properties in England, Italy, Switzerland, Thailand, Japan, New Zealand, and the United States. They traveled with the family and always opened the houses for Martin and his parents wherever they went.

We turned into the long hallway that led to my suite when Tamra stopped—walking and talking—suddenly, then took a step back.

“Oh! Mr. Sandeke.” Tamra turned toward me, gave me a tight smile, then walked off without another word.

I watched her go, a bit perplexed by how suddenly she fled her employer.

When I turned back to my door I understood why. Martin's eyes were deep blue pools of unhappiness and his jaw was set in a firm, grim line.

"Where have you been?"

My eyebrows ticked upward—because his demanding question made me want to junk punch him—then lowered—because I remembered he now had carnal knowledge of me and I'd not joined him for dinner like we'd agreed.

Also, despite his grumpy tone and face, my body apparently wanted him to give me the rough treatment again, because it melted and hummed under his scowl of dissatisfaction.

I straightened my spine, giving my body a mental slap aimed at sobriety, and lifted my chin.

I was careful to keep my voice nice and steady. "I've been cavorting with the servants."

"Cavorting," he repeated, his tone flat. But I was pleased to see the granite-like edge to his jaw soften and his eyes lose their harsh glint.

"Yes. Cavorting for cookies. I wandered the halls for a while, got lost, then eventually found the kitchen." I said this while walking toward him as casually as I was able, then entered my room, leaving the door open behind me in a silent invitation.

He took the invite and closed the door as he followed. I heard him sigh before he demanded, "Why weren't you at dinner?"

"Sam and I decided to get some studying done. And I was tired." I crossed to the sitting area by the big window and plopped down in a chair, then gave him a small, friendly smile. "How are the boys? Quite recovered from the perils of traveling via private plane, limo and yacht, and practice this morning?"

Some of the sharpness re-entered his gaze and he crossed his arms over his chest. "You would prefer to fly commercial?"

“Of course not. I’d prefer not to fly at all. I insist you teleport me the next time we take a vacation to paradise.”

He finally cracked a smile and crossed to where I sat. He examined me for a moment in silence, then took the chair next to mine. He eased into it, all fluid grace, long limbs, and coiled power.

“The next time?” he asked, and I was pleased to hear his voice held a hint of teasing.

“Of course. I’ve decided that you and I are going to be best friends, just as long as you keep me in a steady supply of salmon cakes.”

“Yes. And cookies.” I bent my elbow on the high, cushioned arm of the chair and rested my cheek against my hand, let my eyes move over his handsome features and found him watching me, his eyes intent.

His mouth curved into a smirk that was mirrored in his stare. “And dancing lessons?”

I grew very still, my eyes locked on his, because by dancing lessons, I knew he meant orgasms. Probably mutual orgasms. And lots of them.

I swallowed thickly, and heat traveled up my chest to my neck. The cold lump in my stomach seemed to balloon and press against my lungs. I thought about the marks on my skin and the soreness between my legs, reminders of how physical intimacy with Martin had been exciting and satisfying, but also extremely intense and a little scary. Maybe too intense.

He reached for my hand where it rested against my cheek and I stiffened, straightened, and yanked it away, opting instead to twist my fingers together on my lap. I also tore my gaze from his and stared at the floor.

We were silent for a stretch as I tried to figure out what to say, how to respond. This was problematic as I didn’t know what to say or how to respond.

“Look at me.”

I tried to swallow again but experienced a swallow misfire, and released a shaky breath. “Martin...” I covered my face with my hands. My cheeks were hot and I shook my head.

“Kaitlyn, if you tell me you regret what happened...” His voice was low, sounded tight and barely controlled.

“I don’t regret it,” I blurted, because it was true. I didn’t regret it. I liked it, a lot. And I wanted to do it again.

I peered at him from between my fingers, found him watching me, his jaw set and his eyes fierce. When I spoke it was muffled by my palms pressed to my mouth. “I don’t regret it. But I don’t know how to feel about it because it was a little scary.”

His gaze grew introspective, like he was searching his memory, and I noted his forehead was marred with wrinkles of concern. “Scary? How so?”

I tried to distance myself from the conversation and approach it with pragmatic analysis. “Well, I think the first true ‘sexual experience’ for any girl is going to be frightening, so there is that. But also...well...I’m sore. And you left bruises on my hip and bites on my neck. You were quite intense and I liked that a lot, but you weren’t very...gentle.”

He blinked rapidly and a flicker of something like dismay clouded his features. He studied me with pensive unhappiness. Then his head fell backward to the cushion of the chair and his chest expanded with a large breath. “Goddammit.”

He looked angry.

“Are you...mad?” I asked, my hands dropping to my lap as I studied his face for a clue. I couldn’t believe he was angry. For heaven’s sake, I was new at this, at all of this.

He closed his eyes for a full five seconds, then said, “I didn’t mean to hurt you, not at all. I don’t want to hurt you.”

I examined him, how upset he was, and realized that irritation was pointed inward. “Can you be—I mean—is it possible for you to be less rough?”

He lifted his head, his eyes opening and I saw his determination before he spoke. “Yes. You have my word. That won’t happen again.”

I got the sense he was disappointed in himself...very curious.

“I didn’t say that exactly. I mean,” I cleared my throat, trying to quash my nervousness, because it was weird doing a post-orgasm analysis with Martin Sandeke, “so, just to be clear, it was good. It was all very good. I liked what happened... earlier. My pants liked it too. But, as much as my pants want to get this party started, I’m very new to all of this.” I emphasized all of this by waving my hands over my pelvis then waving them in the direction of his entire body.

Some of his dismay gave way to amusement. “I know.”

“I’m not saying the rough was bad, and I’m not ruling it out for future interludes—if there are future interludes—as long as I get to be rough sometimes too.”

His gaze abruptly heated and his eyes narrowed, sharpened. I ignored this because the idea of getting rough with Martin was...epically arousing. I rushed to continue, “I’m just suggesting that, if this happens again—”

“When it happens again.”

“—you go a little easier on me until I know how to do this thing.”

He nodded and I was pleased to see him relax a bit more.

We stared at each other for a beat, and the air felt ripe and heavy. He was watching me as though he were imagining these future interludes, planning and preparing for them.

“I just wish—”

“What do you wish?”

A sudden idea occurred to me and I embraced it before I could think too much about the ramifications; I assumed he’d reject the idea outright, which is why I blurted it. “Heck, let’s go all in. If we’re going to give it a try, we might as well really give it a try. I think we should throw caution to the wind and label each other as girlfriend and boyfriend. Ala, Have you met Martin? He's my boyfriend. I'm Parker, his girlfriend. We're together in the biblical sense of the word, sans the sacrament."

He stared at me for five full seconds, obviously caught off guard by my suggestion, but then he surprised me by reaching forward, and with a sure and smooth movement, pulled me onto his lap. I stumbled and basically fell into him. Meanwhile his hands cradled my face, his thumbs caressed the line of my jaw, and his eyes moved almost reverently from the progress of his fingers to my lips.

"Parker," his voice was a rumble, growly whisper, laced with warning, "don't say it unless you mean it."

Well, crap. Bluff called.

I licked my lips—a nervous habit—which had the byproduct of turning his aqua eyes darker. He looked...greedy.

"Martin, this is nuts. You don't need or want a girlfriend."

"I want you."

Gah! Right in the feels!

He felt comfortable touching me, that much was clear. But I hesitated to touch him. I didn't want to touch him when he wasn't really mine; because when this was over, I wouldn't be allowed to touch him anymore. Then I would have lost something.

Therefore, I crossed my arms over my chest and shook my head.

"Let's talk about our differences," I said, hoping a well-reasoned argument would make some kind of dent in his crazy fixation.

Again, he ground his teeth; his hands slipped away from my face and his arms wrapped around me, as though to keep me from leaving.

"Yesterday, back in the limo," I said, firming my resolve, "and then on the boat, and then when we left the marina, you did this thing where you gave the other guys dirty looks for talking to me."

Martin stared at me, betraying nothing of his thoughts.

“I feel pretty confident in stating that you’re...well, you’re interested in me and it’s not platonic. Therefore, your behavior felt as though you were marking your territory. I’ve never had a guy do that before, but maybe I’m misreading the situation...?”

He cleared his throat again. “You’re not.”

“I didn’t like it.”

“You didn’t like it?”

“No. I didn’t. It made me feel like, I don’t know, like I was Chinese leftovers and you didn’t want anyone to sample me.”

“I don’t want anyone to sample you.”

“But I’m not food. I get to say who samples and who doesn’t.”

“I thought most girls liked it when guys were possessive.”

“Really?” I asked this because I really didn’t think so; then I shook my head. “No. At least...well, at least I don’t think so, not like that. It’s like, why would I want to be with someone who doesn’t trust me to be loyal? I’m not a buffet. Guys can’t sample the lo mein just because I’m standing there. I get a vote in who eats my noodles.”

“I trust you,” he said quickly, his gaze darting to mine then away. “After Friday night, what you did, I think I trust you more than anyone.”

Oh, gah! He sounded so...sincere. I ached for him, because I believed him and it made me sad. How was it possible I was the most trustworthy person in his life? How heartbreaking was that?

Unable to help myself and spurred by a sudden desire to touch him, I placed my hands on his shoulders. “Martin, it’s just, I don’t have much experience with dating or having a boyfriend. I’ve had one, but he wasn’t...well, he didn’t count. I’m not really sure how it works—”

“I have even less experience than you.”

I glared at him. “That’s a lie.”

“No. It’s not. I’ve never...,” he cleared his throat, “...you’re the first girl I’ve wanted...like this.” He sounded enormously frustrated and his fingers dug into my hip and ribs where he held me. When he spoke next it was through gritted teeth. “I just wish you’d be less stubborn.”

“You can’t always have your way.”

“I know that. If I had my way we’d be naked right now in the ocean or...shit, doing anything other than discussing more reasons why you don’t think this is going to work.”

My instinct was to pacify him, reach forward and soothe his bad temper, promise I would stop being difficult and just give in to the fantasy of this being my reality. But I couldn’t ignore reason and logic, even if I was strangely flattered by his caveman displays, possessive impatience, and apparent fixation.

And also...skinny-dipping with Martin = pre-bedtime imagery for the win.

Heat raced up my neck and over my cheeks and I squeezed my eyes shut, gathering a deep breath. I hoped to also re-gather my wits, because right that minute they were skinny-dipping with Martin some hundred yards away in the Caribbean.

“And now you’re blushing.” He didn’t sound pleased about this. He sounded frustrated and resentful.

“What do you expect?” I asked, then opened my eyes. “I’m not used to this. It’s going to take me some time to get used to the idea that you’re interested in me. For cripe’s sake, it’s been forty-eight hours and we’re not even dating—”

“We are dating. Remember, we’re having tacos and soon we’re going to have lots of dance lessons.” His eyes drifted to the love marks on my neck and he smirked. It was a satisfied, pleased smirk.

A jerk smirk.

“Well, future tacos notwithstanding,” strategically and stubbornly, I ignored his reference to dance lessons, “I know I’m not your girlfriend, and even if I were I wouldn’t want to be peed on.”

Martin choked on air then gave me a squirrely look. “Peed on?”

“You know, figuratively and—for the record—literally. If we got to a place where we became ‘involved’,” I used air quotes to emphasize involved, because it seemed like an odd word, but the most appropriate for the situation, “I don’t think I’d be happy with you marking your territory, unless some guy was being inappropriate with me and I sent out the boyfriend bat signal.”

He glared at me, his gaze searching. Then he nodded. “Fine. If I go all day tomorrow without...peeing on you,” his lips twitched, but he quickly schooled his expression, “if I do that, then you’ll come to the party with me tomorrow night.”

What should have been a request or a question was once again a declaration. I stared at him. I really hated parties.

But he looked...oddly hopeful.

Oddly hopeful on Martin Sandeke made my heart melt. His expression, plus the feel of him all around me, meant I really didn’t have much of a choice.

“Fine.” I sighed, trying not to sound like a petulant teenager and mostly succeeding. “I’ll go.”

Stoichiometry: Calculations with Chemical Formulas and Equations

MARTIN DIDN'T PEE on me. In fact, he didn't even look at me or talk to me for most of the day.

Like the day before, the guys were up early practicing, Sam and I assumed our spots on the beach, and they arrived in the early afternoon for food. I left as soon as Ben arrived. He made me feel uncomfortable and icky—and I knew that was on me. I should have been able to ignore him, but I couldn't. So I left.

I milled around the house, exploring, expecting Martin to show up. He didn't. I found the music room—yes, this compound of excess had its own music room, with signed gold records from rock and country music legends lining the walls, signed concert posters, and pictures of a tall, lanky, geeky looking dude alongside several notable musicians and celebrities.

I recognized the geeky dude in the photos as Martin's dad and noted they had the same thick hair and lips. They were likely the same height. But that's where the similarities seemed to end. After inspecting the pictures several times, testing out the baby grand piano—it needed to be tuned—and discovering three beautiful Gibson guitars along the wall, I went back to my room and read.

Then I did some chemistry homework.

Then I took a nap.

Then I woke up on a man.

I didn't realize it at first, because I suffered from post-nap confusion. When I did come to my senses I discovered I was half sprawled on a hard chest, and fingers were playing with my hair, brushing it back from my cheeks and neck, gathering it, twisting it, tugging it lightly.

I stiffened, shot upward, lifted my fists to defend my honor, and found Martin laying on the bed, his hands up like he surrendered.

“Whoa!” His eyes were huge and he gave me a startled smile. “Do you always jump up like that after sleeping?”

“Like what? A badass?” My voice was gravelly, still laced with sleep.

“Yeah, like a badass.”

I huffed, let my fists fall to my lap. “No. Only when I find Martin Sandeke on my bed.”

“Good to know.” His lips twisted to the side and his eyes swept up and down my form. “I’ll make sure to wear protection when I’m in your bed.”

“You should probably wear it even when we’re not in bed.”

“I always use protection.” He lifted an eyebrow meaningfully.

Pause.

Blink.

Oh...I get it.

Amazingly I didn’t blush. I just gave him a half-lidded I’m not impressed glare which made him burst out laughing.

“You are such a guy.” I gave him a reluctant smile.

“What do you know about guys?” He repositioned himself on the bed, scootching up and placing his hands behind his back against the pillows.

“Admittedly, not much. My dad isn’t much of a guy.”

“Well, let’s see. He’s a scientist. He’s always losing things. His socks never match. He loves baseball, but he can’t play it very well. He tried to get me to play softball. I’d always sneak my Gameboy in my practice bag then hide behind the bleachers and play Dr. Mario instead.”

“So he pushed you a lot?”

“No. Not at all. I think he wanted me to do it because he likes cheering for me...to be honest. He’s always the one taking pictures, at events, ceremonies, that kind of thing. He’s hardly ever in the pictures. I looked back at my high school graduation photos and realized he’d taken over a thousand, but he wasn’t in any of them. So I dressed back up in my cap and gown, did my hair the same, and—with George’s help—arranged to have a photographer come to the house so we could get some good shots.”

“Who’s George? Your ex-boyfriend? The one who didn’t know how to fool around?”

“No.” I glared at Martin, shook my head at his antics. “George is my mom’s personal assistant, he’s like an older brother to me.”

“Hmm...” Martin’s eyes narrowed a fraction, considering me, then asked, “Did your dad like that? What you did?”

I nodded, smiling at the memory. “Yeah. He did. He cried actually. Not a lot, just a little. The last time I visited him at work, I saw he’d hung up no less than six of the pictures in his office.” I laughed lightly, shaking my head. “He’s a goof.”

We were quiet for a long moment, sharing a stare. His mouth held a whisper of a smile as though he were living vicariously through my experience and found it a pleasant place to visit. It was...nice. Comfortable. Strange.

I cleared my throat, averted my eyes, finding this nice, comfortable, strange moment more disconcerting than the heated exchanges we’d shared so far. This felt like it could lead to something lasting and normal. We were Martin and Kaitlyn having a conversation, sharing things, like real people did. Not like billionaire playboys did.

“So, what about your dad?” I asked, because I was curious. I knew a lot about Martin’s dad because his dad was a genius, sickeningly rich, and seemed to be in the news all the time dating some model or actress.

“My dad...” The smile left his eyes, and the one that lingered on his lips looked false.

“Yes. The man who raised you.”

He barked a humorless laugh and his eyes closed. “He didn’t raise me.”

I studied his features—his full, delicious lips, strong jaw, high cheekbones, and thick lashes—his perfect features. So perfect. I wondered what it would be like to be perfect, or at least seen that way by the outside world. It seemed to me that perfect—the word and all its connotations—might feel a bit like a cage, a defined floor and ceiling.

“Tell me about him,” I said, knowing I was pushing.

Martin opened his eyes and the bitterness that had been absent the last few times we’d been together was back. Jaded, jerk-faced Martin.

“He didn’t come to my high school graduation.”

I blinked at him. “Oh?”

“No. He said later that it was because I wasn’t valedictorian, but I think it’s because he forgot about it. It didn’t rank in his priorities.”

“Oh,” I said, because I wasn’t sure what else to say. His eyes were hooded, guarded, taunting—like he was daring me to feel sorry for him. I wouldn’t though. Or, rather, I wouldn’t show it.

“He’s the smartest man in the world, did you know that? He’s taken all the tests, whatever the fuck that means, and overall he’s the smartest.”

I placed my hand on his thigh and squeezed. “There’s more than one kind of smart, Martin.”

“That’s true,” he conceded, his eyes losing focus over my shoulder as he considered my words.

Feeling brave, I added, “I don’t think any of those examinations tested for parent-smarts, or priority-smarts, or valuing-your-incredible-son-smarts, because if they did, he would have failed.”

His brilliant gaze refocused on mine and I was somewhat surprised to see the bitterness leech out of his expression, leaving only sorrow and breath-stealing vulnerability.

“You’re a good person, Kaitlyn.” He was frowning at me, like I was a puzzle or a unicorn, like “good people” were the subject of fairy tales.

I opened my mouth, then closed it, then opened it again. “Thank you. You are too, Martin.”

His answering smirk looked wry and his eyes moved to my neck, where I still had the purplish marks from our encounter in the cove.

Normal and comfortable conversation gave way to our baseline: sexual tension. His half-lidded stare grew hot, the intensity of it built a fire in the area of my pants. He was forever building fires in my pants. The figurative Bunsen burner forever alight.

“You’ve never lied to me before,” he said, his voice sultry and teasing.

“I haven’t lied yet.”

“Parker.” He gave me a knowing look.

“What?”

“I’m not so good. You know that, remember? You called me a jerk-faced bully.”

“Well, so far you’ve been good to me, as far as I know.”

“I’d like to do more good things, better things, if you’ll let me...”

I was hot. My cheeks were flushed. I had to measure and regulate my breathing. The soreness between my legs was a lovely reminder of the good things he’d done, but so were the marks on my neck.

“No more hickies,” I blurted.

His eyes widened though he grinned. “Why not?”

“Would you like me to give you a hicky?”

“Hell yeah.”

I rolled my eyes. “I’m going to call your bluff. I will give you a hicky.”

He held his hands out to his sides like he was offering himself to me. “Anytime, lambchop.”

“I’ll do it on your bottom and I’ll make them so big, you won’t be able to sit down.” I narrowed my eyes and pointed at him.

He groaned like a starving man taking a bite of the most delectable dessert, as though the very thought was more pleasurable than he could process.

I scoffed at him, snorting. “You’re a doofus.”

Then he sat up and scootched to where I sat, one hand sliding up my thigh into the hem of my cotton shorts, his other tucking my hair behind my ear. His eyes felt cherishing and a little lost. The effect of his triple assault—earnest eyes, caressing hands, sexy smile—potent.

“I told you before,” he paused, brushed a light kiss over my lips, leaving me breathless as he continued in a low voice, “don’t say it unless you mean it.”

I lifted my chin for another kiss, but to my surprise, Martin stood from the bed. I watched him, confused by his withdrawal, and wrapped my arms around my middle.

He glanced at me and must have sensed my confusion, because he explained as he walked backward to the door. “It’s late, you’ve been sleeping for hours. You missed dinner, again. I’ll get Rosa to bring you a tray before we leave, but we need to get going.”

“Going? Where are we going?”

His smile turned smirky and victorious as he said, “To the party of course.”

The party.

The bet.

I'd forgotten.

Well...barnacles.

MARTIN WON THE bet, even though he'd cheated, and therefore Sam was in my room getting me ready for the party. She saw me coming out of my room with my hair in a ponytail, wearing sweat pants, flip flops, and a raggedy stained T-shirt that showed Chuck Norris destroying the periodic table. It read, The only element I believe in is the element of surprise.

She didn't think my attire was appropriate.

Therefore she marched me back into my room, made me wait while she found some suitable clothes from her room, then dolled me up. She'd put me in a backless orange and purple paisley halter dress that made my boobs look fantastic. She also scrunched my hair with chemicals, separating my curls and somewhat taming the frizz.

To top it all off, she put makeup on my face. Again. It was some kind of personal record, makeup twice in one week. I gave her my resting bitch face while she applied mascara to my lashes.

"The straps of the halter covers your...", her eyes flickered to my neck, "...it covers your love marks."

I grumbled. "Just make me look pretty so I can throw myself off a cliff."

"You are being ridiculous."

"You know I hate parties."

“You didn’t complain this much on Friday.”

“That’s because I had a mission. I had a reason to be there, an assignment. Get in, tell Martin about the plot, get out, go home. This time,” I lifted my hands—and my newly painted purple fingernails—then let them drop noisily with a smack on my thigh, “this time I’m window dressing. I’m the paisley curtains.”

“This dress looks great on you.”

“I know, I’m sorry. You are being so nice. I just need to complain.”

I wasn’t kidding when I’d said I hated parties.

Hate!

I didn’t understand them. They seemed to bring out the worst in people. People laughed too loud, talked too loud, exhibited odd behavior, pretended to have fun when they weren’t having fun...or maybe that was just me. Maybe people did have fun at parties and I was the weirdo.

Despite my grumpy stance, I had to admit Sam was a miracle worker. I looked good.

We met the boys in the foyer; they were dressed casually in shorts and T-shirts, but they all seemed to have taken special care shaving, administering product to their hair, and applying cologne. It was a variable hurricane of smells—all flavored Proctor and Gamble mainly.

Yet some of my surliness receded when Martin looked up and our gazes met. When his eyes widened a little and he appeared to be some degree of blindsided by my appearance. His lips parted and his eyes dropped, moving up and down a few times, blinking.

Sam nudged me and cleared her throat, saying just loud enough for me to hear, “It’s not the dress and it’s not the makeup, it’s you.” Then she walked toward Eric, addressing her next comment to him, “This time I want to drive.”

“You drove last time.”

“Your point?”

He smiled at her, looking handsome and happy, then shrugged. “Fine, drive now, ride later.”

She hit him on the shoulder, but she laughed at his double entendre, and walked out the door. Meanwhile Martin pulled his eyes from me and I was a little perplexed to see a mask of boredom slip over his features.

“Hey Ray,” Martin said. “You got Parker? Griffin is going to ride with me.”

I felt like I’d just been pawned off and had no idea why. I didn’t even want to go to this party, Martin had insisted, and now he didn’t want to ride with me?

Ray glanced from me to Martin, then back again, his raised eyebrows and slightly parted lips betraying his surprise.

“Ssssure,” he said, hesitating, frowning his confusion. Martin and Ray exchanged a glance as I fiddled with the pocket of my dress, all the good feelings upon entering the foyer dissipating in the face of this strange exchange. As well, Ben was there and I could feel his slimy eyes on me. I wished my boobs didn’t look quite so fantastic in this dress.

Then Ray nodded with sudden vehemence. “I mean, absolutely.” He turned a bright smile to me. I was relieved to see how genuine it looked, and he offered me his arm. “I’d love to.”

“Thanks.” I gave him a tight smile.

Boys were weird and I hated them. Except Ray. Ray was nice.

We left first. He chatted amicably on the drive over, making me laugh with a story about how he fainted in high school when he had to dissect a stingray. He also had a really engaging smile and an openness about him and made me think we were friends, or he was my ally, or I could trust him not to eat my Chinese leftovers even when I wasn’t looking.

When we arrived at the house—another sprawling monstrosity, though slightly less sprawling—Ray ran over to my side of the car and helped me out. We were the first to arrive, so he seemed content to loiter by the car while we waited for the others.

Ray fit my hand in his elbow and gave me a big grin. “So, you and Martin, huh?”

“I don’t honestly know. Doesn’t make much sense to me,” I admitted, shrugging.

“It makes sense to me.” His words were quiet, softly spoken.

I looked up at Ray, surprised to find him looking down at me with equally soft eyes. “You’re smart, beautiful—”

I snorted, rolled my eyes.

“Wait, listen, you’re not pretty in a conventional way. You’re not pretty at all. You’re beautiful.”

I pressed my lips together and frowned at him, saying flatly, “And I have a really great personality, right?”

He grinned at that, looked like he was trying not to laugh. “Yeah, you do have a really great personality.”

“You’re nice, Ray.”

“No, you’re nice, Kaitlyn. And you have a nice laugh and a great, weird smile with that cute gap between your teeth.”

I mock-scowled at him, pressing my lips together.

He seemed to hesitate as he studied me, debating whether or not to give a voice to his thoughts. He must’ve decided in favor of the idea because he abruptly said, “You’re the girl that guys like us, if we’re smart and if we’re lucky that is, you’re the girl we marry. You’re the marriage girl.”

My jaw dropped and my eyes bugged out of my head. It took me three or four seconds to find my voice before I said, “What are you talking about?”

“I have two sisters, and I tell them this all the time. Be the marriage girl. Don’t be the hook-up girl. Don’t be her. She’s stupid and shallow. Yes, she gets lots of male attention, dressing in her sexy lumberjack or sexy nun costumes...for a time. But then she’s used up, hardened, disillusioned and desperate, because no one stays with the hook-up girl.”

I blinked at him, pulled my hand from his elbow, and backed up a step. “You’re disgusting and that’s completely misogynistic. What if the hook-up girl is using you just as much as you're using her? What if she's just having fun? This is the problem with society. When a guy sleeps around, he's sowing oats. When a girl does it, she's a hook-up girl."

He held his hands up and shook his head. "I'm not going to defend society, I'm not saying it's right. I'm saying it's biology. It's evolution. It's programmed behavior."

"You do realize I'm nineteen, right? I may never marry. And I certainly won't be getting married any time soon."

"Doesn't matter. Your independence, the fact you aren't actively seeking your MRS degree—that the very idea is repellant—only makes you more of the marriage girl. You're the polar opposite of the hook-up girl."

I growled at him. He laughed at me.

"Listen, I'm not talking about the girl who wants to have fun and a good time with no strings attached. I'm talking about the girl who's looking for a free ride after the ride ends."

I snapped my mouth shut, scowling at him for real, and crossed my arms over my chest. I said nothing, because I knew that girl. Well, I didn't know her, but I'd overheard her plotting with Ben on Friday to drug Martin. That was what Ray meant when he was talking about the hook-up girl.

"Ah...I see you know what I mean."

I huffed. "I don't even know what we're talking about anymore."

"You. You're not the hook-up girl, you couldn't be if you tried. You're the girl we marry."

"How lovely for you, especially after you've spent your adolescence and early adulthood making girls like me feel like excrement."

He gave me a shrug that would have been charming ten minutes ago. "I'm just telling the truth. It might not be easy to hear, but that's the way of the world. You are the finest example of the marriage girl I've ever met. You're beautiful. From what I've seen, you're graceful under pressure, smart, capable, and drama free. You come from a family that's historically famous for being brilliant and exceptional. You're nice—like really, really nice—genuine, and you're hilarious.”

“You think I'm funny now? Just wait until the party. There will be copious pointing and laughing then.”

Ray ignored me. “That's why you and Martin make sense. Because, if Martin is one thing, he's smart. He may not be nice, but he is fucking sharp as a Katana. He's never had to work for it, he's never had to work for anything. He's bored. He's had his fun. He's over the hook-up girls. He's ready for what's next and you are the Olympic gold medal, the Nobel Peace Prize, the Pulitzer Prize, and the Academy Award of marriage material.”

The rest of the carts chose just that moment to show up. I heard Sam's squeals of glee as she and Eric swung around the corner. They parked neatly and tidily in the space next to Ray's. Herc and Tambor were next, followed by Lee and Will, Ben by himself, then Martin and Griffin bringing up the rear.

Meanwhile Ray was looking at me like an older brother might look at his sister, or a father might look at his daughter, after delivering a hard truth about life. Like he was apologizing for the way things were, but not sorry to have delivered the message.

He stepped forward and offered me his elbow. “Did I ruin your night?” His tone was sober and apologetic.

I shook my head, took his offered arm, and said, “No.” He hadn't ruined my night because I was going to a party. There was no way to ruin something that was already ruined.

“I've known him forever,” he whispered, as the engines of our companions' carts turned off and they spilled out onto the gravel driveway.

“How long?” I asked, careful to keep my voice low.

“Since elementary school.”

I nodded, thinking about this, thinking about our bizarre conversation.

“He’s kind of crazy about you, Kaitlyn.”

My eyes cut to Ray’s. His mouth was a grim line. Before I could question him further, the others were upon us and our strange heart-to-heart was at an end.

“Let’s go!” Sam slipped her arm in mine and tugged.

Ray let me go with a small smile and a wave, and a look that said, Let me know if I can help.

I didn’t know quite how to respond to that, what look to give in return. So I turned my attention to the mansion in front of me and the task at hand. I couldn’t think about being Martin’s marriage girl, not until I was safely through the evening with the odious party at an end.

Then and only then would I examine this new development and try to figure out what, if anything, I was going to do about it.

Limiting Reactants

SOMETIMES I HATE it when I'm right. Sometimes I love it when I'm wrong.

Let me explain what happened. I'll try to keep it as emotion free as possible for the sake of all the people who can't deal with the ups and the downs, and the drama and the angst. This is because I'm one of those people. I can't deal with the drama. Admittedly, this is likely because I was raised in a drama-free household.

I once tried being dramatic when I was fourteen. My mother told me to add it to the calendar.

We arrived at the house, Sam and I arm-in-arm, the boys behind us. We walked in the door. Martin gave me a curt nod then left. That's right, he walked away. He disappeared into the crowd.

I stood there stunned for about twenty seconds before Sam pulled me closer and yelled over the music, "Maybe he has to use the bathroom or something."

"Or something," I said, feeling gargantuan levels of annoyed and hurt and confused. Boys were so epically strange and obviously placed on the earth to torture girls. Martin's behavior made no sense. I considered trying to sort it out, but ultimately decided the actions of men were beyond my comprehension.

I noted Herc was glued to Ben as they passed and were absorbed into the throng. I'd wondered if Ben would try to drug someone at this party, but now I suspected Herc has been assigned to keep an eye on him.

Sam, Eric—who, let the record show, stayed with Sam—and I took a brief tour of the party. We walked from room to room, surveying the surroundings, getting a lay of the land as it were.

To me it looked like a party in a big house and nothing more exciting than that. So...not at all exciting.

The rooms were gargantuan and lavishly decorated and were getting trashed by partygoers. A DJ played loud house music. People were dancing and getting drunk, and talking loudly to hear each other over the music. The majority of the girls were dressed in string bikinis. The majority of the guys were dressed in shorts and T-shirts, or board short swim suits. The pool was huge and wrapped around one side of the house. It had a waterfall and three slides as well as four hot tubs.

Sam said she wanted to go swimming. I hadn't brought a swim suit. She lifted up a bag on her shoulder and informed me that not only had she brought me a swim suit, it was a string bikini. I thought I might die of happiness.

That last part isn't true. I was being sarcastic. Sorry.

Sam and I left Eric on the deck with a promise to return once we were appropriately attired. I numbly got dressed, refusing to look at myself in the mirror, because...why? Why would I do that to myself? Afterward, we walked downstairs. We walked on to the deck.

And I saw Martin kissing a girl.

That's literally how it happened. I took two steps out the door, scanned the space for Eric, and instead saw a leggy blonde with her arms around Martin's neck and her body plastered to his, and her mouth suctioned on his like she wanted to taste his dinner.

I immediately averted my gaze.

Even though you don't feel calm doesn't mean you can't be calm.

"I'm going to kill him." Sam's voice was low with menace.

I gripped her arm to keep her in place and I shook my head, letting her see I considered the whole situation ridiculously futile. I doubted my gaze of acceptance had been very effective because I could feel tears sting my eyes. I turned back to the door and walked away from...all of that hot mess.

I heard her growl at Eric when he started to explain and felt her close behind me as I wove through the crowd. She stopped me when we reached the far end of a huge kitchen.

“God, what an asshole!” I could feel her eyeballing me. “What do you want to do?”

I shrugged and rolled my eyes so I wouldn’t cry.

I wouldn’t cry.

Nor could I deal with the funnel cloud of feelings that tore through me, because...I just couldn’t. I didn’t know what to say or do or where to look so I glanced over her shoulder. Several guys were doing keg stands near the largest refrigerator I’d ever seen.

“Kaitlyn, what do you want to do? Do you want to leave?” Sam poked me.

“No,” I said. I didn’t want to leave. I wanted to find a closet and go chill with myself, calm the rising tide of emotion. “But I do have to go to the bathroom.”

“No.” I shook my head as I spotted Eric hovering behind her, about five feet away. He gave me a grim, apologetic smile. “No. I’m actually fine, I just need a minute. I’ll come find you later.”

“Kaitlyn...”

“Really, I’m fine,” I yelled over the cheering keg standers and lifted my chin toward Eric, encouraging him to rescue me from Sam.

I did need a minute alone. Actually I needed several. Ironically, I was more likely to find alone time here, in this crowd, than I would if Sam and I left the party. She would want to rage against Martin, maybe pack up and leave the island tonight. I didn’t want to do that. I wanted to gather my thoughts, leave the party in a few hours, and fulfill my end of the bargain.

Then in the morning, after a very calm, rational discussion with Martin Sandeke, wherein I spelled out all the very factual reasons he and I would never work—for example, how I now hated him with the fire of all the furnaces in hell, and that he was a lying liar who lied when he said he would never hurt me—I would leave the island.

I wouldn't cry.

I wouldn't accuse.

I hadn't really expected any better from Martin, so why should I be surprised now? Just because he gave me an orgasm near a waterfall. So what? It's not like he'd given me a unicorn. It was just an orgasm.

I would not cry. I would simply leave.

As soon as I arrived home, I would email my chemistry professor and request a new lab partner. And if I was very careful—and very lucky—I would never have to set eyes on jerk-face Martin Sandeke ever again.

Chapter One: Thermochemistry

I walked through the house and the partygoers in search of quiet, space, and cleanliness. In the end, numbness descended and I embraced it. Basically, I decided not to care, and instead thought about my ideal party.

Give me a small intimate gathering of five people, a dinner party, where one-on-one conversations can be had, where people talk about current events, good books, good food, and weird news. That was my idea of a good time.

Not keg stands with a hundred people on a private island, with a DJ and underage girls puking in the bushes while venereal diseases were shared in the hot tub. Add to that Martin ignoring me and making out with random girls.

Not that. That was not fun.

I happened upon the library, or a room with a lot of books. It was packed with people and I'm pretty sure a few someones copped a feel as I tried to squeeze past the bodies in favor of the books. I scanned the shelves and felt a spark of something good, something nice as I spotted Twenty Years After, by Alexandre Dumas. I'd been meaning to read it for a while. It was about the three musketeers twenty years after their initial adventures.

To my right someone threw up on the carpet. I glanced at the guy and decided that if people were throwing up on the carpet then no one would care if I borrowed a book.

I pulled it off the shelf, clutched it to my chest, and went in search of a quiet space. I roamed the house for a bit, thought about going back to the souped-up golf carts and just waiting for everyone outside, but dismissed the idea. The available reading light would be insufficient. I also dismissed the bedrooms, as those would be occupied. A bathroom was an obvious choice, but not a good one because they'd be in high demand, and it would be selfish of me to tie one up so I could read.

I tried to find a closet with a light. At one point I almost tripped over a passed-out Ben in the hallway. I glanced around and found Herc hovering nearby, talking to several girls. He gave me a nod. I returned it and continued on my way. I decided my suspicions were correct: Herc had been following Ben around. I wondered if Ben had inadvertently consumed his own date-rape drug.

I made a mental note to contact the campus police department about Ben when I got home. Martin had promised to handle it—whatever that meant—but if handling it meant no jail time for Ben, I would step in and do something.

Shaking off thoughts of Ben the rapist, I ended up stumbling upon the laundry room quite by accident. It was actually perfect. There was a clean comforter folded on the washer and plenty of reading light. Therefore, I arranged the blanket and hopped up on the machine, leant against the wall with the cushy comforter at my back, and began to read.

It was a truly excellent book. I didn't know how much time passed—two hours, maybe three. That Porthos...I swear, he's a riot. His antics always make me laugh. Although Athos was my favorite. I think it was because of his tragic past. I was a bit of a sucker for a guy with a tragic past.

“What are you doing?”

I lifted my eyes at the sound of Martin's voice, but not immediately. I finished the paragraph I was reading, then I looked up, holding my place in the book with my thumb.

He was dressed in swim trunks and he was wet, with beads of water dripping down his chest. As such, he looked super hot.

However, only the right side of his body was visible as the door blocked the other side. His hand was still on the doorknob and he leaned a tad to one side, into the room.

My eyes wandered over his form and I allowed myself to appreciate the beauty of Martin Sandeke like I might admire the beauty of a cold, soulless statue. Physically, he was a magnificent male specimen: corded muscle, long limbs, and rigid angles. Even his temples were drool worthy, especially since I knew his head housed a giant—albeit mismanaged—brain. Truly, he was one of our finest. His ancestors should really give themselves a big pat on the back.

A little pool of water had gathered at his feet, which made me wonder how long he'd been standing in the doorway. My eyes traveled upward again and I noticed he wore an angry expression. He looked livid.

I started a little at the heated annoyance in his stare. Then I glanced around the laundry room, searching for the source of his anger. I found that I was still alone. Therefore, I surmised his fury must be directed at me.

But, just to be sure, I said, “Who? Me?”

“Yes. You,” he growled, then stepped into the room and closed the door behind him. “What are you doing in here?”

I raised the book and tipped my head toward it. “I’m reading.”

Martin exhaled loudly, another growl. “I can see that, Parker. But why the fuck are you in here reading?”

I frowned at his use of profanity, my shoulders bunching with tension. I realized I’d gotten used to it, how often he cussed; I’d accepted it as part of him. But that was before he’d left me standing at the entrance to a party I didn’t want to attend, and that was before I’d seen him kissing a random girl.

“It’s the first sequel to The Three Musketeers. I’ve been meaning to read it. I found it on the shelf in the library—or living room, or whatever room. There are too many rooms in this house, so I don’t know what half of them are called.”

Martin gritted his teeth, and I got the distinct impression he wanted to strangle me. “Parker. This is a party. And you’re in the laundry room? Reading?”

I paused a beat to make sure this wasn't a trick question. When I could find nothing amiss with his interrogation, I nodded slowly. “Yes. This is a party. I am in the laundry room reading.”

“Why? What is wrong with you?”

My mouth opened and closed but no words arrived, because his questions continued to confuse me. Finally, I admitted, “Martin, I don't know what you want me to say or why you appear to be upset. I found the book when I was in one of the several rooms with lots of books. I've been meaning to read it. So I picked it up and found a quiet place. Why are you so angry?”

He charged at me and I ineffectually scrambled backward on the washing machine. In less than two seconds he'd pulled the book from my hands, slapped it on the counter at my left, and braced his arms on either side of my legs, leaning forward.

I realized he'd made me lose my page in the book. I decided to ignore my urge to vocalize this complaint, because his eyes were beyond heated.

They were incensed blue flames. I braced myself, my gaze wide and watchful, and flinched when he lifted a hand. I relaxed a smidge when he used it to push my hair off my shoulder.

When he spoke, his voice was low, strained, like he was trying very hard to control his temper. “I brought you here as my date. That was our agreement.”

I nodded once. “Yes. I know.”

“And, instead of talking to people or having fun, you're in here reading a book.”

I kept my voice even and calm, tried to sound soothing. “I am having fun. I'm reading a book.”

“You're trying to punish me for winning our bet, for bringing you here.”

I shook my head, hoping he would see the honesty in my denial. “I’m not. I promise. I like to read.”

“Who comes to a party, an entire mansion at your disposal, and reads Dumas in a laundry room? I’ve been looking for you for two hours.”

He’s been looking for me? For two hours? Why would he do that?

“If you’ve been looking for me then why are you wet?”

“This place has pools with caves, and I’ve been through all of them searching for you. You’re avoiding me.”

“Honestly, Martin...” I shrugged. “I didn’t think you’d notice.”

“You didn’t think I’d notice?” he roared.

I winced. “That’s right.”

He blinked at me once, then held perfectly still. His features completely motionless as though his face were stuck in angry suspension. I could see something building behind his eyes, like how you can see a far-off storm gathering in the distance. Therefore, I decided it would be best to explain before he lost control of his temper.

“Earlier, after I changed,” I motioned quickly to the string bikini I was wearing, “I went back to the deck and saw you had your hands full—and at one point, your mouth full of a tongue that wasn’t yours—so I figured you were good. You know, entertained, taken care of, no need of my escort services.”

He flinched, blinked rapidly during my explanation like I’d splashed water in his face, and his back straightened.

“You saw that?” He appeared to be surprised.

Lifting my hands up between us like I surrendered, I nodded and continued, “But, no worries. I understand that kissing random girls is in your wheelhouse. Which, like I’ve been saying all along, is another reason why we’re not compatible. Because, as I’ve said—and no judgment—I’m not really into kissing guys who kiss other girls. That’s not in my wheelhouse. So you should go return to your women folk. I'll be down here reading; no rush. But if you plan on spending the night, let me know so I can ensure to hitch a ride with Eric and Sam, or Ray. For your own safety though, please make sure the sheets are clean. I overheard one of the guys in the library say that he thinks he has ringworm. I didn't ask which bedroom he used."

Martin's eyes narrowed as I spoke and his mouth curved into an unhappy line. When I was finished he lifted his gaze to the ceiling, subtly shaking his head; he paired an eye roll with a whispered, "Fuck."

Again, I flinched at the profanity and scrunched my nose, my gaze moving back to the discarded book. I wondered how much longer this conversation was going to take, because Porthos's shenanigans were seriously cracking me up.

"Parker..."

My eyes jumped back to his, which were now once again on me. He didn't look as angry, but he did look frustrated.

"Yes?"

Martin lifted his hand like he was going to put it on my leg, but stopped when I stiffened. He cursed again. Shook his head, again. Gritted his teeth, again.

"Look," he said, "if you'd stayed, then you would have seen me push her away. I'm not interested in her." His expression relaxed, and I saw the flash of hopeful vulnerability. My heart leapt in response.

Stupid heart.

He cupped my cheek, his thumb tracing the line of my jaw, and added, "I'm not interested in any girl here other than you."

I pressed my lips together to keep from frowning, though I knew my eyes betrayed my disbelief because Martin's frustration visibly spiked.

Before he could continue, I interjected, "Martin, even if I believed you—which I don't—it doesn't really matter. You pawned me off on Ray for the drive over. When we walked in here, into this house, you left me. You walked away from me, and you didn't introduce me to anyone. You went off as though I wasn't there. I don't know any of these people and I'm terrible at parties."

His gaze turned thunderous. "Is that what this is about? Are you down here because you're pissed that I left? I thought I was doing what you wanted. You said that you didn't want me to be possessive and hover. Is this some kind of punishment? Because I don't respond well to that kind of mind-fuckery or passive-aggressive bullshit."

Despite my desire to stay calm, his words felt like gasoline on a fire I'd been carrying around in my chest, but had thus far managed to keep under control. My temper rose and with it the volume of my voice.

"No, Martin. I don't do passive-aggressive and I don't punish people. That is one of my life rules. I'm honest. If something upsets me, I'll let you know. But in order for me to be upset, I'd have to be surprised by your terrible behavior. What you did, leaving me in a room full of strangers and giving CPR to female partygoers didn't upset me, because I don't really expect more from you."

It was his turn to flinch. He sucked in a sudden breath and straightened away from me, his eyes cooling to frigid icicles. "What the hell is that supposed to mean?"

"It means you're used to getting what you want or who you want when you want it. And I couldn't care less if you were upstairs, right now, having a ginormous orgy with the ringworm gang. Because I've known all along that you are a jerk-face and you don't know how to treat people with decency."

His mouth fell open, presumably at my words and my hostile tone, and he stared at me. His expression was that of someone who'd been stunned speechless.

I didn't like losing my temper. In fact, I prided myself on how laid-back and in control of my reactions I was, and how I never lost my temper. Therefore, this loss of control was another irritating new development since spending time with jerky Martin Sandeke.

At length, he found his voice. Though, surprisingly, he didn't sound quite as angry. "If you don't like how I treat you, then why do you keep letting me kiss you?"

"Opportunity and lust."

Gah...that was spiteful.

He flinched like I'd kicked him and he glanced away. His reaction made my heart hurt, and therefore, I heaved a gigantic regretful sigh.

My words came out in a rush. "That's not true. I'm sorry. I shouldn't have said that. The truth is..."

He lifted his eyes to mine, and the raw emotion made me forget myself. It made me forget to be cautious. Without really thinking about it or planning to do so, I gave him the whole embarrassing truth.

"You're smart—in fact, you have flashes of brilliance which is a huge turn on for me—and you're funny and charming when you want to be. And sometimes, you treat me with kindness and respect. Also, you're a good kisser. I thought at first it was my lack of experience, but now I think you're just an exceptionally good kisser. I like kissing you. I like the way it feels. I love how you make me feel when you touch me. But what feels good isn't always what's good for me, and I'm not willing to settle for being with someone who sometimes treats me well. I'd rather be alone."

With the end of my unplanned speech the numbness returned. I peered at him in a way I hoped demonstrated my acceptance of the situation and the impossibility of us, and I reached for my book. I did all this while I tried to suppress my blush of mortification. "Now, if you'll excuse me, Porthos is rather charming and I'd like to finish this chapter before leaving."

Martin's glare moved from me to the book. Before I understood his intention, he'd reached for the book, pulled it from me, and tossed it over his shoulder. I yelped my surprised unhappiness, but couldn't retrieve the novel because he'd stepped forward again, crowding my space. He gripped my waist and yanked me forward so he was between my legs, and my chest was against his.

My mind might have been numbed to him, but my pants weren't. I sucked in a sharp breath at the contact, everything tightening and twisting and bracing for his touch.

He stared at me for a long moment, during which—I'm ashamed to admit—my heart rate quadrupled and my body responded by pressing more fully against him. When he did speak, his voice was a growly and hostile whisper. "Listen to me for one fucking second, okay?"

I also whispered, but only because he was whispering, "Only if you stop using the F-word like you get paid royalties every time you say it."

"I'll fucking use whatever fucking word I want to fucking use whenever I fucking want to," he whispered back.

I shook my head and spoke mostly to the other washing machine and two dryers lining the walls. "Again, proving my point, jerk-face."

"Kaitlyn, you are irritating."

"Feeling is mutual, jerk-face."

"Especially when you're right."

"Well, you can..." I paused, blinked at him and his shocking words. "Wait, what?"

His eyes moved over my face as he spoke and the tension in his body eased. Peripherally, I noted he was wrapping his arms around me, one hand sliding under the string of my bikini and against my bare back.

"I'm sorry." He was still using his growly whisper.

I narrowed my eyes, attempting to peer into and through his words, looking for trickery. As well, I was trying to ignore the wave of goosebumps that had spread outward from where his hot palm pressed against my back, and the fluttering butterflies in my stomach.

A beautiful man is the devil's most potent weapon.

A few seconds ticked by while we stared at each other. I wondered if I looked as hostile as he did.

I responded, "Do you even know why you're apologizing?"

"Yes." Another growl.

"Why? Why are you apologizing?"

"Because I shouldn't have left you when we got here. I should have kept you close to me, and I shouldn't have let Danielle close enough to touch me, not when we're together."

My brain stumbled on the word together, and I frowned my confusion at his accurate listing of offenses. "This seems like a miraculously sudden apology."

His jaw flexed. "Are you seriously going to give me shit about apologizing?"

I shook my head. "No. No, I am not. I accept your apology. Thank you for apologizing."

His eyes flickered between mine, then lowered to my mouth. "Now it's your turn."

"My turn?"

"Your turn to apologize."

My eyebrows bounced an inch upward. "What am I apologizing for?"

"For always assuming I'm an asshole."

The Legacy

Dylan Allen

He just won control of his legacy. Loving her could cost him everything.

Billionaire Hayes Rivers came into my life like a hurricane...

Heir to an oil empire, he was sexy and seductive, controlling and scorching hot. I craved every touch, every filthy promise that fell from his beautiful mouth, knowing he could break me. My past had left me battered and bruised, with scars he was determined to heal.

Loving him was like drowning—he consumed me, body and soul.

But Hayes has secrets of his own. And nothing could prepare me for the shocking pieces of our pasts that threaten to rip us apart.

When the truth is revealed will our love be enough to shelter the storm?

Dedication

FOR MY DAY DREAMERS.

YOU MAKE ME BELIEVE.

YOU ARE MY PEOPLE.

I LOVE YOU.

Prologue

THE LEGACY

HAYES

I hear the crunch of footsteps behind me, but I don't turn around. I know I'm not supposed to be here. It should worry me that I've been discovered. I've been warned repeatedly that this part of our property is off limits.

But I'm not worried.

Not today.

Maybe not ever again.

What could possibly happen to me that's worse than my father dying? The worst day of my life has already come and gone. The boulder of pain that has lodged itself into my chest is heavy and no other emotion has been able to find a foothold in it for weeks. With each day that's passed since my father died, I've become more convinced that what I'm feeling is something bigger, less definable than simple pain.

Pain is a basic, localized thing.

What I feel is sophisticated, all-encompassing.

Pain has a remedy.

There's no cure for what has taken root inside of me.

"Yo! What are you doing here?" a man's voice calls out from the clearing behind me. I'd been expecting Swish to come looking for me. I did bail on my father's funeral, after all. But that deep, loose, and jaunty voice is definitely not Swish.

When I turn around, a tall, young, dark-haired man I've never seen before is watching me with a wary look on his face. Like I'm the intruder. Yes, I'm breaking a rule by being here, but this is still my family's property.

I stand up slowly and face him. “Who the fuck are you?” I ask with as much aggression as I can manage.

“Remington Wilde.” He says his name like it’s a title. Like he expects it to mean something to me. And, it does. Even though I’ve never laid eyes on him before. His last name was among some of the very first words I ever learned.

Remington Wilde is the oldest son of my family’s biggest rival.

His family’s heir in training.

Just like me.

I’ve been raised to think of him as my nemesis.

I don’t know what I expected him to look like. Certainly not so... normal. He could be any other teenager at my high school. Like me, he’s taller and broader than average. He’s got a basketball tucked under one of his arms and is dressed like he’s been playing.

“Who the fuck are you?” he says just as combatively.

“Hayes Rivers,” I answer and straighten my spine. The same surprise I felt flickers in his eyes for just a fraction of a second before he schools his expression—but I don’t miss it.

Then, he starts dribbling the ball. His hand meets it every time it springs off the ground, but his eyes never stray from me. I’d heard he was a major basketball talent. But he attended the public high school, Lamar, and I go to the private Strake Jesuit. Our teams have never played each other. But if his playing is anything like his skillful but absentminded dribble, he was clearly born to hold a basketball.

“You’re not supposed to be here,” he says and draws my eyes back to his.

“Neither are you,” I shoot back.

We stare each other down. The longer I look at him, the more I’m sure I’ve seen him before.

He narrows his eyes at me, crosses his arms over his chest and curls his lip. “I came to get a ball that came over the wall. But you look like you've been making yourself comfortable back here." He nods at the sleeping bag that's stretched across the huge boulder in the center of the clearing. I've been coming here since the day my father died. It's been my escape from an endless stream of people who have been at our house to pay their respects.

"So?" I respond with a defensive shrug. I nod at his arm. "Looks like you got your ball. Why are you still here?" I ask.

His eyes narrow briefly, but his expression stays neutral.

"I thought your old man's funeral was today," he says casually, quietly. And yet, the reproach in his tone hits me like he yelled them inches away from my face. A flush of shame washes over me.

Of course, he knows. Everyone does. His mother, the widely-respected Tina Wilde, sent flowers. Eliza hurled the vase against the wall when she read the card, and they were not invited to the funeral. But I know their family must be watching ours closely to see how things change now that my father is gone. I wonder, too. He looks nothing like the mythical foe I'd imagined he would. But, our families have shared nothing more than the wall that divides our properties for the last—nearly—fifteen years.

He glances at his watch, frowns at it and then looks back at me. "It can't be over already? At nine o'clock in the morning?"

I imagine St. John's United Methodist Church packed to the rafters with people, pretending to care that my father is dead, mingling with the handful that really do. I've been handed so many business cards this week by people hoping that the Riverses will continue to be customers.

I've thrown them all away.

"Nah, it's probably just starting." I kick at the leaf-covered ground and avoid his disapproving gaze.

"So ... why are you here and not there?" he asks.

"I already said goodbye," I say with a shrug of my heavy shoulders.

“What about your mom? Your brothers? Don’t they need you there?” he asks. Kindness softens the disapproval in his tone.

I don’t like it.

I don’t want it.

But, I do feel a flush of shame that I’m not there for my brothers. I push that down and say words that are much closer to the surface and less problematic for me.

“She’s not my mom,” I say.

“Oh, she’s not?” He looks genuinely surprised.

“Nope. She married my dad when I was seven,” I say.

“So, they’re your step brothers?”

“They’re my brothers,” I clarify. I hate that word. We haven’t made that distinction since the first year our parents got married. Their mother was an equal opportunity terrorist. She made them as miserable as she made me and we’d formed a real brotherhood in the trenches of Eliza’s crazy. As far as I can tell, the only reason my father married her is because she was a wealthy widow with the right last name with potential spares for his heir. He adopted them, so we’re not just brothers in spirit—the law says we are, too.

“She’s never been my mother,” I say, and my voice sounds hollow in my own ears. I’ve never said that to anyone about Eliza. I’ve hidden my resentment. Mainly for my father’s sake. But now that he’s gone, so is my restraint.

“Where’s your real mom?” he asks.

“She died.” I shrug because I can’t do anything else. “I’m an orphan.” I say that word out loud for the first time and it tastes as bitter as I knew it would.

“Go be with your family, kid,” he says.

“I’m not a kid, and you’re not old enough to be calling me one,” I say.

“I’m eighteen. In college. My dad’s been dead since I was two, and my mama hates the sight of me. So, I’ve been old enough for a lot of things for a long time,” he says. There’s nothing in his tone that implies that he's sad about his father, but now that I know what it feels like to have to say 'my dad's been dead ...' Or maybe he just has a well-honed poker face. I need to work on mine.

"Listen, your brothers are going to need you to act like you have your shit together. If you can't do it for yourself, do it for them." He puts a hand on my shoulder, and it's oddly comforting—not at all awkward. Still, I don't want kindness or comfort. So, I shake it off.

"I'm surprised you even care. Don't the Wildes hate the Riverses? Isn't that why we've never even seen each other before?" I ask.

"First of all, it's the Riverses who hate the Wildes." He bounces his ball once. "And I've seen you before. Didn't know who you were. You and that little cheerleader girlfriend of yours come into Eat! over on Wesleyan. I work behind the deli counter. You probably didn't notice since you didn't take your sunglasses off the whole time you were in the store," he says and dribbles his ball a few more times.

"You work there?" I ask.

"Yeah, who else is going to?" he says.

"Doesn't your family own it?" I ask.

"Yes, and we all work in the businesses until we're old enough and smart enough to run them. We ain't like the Riverses," he says, his dark eyes cocky and daring me to challenge him. I can't. It's true. My family members don't work in any of their businesses. They don't work at all. But damn if I'm going to let him know it bothers me. So, I smirk.

"I'll say hi next time I come in. Maybe you can make me a sandwich," I say.

"Today, I'll cut you some slack and let you get away with that. But don't try that on a day that's not your father's funeral," he says and bounces the ball one last time before he tucks it back under his arm.

"Or what? You'll leave the mayo off my sandwich?" I scoff.

He snorts out a laugh and throws the ball so hard and fast that I barely catch it before it hits me squarely in the chest. “Nah. I’ll use my hands to show you why I can call you kid any time I want.”

I throw the ball back with as much force as I can. He catches it without even looking. Then he turns and starts to walk back through the little clearing in the woods that leads to the door I’ve never dared to open. It’s the emergency access to Rivers Wilde, the neighborhood the Wilde family established when they bought this land from my father, right around the time I was born.

He’s almost disappeared into the brush when he stops and looks back at me.

“Go to your dad’s funeral. Trust me, you’ll never finish saying goodbye, and you’ll be glad you saw him this one last time.”

He leaves, and after a few minutes, so do I.

“You wanted to see me?” I duck my head through the heavy oak door of Swish’s office. He’s had this office in Rivers House for as long as I’ve been alive.

The smell of old books, aged leather, and coffee is comforting. I breathe a sigh of relief when I see that he’s alone. Everyone else has met with me in pairs—mostly with their lawyer present. I haven’t had a truly personal conversation in a whole week.

“Hello, son.” Swish greets me in his swashbuckling East Texas twang that sixty years of living in Houston hasn’t ridden him of. Despite the red-rimmed eyes and the disheveled, finger-mussed state of his normally perfectly styled, legendary silver hair, he’s smiling at me. It’s a beleaguered lift of the left corner of his mouth, but it’s more of a smile than I’ve seen on his face in a month. It's sincere and warm, and when he says, "I'm glad to see you," I believe him.

He tugs his glasses off his nose, dangles, then drops them wearily onto one of the haphazard, stacks of paper littering his desk.

"Come in, close the door." He gestures to it and then hefts his bulky frame out of his chair and strides over to sit in one of the tufted dark red leather seats in front of his desk.

"Sit down, please." He nods at the identical chair across from him. The warm smile is gone and what's replaced it is so grave, so grim, that my stomach clenches. I wipe my suddenly sweaty palms down the front of my jeans-covered leg and do as he asks.

He groans through a yawn, presses the heel of his hand to his bleary eyes and rubs them slowly.

He's oozing fatigue, and it's catching because I'm starting to feel weighed down by my own as I watch him. He looks old. And I'm very aware of the fact that time is not on his side ... or any of ours, really. But, he folds his gnarled, spotted hands over the middle of his infamously large beer belly and leans back in his chair.

"The last two weeks have been ... difficult." His voice is weighed down by all the things we've faced this week.

Difficult.

Memorizing the first nineteen lines of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales in Olde English for class last month was difficult.

Having to live without someone you love and knowing you'll never hear their voice again isn't difficult. It's impossibly hard.

I wish he would get to the point so I can go back to my room and put on some music and try to sleep. My father loved Elvis. I used to think it was such an odd thing for a boy from East Texas—who grew up sucking at the teat of Wednesday night Bible study, Friday night football, and Sunday morning service—to love music that my grandmother used to call the Devil's seduction. The night he died, I played one of his albums on repeat and fell asleep to “Can’t Help Falling in Love.” Now I can’t sleep without listening to it.

“Your father was like a son to me. That I have outlived him and his father ...” He shakes his head. “I don’t know how to feel about it, Hayes. But the one thing I know is that I wouldn’t wish it on anyone. I’ve had a real difficult time finding reasons to be grateful for my advanced age, son. But today, I’m glad I’m here—because you need someone,” he says solemnly.

This time, his lips only quirk when he attempts to soften the graveness of everything.

“You don’t have to smile. I don’t even try,” I say. We’re familiar bedfellows when it comes to sitting across from each other with grim sadness between us.

When my father’s brain tumor returned so aggressively—and within weeks of his surgery—it was Swish who told me it was time to get ready to say goodbye. He was dead two weeks later. In so many ways, my life feels like it’s come to a screeching halt.

I haven’t been to school. My stepmother has taken my brothers and gone to her parents’ in College Station. And my uncle Thomas and his newest future ex-wife have moved into the wing that belonged to my father. I don’t know how he can stand to be in there. The last time I walked into that part of the house, it smelled like my dad, and I couldn’t stomach being there. I can’t imagine sleeping in his old bed, breathing air that smells like him. I miss him so much.

“I was raised in a different time. And your father, God rest his soul, reminded me so much of his father,” he adds,

“They weren’t anything alike,” I interject and lean forward because I want to see his agreement with my own eyes.

Instead, all I see is pity.

“They weren’t,” I insist.

He sighs. “I know your grandfather was ruthless at times.”

“All the time,” I mumble.

“People tell all sorts of stories about him. Your father didn’t speak highly of him. Thomas only speaks of him in hushed tones of reverence. The truth of the treatment his legacy deserves is somewhere between those two. But, he did what he had to, to preserve the family’s traditions of service. As did your father. And you will, too. Remember that you’ve been raised to honor and preserve your family’s money and their name. Your grandfather was the first Rivers to serve the family’s business in a purely figurehead capacity. Your father expanded some of the roles, but they both saw to it that the family’s businesses were run by people who’d done more to prove themselves worthy than just inheriting it. So, as chairman of the board, the title your father held—and that you will hold—is still an important one because you’re in charge of the family’s personal fortune. You’ve seen the reports in Forbes?” he asks.

“Yes, I have no idea if they’re true. I mean, do we really have twenty billion dollars?” I ask.

“There is no ‘we.’ It’s just you. And it’s much more than that,” he says, and my jaw drops.

“Me?” I ask.

“Yes, you,” he says mirthlessly.

“Holy shit.” I sigh and lean back.

“A lot of that comes from your ownership in Kingdom stock. But Hayes, the trust doesn’t give you access to any of it until you’re twenty-five. Until then, your guardian has control over it, and the trustee has control over him.

“The will says that in a case where the heir is too young to assume, a regent or guardian is appointed. It would have been your mother. But ...” He purses his lips.

So, I finish his sentence for him. “But, she’s dead, too.”

“Yes, she is,” he says with a new heaviness in his voice. “Your great-great-grandfather Rivers was obsessed with the idea of establishing his own dynasty. Unfortunately for Thomas, it means his inheritance and importance to the family is much smaller. But now, as your guardian, he'll also be the acting chairman," he says grimly.

"So, it's only until I'm thirty?"

"Yes, but I know he wants that chairmanship permanently. And he wants it to pass to his heirs. That useless cousin of yours would then inherit after him," Swish warns me, and my worry spikes when I think about my cousin Jesse, who lives with his mother in Miami. We've never gotten along. I can't imagine him leading our family.

"As we learned yesterday, your father's adoption of your brothers doesn't make them heirs as he'd hoped. So, the only way Thomas could ever take your place permanently is if you died. And you're so young, he has no hope. But he's going to do everything he can to find a way to undermine you. And he'll have sixteen years to do it," he says.

"What can I do to stop him?" I ask.

"Nothing. I think he's going to ask me to resign as the trustee of the family foundation where all the money sits," he says.

"But you won't. Right?"

"No. And he can't remove me. But son, I'm eighty-two. I'm not going to be here forever. And he'll have complete discretion to pick the next trustee," he says, and I feel a surge of worry.

Each word stings like they're wrapped in shards of glass. My stomach dropped when they read the will yesterday. I didn't expect to become chairman right away. I'm only fourteen. But to have no say—at all—over anything completely surprised me. What was I going to do for the next sixteen years?

"Okay, so what happens now?" I ask.

"Well, that's what I want to talk to you about. Your father made plans right before he died." His voice is grave, and he stops and watches me while his words sink in.

"What plans?"

"You're going to live with your aunt Gigi. In Positano," he says.

“Who?” I ask sharply, sure I hadn’t heard him correctly.

“Your father has an older sister, Georgiana, but everyone calls her Gigi,” he says again, and I sit back. A cold weight spreads in my core as I look at Swish with eyes that go from wide with shock to narrowed in suspicion.

“No, he doesn’t,” I insist.

“Yes, Hayes, he does,” he says softly. He watches me solemnly, and I realize, with real horror building in my chest, that he’s telling the truth. But ... my father wouldn’t hide his sister. Would he?

“How come I’ve never even heard her name before?” I ask, the demand in my voice softened by the quaver in it. My entire body is shaking. My mind is whirling. I don’t understand.

“She was disinherited before you were born,” he says, and I blanch at the idea.

“Are you serious?” I ask rhetorically—the answer is obvious from the look on his face.

He just nods.

“But-why?” I stutter on my question because I can’t imagine that there’s an answer that would help me understand.

“She chose a man over her family, and that was that. Your grandfather wrote her out of the will, out of the family Bible, out of the family tree, and for him, she hasn’t existed in almost sixteen years,” he says.

“His own daughter?” I ask. My grandfather was not a kind or loving man, but he behaved like family was paramount to everything. And he liked control. Over everything. I can’t imagine him having a child out in the world whom he couldn’t rule over with his iron fist.

“It was her choice. Your father stayed in touch with her—secretly. The week before he died, he asked her to be your guardian,” he says.

“He did?” I ask dumbly. But I’ve stopped thinking. What else don’t I know about my family? About my father? Part of me wants to know. The other part hopes I never find out.

“I would have rather he’d let me be your guardian, but he insisted. He wants you to live with her. And she agreed. So, she’s coming to get you, Hayes.” His big body heaves with his sigh like he’s relieved to have said it.

“Coming from ... where’d you say? Post what?” I ask. My head is spinning; I don’t even recognize my own voice.

“Positano,” he says with a weird accent.

“Where the hell is that?” I ask.

“Italy,” he says.

“What’s she doing there?”

“She lives there,” he says slowly, his face contorted like he’s bracing for a strong gust of wind.

“In Italy?” I ask.

“Yes. She got married and moved there with her husband. They’re not married anymore, and she stayed after they got divorced.”

“Is she moving here?” I ask hopefully.

“No,” he says that and nothing else.

“You’ll leave with her in two days. And you will take care of yourself and your name,” he says.

I look at him, confused and in denial about what he’s saying and shake my head as it starts to settle.

“But—I live here. I just made the JV team. I have a girlfriend,” I say and my life flashes past my eyes like a movie. But the reel is withered, burned, incomplete. My heart races as panic starts to set in.

I scramble to my feet. The chair scrapes against the floor as I push out of it.

“I’m in the middle of my freshman year. I just—”

“There are no options for you to stay here.” He cuts me off brutally.

“But ...” I shake my head helplessly. How, in the span of two days, can my life go from one thing to something completely different? “I don’t even know her. We’ve never even met,” I say.

“You will get to know her. She’s already here,” he says. I surge out of my seat and turn around to scan the room.

“What I mean, Hayes, is that she’s in Houston, at the St. Regis. Not here at Rivers House. She got in very late this evening,”

I sink back down in my seat, disappointment ripe in my chest. I sit, my head bowed, my hands dangling from my knees and only half listen to what he’s saying.

“Now, she’s going to do her best to make sure that you’re ready for the chairmanship when you turn thirty. Chairman of the board at Kingdom is a figurehead mainly, but there’s also power and discretion that comes with that role. So, just because you’re not an executive making decisions, you need a good understanding of the company’s business model. Every year the chairman, with the advice of the board, revises or reaffirms the platform and goals. The foundation and the family have had decades of solid leadership. I’m sure that when you’re ready to take over, you’ll continue that legacy. For now, it is up to your uncle to act in your stead.”

I drop my head into my hands.

“I know ... I know. Since his last divorce, he’s taken an advance on his income from the trust nearly every month,” he says sadly but with growing conviction in every word. “As the trustee, I have discretion over what happens to your money. I’m going to make gifts to you from the trust every year. It will be a lot of money, and you can’t touch it until you’re ready to assume the chairmanship. But at least this will keep it out of Thomas’s reach.”

I don’t say anything. I can’t. And what would be the point? I have no say in anything.

“And Gigi will take good care of you. You listen to her. You father trusted her with your life. I do, too.”

“My life?” I ask.

“I mean that you are your father’s only child. If you die without children or a wife, your uncle inherits,” he explains.

My jaw drops. “Die?” I ask in horror.

“I’m not saying he would try to kill you,” he says dismissively.

“Just that if something happens to you, the entire family’s future will be in his hands. And he is not fit to hold it,” he says in a display of temper that is rare and telling.

“I don’t know. None of this makes any sense,” I mutter and drop my face into my hands and try to think.

“One more thing,” he says, and I don’t even look up. One more thing—a million more things. I don’t think things could feel any worse.

“By virtue of being a Rivers, you’ll have people who try to get close to you just to use you for money or access to something they perceive you as a gatekeeper of.”

This speech, at least, is familiar. My father drilled that into me from an early age. Not because he didn’t want me to have friends but because it could never be at the expense of the family. It was first. For him and for me. He married Eliza after a very short time dating. She was a recent widow. Dare, my youngest brother, hadn’t even been one year old.

They never loved each other. He married her because she was young, from an old family, and had her own wealth to bring to the marriage. Just like my mother had been. He told me that the woman I chose had to be someone just like that. “Love grows where there’s commonality of purpose. And if it doesn’t, at least you will always have that to hold you together. But you must never yield your family duty to anything else.”

“All of this is your legacy.” Swish waves his arms around the vast room that’s been his seat of power for the last forty years. “You have to come back and make sure the Rivers name, mission, values, and ethics remain intact. Your family isn’t respected just because it’s wealthy. It’s because they use that money to do good, to create opportunity. They have been to Houston what the Medicis were to Europe during the Renaissance. And you’ve got to remember everything your father taught you. Gigi will do a good job keeping your feet on the ground.”

“What does she know about running a business?” I ask bitterly. I resent her already.

“The running of the business isn’t your role—the stewardship of the family’s foundation and money is. Your father died too young. You’re not ready, but I’m going to make sure that when your time comes, you are,” he says. There’s a calm in his voice that tears at me. How can he be calm? In less than two weeks my entire world has been ripped to shreds, and I’m being sent halfway across the world to live with a woman I don’t know.

“I don’t want to go,” I say, and I wish again that my parents were here.

I think about my brothers. They’re still so little. Stone, the closest in age to me, is only ten. But we’re close. Despite their mother’s attempts to put distance between us, we have always gravitated toward each other.

“I bet Eliza will be happy,” I mumble to the floor.

“Sadly, I agree. But even more reason why you should go.”

I listen to everything he’s saying, and with each word, a piece of my world goes dark. I promise myself that when I have the chance, I will be ready. I’ll do what I must. Go where I need to and when it’s time, I’ll come back and make my father and Swish proud.

Part I

Chapter One

Hello

Hayes

“Can you hold the door, please?” a voice calls from down the hall. This is the third time the doors have attempted to close and someone has stopped us. I’m standing by the button panel and have no intention of pressing the “Door Open” button.

“Excuse me,” a woman behind me says and then a feminine finger complete with a short, but perfectly manicured, light pink fingernail slips around my side and presses the button just as the door is about to close completely. I was reading emails when I stepped onto the lift, so I didn’t see who was standing right behind me. But, now I can feel her. Her breasts press into the back of my arm and her perfume, something with roses, wafts up my nose.

If there were a single inch of space in the elevator I would turn around to see who she is. But there’s not. As soon as her finger disappears, I press the “Door Close” button and keep my finger on it.

“That was rude,” the woman behind me says as the door shuts in the face of the woman who called out for us to wait.

“Oh, well,” I say in return. I look up at the top of the mirrored elevator ceiling. I can only see the tops of our heads. Hers is crowned by a mass of blonde waves that appear to tumble down her back. It’s pushed off her tanned, delicate shoulders. Each one is bisected by two skimpy black strips of fabric holding up what must be a very lightweight shirt.

As the elevator stops on consecutive floors and people step off, it becomes less and less crowded. But she stays pressed to my back, and her hand moves, like she’s fidgeting with something between us.

I wonder briefly if she's a pickpocket, and just as I start to turn around to ask her what the hell she's doing, she speaks.

"Please don't move. My necklace is snagged on your shirt," she says with enough alarm in her voice to halt my movements.

The elevator reaches the next floor and a couple gets off. She and I are the only ones left.

"Shit, I can't get it loose," she mutters. I start to turn again. "If you move, it'll break the chain," she says again in her voice which calls to mind smoke. And rain. And sex.

"Yes, got it," she says right as the door to my floor opens. She steps back and the rush of cool air between us isn't refreshing. It's just a very sharp contrast to the warm, soft heat that had just been there. I step off the lift and turn around. I stop in my tracks. Her eyes are wide set and almond-shaped. Their color is a medley of the same blues and greens of the sea that surrounds this villa. Not clear, but compelling and inviting. They make her face, which is a very nice face, completely extraordinary.

Her gaze is direct and questioning while our eyes are locked. Then, it travels down my chest, lingers at the waist of my low-slung shorts before they skim my bare legs and my sneakered feet.

I cough, and she looks back at my face. The muscles in my chest tighten at the naked admiration in her eyes.

"Hello," I say and extend my hand. She flushes the prettiest shade of pink and tucks her hair behind her ear.

Damn.

She's got the doe-eyed, sex kitten look down to a science. Her eyes are wide with surprise. Her lips are parted ... fuck, her lips are perfect.

She looks like a fucking snack—the perfect portion of everything I like. But it's the one thing I know about her that corrals the compulsion I have to find out if that sweet pink mouth is as soft as it looks.

“Hello,” she says slowly, a tentative smile spreading across those lips. Her voice is even sexier when paired with the vision standing in front of me.

She holds out her hand and shakes mine. When our palms touch, my pulse jumps and every one of the thousands of nerve endings that run along the surface of my skin wake up. She flushes even darker as our fingers wrap around our hands. We hold hands for a beat longer than necessary before she gasps softly and pulls her hand away.

“My necklace,” she says as if she’s explaining. She holds her open palm out to me. A delicate gold chain with a pendant in the shape of a raindrop hanging from it sits in the center of her hand.

“Is it broken?” I ask and cup her hand in mine and lift it up so I can see better. It’s not necessary, but I like touching her. She steps closer to me.

“No, but I had to unfasten it to get it unhooked from your shirt.” She pulls her hand out of my grasp and drops the chain into my still upturned palm. “Would you mind?” The heat in her voice turns that question into a not-so-subtle ‘come hither.’ The unmasked attraction in her eyes hits me like a fist to my chest, and I have to clear my throat before I can respond.

“Of course,” I say. She turns her back to me and bows her head. Those tumbling curls spill down to the middle of her back. Her black camisole skims her waist and exposes a bare slice of smooth, tanned skin.

She’s short, a whole foot shorter than my six foot three—and petite.

Well, except for that ass.

Shit.

I’m an ass man and that is one of the finest I’ve ever seen. Clearly genetics and exercise have been making magic back there because it’s fucking perfect. Her hips flare and then bam! There it is!

She cups the curtain of hair and sweeps it off her neck and lays it over one shoulder. I step forward and take in the creamy soft expanse of skin that covers her back and neck. She glances over her shoulder at me. Her lower lip is captured between her teeth and her eyes are hooded as she looks up at me through her lashes. “You okay?” she asks when I don’t move or say anything.

Get your shit together, Hayes.

“Sorry.” I shoot her an apologetic smile. “Turn around,” I say and she nods before she does. I reach over her and drape the chain across her neck. I look over her shoulder. The teardrop is resting in the middle of her chest. I drag it slowly up and into place. I watch, transfixed, as it glides over her skin like I imagine my own fingers would. When it slides into the small hollow between her collarbones, I draw the clasp together at the nape of her neck.

I fumble with the tiny closure a few times. “My hands are big.” I apologize as my fingers brush the soft skin of her neck. She exhales sharply and gooseflesh ripples over her skin. There’s no air conditioning in the hallway. I smile to myself. Maybe this weekend won’t be as mundane as I’d feared. I manage to close it and she turns around and rewards me with the prettiest fucking smile I’ve seen all year.

The loud trill of my phone fills the air like a siren, and she jumps back. I glance at the phone in my hand and grimace. “Excuse me, I have to take this,” I say and send her an apologetic smile.

Her answering smile is the epitome of graciousness. . “Of course. I’m on this floor ... maybe I’ll see you later.”

“Absolutely,” I respond before I turn toward my room and answer my phone.

“Hayes, honey, you there?” my aunt Gigi asks as I walk into my room.

“I’m here. How’s my favorite girl?” I ask.

I flip the switch on the air conditioner, pull my shirt over my head, and go stand beneath the wall unit that’s perched above the south facing window.

“You sure know how to make your Gigi feel special, Hayes. How was your flight?”

“It was good. I worked,” I tell her.

“Of course, you did. Now, before I get down to business, I want you to make me a promise,” she says.

“That’s not fair. I can’t agree to promise if I don’t know what you’re going to ask,” I cajole her. Even though I know exactly what she’s going to ask.

“Don’t be smart, Hayes,” she chides me in the way only she can.

“Pardon me,” I apologize sincerely.

“I want you to promise me you’re going to try and have a good time. Don’t scowl so much. That face of yours is so handsome when you smile, honey,” she coos.

“Okay, sure thing. I promise,” I say.

“You’re lying, but I love you for humoring me,” she says airily.

“It’s what I live for,” I return dryly.

“Don’t be smart. I’m helping the movers sort boxes and they can’t find the box with your crockery.” She sounds distressed.

“What’s crockery?” I ask and lean against the door of my room and gaze out the window at the copse of pine trees that provide a natural border for the property and perfume the air all year round.

“Your plates, glasses, bowls,” she explains.

“Oh, that’s because there are none. I never eat at home. I didn’t see the need for them,” I answer honestly.

“Oh, Lord, Hayes. People will think you were raised in a barn,” she cries.

“No one will think I was raised in a barn,” I say dryly.

“I’m going to the Crate Barrel in Highland Village to place an order. I don’t know if they deliver, so you’ll need to pick it up when you get back. I'm just going to go over the list of things I'm getting," she says.

"Thanks for doing this for me, Gigi," I say.

"Well, it's the least I can do since I won't be here when you actually move in. And I should be thanking you for going to the wedding for me, honey. I know he's a pretentious little shit, but his mother was my dearest friend in Positano. I would have hated to not have anyone there. And maybe," she drawls conspiratorially, "you'll meet the girl of your dreams," she ends hopefully.

"Have you seen Thomas?" I ask, changing the subject.

"No." She sniffs like she smells something bad. "He and I haven't been in touch at all. I just shudder to think what the foundation would look like if he had even one more year with it. I'm so glad you're moving back here," she says.

"Nice to know you'll miss me," I say dryly.

"Of course, I will, baby. But I'm glad you're getting on with your life," she says. But I can tell there's something on the tip of her tongue by the way she catches her breath at the end of that last sentence.

"What's going on?" I ask and brace myself. My aunt is the most direct human being on the planet. The only thing she's ever been hesitant to talk about is Renee. "What did she do this time?"

"She accepted your offer," she says.

"How do you know that?" I ask. I put her on speaker and open my email application.

"Well, I was at that lovely restaurant in your new neighborhood ... oh, Hayes, I love it here," she says dreamily.

"You were about to tell me how you know about Renee," I say impatiently.

"Oh, sorry, I just get so carried away talking about this place. The Wildes have done such a good job—"

"Gigi ..."

“Okay, sorry,” she says like she’s being put upon.

“Just tell me about Renee,” I say with feigned patience. She doesn’t like to be rushed. And slows down purposely sometimes when she is.

She clears her throat, and I can just see her, tucking her feet underneath her and sweeping her dark, salt-and-pepper hair off her shoulders before she speaks. “Well, like I said, I was at a restaurant. Her lawyer was sitting at the table right behind me!” she says triumphantly.

“How did you know he was her lawyer? I don’t think I’d know him on sight, and I’ve sat across the table from him at least a dozen times in the last two months,” I say.

“Hayes, you know I never forget a face. Also, I heard him say her name. It’s why my interest was piqued in the first place and then I realized who he was and what he was talking about,” she explains. “Stop interrupting and listen,” she says impatiently.

“Excuse me, go on,” I say sarcastically.

“Of course, he had no clue who I was. He was celebrating. His thirty percent is more than you should have given that disloyal little bitch all together,” my aunt says in her most severe voice.

“I’m just glad it’s done.” My voice is toneless. Renee, my ex-wife and my biggest regret, sued me two weeks ago. Gigi introduced us. We were all in Carmel for an annual party one of her friends throws every Fourth of July. I had just finished my MBA at Wharton and was working for a KPMG in Rome. I’d come out for the party because I was turning twenty-five and had somehow managed to let Gigi convince me that I needed to find a wife. This party she said would be crawling with women who would be suitable. Suitable meant she’d be from a wealthy family and a well-trained socialite who never put a foot out of place publicly.

Renee—on paper— was perfect. That she was sexy was icing on the cake.

I learned early on one of the hazards of having a lot of money. Your worst impulses have all the fuel they need to turn into your biggest regret. We were married within weeks of meeting each other. Our alcohol and sex-fueled dash down the altar had lasted a grand total of twenty-two days. Once the booze wore off, the sex got boring. Once that was gone, we realized we didn't even like each other very much.

When we divorced, everything I'd earned during our marriage was half hers. That was barely anything considering we were officially separated less than thirty days after we found each other.

Our divorce finalized on my twenty-fifth birthday. The same day my inheritance from the Rivers Trust, and what Swish had been setting aside for me for the last ten years, all vested. She'd never known the details of it. There was never any need for her to.

I gave her enough money to get settled in a new place by herself and to give her breathing room until she could find a job.

She found a new husband before she found employment, and I was off the hook for alimony.

Then, a year before my thirtieth birthday, coincidence created a set of circumstances that set us on a course for a much-less-than-amicable reunion. A job took her and her new husband to Houston. Less than six months later, he'd left her for another woman, and her divorce was being formalized.

The Houston press was in a tizzy about my impending return. Would I be able to navigate the treacherous swamp of Houston's upper-class society when I spent my formative years in Europe? Did I even still speak English? How had becoming one of the wealthiest men in the country—practically overnight—changed me?

It was that last question that got Renee's attention. Though she'd never married without a prenup again, none of her husbands were green enough to let her walk away with more than enough to satisfy that "the lifestyle to which she was accustomed" clause in their prenups. So, when she heard that I'd gone from successful accountant to the new "Rivers King," as they called me in the press, she pounced.

She sued me for a share of my inheritance. She argued that it should have been included in our community property because I concealed its existence from her and because it matured while we were still legally married.

I pushed back. She was asking for thirty percent of my estate. I wasn't willing to give her thirty cents. The day after our first court hearing, she showed up at my house with a bottle of wine and an offer for settling. I slammed the door in her face.

The next morning, she sat down on a local talk show wearing sunglasses and implied that I'd removed her—physically—from my house. The police paid me a visit and set the rumor mill spilling.

My lawyers advised me to settle. Gigi wanted me to fight back. But, I didn't want a court battle. She just wanted my money. And that is the one thing I have plenty of. It kept the foundation's and family money out of her reach.

"Don't let it get you down," Gigi says. She mistakes my silence for sadness.

"I'm not down. I'm glad she's gone," I say honestly. It's true. I hope our paths never cross again.

"Most people aren't so calculating," she says. "You had one bad experience. You can't stay single forever because of it."

"Why not?" I say it like I'm joking, but I've actually considered it.

"Don't say things like that! People will start thinking you're like that ridiculous George Clooney," she says.

"He looks like he's doing all right," I say frankly.

"Hayes McGregor Rivers," she says sharply, and I laugh at how riled up this topic always gets her.

"I know I got Renee wrong. But, in my defense, I didn't think you'd marry her a week after you met. If you let me leave this earth without grandnieces and nephews, I'll haunt you forever," she says.

“Well, that doesn’t sound so bad. I like having you around,” I retort. She lets out a pained, long-suffering sigh.

“You’re thirty. You need to start thinking about it again. Especially if you’re going to make a successful transition back into Houston’s society.”

I can’t suppress my groan. We’ve been having this argument for the last year.

“Gigi, let me do one thing at a time. The foundation needs my attention right now. The wife hunt can wait.”

“Well, there are lots of eligible girls from very nice families in Houston,” she says.

“Gigi—”

“Oooh, if I’m here more often, I could be your matchmaker,” she says hopefully. I start to quip that she’s done enough by introducing and encouraging my liaison with Renee. But, it goes beyond whatever her hopes are. I have watched one marriage of convenience after another fail and fall apart. It’s the last thing I want. So, I level with her.

“I’m not interested in being with anyone who would use a matchmaker. Especially not if it’s any one of the women you’re talking about. They wouldn’t care if I was eighty, sterile, and impotent. They want my money and they want to secure themselves a lifetime of monthly checks in the form of child support when they birth little Rivers heirs, and they would sleep with our gardener to make sure they got it even if I couldn’t give it to them,” I say.

She’s completely quiet.

“Gigi?” I call her name.

“You need to think about who you’ll move on with,” she says finally. Her voice is completely normal. I put her silence down to a bad connection.

I’ve already moved on. To a place where choosing a wife will never be an impulsive, uninformed act again. I’ll never put Kingdom at risk like that again. “I will. If you will drop this conversation,” I say.

“Deal. I had lunch with Henny yesterday,” she says perkily, and I relax a little. Rivers Wilde gossip, I can deal with.

“How was that?” I ask.

“She looks wonderful. Retirement agrees with her. We ate lunch in her pool and drank an entire bottle of wine. Her friend Sally made lunch. It was grand,” she giggles to herself. “I was sick to my stomach when I got home, but it just made me think about how much I miss living here,” she says dreamily.

“Perfect, I’ll buy you a house and you can move with me,” I say.

“I-I couldn’t leave Positano, but I’m thinking with you gone, it won’t feel like home. I spent the first twenty-five years of my life in Houston. Being back here, especially in Rivers Wilde ... I’m tempted to start spending part of the year here. It’s charming,” she says happily.

“Charming isn’t how I would describe it, but I think you being there would make it feel less like hostile territory,” I say.

“I wish your brothers would come home. You need them. Though, with that dreadful mother of theirs, I can understand why they scattered the way they have,” she says ruefully.

“They will,” I say with more confidence than I feel. I certainly hope they will. So far, their responses to my request have been less than promising. But, Gigi’s right, I need them. They’re all the real family I have left.

Houston doesn’t feel like home anymore, and I have to find a way to make it so. Having them around might make that easier.

“Oh, dear.” My aunt sounds dismayed. “I shouldn’t have mentioned Renee. She always spoils the mood.”

“She’s good for that,” I say.

“Just goes to show how money can’t buy you anything that matters.”

“Right,” I say shortly. Talking about Renee and money are two things I’d always rather not do. But when I think about all the money I spent to book this particular suite in the hopes of finding quiet, and how that, too, has managed to elude me, it makes me downright antsy.

“All right, baby, you go on. Just promise you’ll try to have a nice time,” she says.

“I promise,” I say and hang up.

I walk back to the door and open it.

The corridor is empty, but that delicious perfume she was wearing lingers.

Oh, I plan to have a very nice time.

Chapter Two

Gold Digger

Hayes

“This is paradise.” A female American voice drifts into my ear as if carried by the light sea breeze and interrupts my afternoon nap. Reluctantly, I open my eyes slowly and sit up. I squint against the afternoon sun’s glare and sweep my eyes over the huge veranda. I’m as alone as I’d been when I first came out here to lie down.

I listen and don’t hear anyone talking. I walk over to the ornately-carved stone wall and rest my forearms on the smooth, sun-warmed cement rail and stare out at the view.

The sweeping green and blues of the sea, sky and verdant, lush landscape seem endless. The light breeze isn’t stiff enough to do more than ruffle the very fine hairs on my arms. But it carries with it the smell of lemon and pine. The salt of the sea spray gives the air a bite that’s softened by the sound of the sea’s lazy current.

The sea stretches and disappears into the curve of the horizon. I gaze at it and understand why people thought the world was flat. From here, I can imagine falling off the illusion created by the glancing kiss it shares with the sky.

The mossy cliff that runs along this stretch of beach surrounds the villa making it feel secluded even though there are neighboring villas on either side. My room is one of only two massive suites on the fourth floor. I thought it would be quiet. I hoped that if I had neighbors, they would be people who wanted to be as far away from the festivities’ noises as possible.

A cacophony of excited women’s voices tears a hole in that hope. Laughter and unintelligible shouts of delight spill through it and splatter all over my mood. It was good while it lasted, I tell myself. I pull out my phone and scan my emails.

I scroll through email after email of bad news. Kingdom is being hit with lawsuits left and right. From breach of contract to improper dismissals. In the last fifteen years, my uncle's failure to manage Kingdom and all of its holdings properly is matched only by his lack of transparency. He's stacked the board with his minions instead of competent people. We are in violation of hundreds of regulatory guidelines in nearly every facet of our business, and everyone is looking to me for answers I don't have.

It's been two weeks since I became chairman of the board. The first email I received in my official capacity was from my newly-appointed executive assistant. In it, she asked me to send her a guest list for my swearing-in ceremony and banquet. My reply informed her that, until we had something real to celebrate, the banquet was postponed.

This wedding couldn't have happened at a worse time. When Gigi asked me to attend on her behalf, I said no.

She pinched my ear, told me not to talk back, and booked my flight.

So, here I am.

"Let's go out here. I want to see the ocean," the same voice that woke me says. Even though I can hear the women, I can't see them, and they have no idea I'm here.

"Yeah, I can't believe we're here. This is beautiful," another voice gushes.

"You know, I live forty-five minutes from the beach, and I don't think I've seen the ocean all year," another voice raves. Like the other voice, hers is bubbling with excitement.

"It's the sea, Cass. The Ligurian Sea. Not the ocean, and I've got a headache. I'm going to lie down. Have fun with the girls, okay?" This voice makes my ears perk up. It's my elevator girl. But she sounds decidedly unhappy.

Who wouldn't be happy to be here?

You. That's who. I remind myself.

“Oh, come on, TB, it feels so good out here,” the enthusiastic voice calls out to her.

“No, you guys have fun. I’m just tired after that trip,” she says, her words muffled by a very fake yawn.

A chorus of pleasant goodbyes rings out behind her, and the door closes with a sharp rattle of wood and glass.

Then the claws come out.

“God, Cass. Why did you bring her?” one voice drones as if she’s in pain.

“Actually, I brought you. She’s my plus one. And she’s having a hard time, so you guys better not be dicks,” Cass responds.

“Well, from what I heard, it’s her own fault,” another voice chimes in.

“And why is she dressed like that? I mean, if I had thighs like that, I’d never wear shorts.”

“I think her thighs look great,” Cass says defensively.

“I mean, she’s pretty, but ... like ... how can she even afford this trip? This room? I heard no one will hire her,” a chorus girl says.

“That’s none of your business, you guys.” Cass’s voice is rising in anger.

“Well, if her gold-digging ways are going to reflect on us—”

“You’re only here because Liv was nice enough to let you use her room block despite the fact that you’re not wedding guests. And if this is how you feel about her, then just keep your distance this weekend.”

I like this Cass. There’s a beat of silence before one of the voices responds in a whiny bray.

“She’s the one who—”

“I’m baaaack!” The door flies open as the voice belonging to “TB” rejoins the group. Their conversation comes to a complete and utter stop.

“Oh, hey. Couldn’t sleep?” Cass says in a much thinner, more hesitant voice than the one she’s been using since they came outside.

“No. I was just so excited thinking about all the rich guys who’ll be here this weekend,” she says in a sing-song voice.

I freeze. Suddenly, I wish I’d gone inside. This is the very last thing I need or want to hear.

“I mean, it’s an Italian villa. It’s bound to be crawling with them,” Cass says and her discomfort is loud and clear even from where I’m sitting.

“Exactly, ladies,” TB crows. “If you want me to teach you, all you have to do is ask. It’s not that hard. Men with money are the best boyfriends. They’re usually so busy making it they don’t have time for you. You might only have to fuck him once a month,” she says. A chorus of uncomfortable giggles ripples through the crackling air around me.

I know firsthand about women like her.

I’ve just finished freeing myself from the clutches of one.

My amusement, interest, and good mood fizzle all at once. I start to head back inside. At least I’ll know who to avoid tonight.

I’m almost to my door when my phone starts to ring.

The loud trill fills the air like a siren, and the conversation from the next balcony comes to an abrupt stop.

“Oh my God, is someone there?” I hear one of the chorus girls say right as I shut the door behind me and answer the phone.

Chapter Three

Dolce Vita

Confidence

“Who is that?” I lean over to Cass and whisper without taking my eyes off the tall, well-built, beautiful man who just strode into the tent like he’s about to tell us all he’s our new ruler and ask us to pledge our loyalty or die. He’s even more beautiful in that suit than he was in that hallway this afternoon. I can still feel the soft brush of his fingers on my neck. The way my breath caught in my throat when he’d dragged the pendant up my chest until it nestled into the small hollow at the base of my throat.

His dark, wavy hair is just long enough to curl right at the edge of his crisp white tuxedo shirt. It’s unruly and perfectly artless in a way that no human hand, and no amount of pomade, could create. Those silky dark-chocolate waves are the work of God himself. His profile is strong and bold; his nose prominent and straight. His lips are set in a straight line but I can see their fullness even in his profile. And God, his jaw. It’s chiseled and wide and covered in a beard low enough to be a five o’clock shadow, meticulously groomed so you can tell it’s not. His broad, tall frame is poured into a black tuxedo that fits him perfectly. He looks like he’s the sovereign of something—a country, a business, a thousand women in a harem somewhere ...

Heads turn as he crosses the room. And I can’t blame them—not even a little bit. He oozes sex and power. His long strides eat up the floor, and he reaches the lone empty table at the back of the tent quickly. When he’s adorned the chair with his glorious body, he turns to face the front of the room where the bridal party is sitting and giving their speeches.

“Who’s who?” she asks and pokes her head around the room. I tug her arm and nod at him.

“Him. Also known as the man of all of my dirty dreams,” I purr excitedly, my eyes trained on the finest specimen of man I’ve ever seen this close up.

“Ohhh,” she drawls, eyes widening with interest and props her chin on her hand and ogles him.

“That’s Hayes Rivers,” the woman on my right says. Cass and I both turn to face her, surprised by her interjection.

“Heir to Kingdom,” she says when neither of us respond.

“I knew it. He looks like a king. Which kingdom?” I ask. I’m already imagining myself in a ball gown, crown on my head walking down some long, red-carpeted aisle where he’s waiting at the end.

“No, not a kingdom.” And just like that, she kills my dream. “Kingdom is the name of his family’s business. He inherited all the money when he turned twenty-five. And now he’s the new Rivers king,” she says.

“How old is he now?” I ask, my curiosity overtaking my normal abhorrence for gossip.

“He must be thirty ... he’s one of the richest men in the freaking world,” she exclaims.

“Really? Why’s he here?”

“His grandmother is friends with the groom,” our little canary says.

“I can’t believe you’ve never heard of him. His return to Houston is all anyone’s talking about,” she says and looks at both of us like we’re crazy.

“I don’t live in Houston,” I say.

“Well, I heard ...” Her eyes dart around as if checking for spies and then she leans into us. “Apparently, he had a fight with his ex. And it got physical,” she grimaces. But her eyes are twinkling. “I’m not one to gossip ...” she says and Cass and I exchange a yeah, right look.

“But, she was all over the place wearing sunglasses. No one saw her, mind you, and she never said, but it was obvious he roughed her up,” she says.

My lawyer hat comes on and my eyes slide away from the delicious man to her. I make sure there’s no warmth in them and her silly, careless smile falters.

“That’s actually the exact opposite of obvious,” I say dismissively.

“Only if you’re blind. I mean, yeah, he’s nice to look at, but he looks so angry, don’t you think?”

I glance at him, and just then, like he knows what she said, his jaw clenches.

“Well, if people were talking about me like this, I might be angry, too,” I say and Cass pinches me.

“Well, if you think you know better, you can ignore me. But don’t say you weren’t warned,” she says and turns back to the victim on her other side.

As if I need any warning. I can smell a violent man the minute he enters the room. I grew up with them under the same roof. I watched them do more damage than any of the natural disasters that were a way of life for us in the Mississippi Delta.

I lean toward Cass.

“He’s staying on our floor,” I whisper. I can’t take my eyes off him. My whole body is tingling just from looking at him.

“Thank you, God,” I say, pressing my hands together in gratitude.

Cass laughs. “I mean, he does clean up nicely, but he looks like he’d be more comfortable in a boxing ring than on a dance floor,” she says.

“Yes, exactly,” I practically purr before I take another sip of my gin and tonic. My thighs clench when I think about how rough things could get.

“His nose doesn’t look like it’s been broken, though,” she muses.

“No one’s perfect,” I joke and take a final swig of my drink.

“Enjoy. My fantasy Italian fling is more in the style of Jude Law in the Talented Mr. Ripley. He looks like he could eat Jude Law in a single bite.”

“Or me,” I drawl with a wink and stand up. I run my hands down my dress.

Cass grabs my arm and yanks me back down in my seat. “Where in the world are you going? You are not going to approach him,” she says as if scandalized.

I glance over at her and grin, because I am so going to approach him.

“You never approach anyone. You’re still getting over Nigel. Who are you?” she asks, green eyes wide with surprise.

“I’m Confidence Ryan, and I’m about to go climb my very own Mt. Olympus,” I say with a suggestive waggle of my eyebrows.

“Are you drunk?” she asks when I start to stand up again.

“Yes, but so what?” I say.

“You’ll regret it in the morning,” she frets.

“Maybe ...” I shrug.

“This isn’t you.” She peers up at me.

“Again, so what?” I shrug off her questions. “I’m in Italy. I’m single. And I think that if I’m ready to walk over and put my ass on a table for another man to make a meal of me, then I might be over Nigel,” I say.

“True facts,” she says with an enthusiastic nod.

“And if I have regrets ... then, at least it will be for something worth regretting. I want to know what that kind of regret feels like,” I say in a moment of rare vulnerability.

“Okay,” she says, relenting in her attempts to stop me. Even if she doesn’t quite sound convinced.

“Just be safe. Get your own drinks and drop your glass so it shatters if you need a rescue,” she says and takes a sip of her drink.

“I won’t be breaking any glasses. If I need a rescue, I’ll do it myself.” A sudden bolt of doubt flashes through my mind.

This is very unlike me.

I self-consciously glance down at myself.

“Do I look okay?” I cast a sheepish glance at Cass. My bravado has failed me now that I’m about to walk the walk.

“You look better than okay. You look wonderful,” she says with all of the sincerity of a dutiful and loving friend who would never say anything other than how wonderful I look.

I lose my nerve and lower myself back into my seat. I grab my wine and take a moody, resentful sip.

Cass puts her drink down and grabs my forearm.

“What happened?” Her dark brows are furrowed in concern. “I thought you were off to get laid.”

I sink down in my seat and pout.

“Why in the world would he be interested in me? She said he’s filthy rich or something. He’s young and hot, too. Do you know how rare that is? I bet he’s engaged to marry one of those princesses—Eugenie or whatever.” I fling my hand in his direction, but my eyes are fixed on the drink I’m lifting back to my lips.

“If he is, then I feel sorry for her because he’s going to be leaving here with the hottest woman in the room,” she says with a little too much enthusiasm. And I roll my eyes.

“Confidence, you’re a catch,” she exclaims.

I give her a disbelieving look. “Oh yeah, I know thousands of eligible, sexy men who are beating a path to be with a broke, failed lawyer whose family is a poster for dysfunction,” I say grumpily.

“That’s not all you are,” she whispers fiercely, squeezing my arm. I chuckle—it’s humorless, short and dry.

“Well, I’m glad you agree that it’s some of what I am,” I quip and take another swig of my wine.

“For God’s sake, one lost job doesn’t mean you failed,” she cajoles.

I throw her a glance. “I was almost disbarred.”

“That was all that fucking Nigel’s fault,” she reminds me.

“True. But it’s certainly not his fault that I’ve spent sixty percent of my life savings in the last three months. A good chunk of it on this last minute, incredibly glamorous vacation. Who doesn’t find a financially irresponsible spendthrift irresistible?”

“You think anyone worthy of you will care about any of that?” Cass asks me softly.

“One of us will have to care. Even a lifetime of sex with that beautiful man won’t make up for my flagrant disregard for budgets.”

She chuckles. “Now you’re just being dramatic. At least you have your life savings. If I lost my job, I would have to move back home with my parents after one month,” she says and nudges me with her shoulder.

I sigh and look back at my man ... God, I’m ridiculous. He’s not my anything.

“I’ve never broken a rule my whole life, Cass,” I say to her. “I didn’t even shave above the knee until I was twenty-one. I did whatever I thought I had to, to get out of Arkansas. I had a good run, and in one fell swoop, I’ve managed to ruin my life.” I drain my glass and drop it on the table. “So, If I’m hanging out in rock bottom city, then I’m at least doing it in style.” I wave an arm around the opulently decorated room to make my point.

“Well, you can thank Jules for being smart enough to land an Italian count with enough money to pull off a party like this.”

“To Jules,” I say.

“To Jules,” she repeats as we clink our empty glasses.

“You know what?” I ask and stare at the bubbles clinging to the lip of my glass. They remind me of myself. I’m holding on. Long after life should have swallowed me whole.

“What?” Cass asks when I don’t continue.

“I’ve found that rock bottom might be the best thing to ever happen to me. I’ve spent the last three months shopping, traveling, eating, and sleeping to my heart’s content. Sure, after this, I have to move home. But, have you seen how round my ass has gotten?” I lift and point to my silver sequined covered backside and wink. “It’s amazing, right?” I grin at her.

“And you have not hit rock bottom, TB,” she says reproachfully.

“No, I have. Really,” I assure her with a falsely proud smile. “But, I have a plan. And being back home will light a fire under me. Not to mention taking this trip has brought me perilously close to poverty. It’s time to give up my apartment, go home, and regroup.”

She pats my arm consolingly. “Well, if all of that fails, you could turn your new hobby into a business,” she says.

“Yes!” I clap my hands and hoot with laughter. “Like I could be some sort of plus one for hire.”

“You’ve had enough practice in the last few months,” she ribs me.

“I know,” I crow with delight. “Weddings are such a score. I mean, I have classy-as-fuck friends, so the venues are always marvelous, and I get it at the block rate.” I laugh out loud and stop when I see Cass isn’t laughing with me.

“What?” I ask and blush.

“I’m glad you’re letting that crazy dark hair go. Your hair is the prettiest natural blonde I’ve ever seen. I’ve missed the fits of jealousy I used to have every time you wore it down.”

“I do look good, don’t I? A life of leisure is apparently the real fountain of youth.” I wink. “But tell me why you’re looking at me like my mom did the first time I managed to bait a hook myself,” I tease, but I’m blushing at the unfiltered pride in her eyes.

“It’s just that I’m glad that you’re doing what makes you happy. It is slightly reckless to blow through your savings this way. But, I also know that you’re a brilliant, passionate attorney, and the minute you’re ready, you’ll have a score of job offers. I’m thrilled you’re being a sexy, lazy, beach bum for once in your life. You’ve earned it, ” Cass says with the most sincerely delighted smile on her face. I smile back at her with equal delight.

This is why she’s my best friend. She loves me as much as I love her. And when I’m happy, she is too. My heart swells with gratitude that I have her in my life.

I look back at my dream man. He’s sitting with his arms crossed watching the dancing people like he’d rather be anywhere else. His heavy, square chin has a cleft.

I want to stick my tongue in it. I regain my resolve.

“I’m about to add slutty to that sexy and lazy,” I say and give her a bawdy wink. Then, I stand up again before I lose my nerve. I’m about to turn and walk his way when I remember something and lean down to talk to Cass.

“The guy behind the bar—his name tag said Luca—he’s a dead ringer for Jude Law, and I saw him checking out your ass when we walked through earlier,” I say.

She leaps out of her seat. “I can’t believe you saw him and didn’t tell me.” She scowls and starts to gather her phone and the lipstick and gum that spilled out of her tiny gold clutch.

“How was I to know what you were in the mood for? And if I told you every time a guy checked you out, we’d be here all night.”

“You sweet talker.” She swats my arm and presses a quick kiss to my cheek. “Be safe, have fun. And remind me to stick an extra-long pin in my Nigel voodoo doll when we get home.”

“I love you,” I say through a giggle.

She really has a Nigel voodoo doll at home. It's a pathetic little stick figure made of popsicle sticks. All of its limbs are broken.

"How could you not?" She wiggles her fingers goodbye and disappears into the crowd. I run my fingers through my heavy hair. Thank you for low humidity and great hair products. There's not a hint of frizz in sight, and there hasn't been since I got here. I take all of this as an omen. Beautiful setting, great company, best hair day of my life—the stars have aligned. Of course, the man of my sexual dreams would be here, too.

With that thought, I take a deep breath and turn to face my future conquest.

I hope that tonight, though, I'll be the one who's conquered. I'm five foot three. Tall, well-built men are my weakness.

The strapping, dark-haired, Duke of Midnight across the room looks like he might be up for the job. I say a quick prayer that I didn't misread things in the elevator this morning and that I'm not about to make a fool of myself and start toward him. As I weave my way across the moderately populated dance floor, I lose sight of him once or twice. But when I step off the other side off the dance floor, my view of him is completely unobstructed. When his eyes swing in my direction, they land on me right away. His eyes sweep up my body, his head's angle marking their current position. My feet, my legs, my hips, stomach, my breasts, and on my face.

I feel a shot of confidence that propels me forward. I've never done anything like this before. But when I saw him this afternoon, I thought, mine.

Despite my little blip of doubt, I'm excited about the possibility of having a night with him. That's all I really want.

Since we've been in Castiglioncello, I've felt different—freer, happier. It's the most beautiful place my admittedly limited travels have ever taken me. The sea's perpetual whispers and roars lend an air of magic to the cove of neighboring villas we're staying at this weekend. As soon as we stepped off the dreary shuttle that brought us the forty miles from the airport in Pisa, I knew this would be a trip I'd never forget. Until now,

I thought it would be because of the spectacular views, the clean, fragrant air, and being with Cass. Yet, as I approach Mr. Tall Dark and Glorious, I know that this is going to be the experience that defines this trip. Lord knows, I was in desperate need of something glorious and unforgettable right now.

When I'm two tables away, his eyes come into focus. Like my mama would say, Lawd ha'mercy. While I'd been gawking at his body, the shadows in the hallway had been hiding the real treasure. They're a heart stopping disc of pure hazel ringed in what could be a mossy green or nutty brown ... the light doesn't allow me to see clearly. They're fringed by a thick tangle of lashes and burning with intelligence and ... wariness.

He stands up just before I reach him.

His tall, broad frame is a little leaner up close. "Hello," he says and takes my hand. He presses a kiss to it and offers me a seat by pulling the one next to him out.

Holy Father. If this is how they make men in Europe, then I was born in the wrong place. Because this man is straight out of one of those fairy tales that I never believed in because I never saw a girl like me in one of them.

"Thank you," I say demurely, the flutter in my stomach turning to a vibration as I plant myself in the offered chair.

"You're welcome," he says noncommittally and then just watches me. That trace of wariness grows as he observes me.

"Why aren't you dancing?" I ask.

"I don't dance," he says shortly.

"Oh. Okay," I say with a grimace of shame when he doesn't speak. I feel a surge of mortification when I realize that I have, in fact, been too presumptuous.

"I don't know what I was thinking," I say. I wish I could snap my fingers and make myself disappear. "I thought ... maybe when we saw each other earlier on the elevator ... that you seemed interested. I'm sorry. I'll just ..." I start to stand up and pray I can run in these stupid shoes that I spent too much money on. I want to cry. I scrape my chair back and he grabs my wrist.

“No, don’t go. I’m glad you came.” His voice is deep and smooth like the molasses in my grandmother’s gingerbread cookies. And he’s American, too.

Thank you, God, I mouth down to my lap before I look up and smile.

“My mouth is good for a lot of things ... small talk just isn’t one of them,” he says, gaze smoldering and yet so relaxed. I’m so startled by the innuendo that a bubble of laughter escapes me. I cover my mouth with my hand. He reaches over to stroke the back of my hand and then circles my wrist. He tugs my hand away from my mouth. “Your smile is beautiful.”

“Oh, my ...” I sigh and my stomach does a summersault. I can’t believe this is happening. He’s actually into me.

He gives me a small, quick smile that I feel a surge of pride at having pulled it out of him.

“So, you’re in business?”

“That’s cute,” he says quietly and takes a sip of his drink.

“Huh?”

“No, I’m just an ordinary man.” His glass hovers in front of his lips and he watches me out of hooded eyes.

“There’s nothing ordinary about you,” I say and stick my hand out, “I should introduce myself. I’m Confidence Ryan, and I don’t really know the bride or the groom, but I’m my friend Cass’s plus one,” I say.

“Your name is Confidence?” he asks, perplexed.

“I know, it’s kind of weird at first. But I promise once you get used to it, you’ll see it’s actually a really great name,” I assure him.

“No, not weird at all. Hayes Rivers,” he says without any other detail. Not that I need any more for what I’m hoping is going to happen. But, his smile doesn’t quite meet his eyes.

“I love that name. Is it a family name?” I ask.

His smile dims slightly. “No,” he says shortly.

“Well, my parents named my siblings and me after things they hoped we’d grow up to possess. I definitely lucked out. My siblings are named Happiness and Fortune,” I tell him and then wish a hole would open up and put me out of my misery.

Why am I not better at flirting?

It’s his turn to laugh, and he says, “Now, that is a great line.” He shakes his head. “Can you imagine if people actually gave their children names like that?” he asks and I cringe. Hard.

He stops laughing. “Oh ...”

“Yeah,” I say slowly.

“I’m sorry,” he says quietly, real contrition in his eyes

“No, it’s okay. I’m used to it and they grow on you,” I say and change the subject. “So, you friends of the groom?”

“No, my aunt is. She couldn’t go, so I came in her stead.”

“Well, you’re a lot nicer than an RSVP and a gift card that most people send when they can’t come to a wedding. It’s nice of you to come. Even though, I bet it wasn’t that hard of a sell. It’s beautiful here,” I say.

“I’m not nice. My aunt raised me. So, when she asks something of me, I do it.” He shrugs and takes a sip of water, and I glance back at our table for a second to see if Cass is back. She’s not.

“May I?” he asks, and I turn back to face him. He’s watching me expectantly.

“May you what?” He nods to the table. His hand is hovering right above my wrist.

“Oh, you want to ...” I ask in surprise, but smile and nod. “Feel free to put those big hands wherever you’d like,” I say and groan internally at how thirsty I sound.

He smirks a little before his thumb swipes once on the tender skin on the inside of my wrist. I shiver and bite back a moan at the tremor that runs down the center of my body. I’m shouting YES in my head.

He lifts my hand to his face. His breath tickles me before he draws in a deep breath, his eyes closed as he rubs his nose back and forth across my wrist. My insides liquify.

“You smell like roses,” he whispers so softly, his breath floats over the inside of my forearm and a tingle dances all the way up my arm.

If I'm dreaming, please don't ever wake me.

I lean into him and put on my sauciest smile. “It’s this body lotion I bought in duty free—”

“It smells cheap.” His voice is no longer soft and seductive. Heat rises up my neck and spreads on my cheeks as his words sink in.

I yank my hand out of his grasp and lean away, “Excuse me?” I ask in affront.

“Didn’t anyone tell you before you came over that I only entertain heiresses and above?”

“Entertain?” I put the words in air quotes while I gawk at the man who just turned from a prince to a toad in less than three minutes.

“I’m not interested in being your next payday,” he announces.

My jaw drops.

“Don’t feel bad,” he says without looking at me. “Go try it on one of the drunker, more persuadable men here. I’m sure you’ll leave with enough money to at least cover your expenses,” he says and my head snaps back so hard, I’m surprised it’s still attached to my body.

His gaze flits over me. “No question. You’re a knockout. But, if you’re looking for something more than a weekend, I’d suggest you invest in your look. Off-the-rack dresses aren’t going to cut it with this crowd. Dress for the job you want, and all that,” he says and falls back in his chair.

Each insult and insinuation is barbed with contempt. They flay old wounds wide open.

“You jerk,” I spit and lean forward so I can look him in the eye when I tell him to fuck off.

They’re cold, dark, and shuttered. He looks like a completely different person than the one I met on the elevator. I wonder who put that look in his eye. I know it’s not me. The disillusionment I see is deep-seated. Despite the warm May sea breeze passing through the tent, goosebumps replace my tingles.

“Do better research on your next target. Approaching me at an event like this was a dead giveaway about your motives. You should have bumped into me at the airport or something less obvious.” His voice is devoid of any emotion, his gaze moves to the dance floor. His gaze is observant but detached. “Hmm ... it’s a shame, I think we would’ve had a great time together,” he says while he looks at me like I’m a car he’s thinking about buying.

I wonder for a minute if I’m being punked. I glance around the room. The music, the tinkle of silverware scraping plates, people shouting to be heard over the noise are still there. No camera crew is rolling in to surprise me.

Nothing changed. No one’s watching us. I look back at him.

“Are you serious?” I ask him. I look closely at him for a sign that maybe he’s kidding.

Nope, that disdain is real. He frowns and adjusts the cuffs of his jacket before he leans forward. “Let me spell it out.” His eyes skim over me again. “Based on your lack of ... polish,” his eyes roam my body, from head to toe and a flush burns over my skin in their wake. “I’m assuming you’re new to this scene. All the regulars know better than to try a trick like this. This place is littered with rich men. I’m sure you’ll find one. You can thank me by calling out my name when you pretend he made you come,” he says without a hint of humor and adjusts his cufflinks.

I clasp my purse to my chest in shock.

He looks back at me with complete disinterest.

“You’re the one who claimed to be the expert at landing rich men. I’m just trying to make sure you don’t look like a fool in front of your friends.” He leans his head in close like he’s sharing a secret. “Just a heads-up, they don’t seem to really like you very much,” he says.

My heart plummets to my toes.

“Were you listening to us?” I gasp in horror. We thought we heard a phone ring, but one of Cass’s debutante friends said it came from the terrace.

“It was hard not to when you were speaking at the top of your lungs,” he says.

I stare unseeingly at the room full of revelers who have no clue that this man is taking a pickaxe to my pride. I shake my head. He’s taken my words, spoken in a moment of pure self-preservation, out of context. But I’ll be damned if I’m going to explain myself to him.

“Don’t look so down in the mouth. You’ve been spared a night of pretending that you’re turned on by anything more than the diamonds in my watch.”

And just like that, he turns away and faces the front of the room again.

I don’t know whether to be angry, offended, sad, or ashamed. I settle on all of the above and they move through me like lava pushes its way past the earth’s crust. I stand up, step right in front of his face, and let them spill.

“Oh, no you don’t,” I snarl.

He has the nerve to look surprised that I’m still there.

“What?” I widen my eyes in an exaggeration of his own expression. “Did you think I was just going to slink away in shame?” I glare down at him. “I’m not the one who should feel ashamed. You are a pig.” I spit the word at him. He looks back at the dance floor.

“You don’t get to accuse me of being some sort of gold digger and then turn back to your entertainment like it’s not a completely unwarranted insult,” I say and nudge his shoulder with one of my fingers when he doesn't look up. He glances up at me and sighs as if I'm tedious.

"Actually, I do get to do that. I just did. And, seriously," his eyes flit over me from head to toe again. "Think about investing in your look. At least if you want to be someone to take out in public," he says and turns his stony expression back to the dance floor. Those words spoken so casually, hit their target with the precision of fast flying bullets.

I imagine what it would feel like to slap that smug look off his face. But imagining is as close to satisfaction as I'll ever get. I have enough problems without adding an arrest in Italy to it.

"And you should invest in fixing your terrible personality," I snap, completely enraged by him.

"Sure. I'll take your advice if you'll take mine," he says.

I bend down so I can put my face in his. I see a flare of heat in his eyes, but I can't tell if it's ire or desire. Because even as I face off with him and burn with real dislike, I can feel a tug between us. His mouth is inches from mine and I can't keep my eyes off it. Before he shuts his expression again, he looks at my mouth the same way.

That bored, blank expression is back, and I pull back from him. "I don't know what kind of upbringing you had that you feel like you can talk to someone the way you just talked to me. Your money doesn't make you better than me or anyone," I say.

"Hmm," he says and stands up and takes a step toward me. The heated expression in his eyes makes me take a reflexive step backward.

"Hmm, what?" I ask

His hand darts out and he grips my hip before I can take a second step.

He trails a finger down my arm and wraps his fingers around my wrist. He presses the pads of his fingers to my pulse point.

"It's a shame ... you're fucking beautiful," he whispers, and I can hear real regret in his voice. It offends me at the same time as it thrills me.

Damn him for being an asshole while looking the way he does.

“Let go of me,” I say, but I make no effort to free myself.

“I don’t want to,” he says quietly. “You don’t want me to, either.” His thumb strokes my pulse point and I shudder. I tug my arm free. No way will I give him the satisfaction of knowing that his touch is the most exciting thing I’ve felt in a long time.

“Tesoro dolce,” he murmurs.

“I don’t know what that means, but you better cut it out,” I warn him.

Because when he does, I want to stop and listen, even though I have no idea what he’s saying.

“Why? Don’t you like it?” he asks silkily.

“No, that’s probably the word for streetwalker or cum dumpster or something,” I grumble.

His hand skims my hip and the rest of my body quivers, throbs, tingles, and yearns for the same treatment.

“I can teach you. While I fuck you. I think you’d still let me,” he says and that wakes me up. I pull out of his grasp.

I cross my arms over my chest and glower down at him. “Right, you called me cheap, and now, you’re calling me easy?” I say in my best offended Southern woman voice.

“I wasn’t calling you easy, but if you are ...” He raises his eyebrows suggestively. “I’ll overlook the cheap and even take you back to my room,” he drawls with an amused smirk on his face.

I have never itched to slap someone more than I do right now.

“Fuck you!” I spit.

“See? We want the same thing,” he quips with a grin that’s cold as ice.

“You must be in a world of pain to act like that. You’re a total asshole and you should be ashamed that you take joy in trying to make people feel small. You failed, by the way. Goodnight.” I spin on my stupid heels and walk with as much ass shaking as I can back to my table.

“Ugh, who cares?” I mumble as I arrive back at my table full of strangers and no Cass.

“No luck?” my doggedly gossipy neighbor asks when I sit down. “Don’t worry, he looks like he would break you in half,” she says with a conspiratorial wink.

That’s exactly what I’d been hoping.

I drop down in my seat and grab one of the sesame rolls from the breadbasket and slather it with the fancy butter that’s served with every meal here. I’m about to take another huge bite when I remember the little joint I dropped in my purse, and I decide that I’ll just do another one of the things on the Confidence Gone Wild list.

I grab my purse and head toward the back of the tent. When I get to his table near the rear exit, I give him as wide a berth as I can when I walk past him and push the flap of the tent open.

“Where are you going?” His hand is around my wrist and it brings me to a jerking halt that nearly sends me tumbling into his lap. I brace myself with a hand on his shoulder.

“None of your business, you rude man. And if you’re thinking about apologizing, you can save it. I’ll never forgive you.” I yank hard.

He doesn’t let go.

“Thanks for the tip. I’ll make sure to break my neck,” I say with as much asperity as I can muster, and he has the grace to wince.

“What? I thought you’d like the thought of that,” I grit out and pull my arm again—in vain. “Let go. You can’t manhandle me like this,” I say when his grip only gets tighter.

“I’m not manhandling you,” he says, but his grip on my arm loosens, “and I’m not letting you go until you turn around and head back into the party. Think of all the potential benefactors you’ll miss out on if you plunge to your death,” he says sarcastically.

“Are you actually making fun of me?” My anger is reaching a boiling point. I need to get out of here. I narrow my eyes at him. “If you don’t let me go, I’m going to scream,” I threaten.

He lets go immediately, and I see a flash of worry in his eyes. I recall my gossipy table-mate’s comments about him and his wife and immediately feel guilty.

“I wasn’t really going to scream. I just wanted you to let go,” I say quickly. Then I Square my shoulders and look down my nose at him. “Enjoy being miserable. Sorry I ever met you. Goodbye,” I say and turn to leave.

“If you insist on going, I’ll go with you,” he says and starts to stand up.

“No, you will not,” I say and rush out of the tent before he’s fully on his feet.

I slip my nude sling backs off my feet and fumble until I have a good grip on the railing of the staircase. It’s dark and the moon is the only source of light, but the path is completely canopied in trees so in the places where the leaves are dense, it’s pitch black. The sound of the sea is very close; the breeze whips up the skirt of my salmon-colored dress. I love this dress. I can’t believe he insulted the way I’m dressed.

“For God’s sake, wait. This is actually completely crazy,” he calls after me.

“Then why don’t you go back to where you were actually being a jerk?” I call back over my shoulder.

I pull my phone out of my purse and fumble to find the flashlight button. The light is comforting, and I take one more step before I look back.

“Confidence, come back before you get yourself killed,” he shouts, and he actually sounds concerned.

He's good.

"Just one less evil gold digger in the world, right? Leave me alone." I grip the rail and take another step. My heart and foot plunge simultaneously. There's nothing but air under my foot.

"Woaah!" I find my balance quickly. I glance down to see the gently lapping waves of a small inlet. I sigh in relief and sag against the rail.

"No, Confidence!" is the last thing I hear before the awful crack that seems to split the night in half. The entire rail collapses underneath my weight, and I fall backward off the side of the cliff. My scream is swept up by the wind and carried off in a soundless current.

I close my eyes and imagine the sea rushing up to meet me. The last thought before my world goes black is that I wish he'd at least kissed me before he opened his mouth and ruined it.

Chapter Four

The Ledge

Hayes

I break into a sprint when I hear the crack of the wooden railing. My stomach sinks like a twenty-pound stone in water. I slow down just in time to stop myself from following her over the ledge. I stand in the spot where I'd seen the flutter of pink fabric before she disappeared. One shoe and her small gold handbag are scattered on the ground close to where she had been standing. I close my eyes, count to three, and prepare myself for whatever I might find.

It happened so fast. I know that it's a long drop from there to the shallow pool of water that's been formed by erosion.

Trepidation and horror make my heartbeat slow down even while it thuds hard against the cavity of my chest. I hold my breath and look down.

Relief floods me, fast and wild, and it makes me dizzy. Her fall was broken by a ledge jutting out of the side of the stone face of the cliff. This cliff has dozens of them. It's an elite rock climber haven, and every fall, just when the weather starts to clear and cool, they descend to risk their lives climbing cliffs like this all over Tuscany.

The sound of the sea roaring is gone, and I realize that it hadn't been the sea I'd been hearing. It was the rush of my own blood as I imagined the worst. It's actually very quiet here. The water laps gently on the rocky shore, the waves break in the distance. Behind me, the strains of music from the tent create a strange dichotomy. They have no idea what's happening out here. And, I'd like to keep it that way as long as I can.

I pull my phone out of my breast pocket before lying on my stomach. I slide forward until my head dangles off the ledge, and I can see her clearly. She's a little less than ten feet down. Not too far, but not close enough that I could reach her by extending my arms.

She's moved since I first spotted her. She'd been lying on her back, legs splayed. Now, she's curled up in a fetal position. That she's been able to move herself is a very good sign.

"Confidence," I call down. She doesn't speak, but whimpers loudly and nods.

I assess the ledge. The thick coating of moss covering it is a blessing and a curse. It saved her from landing on hard concrete, but it's also slick and will make moving around on it treacherous. The piece of rock she landed on looks to be about ten feet long and eight feet wide. It's not small, but there are only about five feet between her and its ledge.

If she rolls over a full body turn, she'll fall off. I glance up at the sky. It's dark, but the moon is very bright. The cloudless sky is good news. But even that comes with the caveat of the unexpected showers that are very commonplace in Tuscany during the summer.

I need to get help in a hurry.

I dial the preprogrammed number for the villa's security and explain to Marco, as succinctly as I can, what happened. Just as I hang up, she moves her foot, and a loud, gut-wrenching moan floats up to me on the wind. I drop my phone next to me and clear my throat before I speak.

"Confidence, can you hear me?" I shout down.

She nods, and puts a hand on her head and starts to roll her shoulders.

"Don't move, please!" I shout. She freezes immediately.

"The ledge is five feet from your left. Don't go in that direction. Can you roll backward until you touch the cliff wall?" I ask. "In fact, if you could just not move at all, it would be best. Does anything hurt?" I ask her.

"Oh my God!" she shouts tearfully. "Everything hurts. So much." She cries, but she does what I ask. When she reaches the cliff wall, she scrambles up to sitting and looks up and over her shoulder at me.

I can only see the shadow of her profile in the inky moonlit dark. "I'm really scared," she says softly, and the vulnerability in her voice twists my gut.

"I know," I breathe and then realize I whispered it. "Help will be here soon, okay?" I say in a louder voice.

"You're rich, right?" she calls up to me.

"What?" I call back in surprise.

"You said so," she presses impatiently. "It had better be true. Sending a dead body overseas is expensive. My mother doesn't have the money." She's talking quickly, but her voice is thick with emotion and pain. "Since it's your fault this happened, you have to promise to pay to send me home, so I can be buried next to my grandparents and as far away from my father as possible," she says.

"You're not going to die. It's lucky I'm here," I call down.

"Yeah, in the same way it's lucky to be mauled by a bear," she yells. The bark of laughter that springs straight from my gut, surprises me. And she has a sense of humor.

"I don't know how that's lucky, but we've already learned that you and I don't share a lot of common perspectives," I joke back.

"I can't believe you're making jokes when I'm about to die!" she screams, and the pitch of terror in her voice is enough to squelch my little burst of levity.

"You're not going to die," I tell her.

"I will never forgive you. Not for what you said and not for killing me. I will haunt you from the grave," she shouts. I remember about Gigi's threat earlier and almost laugh. Almost, but I don't dare. Not yet.

"I haven't asked forgiveness. I gave you an honest assessment. And for the final time, you're not going to die," I tell her.

“What do you mean for the final time?” she cries up to me. “You mean you’ll stop reassuring me? You’d just let me sit here and panic about dying and not try to make me feel better?” She’s nearly screaming and her words are punctuated by sobs.

“You’re making yourself hysterical,” I call down in a voice that I hope doesn’t betray my unease.

“You’d be hysterical if you were the one down here facing impending death,” she cries angrily.

“I promise you’re not going to die,” I repeat.

“Don’t say that. You can’t promise that. Everyone dies. I had a feeling something significant would happen while I was here,” she says mournfully. “Twenty minutes ago, I thought it was that I would get to have a fun little fling with a sexy stranger. Hahaha, what a joke,” she cries.

She turns her head more so that nearly her full face is visible. A beam of moonlight breaks the dark shadowing them. I can see those eyes that tempted me so much tonight. Her face, even while twisted with pain and fear is like a painting—with features that separately you’d never think to pair together. Big eyes, a tiny nose. That lush, but small mouth ... Yet they come together and create an expressive, very interesting, and beautiful masterpiece.

My phone rings, and I answer it with my head still over the side so I can keep an eye on her “One sec, it’s about the rescue,” I tell her before I put it to my ear. Marco starts speaking right away and my heart sinks when he gives me the status.

“What’s wrong?” she asks as soon as I hang up.

“Nothing’s wrong—”

“Your face says otherwise,” she snaps. “Just tell me because I’m freaking out down here,” she says.

“It’s not a big deal,” I reassure her. “The station’s rappel team is one man short tonight. One of the guy’s wife went into labor about an hour ago,” I tell her. Her eyes widen in horror. She pushes up to sitting and scoots closer to the cliff wall. I listen for signs of cracking or shifting in the rock. I hear nothing and exhale in relief. “There’s a team thirty minutes away, and he’s already on his way to them.”

“This is what I get for being so goddamn selfish. I’m going to die on a cliff in Italy and all because I wanted to live a little,” she cries.

“You’re not going to die,” I repeat what has become my refrain.

“Oh, the irony,” she shouts and throws an arm over her eyes.

“Well, it will certainly be a loss for the theatre, if you decide to throw yourself to your death,” I say dryly.

“It’s not funny. You come down here and see if making jokes seems like a nice thing to do,” she says, her eyes still covered by her arm.

My anxiety and guilt are tangling with each other. I don’t know what to do and everything I say seems to only make her more upset.

“Do you want me to go get your friend?” I ask, feeling like a failure.

“No. Please don’t leave me.” Her hand stretches out to me. And she looks up over her shoulder again. Her eyes are full of sorrow. “She’s having the time of her life. I’ve already ruined her trip by coming in the first place. I don’t know why I did,” she says.

“I’m sure she’s glad you came and maybe—”

“I need to confess something,” she calls, lips having been pursed in pain and now they twitch. I feel a prick of unease.

“No, you don’t need to confess anything. And it wouldn’t even count, I’m not a priest,” I call down. “Save your energy and try to think about something—”

“You will listen, you owe me,” she yells in a high-pitched, primal voice that is rich with anxiety and fear.

I give a sigh of resignation. I need to do whatever it takes to keep her calm and still while we wait.

“I’m listening. But not because I think you’re going to die,” I say.

“I got fired from my job three months ago. It was my dream job. And I was supporting my entire family with it. And I haven’t told my mother what really happened. I’ve lied to everyone,” she says in a rush.

“You don’t have to—” I try to stop her, but she just keeps pushing forward.

“I wish I hadn’t because I’m going to die, and those cunts who were making fun of me are going to think I’m really someone who uses men for money,” she says angrily.

“Aren’t you?” I ask her.

She glares daggers up at me. “Really? I mean, if I were, I’m clearly terrible at it. You practically threw me off a cliff to get rid of me,” she says.

I laugh despite the real anxiety I’m feeling waiting to hear back from Marco.

“I thought you were about to confess lies. You’re just telling more of them,” I quip.

“Just because you didn’t put your hand between my shoulders and shove me, doesn’t mean you’re not the reason I’m out here,” she snaps.

“Sorry.” I feel instantly contrite.

“I heard them talking about me. Out there on the balcony,” she says quietly. “I was leaving and came back for something and overheard them. I just wanted to make them think that I didn’t care. But, of course I care. But all anyone knows are the rumors. And they would rather believe the most ridiculous theories, with no basis in fact, than hear the boring truth,” she says. I know exactly how that feels. Renee dragged my name through the mud and I know most people believed her.

There’s an instant kinship, an invisible knitting of recognition and connection that I feel for her. I’ve been struggling with this very thing since I moved back to Houston. And I’ve had to endure gossip, not respond to innuendo and have everyone think Oh, look at the size of him. Of course, he choked her out or whatever. The gossip campaign that Renee started has died down in fervor, but I know that these people think they know things about me. And they know absolutely nothing.

“Tell me what really happened,” I hear myself asking before I can think about it. It would be bad form not to ask, I tell myself. But, I can’t deny that I’m eager to know more about this woman who has me lying on my stomach with my head dangling off the edge of a cliff in the dirt, playing the role of confessor.

“I was living in Nashville. I had a great job at the Southern Poverty Law Center right out of law school. But the money was shit and I wanted to be able to do more for myself and my mama. So, I started applying for jobs in law firms. Big ones where I swore I’d never work. I went to a shitty law school, but I was first in my class and I wrote an article that the Harvard Law Review published. So, I had no problem finding a job. I moved to Washington, DC. It was great. The cost of living was crazy. But, I was renting and took the train in. Everything was great until I started seeing someone at work,” she says.

“Well, I don’t know how you could have foreseen that wouldn’t go pear-shaped,” I say sarcastically.

“Oh, it gets even worse. He was my boss,” she drones.

“Oh.” Damn.

“That’s not the best part.”

“What? Was he married?” I joke.

“Engaged,” she says quietly.

That was the last thing I was expecting to hear.

“Shit, I keep putting my foot in my mouth with you, don’t I?”

“You did say you were terrible at small talk.” She laughs, with real humor and shakes her head in what I have to guess—because I can’t see her face—is chagrin.

“I lived in Rockville. That’s a suburb of DC. It was affordable and not crowded, you know. I didn’t really spend much time in DC beyond work. I didn't have any friends there, so my time in the actual district itself was limited to my office in China Town. But earlier this year, I ended up having an unexpected free afternoon after a deal closed early. You have no idea how rare that is. It's fucking brutal, that life. I worked like a mule at harvest time. On the days we were prepping for a deal to close, I would go forty-eight hours with no sleep. I never complained. I was proving to be something of a wunderkind in the practice that dealt with large insurance settlements. We were charting courses no one had ever even thought of. I was making an impact and I was making money. I never complained about the shitty treatment, the shitty hours and the constant sexual harassment."

"That intense," I say.

"It was. But like I said, it had its upsides," she says and she sighs up at the sky in nostalgia. "On the first free day I'd had in a year, I woke up feeling like doing something special.

"I decided to go to Dupont Circle and walk up Connecticut Ave to Nigel's favorite store—so I could buy him a fucking tie. He was in California for the week and I thought I'd be wearing it, and nothing else when he got back in a couple days ..." The image she paints turns me on until I remember that she did that for another man. The surge of jealousy I feel is dismissed for the ridiculousness that it is. She's not mine. Nor do I want her to be. But, I have to admit that seeing her naked with only one of my ties around her neck would have been fucking nice.

"Well, turns out his 'I'm going to be in California for work all week' was a lie," she says.

"He was at the store?" I ask.

"Yup, with his fiancée. I saw him, and at first, I was excited. I called his name. They both turned around. You should have seen his face." She snickers, and it makes me smile, too. "It was the classic, I think I'm going to shit myself, so I'm clenching my ass as hard as I can face." She laughs to herself and I find it miraculous that she can laugh at the memory even while she's lying there in pain.

I feel my first pang of doubt about the conclusions I drew about her.

“Can you believe that at first he tried to act like he had no clue who I was?” she says, and I guffaw incredulously.

“No fucking way.”

“Oh, way,” she says.

“I mean, hello, motherfucker. Your tongue was buried between my thighs two days ago, remember that?” She laughs and I do, too. But my laugh isn’t a loose, easy one. It’s knotted around the discomfort I feel every time she refers to her sexual relationship with that man.

I don’t like it. Not one fucking bit, and I have no idea why or where that feeling came from. Because honestly, half an hour ago, I didn’t give two shits whether I saw her again or not.

“Come on, Rebecca, look at her, would I date a girl who shops at The Gap?” She says this in a deep voice that I’m assuming is meant to be the boyfriend. “I mean, who says things like that?”

“Well, apparently, your boyfriend. So, what’d you do? I hope it was worse than throwing yourself off a cliff because what he did was way worse than what I did ... and look how you’ve punished me,” I quip.

And when she laughs, I feel a swell of pride. And then immediately wonder who the fuck I am. Maybe I’ve had too much to drink.

“I didn’t throw myself off a cliff, and I wasn’t trying to punish you. You’re so vain. Not everything is about you,” she says angrily but with no malice.

“Anyway, I wish I’d done something to punish him then. It would’ve been much more satisfying getting arrested if I’d actually done something to earn it,” she says irritably.

“You’re like one of those Russian dolls. So many layers,” I say in wonder.

“Huh?” she replies.

“Nothing, keep going,” I prompt, eager to hear what came next.

“He had the nerve to call security. In seconds, they swooped in and escorted me out. I was truly speechless. Shocked beyond belief.”

I can be ruthless with people I’m not happy with. But, I can’t imagine pretending not to know someone you’ve been intimate with.

“What next?” I ask, intrigued beyond belief.

“I get back to work and find out the girl he was with is the daughter of our firm’s managing partner. Overnight, my job became a different kind of hell. It wasn’t just long hours and hard work. It was impossibly long hours, being assigned to cases in practice areas like white collar crime—places where I had no expertise and no interest. They gave me all these extremely technical questions to answer for super valuable clients. Then they’d tell me they needed the answer back in a matter of hours. These questions required a full day’s worth of work in less time than I was given to complete the job. So of course, I made mistakes. I fucked up assignments. I took too long to return phone calls. Whatever you can think of, I did it. I was constantly being called to task,” she rants. “They started saying things like, maybe I couldn’t do the work because I didn’t go to Harvard or Cornell like everyone else. For nearly an entire month after the incident at the store, they did everything they could to get me to quit.

“I knew what they were doing. I tried to stay strong. I was finally taking care of my mother the way she deserved. So, I hung on because I liked the money too much, and I thought I could outlast them. I’d never lost a fight in my life. And I have fought some really big demons,” she says, and her voice is clogged with heavy emotions.

“Wow,” is all I say, despite the dozens of questions I want to ask. Her honesty is so refreshing. I want more of it.

“But one day, the fuck up was too big. And a partner threw an entire three-ringed binder at me from across a conference room,” she says.

I was stunned at that.

“I know,” she says as if she can hear the shock in my silence. “No one did anything. In fact, they asked me to clean up the papers that had fallen out when it slammed into the wall next to my head.

“I started to think about quitting. I decided that there was no amount of money worth all of this. And if, at the age of twenty-eight, I was making nearly 200k a year, it meant I could find something like that again, right?” she posits.

“Right,” I agree.

“Wrong,” she deadpans. “When I leave here, I’m moving back home to Arkansas because I can’t afford my rent in DC anymore. This trip was my last hurrah. But now, I’m going to die.” Her chest rises and falls rapidly as she tries to catch her breath after that diatribe.

I ask her the question that’s been on the tip of my tongue.

“How could you not know that your boyfriend had someone else in his life?” I hear a voice in my head say, Not now, she’s in the middle of what she believes could be her deathbed confession. But, the woman I’m looking down at, that I’m listening to—that woman is smart and damn perceptive.

So, I double down when she doesn’t respond right away. “Really. How could you not have known?”

“I ask myself that every day,” she responds miserably.

“You seem like an astute person,” I muse.

“Then you’re clearly not,” she says with disdain.

“Thanks, that’s nice,” I say dryly.

“Haven’t you been listening to my story? Don’t you see the parallels?”

“Parallels?”

“Yes. He fucked me on the down low, but basically said I was too low class for him to be seen with in public. You wouldn’t even fuck me. And you made it very clear that even if you could lower yourself to being with me, I was too cheap to do more with than that,” she says without any recrimination at all in her voice. “I must be the world’s biggest kind of fool. I keep meeting and liking the same kind of guy,” she says.

“Hey, I am not the same kind of guy as that asshole,” I say.

“What says you’re not? Certainly not the way you spoke to me. I mean, you being out here on this ledge is nice. But considering how it’s your fault and all, you leaving me alone out here would make you a pretty evil son of a bitch, so ... I’m not sure that I can see any real difference between you and my boyfriend of five years except he kept his sense of superiority hidden for much longer than you did.” She lays this indictment on me with the force of a sledgehammer.

Swish would be so disappointed in me right now, and there’s nothing worse than feeling that certainty settle down on my shoulders.

“Anyway, all I’m saying is, clearly, I have a type. With Nigel, all I lost was my job. You’re about to cost me my fucking life,” she says.

“Don’t say they actually fired you. Didn’t you have a contract or something?” I ask, ignoring her melodrama.

“I know you only date heiresses, so you wouldn’t know much about jobs and employment like the rest of us working stiffs,” she snarks. She’s making a joke, but a lash of shame strikes me right in the center of my chest when I remember the way I spoke to her.

“Most of us who have jobs are what’s called at will. I can quit whenever I want, and they can fire me for any reason. They found their reason and fired me,” she says simply.

“What did you do?”

“Nothing. I left. They offered me money to sign a nondisclosure, something saying I wouldn’t sue them for wrongful termination. I was tempted. That money would not have gone begging.”

“So, you signed it?” I ask.

“Hell no,” she says like it’s the stupidest question she’s ever been asked. “Of course not. I would dance naked on a pole in Little Rock before I took their hush money. I’ve worked too hard to let them drag my name in the mud. That is my story. And I’ll tell it if I want to,” she declares.

“So, have you?” I ask.

She sighs loudly. “No. Because it would destroy what’s left of my career. No one would ever hire me again. But, I hope they spend the entire three-year statutory period looking over their shoulders for that lawsuit. They’re playing games. I’m playing for my life. I have one shot to escape the future that I was born to, and I’ll be damned if they take it from me,” the lioness on the ledge roars.

Goddamn.

She’s sexy as fuck when she’s angry. Her voice is strong. There’s no fear. No apology.

“Nigel made sure to stop by my office on my last day and tell me how sorry he was that things didn’t work out. He told me that I should lower my ambitions. I had a great body, a decent face and amazing hair. But my pedigree was all wrong. ‘Stop punching above your weight, find your kind,’ he said.”

“Shit. He’s a proper asshole,” I say.

“He’s worse than an asshole. He’s a hemorrhoid. Useless, painful, and rotten on the inside,” she says with real scorn. “My kind are hunters and trackers. We’re keepers of tradition. We’re salt of the earth. I refused to feel ashamed of that.”

My dick gets hard. Like her words are her mouth and they’re wrapping themselves around it, sucking as hard. Just how I like it.

Fuck. Me.

I’m about two minutes from jumping down on that ledge with her and finding my way under that little dress and making both of our dreams come true.

“Oh, about two weeks after I left, Nigel had what he called a ‘crisis of his conscience.’ But really, what he meant was that he wanted to fuck me again.”

My dick deflates. “Please spare me the details.”

“Oh, stop being a prude,” she says, misunderstanding my request. “Nothing even happened. I got home from another awful interview and found him sitting in his car outside my building. I lost it. I took my briefcase and started pounding his car. I broke his headlights and put a good dent in the hood before he drove off.”

“Did he leave you alone after that?”

“Yeah. He sent the police to me instead.”

“Shit.”

“Yup. Then, I got a call from my old partner,” she says.

“About him?” I ask.

“No. When I was fired, we were waiting for a ruling on a pro bono case I took on for the firm. Flood victims suing the insurance company for failing to pay legitimate claims. The ruling came back and we won. Big time. There was an appeal filed by the insurance company, and they wanted me to help with it,” she states. “Said they could get the DA to drop the charges if I did. So, I did. I could have been disbarred if I’d actually been prosecuted,” she says.

I whistle, impressed at their nerve. “Why didn’t they just assign another attorney?”

“I’m regarded as the foremost expert in the area of disaster relief financing for municipalities and regulated businesses like property and casualty insurance companies,” she says.

“That sounds impressive as hell, but it’s all Greek to me. Tell me, in plain English, what that means,” I ask her.

“Well,” she sighs. “When I was in law school, I wrote this article for a prestigious law review about the economics of hurricane disaster relief and how wrong we get it. That we focus on the bulk of the money of the issues that are sexy and headline worthy. Like helicopter rescues and helping resettle displaced people in new cities and states. But what about the people who stay? Whose homes aren’t washed away, but simply flooded. The news cameras ignore them. It's not sexy to sit in your house and suffer quietly. No one wants to tell stories that would force us to really think about how we treat poor people in this country. So instead, we see the people lifted out of their homes by helicopters, moved to entirely new cities, given new clothes, new lives, and that makes us look benevolent. And I've been advocating for the litigation of cases that will force the federal circuits to take a position. Or maybe even make it to the Supreme Court." She shakes her head. "Gah, sorry, I could talk about this all night," she says.

"I could listen to you talk about this all night," I confess.

"Because of you, I'll never get my Nobel Peace Prize. I had so much potential," she cries and shakes her fist up at me.

"Stop speaking of yourself in the past tense," I chide her gently.

"You've ruined my life," she yells up at me. "And you know what's worse?"

"What?"

"Forget it," she says.

"Forget what?"

"Nothing," she responds sullenly.

"Okay," I acquiesce.

"I guess it doesn't matter if I tell you now," she grumbles after a few seconds pass. I smile but hide it in my voice when I speak.

"Shit or get off the pot, Confidence. Tell me or stop talking about it," I say.

"See? You're rude. But, because I'm stupid when it comes to men, I like you." She says it like it's a fate worse than death.

"You do?" I ask, completely surprised and pleased.

"Of course, I do. I saw you and thought, yes, he's mine." She leans her head against the wall and gazes up at the stars.

"Did you, really?" I ask. I like the way that sounds.

“Yes. Something is very wrong with me,” she says miserably and I snort out a laugh. “It’s not funny. Every time I look up at you, I think about how much I want to kiss you.”

Heat coils in my chest. “I want to kiss you, too,” I admit.

“Of course, you do, now that I’m lying down here about to die,” she says angrily. I laugh. Again. God, she’s funny.

“I should be inside eating cake, getting drunk, and taking some beautiful stranger to bed. What kind of karma is this?” She wails to the sky and slams her open palm on the ground.

I watch helplessly from this stupid ledge. I feel like total shit.

“I’m sorry about what I said,” I start.

She doesn’t respond.

I haven’t apologized for anything in a long time. I don’t even know if I’m doing it right, but her increased volume makes me think not.

These are my “What would Swisher Do” moments. As soon as I ask myself that question, the answer comes.

“It was shitty, and I was an asshole for no reason,” I call down.

“Yes, it was.” She snuffles and looks up at me over her shoulders which are pressed flat against the rock. “No one’s an asshole for no reason. But, I really hope yours is good, because I want to forgive you,” she says begrudgingly.

I laugh. “You sure about that?” I ask.

“Only because if I get off this ledge, I’ll be able to have the night I wanted.” She scowls up at me.

I like that scowl.

I like her.

Very much.

The fearlessness of her conviction is so fucking attractive.

It’s a very rare trait. It’s the lack of that trait that makes the saying, and there are no atheists in foxholes very true.

But here she is. In her proverbial foxhole, and she's not finding her faith. Or compromising. I've only known four other living people who are like this, and three of them are my brothers. So, I give her a sign of respect that I give very few.

The truth.

"I can count my family on one hand. My aunt, my brothers. To everyone else, I'm a means to an end. And that end usually has something to do with my money. I've stopped minding. I just wish I would meet someone who would be honest about it." I say the words out loud that I've only ever let fester in my chest, and they sound as awful as they feel.

Her voice softens. "Oh, Hayes—"

The blare of sirens and the glowing from their flashing lights cuts her off.

The spell is broken, and I switch to action mode. I speak quickly and urgently down to her.

"I told them not to alert anyone inside. But it's going to be impossible for them to get out here without that now. And people are going to come out and see what's happening."

"Of course, they will," she says dejectedly. "For once, I'd love to not make a dramatic exit." And I feel her pain. More than I can say.

"I'm going to go and make sure they don't come too far, and I'll do my best to make sure your dignity is in one piece when the night is over," I tell her and start to get up.

"No, you can't leave me alone with them!" she cries out, and her eyes widen with fear. "What if they drop me? What if I fall?" she cries. Her chest heaves and arches her back off that wall.

"No, don't worry, and don't move. I won't leave until they get here, but I want to go and stand by the entrance to make sure that no one else comes out here. The last thing we need is for you to have to push through a crowd of people."

"I'm so scared. Please promise you'll stay close by. I just want to hear your voice, please?" She pleads with me with such earnest vulnerability that it makes me wish I could be the one to bring her up to safety.

“I’ll make sure you’re safe. And I’ll be just behind the rescuers, okay?” I search her eyes until she nods.

She looks over to her left and whimpers.

“Don’t look. Keep your eyes turned up here.”

“It’s so dark. I’m scared, Hayes.” She hiccups my name, and my heart squeezes in my chest. A sudden gust of wind picks up her thick mane of hair and blows it wildly around her head.

She screams! “Oh my God, are there birds?” Her hands wave frantically around her body.

“No, it’s just your hair, Confidence,” I call. I look over my shoulder when I hear shouts and chairs scraping the ground.

“What if they can’t find a way to get me up?” she asks tearfully.

“It’s really not that far. It’ll be a breeze, and I’ll be right here. I’ll make sure you’re safe. I promise.”

I’ve barely managed to keep myself safe. But I’ll be damned if I don’t excel at it for her. I hear the commotion before the back flap of the tent explodes open.

“Down here,” I call out and start to lift off the ground.

“Haaaaaaaayes, I can’t see you anymore!” she screams.

“I know, but I’m here. I need to make room for the rescuers. One second!” I yell and then rush a few feet to meet them.

A woman in a short, multicolored sundress comes dashing out. Her eyes are wild with fear. She runs at me. “When I heard a woman had fallen, I was afraid it was TB, and then I saw you.” She reaches me and shoves me in the chest. “And I knew it was her. What did you do to her?” she snarls in my face.

Then, she crumples against my chest and covers her face with her hands. “I should have stopped her!” she wails.

I put my hand on her shoulder and pull her back. Her green eyes are clear of anger, and I can see her distress is real.

“Come on,” I say and start walking again. “I told her I’d be close enough to hear her, and right now, I’m not,”

When I reach the rescue party, Confidence is shouting, “He left me!” over and over.

“No. I didn’t,” I shout over her.

“You did.” She sounds unhinged. “You promised me, Hayes,” she wails.

“I didn’t leave. Your friend came down, I was just—”

“Oh my God! Cass!” she shrieks.

“So, what’s the plan?” I ask one of the men who’s talking on his walkie-talkie.

“We’re just getting anchored, Signore Rivers,” he says. “Then we’ll send Danelo down to secure her harness, connect her to the rappel, and we’ll pull her up. Once we’re anchored, it will only be a matter of minutes,” he says.

I exhale a sigh of relief I didn’t even realize I was holding onto.

“Why don’t you go sit there?” He nods at the stone steps where the rest of the guests are gawking. “You look very pale.”

“No, I want to be close enough for her to hear me,” I tell him. “I’ll wait right here.”

Chapter Five

Turd Blossom

Confidence

“Thank goodness,” Cass cries when my feet touch the ground after the rappel team hauls me to safety.

I wince at a shooting pain in my ankle and immediately bend my knee to take the pressure off it.

The harness is heavy, and when I try to stand on one leg, it’s impossible. I sway a little until a pair of strong hands grab me by the shoulders and steady me.

“Let me hold you up.” Hayes’s deep voice makes my heartbeat quicken. I look up from the three pairs of hands that are working to loosen the various latches and clasps on the contraption that saved my life. When our eyes meet, his are full of worry and warmth that I hadn’t seen up close. I’d been staring up at those eyes while I was sitting on that ledge. They had been my lifeline. I know he never felt fully afraid, but I did. When I landed on that ledge, it took me a full thirty seconds to convince myself that I wasn’t dead.

“Thank you for staying with me.” I reach over the men kneeled around me and grab his outstretched forearm.

“I’m sorry you were out here in the first place,” he says. His eyes are close and hypnotically focused on my mouth. I look at his mouth, too. One of his hands leaves my shoulder and cups my face.

“You scared me, Confidence,” he murmurs.

“You pissed me off, Hayes,” I say softly.

“I’m sorry, if you are,” he says.

“I hold grudges, so I’m not ready to accept your apology,” I say honestly.

He smiles.

“But I’ll work for it if I have to,” he says. His hazel eyes burn into mine. I swallow hard at the heat in them. He’s looking at me like he wishes we were alone. I do, too.

Something happened between us while I was on that ledge. I didn’t feel it fully because no matter how much he did to distract me, I couldn’t forget that I was a few feet away from falling off. But now that I’m safe and in his arms, I’m catching up. And my body is buzzing for an entirely different reason. I smile up at him, bright and wide with my perfectly straight teeth that my mom always called God’s apology for fucking up everything else in my life.

“I’m so glad you followed me out, even though it was your fault. You kept me from going crazy,” I say softly. We’ve run the full gamut of emotions, and we’ve ended up intrigued and much more than interested.

He leans in slightly—his eyes are open and on mine. My heart is thudding like I’ve just sprinted for a mile. My face is tingling. His fingers move in slow, small circles at the base of my neck; his thumbs massage the muscles that are clenched in my jaw. My head falls back and his fingers slip into my hair and cup the base of my skull. He cradles my head like it’s the most delicate thing he’s ever held. I’m liquifying. The adrenaline is mingling with lust, and I’m turned on in a way that I’ve never been before. What they say about near death experiences making you horny is true. His fingers caress my scalp and send chills through me that curl into heat-seeking missiles that turn my entire body into an erogenous zone.

“I’m going to kiss you now,” he murmurs and leans forward to brush a kiss on my mouth. But my lips want more and they cling to his greedily. Kissing him is like being hit with a thousand lightning bolts of full-blown pleasure. He feels like the most worthwhile regret I’ll ever have. I want to make this count.

I sink my teeth into his lower lip and tug. He hisses, but he takes control of the kiss and covers my mouth with his. And then he kisses the shit out of me. It's so perfect that it feels like I fell off the edge of the cliff just so this could happen.

His lips are soft and demanding. I could get addicted to this man—really fast. My body is singing like it's just had that first, singular hit of its new favorite drug. He pulls back after one of the men working on my harness coughs loudly. I hold onto his lips until simple biology makes it impossible for me to hold on anymore. We smile like lunatics at each other. He looks like a kid on Christmas morning and that's exactly how I feel. When they pull the harness off me, I know two things for sure. One, this was just the first of many kisses I'm going to share with him. And two, that I'll never forget him or this trip as long as I live.

"I still don't forgive you," I remind him.

"I want to make it up to you."

"Okay," I whisper when he leans away.

"Hell yeah, TB!" Cass calls from over Hayes's shoulder.

The harness loosens and the men crouched in front of me working it loose all stand. Hayes lets go of me, and I drop my leg back down for balance. I immediately regret my decision because pain—almost blindingly sharp—shoots up my leg from my ankle.

We're in my bed. The EMTs decided my ankle was only sprained. They put me in a soft knee length boot to mobilize it. Considering that I fell down that ledge, I'm amazed I walked away with that being the only thing wrong. I also walked away with the most unexpected, beautiful surprise. Hayes Rivers. He's still mostly pretty rude, but he's been attentive and tender. And I can't keep my hands off him.

“So, tell me, what’s TB mean?” he asks. His breath is warm and tickles the fine hairs near my temples.

“Turd Blossom,” I say, and his chest tightens against my cheek.

“What in the world is that?”

I laugh hoarsely and pat his chest softly. “And you call yourself a Texan,” I say.

“Is knowing what a turd blossom is a prerequisite for being a real Texan?” he asks.

“No, it’s not a prerequisite, it’s a requirement. To call yourself a real Texan, you’ve got to have had some shit dumped on you and come up smelling like roses,” I tell him.

“And how do you know so much about being a Texan?”

“I went to college in Texas,” I tell him.

“UT?”

“Not UT, I couldn’t afford that. I went to Texas State in San Marcos. It was like Paris, France compared to Amorel,” I say and laugh as I remember how googly-eyed I’d been for the first couple of weeks.

“Where’s Amorel?” he asks.

“Is it a small town?” he asks.

I laugh. “That would be a generous description. We have one road running through town and really, it’s just there because the railroad tracks need a place to cross.” I laugh.

I wiggle the toes of my healthy foot along his shins. “It’s why my feet are extra wide.”

He laughs. “This because of your childhood? Or is this a random Confidence fact?” he asks.

“My childhood,” I clarify. “I was barefoot all the time. Walking on hard ground with no shoes makes your feet spread and hardens them.” I miss the springy, fertile, cool soil of Amorel beneath my feet suddenly.

“I played barefoot all the time,” he says

“I didn’t play barefoot. I lived barefoot. I even went to school without shoes. And so did a lot of the other kids.”

“Barefoot? Were you ...” He trails off like he doesn’t want to say it.

“Was I poor?” I ask and laugh. “It’s not a dirty word. I’m not ashamed of where I come from. Because look where it got me,” I tell him.

“Well.” He hums low in his throat like he’s thinking deeply. “I think you defied the odds, getting out of there to where you are now.” He leans back and looks down at me. “I have a feeling you left a string of broken hearts in town when you left, and I’m sure half of them never managed to make it out and come after you,” he quips.

“Yeah, no.” I laugh out loud at the idea. “There was nothing romantic about my existence. It was a hard life, but my town did everything they could to make sure I got out. And, there was no string of broken hearts.” I nudge the center of his chest with my nose. “I was too busy doing chores, hunting, cleaning, going to school, and reading everything I could get my hands on.”

“See? You did what it takes to get out of there and your family helped you,” he says.

“Not by myself. And not because of my family. At least, not my blood family. It was the sheriff, my school librarian, the woman who ran the food market. Family, for me, isn’t because of blood. It’s because we decided to be each other’s support system.”

A strange expression crosses his face. “What? Does being a trust fund baby negate the need for family?” I ask.

“Of course not. And I don’t like that phrase. I’ve never been comfortable with the idea of being idle. I’ve worked since I left university. My brothers are the same way. We all have professions,” he says.

I pull back, “Profession? That sounds fancy. What did you do?”

“Nothing as fancy as a big firm lawyer,” he drawls. “I’m an accountant. Or I was,” he says and for some reason it tickles me to death. I laugh.

“You’re an accountant? You look like James Bond, the superhero version. I would never have guessed,” I tease. Kinda.

“Yeah, and I worked for my family’s company for a while. I’m the first Rivers in two generations to do so,” he says with pride.

“But, I think that if I didn’t have the benefit of all that money, it would have been a lot harder.”

I shrug, unimpressed.

“Sure, having to work a second job while going to school full-time meant college wasn’t a barrel of laughs. But, you know what?” I ask him.

“What?” he responds with an indulgent smile.

“I don’t even remember the hard work. I just know it’s paid off. So, yeah, I come from one of the poorest places in the country. But, I can also tell you that the more successful I become, the more terrible the people I meet are,” I say.

“Oh, come on.”

“It’s true. There are five hundred people in my town. They’re all like my family. They say good morning and they mean it,” I say.

“Hmm, sounds nice.”

“It was. That entire town raised me. When I left for school, over a hundred of them drove down to Memphis to hug me at the airport. They couldn’t give me money, but they gave me the work ethic to fuel my ambition just because they love me. Now everyone around me wants something in return.”

“Maybe. But I still think you defied the odds,” he says.

“So did you,” I throw back. “If you have disposable income, good health insurance, and job security, then you’ve defied the odds. Do you know how unattainable that is for so many people? The odds are stacked against most of us,” I tell him.

“Honestly, I have no idea. I’ve never had to think about any of those things,” he muses like he’s never considered the mundane aspects of life.

Lucky him.

“Do you volunteer?” I cock my head at him.

“Like, you mean ... my time?” he asks like it’s the most far-fetched thing he’s ever had.

“Yes, your time. You know, in your community? Worked in a soup kitchen, repaired a roof, cut grass, read to someone who couldn’t read to themselves?” I ask.

“No ... I support those things financially,” he says.

I shrug. “Yeah, that’s great. And we should all do that if we’re able. But if you don’t interact with the people you’re writing those checks to support, you’ll never see them as anything but poor. Which, contrary to popular belief, is not a character flaw.”

He doesn’t respond, and after a full minute of tense silence, I can’t stand it anymore.

“I’m sorry. I’m just passionate about ... well, about everything,” I admit.

“Everything?” He laughs and it rumbles around his chest and rolls over me like thunder. I snuggle closer to him.

“Well, yeah—everything I do, anyway. I don’t see the point in doing something if I’m not all in. It’ll take the same amount of time to do it whether I’m enthusiastic or not. And I’ve found my greatest passions that way. What you give is what you get ... I acquired a lot from my experiences, so I know that means I’ve got to give them my all, too.”

He doesn’t say anything and I start to feel uneasy. Me and my oversharing big mouth. “Did I just scare you off?” I press my forehead to his chest and close my eyes. “I’m a little neurotic,” I say.

“Where did you come from?” He drops his chin onto the top of my head and pulls me close to him. He smells so good.

“Did you fall asleep when I was talking? I just told you. I’m from Arkansas—”

“That’s not what I mean. I mean, I didn’t know people like you existed ...” He pulls back so he can see my face. I flush at the awe in his eyes.

“Oh, come on. I’m a clumsy, country redneck with a law degree and a nice ass,” I quip to hide my embarrassment.

“Yeah, I can only agree with the nice ass part and I guess I believe you’re a lawyer, but I need to see a diploma.” He slides his hands down and cups the cheeks of said ass in his strong hands. “I’m sorry for what I said to you. You’re incredible. I have never met anyone like you, and I’ve never wanted a do-over so badly in my life.” He rushes the words out in a clumsy, halting sentence. I school my smile before I tilt my head up at him. His eyes are so beautiful and they’re fixed on mine in an open, honest, slightly vulnerable way.

“My mother told me that we speak from our brains, but we hear from our hearts,” I say.

“Meaning you know bullshit when you hear it?” he asks with an amused smirk.

“I know bullshit when I hear it,” I confirm. “And that’s the only reason I’m forgiving you. I can tell you’re really sorry. Also, it sucks that you have such shitty people in your life that you’re walking around expecting to be used,” I say honestly. He tenses again.

“I don’t know that they’re all shitty people. My brothers aren’t. My aunt isn’t. But otherwise, in my circle, money is more than just what you use to live. It’s your armor, it’s your power, your weapon—”

“You make life sound like a war,” I say.

“Isn’t it?” he asks.

“I mean, I don’t think so and I’ve had some battles, but no. In general, I’m just trying to do better than the people before me so that the people after me have something worth taking care of, too,” I say.

“That’s all I want, too,” he says and runs an absent hand up and down the small of my back. His hand is heavy and warm, and I start to feel the first call of sleep.

“The lady at the table told us your family is a big deal in Houston. What for?”

He takes a minute, his hands tightening their grip on my body. He hums contemplatively and sighs deeply before he speaks.

“I’m very wealthy. I have been since I was twenty-five. That alone makes me someone whose name people know. My father died when I was fourteen, and I went to live with my aunt.” His lips twitch slightly like he’s in pain.

“Was this in Texas?” I ask him gently.

“No, it was in Positano.” He runs a hand through his thick, curly hair.

“Where’s that?” I ask.

“Italy,” he says.

My fingers drift down his face when I see the flash of pain in his eyes that the memory of it brings.

“That’s a long way from home,” I say.

“It was. And when I got here, I was so angry. At everyone. I didn’t really know my aunt, and I resented having to come and live with her. I behaved like such a jerk. She sent me to a boarding school after I broke a window in her neighbor’s house and refused to apologize,” he laughs.

“She kicked you out?” I ask

“Yeah.” He scratches his chin; the scrape of stubble under his nails vibrates against my ear, and I snuggle closer to him. His body is so hard, but it yields where I need it to, and I’ve never been more comfortable in my whole life. “We were at real odds with each other. She didn't know what to do with me, and I didn't know what to do with all of my anger," he says.

"How was boarding school?" I ask.

"Hell. I didn't speak Italian well; I was a loner, and the upperclassmen smelled blood in the water. And almost right away, they tried to make me their grunt. And that wasn't happening," he says coldly. I like that rough edge in his voice. I shiver and move closer to him.

"So, what'd you do?" I ask.

"The first one who got close enough to me got a bloody nose for his trouble," he says with grudging pride.

I nudge him and tighten the hands that I have wrapped around his waist. He's talking about it like it was no big deal. I can tell that now, it's not. But I can't imagine what he must have been feeling then. My heart aches for him. How can someone have so much and yet ...

"So, you fought your way through school?" I ask him.

"Didn't get the chance. I was expelled when I broke the French ambassador's son's cheekbone," he says grimly.

"Holy shit." I grimace.

He starts to pull his hand back.

I hold his arms in place to stop him. "Please don't stop touching me; I like it. A lot," I say quietly.

His arms tighten around me, and I relax again.

"Did you hear about my ex? I'm assuming that gossip has made its way here," he says.

I nod.

"What did you hear?"

"It doesn't matter. I don't believe it," I tell him.

"Why not? Because I was nice to you tonight?" he asks in a voice that reeks with skepticism.

"Don't be a jerk," I say.

“I’m not being a jerk,” he pushes back. “I just know what people say. ‘Guy his size ...’”

“Well, my father was five foot, five inches tall, 140 pounds, and he’s the most vicious human being I’ve ever met. He beat my mother until the day he died. His size had nothing to do with it. And it doesn’t have anything to do with my brother who’s the same size and just as brutal. I was bred by a violent man. I lived with violent men. I can smell it. My skin tingles.” I look down at my arms. “The only tingles you give me are the kind that feel really good.”

He nuzzles my hair with his chin.

“But ... how did you end up in such a bad place with your ex?” I ask.

He stiffens and then clears his throat.

“I was living in New York after college, away from my family and with my brothers. All four of us in one city. It was ... amazing.”

His sigh is full of nostalgia and I can hear the smile the memory has brought to his face. “I feel a but coming on,” I say when he pauses a beat too long.

“But, I was also in a really dark place. I was almost twenty-five. My inheritance was vesting and yet I still couldn’t go home. I’d have the money, but none of the responsibility that made it mine. And I was obsessed with being ready to take the helm. My aunt always takes blame for introducing me to her. But if I’m honest, I thought finding a wife was the most important thing. Combine that with alcohol, youth, and more money than sense ... and you’ve got a perfect storm.

“I married the wrong woman. We divorced. She moved on. I moved back to Europe.

“Five years later, her luck ran out and she was trying to get more money out of me. She came to my house one evening and I refused to let her in. She banged on the door for an hour. She only left when I told her I was calling the police.”

“Why didn’t you call them the minute she showed up? This sounds insane,” I ask.

“Because I was, as always, thinking about what that would look like for the family. It ended up being a disaster anyway,” he says.

“So, you’ve been in the position for how long?”

“Since I turned thirty, two months ago. It’s been a total disaster. My uncle and stepmother have spent the last sixteen years making a mess of it. So, first order of business is trying to climb through all the shit they’ve piled on top of us.”

“Ha, just like a turd blossom!” I wiggle my fingers against his ribs.

“I’m not ticklish,” he says dryly.

“How boring.”

“Listen, I like the idea of that nickname, but I can’t see myself calling you anything that has anything to do with shit.”

“Well, I don’t need a nickname. I’m good with you calling me by my name.”

He watches me with pursed lips. His eyes narrow and then he holds his wrist up so the face of it is in my line of sight.

“See those stones? Can you tell if they’re real?”

I drag my finger over the halo of diamonds on his watch’s face.

“I can’t tell. I don’t think I’ve ever seen real diamonds in my life,” I admit and peer at them.

“What’s your first impression?” he asks.

I examine them again. “They’re pretty, but they kinda look just like the stones in a ring I bought myself for Christmas at Macy’s,” I muse.

“I think unless you’re an expert, you probably can’t tell them apart from other clear stones.”

“So why do people pay so much for them?” I ask.

“They’re rarer than most stones, stronger than most, too. So, yeah, there are lots of things that might look like them, but when you test their strength, they'll show you why they're worthy of the price tag."

His voice is roughened by exhaustion, but it's soothing. Everything about him is; his voice, his hands, his body, the way he touches me—it all feels right.

It's almost six o'clock in the morning, and we've been talking all night. The buttery morning sun peeks through the dark green wooden shutters that are ubiquitous to all of the villas along this stretch of coast. I watch the dust motes dance in the rays that fall on the tangle of white sheets that we've cocooned ourselves in. It's also a reminder that a new day is here and that in a couple of days I'll be on a plane back to reality.

"That's how I'd describe you," he says and my eyes snap back to him. He's staring at the face of his watch still.

"How?" I ask.

"A diamond. Well, durable, rare, stronger than you look—a treasure." And when he says those words, I think how right they feel.

"I agree," I say, and then flush with embarrassment. "I'm not vain," I say defensively.

He disentangles himself from me, and I land with a small bounce on the soft mattress we're laying on.

I find myself looking up him. He's propped his head on his fist, and he's watching me.

"There's nothing wrong with vanity, Confidence. I've never met a woman more entitled to her vanity than you. I'll call you ... just that, Tesoro." His fingers trail up my arm.

"That's what you called me tonight when you were being rude," I remind him.

"I didn't mean it then. But it turns out that it was portent." His fingers skim my shoulder and trip up my neck before they delve into my hair.

"I like that, even though you're just trying to make up for being such a dick tonight," I tell him dismissively. But inside I flail, flutter, and swell with pleasure.

“Yeah, I am,” he says slowly.

I laugh at the surprise on his face.

“Is that rare?”

“Yeah, I’m not usually worried about making up for being anything. Most of the time, out of either necessity, obligation, or a combination of both, I’m forced to make hard decisions, to speak harshly to people I respect, to say no to people I love. But, right now, I feel like I can just be myself. And remorse is something I’m glad I can still feel. It reminds me I’m human,” he says a little absently, like he’s thinking out loud. His fingers skim—with no real agenda—up and down my side. “So, this is just because it feels right to say that I’m sorry.” He focuses on me again, and when our eyes connect, we click into place like well-oiled gears and just look at each other. He’s got a mole—tiny and the same color as his skin—on the left side of his mouth. His five o’clock shadow is heavy and rides up his cheeks. The light from the lamp overhead cuts between and lights his face so his lashes make shadows on his cheeks. I trail my fingers along the shadows and say, “Thanks for apologizing.”

He sighs.

“I wish I could go to the beginning. When I saw you in the hallway outside my room, I should have dragged you into my room and kissed you,” he says slowly.

“But, I wouldn’t change a thing. I mean, that kiss would have been awesome. But everything that’s happened since was like a prelude to all of this. I’ve gotten the chance to know the man behind those lips,” I say suggestively.

I lean up and kiss the tiny frown that’s marring his lips away.

“And?”

“And now, this kiss is going to be something much better than awesome ... it’ll be honest,” I say. I brush my mouth against his and I feel it in my core. Sexual tension inside of me. I’m dying to be with him.

“I like that,” he says, then leans down and kisses me back. His lips are soft and insistent on my mouth, and I open for him.

The pads of his long fingers scrape my scalp and his thumbs cup my jaw while we kiss. It is achingly tender, and with each press of our lips, my desire for him blooms even bigger and brighter. Our tongues do an erotic slide and rub that makes my toes curl. I've kissed my fair share of men, but this is different. It doesn't have an agenda. It's not foreplay. It's just a kiss for the sake of it. He groans into my mouth and bites my lower lip before he sucks on it. Heat floods my body. My heart rate rises. This kiss is everything. He's my river. I am drowning in him. And, I don't want to be rescued.

"Your mouth ... it's so fucking sweet," he whispers before we're kissing again. His hand slides from my hair down my back, grips my ass, and works its way back up to grasp the back of my neck and hold me in place while we share a kiss that's far beyond anything I imagined a kiss could be. Heat is licking at my skin; I feel like I'm on fire. I sink my fingers into his hair and nibble on his lips before I break our lip-lock. I drop kisses on his chin and underneath.

A yawn cracks my jaw and surprises me so much I almost choke on the air I inhale.

"Well, glad to know my kiss bored you to sleep," he says dryly.

"More like it wore my jaw out," I say and yawn again.

He yawns, too, then groans and pulls me into a bear hug. "Let's sleep. I have a call at 9:00 a.m. and then I'll be working for the rest of the day."

He nestles his head on top of mine, tucks his hands underneath me, and pulls me flush against him.

I laugh at the way he's cocooned me.

"I would never have guessed you grew up sleeping with a binkie. You're a pro at the full body wraparound snuggle," I say.

"Binkie?" he asks sleepily.

"Binkie. That's what we call security blankets, stuffed animal, your mama's T-shirt. You know, something that you hold because it helps you sleep."

“Well, clearly, I’m a natural at the full body wraparound, because I can confirm, you’re my very first one.” He drops a kiss on the top of my head and sighs, deep and content before his breathing evens out.

And I lie there and let myself enjoy what I know will go down as one of the best nights of my life.

Confidence

“Woah, yeah. Hayes, this is a full 180 from where you were last night. Last night you said, and I quote, ‘I would have fucked her, but I could never have brought her home.’” My brother Dare peers into the FaceTime screen on my phone.

I bristle. “I didn’t say that,” I say.

“Actually, you texted it, but either way, that’s how you described her. And now ...”

“Things have changed, and I need to know who she is,” I tell him.

His one-eyed squint full of skeptical amusement, he asks, “Who are you and what did you do with my older brother? Mr. I’ll – never — date — seriously — again?” Dare frowns.

“Listen, I need to get in there. I just wanted to see if you could get me the background check without me having to use official channels. If you’re just going to talk shit, I’ll talk to you later,” I snap at him and run my fingers through my hair.

“Wait, at least let me give you some advice. Because if nothing else, you know you’re moving too fast, or else you wouldn’t have called me,” he drawls.

“It is too fast. But I need to make sure this isn’t another Renee situation. Can you get it? Or not?” I fix him with a stony glare. He rolls his eyes in defeat but pushes back one more time.

“Why don’t you just get to know her yourself? Don’t freak out because you actually like her. I mean, it sucks that she’s ‘unpolished and unbred’—”

“Hey, I didn’t say that,” I protest.

“That’s what you said it boils down to. And if you’re really worried about her pedigree, maybe you’re not ready to be with anyone right now.”

“I don’t give a shit about her pedigree. And don’t be dramatic, Dare.” I dismiss his rebuke.

“Hayes, a background check is fucking dramatic. And it’s dishonest. What’ll you do if she finds out?”

“How would she find out?”

“Well, hopefully, when you realize what a dick move it was and tell her,” he says.

“I’m glad you’ve finally found a moral compass, Dare. How about you practice using it before you start lecturing me about honesty,” I say sarcastically.

He laughs. “I’ve always had a good moral compass. Just not when it comes to my own life.”

I frown at him.

He sighs and shakes his head. “Why don’t you just trust what you feel, He-man?” He uses the nickname he gave me when our parents first got married. I lean against the wall and scowl at him.

“Because, I don’t trust myself. Not anymore. I just inherited the keys to a kingdom, Dare, and whoever I’m with will have access to them. I need to be sure. If you can’t do it, I have two other guys I can call,” I tell him flatly.

He sits up and takes a deep breath with his vape pen in between his lips. “I got you, bro.” He says it with barely tepid enthusiasm.

“Somehow, that doesn’t inspire confidence, Dare,” I mutter.

“Yeah. Well, I said I’d do it. I didn’t say I’d pretend to enjoy it. I hope once it comes back, you’ll find a way to tell her and apologize.”

“Sure, any other advice?” I ask sarcastically.

“When you fuck her, only kiss her once and make sure when you come you aren’t looking her in the eyes.—”

“I do not need any advice about how to fuck, Dare,” I tell him and grimace in annoyance.

“I only meant until you get the background check results and can confirm that falling in love with her is safe.”

“Dare ...” I growl impatiently.

He winks. “I’ll never lie to you. I know your bark is worse than your bite. And I’m your brother. We’re BFFs forever,” he chirps in a high-pitched voice.

“Shut up and get me the info,” I snap, and I hear his laughter when I press the end call button.

I got a call from the office in the middle of the wedding ceremony. I stepped out of the tiny seaside chapel to take it and I’ve been gone for more than an hour. I had been more than ready to go find Confidence, but I needed to call Dare first.

I walk back to the terrace where the tent has been set up for two days. During the day, the flaps are raised, and you can see clear to the horizon.

Tonight, it’s pouring rain outside. And the curtains are tightly closed against it. The ceiling is pitch black and blanketed with thousands of rows of twinkling lights in the shape of stars. Huge, lush trees with golden, round imitation fruit hanging off them line the walls and act as cover for the seating alcoves tucked into the corners of the space. There are flowers everywhere that complete the look. It sets a beautiful scene. Yet, it all fades into the background when I finally see her.

Nothing in this room is nearly as beautiful, original, or fresh as Confidence. I’ve thought of nearly nothing else since I laid eyes on her in the hallway.

Her golden spun hair is swept off her neck and face and piled in a mass of curls on the top of her head like a crown. She’s got some sort of jewelry interspersed in it and the stones fire like diamonds when they catch the lights from overhead. The thin white straps of her dress cling to her shoulders, but they look like they’d slip off at the slightest provocation.

A gust of wind.

The gentle nudge of my nose.

In the hungry grip of my teeth.

The lights overhead reflect on her bare back like a cloak of diamonds. How fucking appropriate.

I keep my eyes on her as I approach and watch the movements of her back and the elegant sway of her neck as she laughs at something. I can't wait to press my lips to that sweet, fragrant skin.

Her hand slides up to caress the very spot I was just fantasizing about. Her fingers linger there and her head lolls slightly. And like she can sense me, she turns her graceful neck until she's facing me.

The smile on her face when she sees me feels too good to be true. We hold eyes as I walk up to the table.

Am I being a fool?

Does it matter if it's just going to be a few days of fun?

Will a few days of fun be enough? I push aside the unease that pings in my chest at that thought.

Conversation stops when I get to the table. I smile at them, greet a few by name. Their response is universal and reminds me why I sit by myself. They all congratulate me on my chairmanship and a few ask for a meeting.

When I've finally done my social duty, I smile down at Confidence. "Good evening." A small dimple indents the middle of her right cheek. I run the tip of my finger over it and trace the underside of her lip. Her skin feels like the softest velvet. She blushes and tucks a thick strand of curls behind her ear and smiles wide.

"Did you rest this afternoon?" I tip her chin up with my finger and her delicate throat bobs.

Oh, yes. There's something about her.

"Yeah, I did. How was work?" she asks. Her blue eyes catch the light and glimmer with desire. I stroke her shoulder and fiddle with the thin strap of her dress.

“I wanted to come and see you, but—”

“Excuse me, Mr. Rivers.” A hand taps my sleeve, and I look down at the man sitting next to her. “Yes?” I glance down at him in irritation.

He gives me a wan smile and sits up straighter. “I just wanted to introduce myself. I’m Giovanni Caselli.” He nods at Confidence. “I’m this young lady’s escort tonight. I met her in the bar—” I immediately tune him out.

“Would you like a drink?” I ask Confidence. She shoots a worried glance at her companion and then back at me. “Maybe a limoncello, but it can wait. You just got here,” she says.

“Mr. Caselli, if you would,” I look down at the third wheel and scowl. “I’ll have a whisky soda.”

He only hesitates for the blink of an eye before he stands up. “Oh, it would be my honor to fetch you a drink, Mr. Rivers,” he says. His thickly accented English is perfect and he bobs up and down. “Please feel free to use my seat while I’m gone.”

Fucking coward.

I lean in and whisper in his ear, “Invia un server con i nostri drink in modo da poterti concentrare sulla ricerca di un altro posto.” Send a waiter with our drinks and find yourself another seat.

His eyes widen at my directive, but he nods, bows to the rest of the table, and with a furtive, “Ciao” in Confidence’s direction, he darts off.

“What did you say to him?” she asks with a disapproving laugh. I drop down in the seat next to her and grab the leg of hers and drag it over.

“I thanked him for keeping my seat warm,” I say with a shrug. My eyes sweep the rest of the table, and a few of the eyes trained on us zip away. But a couple actually gawk for another second before they bend their heads together to gossip.

“Why is everyone staring?” she whispers, her eyes wide as she looks around the table.

“They’re shocked that I’m sitting here. I haven’t had a plus one in five years. For me, these events are about business. It’s a chance to catch people with their guard down, make a deal that would be impossible to hatch in a boardroom.”

“So, you don’t have business this time?” she asks.

“Yeah ... You,” I say.

She laughs. “You’re so smooth when you want to be,” she teases.

I pick up her hand and place it in my palm. She stops laughing and wraps her delicate fingers around mine. Her nails are painted a light pink. They’re short, simple, but so fucking pretty. Just like her.

“But I can’t seem to stop touching you,” I say quietly and look back at her face.

Her eyes sink their hooks into me and reel me in. I go willingly. I want to backstroke in those baby blues. Her full, red lips are parted and soft.

She’s practically drooling.

“Does it turn you on?” I ask, half teasing, half pleased as fuck.

She’s good company. I feel completely comfortable with her. Like I do with my brothers, and a very small handful of friends. She’s smart and funny. And she looks at me and just sees a man she’s attracted to. Not what I can do for her.

It’s bad timing. I have so much on my plate. I have no idea what will happen when the wedding is over. But, I know that I’d like to see her again. Is she even thinking about it, or is this really just the weekend fling she talked about last night?

“What are you thinking?” she asks.

“This and that,” I say vaguely, but I add a smile so she doesn’t pick up on the prickle of unease in my gut

I trace her finger absently and think about what I said to Dare. It’s true—it would be seen as a misalliance. But, it wouldn’t be. There's nothing I've seen that says she's not amazing. I want to explore what we've ignited this weekend.

"What are you thinking?" I ask.

She raises her eyebrows in amusement. "Just that I'm sure everyone would be shocked to find that underneath your Duke of Midnight persona, you're really an introvert who creates distance to prevent being disappointed."

"I have no idea what the Duke of Midnight reference alludes to, but the rest is essentially correct," I admit with a shrug. I am very well aware of all of my shortcomings and of my character. The way my past experiences have shaped the way I build relationships. I see them as just part and parcel of who I am.

"Duke of Midnight ... It's the title of a book I read a few years ago. A historical romance where, by day, the duke is an autocratic and powerful member of parliament. By night, though, he was a sort of protector of the poor—Victorian England's version of Batman. Anyway, no one would have guessed that his motivations were all about avenging his parents' murders and not about being the most powerful duke in the world. It's such a great book. And after yesterday, I think you'd be just like that if circumstances called for it." She smiles.

I hear Dare's voice in my head when she does exactly what he suggested I try—trusting how she feels and what I've shown her to decide if I'm worth knowing. I feel my first niggle of guilt about ordering that background check.

I swivel the small stack of delicate gold rings that adorn her middle finger.

She's told me about losing her job. If there's nothing more scandalous in her past than that, then it would be a good indicator that there won't be anything scandalous in her future. After Renee, I won't take any more chances with the women in my life. My responsibility is to make sure I pass on a legacy worth fighting for to the next generation. My personal desires come second to that.

My brothers have talked themselves blue in the face trying to convince me that I should date again. I've ignored them. They have the luxury of doing whatever they want. As long as I'm alive, it's my responsibility to continue the family name. Have children, grow what we have—to continue funding medical research, continue investing in the city that made us who we are. And to steer us in the direction of being what we've always been. Leaders, contributors, powerful, and respected.

The tickle of her fingers tracing my knuckles draws me back to the moment. I glance up at her face to find her watching our joined hands, lost in an internal conversation of her own. I watch her unobserved and lose the ability to breathe.

She's more beautiful than anyone has the right to be. And the longer I look at her, the more I'm sure she's the most beautiful woman I've ever seen. Her lush lips are coated in an obscenely sexy, slick, red lipstick. Her cheeks shimmer with what looks like gold dust. How fitting, since she looks like a very sexy fairy. Her dress is white lace confection that's stark in contrast to the smooth tanned skin of her chest and arms. Her hair sits in a blonde knot that kisses the nape of her neck and I'm jealous of it. I imagine closing my lips over that spot and whirling my tongue over it before I sucked her hard enough to leave a mark.

She's still staring at our hands and her lips lift in a quirk.

She traces the network of veins that cross the back of my hand.

"You've got such big hands," she says absently.

"Yours are so small," I respond.

I feel eyes on us, and when I look back at the table, their eyes all dart away like roaches when the lights come on. I should give them something to make their gossip worth it.

"Let's dance," I say.

"I thought you didn't dance," she says.

I answer by standing up and holding my hand out to her.

"May I?" I ask with a formal bow.

She giggles, but pouts and points down at her booted foot with a frown. The large plastic boot that's holding her sprained ankle in place sticks out of the bottom of her long, flowing, white lace skirt.

"I can't dance on it; walking is about as good as it gets."

"You can if you're standing on my feet," I tell her.

Her eyes widen with surprise and her mouth drops open in a happy smile. She stands up, grabs my hands, and beams up at me.

"That's the nicest thing, but I'm not exactly small and this boot—"

"You're tiny," I retort.

"I'm short, but I'm certainly more than a small handful." She starts to sit back down, but I put a hand at her waist and pull her gently into my chest.

"Well, it's a good thing I have these big hands, isn't it?" I murmur in her ear. I lead her slowly onto the dance floor and point down at my feet.

"Climb on." I hold out my upturned hands to her.

She gives me a slightly skeptical smile before she says, "Okay. But you better not let me fall," she warns and then she puts one foot on top of mine.

"Never," I say and tighten my grip on her waist.

The song starts to fade and the next one starts.

"Oh, my goodness, is this Elvis?" she asks as she places the ball of her silver ballet-slipped foot onto my other.

"He's very popular in Europe," I say and smile as the strains of the song "Can't Help Falling in Love" start to play. I look up to the ceiling of the tent and thank my dad for the sign.

I slip both of my arms around her waist and draw her into me. The bodice of her dress has a V down the front that stops a few inches above her belly button. The one in the back is just as deep and twice as wide. She looks like an entire meal tonight.

I slide one hand up the expanse of velvet skin of her back and wrap the other around her waist.

“Slip your arms around my neck,” I murmur. She does it slowly, her eyes on my mouth as her fingers link behind my neck.

Now, we’re chest to chest, hip to hip, thigh to thigh, and cheek to cheek. Elvis is crooning about wise men and fools. This unexpectedly wonderful woman amazes me. And I can’t help but nod in agreement when he sings, “some things are meant to be.”

I lean in, brush a kiss across her soft, pliant lips. The touch pulses. The air is vibrating with attraction and the pull between us is a living thing.

“Do you feel that?” she asks, her voice full of innocent wonder.

My short beard brushes the soft, sweetly fragrant skin of her cheek.

“Yeah, I do.”

“I think it’s the air and the water. It’s so beautiful here,” she says softly. She drops her head on my shoulder. I glare down and her eyes are closed. A small smile pulls at her lips.

“I think it’s us,” I whisper in her ear and drag my lips to that dimple and drop a kiss on it. “You’re beautiful.”

“So are you,” she replies with a drowsy smile, and I laugh dismissively. I step back and forth, my hand at her waist tightening to hold her flush against me.

“Not one single person has ever called me that before.” I laugh.

Her eyes pop open and cast a haze of desire that traps me in its azure net. My heart jerks in my chest, and the laughter dies in my throat.

“Then, they must not have been looking at you at all,” she whispers. Then, she takes my big hand into her much smaller, much prettier one, puts it to her delicious lips, and drags a kiss across my knuckles.

I'm moving in a small circle of slow two-steps. The music blends in with the rest of the background noise, and all I hear is the beating of my heart and the thud of my racing pulse in my ears.

There's a storm brewing between us. It's loud and it builds in a slow stream of tension that's permeating the air.

I feel it in my racing pulse.

I feel it in the tingle at the base of my spine.

And when she sways into me, she feels it in the ardent pressure of my rock-hard dick between us.

"Oh my God," she gasps, and twines her fingers into the hair at the base of my neck.

Without a single thought for propriety or gossip, I bend and slip my arm under her knees and lift her in my arms.

A loud cheer goes up in the crowd as I shoulder my way through the dance floor and out of the tent.

"Oh my Lord, what are you doing?" she asks in a whoop of laughter as she tightens her arms around my neck.

"I'm taking you to the closest room with a door. When we get there, I'm going to throw up that skirt and take off whatever's underneath it and fuck you," I growl before I kiss her hard and fast.

We step into the carpeted lobby of the villa and scan the room until I see a swinging door with the light off inside. I head straight for it.

"This is crazy," she gasps into my neck. "I feel like I'm on fire, Hayes. I've never ... I don't know what it is." She starts to squirm.

"I do. It's whatever fucking pheromone you're secreting. It makes me want to beat my fucking chest and rut with you while everyone watches," I say and kick the door open. I set her down before I feel around for a light switch. The bright fluorescent bulb flickers a few times before it floods the room with light. It's a utility closet with a waist high counter running down the middle.

“Perfect,” I whisper.

I wrap my arms around her waist and hoist her up, the voluminous layers of her skirt crushed in my hold. I stare at her face for just a second and I’ll never forget the way her eyes burned with need right before I took her mouth in a kiss I’d been thinking about for almost twenty-four hours.

She opens like the beautiful flower she is and my tongue slips into her sweet, warm mouth.

She’s like nothing I’ve ever felt.

She feels like mine.

So much like mine.

For tonight, at least, she will be.

I drop her onto the work bench and break our kiss. I shove her lace skirt up to her waist and her hand falls to my belt. I slide my hand up her thigh. “Your skin is so... soft. May I?” I ask.

She growls. “Please. Just touch me.”

I kiss her again and press my palm to the damp, heated slip of silk between her legs. I pull it so it slides between her lips. She moans into my mouth and unzips my pants.

“Please hurry. I want you inside me so badly, it hurts,” she moans.

I slip my hands back in between her splayed thighs, and I play with her pussy. I slip a finger inside her, rub her wetness up her slit and rub her clit. She lets loose a broken sob when I pinch it at the same time that I nip the tender skin on her throat.

“What are you doing to me?” She pants and throws her head back. It hits the wall behind her.

“I’m about to fuck you until you come so hard and loud that they’ll hear you in the other room.”

“Yes. God,” she groans and leans forward to wrap a hand around me. She strokes up, and I thrust up into her hand.

“I want you so badly,” I growl and grab a handful of her ass and squeeze it until I’m sure my fingers will leave an imprint.

She moans, and her legs spread even farther apart.

“Then fucking take me,” she says impatiently.

I pull her off the bench and turn her around.

I lift her skirt and expose her round, luscious ass. I slap it, and she jumps. But then her hips loosen.

“Let me fuck you how I know you need.” I slip my fingers around the soaked piece of fabric that’s drawn between her lips.

“Yes, please...”

“Why did you even bother wearing these?” I slip two fingers inside her and press up.

“Because, I imagined that you might want to rip them off,” she says and shoots a satisfied grin over her shoulder. I give the silk scrap of fabric a sharp tug, and they give up their hold on her body and fall into my hand. I stuff them into the pocket of my shirt. I push her legs even farther apart and thrust three fingers inside her. Her back arches and she groans into the table top.

“Your pussy is fucking unreal.” I swivel my hand and she pulses around my fingers and rotates her hips.

I pull out of her and fish a condom out of my pocket. I roll it on and spread her wetness from my fingers all over it.

“I want you so much,” she moans.

“Then, get your pussy on my dick, Tesoro,” I say and pull her back onto me. She thrusts back and starts fucking herself. I watch my dick glide in and out of her and wonder if I could build a shrine to her cunt. I grab her hips and slam up on her next downward slide. She screams, loud enough that it carries out into the hallway and mingles with the sounds of conversation on the other side of the door.

“Do you like that I’m fucking you where everyone can hear?” I whisper in her ear.

I slide the strap of her dress down and I pull down the bodice. Her round, full-as-fuck, pink-tipped breast spills out.

“Yes,” she pants in my ear.

“Why?” I rain kisses down her throat and bite her shoulder, nudging her entrance with the head of my cock.

“I want them to know I fucked my dream man tonight,” she croons, and I laugh.

“Dream man?”

She turns her head over her shoulder and holds me in the sweet snare of her azure gaze. “Yes. My dream man. Who looks like a king and fucks me like I’m his queen. Who is so fierce and so raw on the inside that he bleeds everything he’s feeling straight into his eyes,” she pants.

My heart stutters to a stop at how sure she sounds and how good it feels to be seen.

I lean down, press a kiss to her mouth, and start fucking her again. She breaks the kiss and presses her face into the table with a deep, satisfied moan.

I sweep her few errant curls off her shoulders and press my mouth into the slope where her shoulder meets her neck and press forward with hard, shallow thrusts.

“Fuck, fuck, fuck, fuck.” The feeling of being balls deep inside her is indescribable.

I feel like a fucking king.

I surge forward and drive her into the table. Her booted foot makes contact with my shin, and I ask, “Are you okay?” without slowing my rhythm. She nods. I fist my hand in her hair and pull a fist full of her hair back. I press our cheeks together.

“Jesus, you feel like a goddamn dream. I want to watch you come,” I pull out of her and turn her on her back. I thrust back into her in one long, hard push of my hips.

“Ahhhhh,” she wails and I get to watch the achingly beautiful expression on her face when my name pushes up her throat and out of her mouth in the sexiest whimper I've ever heard.

I push even deeper.

"Yes, sing for me, Tesoro," I coax her. Her facial expression ebbs between ecstasy and pain, and then to bliss while I fuck her. My hand is grasping her thigh and her arms are flung wide on the table.

I pull the straps of her sleeves down so that both of her breasts are exposed to me. I bite down on one of her hard, pink-as-the-inside-of-a-seashell nipple and she starts to cry my name over and over. I focus on the satin fist her pussy is making around my cock. I lose myself in her cries and race toward the relief I need like I need air.

I already want her again.

I bury my face in her neck, hold her succulent ass with one hand and hold the other flat against the wall beside her head.

She presses her warm, soft lips to my ear and flicks her tongue along the shell of it. "There's a hurricane swirling inside of me," she whispers.

"That's me," I tell her between small nips at her throat.

"I'm coming apart," she moans.

My breath hitches. I pull back and look into her limpid, breathtakingly bright eyes. She touches her open mouth to mine and kisses me softly.

"It feels so good, I don't know what to do." Her breath comes in short puffs.

"Like I've never ..." She trails off.

"I know; it feels too good to be true, right?" I stare into her eyes and the naked desire in them, the honesty in her gaze, moves something inside of me.

Yes, I like her.

"Like ... I'll never, ever get enough," she says in a low, but strong voice.

Her eyes light with a fierceness before her mouth is back on mine. She grips my neck, twines her fingers into my hair and pulls herself up my body.

Her legs tighten around my waist. I let go of her ass and press my other hand to the wall. "I want to make you come," she groans just as she lifts up and slams back down on my cock.

She squeezes me in rhythmic pulses that shoot pleasure straight to my balls. Like a slave following his master's command, I start to come in a rush that blindsides me.

My knees buckle and I close my eyes against the suddenly unbearably bright light in the room. She rides me through my orgasm and slips a hand in between her legs. "I can't come without my clit," she pants before she starts rubbing between her legs.

"Let me," I breathe and stand up. I take the condom off and toss it in the trash can next to the door. I spread her thighs and admire the sweet, wet, swollen pussy I just finished fucking. I bend and squat until my face is right where it wants to be. I lick her from the tender spot above her pucker all the way to her clit, and I pull it into my mouth. I suck hard, soft, flick my tongue, nip with my teeth until I know what she needs. And then, I eat her until she comes. Her hands fist in my hair even while she squirms away from my mouth. I press my palm to the center of her stomach and hold her in place and suck her clit until she screams my name. I want to beat my chest and throw her over my shoulder.

I stand up and stare down at her.

She's slumped against the wall like a rag doll. Her hair is spilling free of the pins she used to put it up and now curling strands lay tousled all around her shoulders.

"That was ..." She sighs and eyes me lazily out of half-open eyes.

"Yeah, it was ... crazy," I say and tuck my shirt back into my trousers and fasten them.

She pouts.

I tug her dress straps up over her shoulders and cover her breasts.

“You’re killing my dreams,” she complains, a frown puckering a swollen, sultry mouth.

“What dreams are those?”

“Ones where you’re not getting dressed and pulling my dress back in place,” she says in a sexy tone.

“It’s bad enough that I carried you off the dance floor and fucked you in a utility closet with a door that doesn’t close properly,” I remind her.

Her face flashes a hot red and she sits up and crosses her arms over her chest and looks over my shoulder at the door.

“Oh my God, it’s a swinging door, Hayes. What if someone saw us?” she asks.

“Then, they got a fucking great show,” I say and run the tip of my finger over the gentle slope of her lips.

“I’m only getting dressed so I can carry you up to my room. I think walking through the lobby would turn our tryst into flagrantre delicto.”

“In what?” she asks

“It’s Latin. Translated literally, it means a blazing offense,” I tell her with a smile. “These days it’s sort of synonymous for walking around in a state of undress.” I start to lift her and she stiffens and puts her hands on my bicep to stop me.

“I can walk. You can’t be carrying me everywhere,” she says. Her brows are drawn and she looks ready to argue. I kiss her, and she melts against me. I scoop her up and hold her to my chest, and her arms go around my neck. I take one last sip of her and then break our kiss. A satisfied smile stretches across her sexy lips and the protest she put up a second ago is gone. I kick the door open and step out into the hallway and start toward the rear of the villa.

“The elevator is that way.” She points a graceful finger in the opposite direction.

“We’re not taking the elevator,” I inform her.

“Why not?”

“It’ll take too long.” I wink and start up the narrow stairs to my room. “I’m in a hurry.”

Chapter Seven

Andiamo

Confidence

“That was so beautiful, Hayes.” I watch in awe as his fingers skip across the ivory keys of the piano and then stop.

“Thank you. My aunt Gigi taught me, and even though my hands are big, it came naturally.”

We’re seated at the piano, and Hayes is peeling back even more layers. He plays the piano beautifully. “So, this is like your last hurrah, too?” I ask with a waggle of my eyebrows.

“I wouldn’t have thought of it that way, actually, but you’ve definitely put the hurrah into this trip.” He waggles his thick brows back to me and gives my hand a squeeze.

“Well, I’m glad I could be of service.” I snuggle into him. We’re waiting for our airport shuttle in the lobby. Our flights are a couple hours apart, but we’re heading to the airport early to avoid the larger crowds leaving later this afternoon.

Cass is asleep on the little divan in the corner. Her black fedora is pulled down over her eyes and she’s got her sunglasses on.

“She had a good weekend.” Hayes nods in her direction.

“So did I,” I say. “Who would have known that you are such a Renaissance Man, Hayes.”

He presses a finger to my lips and looks around the room. “Shh... I like them being a little afraid of me.” He laughs and I admire the way his shirt bunches around broad shoulders when they shake with laughter. I want to soak up every detail.

“I can’t believe we’re leaving today. It’s been amazing.” I drop my head to his shoulder and link my arms through his.

“I want to see you again,” he says suddenly and my happy heart leaps in my chest. Warmth suffuses my body and I’m surprised at how elated I feel. But, I don’t question it. None of it. This weekend has been magical and full of surprises. Hayes is the most magical one of all. I’ve never had such an instant and tenacious connection before.

“I would love that,” I agree softly.

He reaches up and pulls his phone and a pair of black-framed glasses out of his breast pocket.

“Let’s look at our calendars,” he says and slips the glasses on his nose.

“Your glasses are hot,” I say, admiring the profile.

“Right.” He rolls his eyes dismissively. “First, what’s your number?”

I rattle it off and he puts his in my phone. “What’s the rest of your summer like?” he says.

“Mine is pretty open,” I say cheerily. Inside, my stomach knots when I think about the absence of job interviews, or anything else, on my calendar.

“I’ll be in Houston next week, I could fly you in,” he says.

“Fly me in?” I question, and I feel the first prickle of discomfort.

“Yeah, you said Arkansas? I can send a plane,” he says nonchalantly, his eyes still glued to his phone, his fingers flying across his keyboard.

“I can fly myself to see you.” My pride is bruised a little.

“Why would you do that? You’re not working, right?” he asks quizzically.

“Why did you get a job instead of living on your family’s millions?” I ask him.

He pauses his typing and slides his gaze sideways in my direction.

“What?” I ask when he doesn’t say anything.

“That’s hardly the same. It’s just a quick flight,” he says slowly.

“To you, it’s just a flight. But this is my first time out of the country and only the fifth time I’ve ever been on a plane. It took me four months of dedicated saving to afford the flight from Memphis to Austin when I left for college,” I tell him. “I’ll never see a flight as nothing. And given the way things between us got started, I couldn’t even imagine you buying me a plane ticket—or anything else.”

He stares at me for a long moment. His gaze is assessing, and I can practically hear the wheels spinning in his head.

“Fine,” he says. “Then I’ll come visit you.”

“Okay ...” I clear my throat. “I’m telling you it’s probably not anything like what you’re used to.”

“I’m good at getting used to new situations,” he says pensively. His fingers drum the piano keys lightly and make a tinkling melody that is so contrary to the heaviness in his voice.

“I just moved back to Houston, started a new job; it’s been fine.” He sounds like he’s trying to convince himself.

I nudge his arm lightly with my shoulder. “You sound thrilled about it.” He smiles absently but doesn’t look away from the keyboard. “I don’t know what I am,” he says and shakes his head slightly. His lips quirk, and when he turns his head to look at me, conflict has muddled his normally clear gaze.

“What do you mean?” I rub up and down his arm.

“It’s strange to step into the role as the head of a family that I don’t really know. I was born to it, but that doesn’t feel like enough of a reason. Does that make sense?” he asks.

I turn fully now and wait until he does the same and we’re face to face.

I trace the uneven bridge of his nose and gaze into his keen, green hazel eyes while I try to find the words to answer him.

We only met two days ago. We bonded during a highly stressful moment. I was terrified on that ledge. I know how lucky I was. If I'd fallen on another part of that path, I wouldn't be sitting here. That he was there feels like a very significant detail. One that, despite being mainly a coincidence, I think it will change the course of my life. I overshared a lot on Friday night. I don't regret it. Yet without the rush of adrenaline from that evening and with our separation looming, my feelings aren't as sanguine as they were yesterday.

I'm grateful for the serendipity that brought us together. But, lightning doesn't strike in the same place more than once.

I'm glad we didn't walk out of here and leave our reunion to fate. A tangible chemistry courses between us. It carries with it an effortless ease, an immediate comfort and mountain of physical attraction. He's powerful, brilliant, passionate, decisive, honest, funny, and he's kind. He's shown me all of that and it's only been one weekend. What would it be like to spend a whole week, month, year with him? I can't wait to find out. I have a feeling. Just a feeling... That this man could be my man. So, I decide I'm going to fake it until I make it happen.

I stand and extend my hand. "Let's go out onto the terrace. It's quiet and private." He nods and smiles up at me for a beat before he takes my hand into his and stands up.

We step out onto the red brick paved balcony. It's another beautiful, if unpredictable, day. Puffy light gray and white clouds dot the powdery blue sky, birds are chirping, the sea rolls and crashes, and the breeze blows lightly around us. From here, the menace of the rocks that I fell from is obscured by a blanket of pine trees. The beach below is beautifully kept and the water is crystal clear.

He stands behind me, wraps his arms around my waist and drops his chin on my shoulder. I cover his hands with mine and try to memorize the way it feels to have him surrounding me. He sighs—it's not a heavy sigh, but it's not one that says, "I'm content."

"I'm listening, Hayes," I say into the silence.

“Yeah, I can tell.” His voice vibrates from his chest and resonates against my back. I feel the gratitude in his words, even though he didn’t express it explicitly.

We speak with our brains. People hear with their hearts.

“I’ve been preparing half my life for a job that I don’t feel even close to being ready to assume. My father, and then my aunt, told me repeatedly that I have something important to do with my life. And now, it’s one of my strongest desires,” he says.

“I think that’s what everyone wants,” I say.

“No.” He shakes his head and his chin brushes my hair. I nestle tighter against him and his hands come off the rail and wrap around me. It’s the most possessive yet tender embrace. “Some people just want to be important. There’s a difference. I’m learning it now. I’m seeing it in you. Everyone I know is pursuing glory for themselves. Money for themselves. Prosperity for themselves.” His arms tighten around me. “You’re talking about preserving things that benefit your entire community. That’s how I want to think about my family. If I only have this finite time to make my mark, then I want to do it in a way that matters. Like you said, make it count for more than just time spent,” he says.

“Yeah.” I nod, but inside of me, something is blooming. He listened to me. He thought about what I said and found value in it. I think this man might be a unicorn.

He tilts his chin in the direction of the horizon and says, “Those men who sailed out past what looked like flat earth and kept going even though they weren’t sure they wouldn’t fall off—they’re the people I admire. They conquered the earth and then laid claim to it,” he says.

“Tell that to them.” He nods at the horizon again.

I turn to face him. His eyes are bright and beautiful and just looking into them steals my breath. But I force my mind back to the point I want to make. “Maybe it’s because I grew up on the river. No levee we’ll ever build is strong enough to hold back more rain than the human mind can imagine. Mother nature is merciless. It made me realize how really insignificant we all are,” I say.

“You’re only insignificant if you leave nothing worthwhile and lasting behind,” he pushes back.

“How do we measure what’s worthwhile? Who decides that?”

“What does history record?” he asks.

“Are you saying that if we don’t write down what happened here this weekend you’ll forget it and it won’t mark a moment in your life that will influence how you make decisions in the future?” I ask.

“No, I’m not saying that. And that’s a very nicely-made point,” he says with respect in his voice. I shrug and turn back around to look out at the horizon.

“Until you’ve been overwhelmed by life—found a wave you can’t surf, a mountain you can’t scale, a river you can’t cross—it’s really hard to understand how small you are,” I say.

“I guess ...” he says.

“If I hadn’t seen how mother nature gives not one whit about even the best laid plans of men, I may not be sure either. To watch that happen is humbling, heartbreaking, and transformative. We don’t conquer anything. We just have use of it for a short while, but those trees, they grow back.

“Those monuments? They need men to write their existence into history. On the other hand, the acts of bravery and kindness those horrible events inspire may not make it into history books. But they will pass from generation to generation by word of mouth. And when people hear about them, they’ll get goose bumps,” I say.

“So, instead of conquering, I should be thinking about contributing something lasting,” he muses.

“That’s for you to decide. But it’s what I hope for. That I’ll do well enough with my life that when my story is told or read ...” I drawl and he laughs. “That people will feel something.” I sigh and his arms tighten around me.

“If you really want to make a difference, you don’t have to chase horizons; just look around you and do something that calls you,” I tell him.

I touch the pendant around my neck. “This necklace?” I touch the small pendant at my throat.

“Yeah. I like to think of it as your fishing hook,” he teases and I smile.

“It was the very first thing I bought for myself when I won that case. It’s a reminder that I may just be a drop in the bucket, but it only takes one drop to overflow it. Little old me ... I did something. We all can,” I say.

We stand there quietly for a few minutes. “I’ll get off my soapbox now,” I say sheepishly.

“I like the way you look up there,” he says quickly and presses a kiss to my cheek.

“That’s because you’ve only had one weekend of it,” I joke.

“I think if I’d had any more, I’d be trying to find a way to keep you right where you are for as long as I could,” he murmurs in my ear. And my heart that’s been tripping all weekend finally gives up the ghost and falls.

Chapter Eight

Sure Thing

Confidence

One Month Later

“You miss me?” I murmur softly as soon as the call connects.

“Too much.” The words, enveloped in Hayes’s fatigue-roughened voice, deliver a delicious jolt to my heart.

“I miss you, too,” I say and hug my pillow tightly to my chest and inhale the lingering scent of him on it.

“I’ll be back next week, and I think I can come up on Thursday, so we’ll have an extra day.”

I feel a pang of guilt that he’s the one doing all the traveling.

“I can’t wait until I can come and see you ...” I start and then trail off because I know what he’s going to say. This is our constant argument.

“I can’t wait for that either. Say the word. I’ll make it happen,” he says and a yawn escapes.

“Do you want me to get us a hotel in Memphis next time?” I ask him and do the math in my head really quickly. I should be able to swing it even after I pay Mama’s rent for the month.

“No, I like staying at your place,” he says. He sounds sincere. But I’ve seen pictures of the house Hayes grew up in, in Houston and the villa he lived in with his aunt in Italy. Our double-wide is clean and cozy, but it’s a huge step down in terms of the luxury he must be used to.

“My bed is so small. Don’t you want a weekend without your feet hanging off the edge?” I ask.

“Nope. That small bed means you can’t roll away in the middle of the night. In fact, when we get a bed, I think we should make sure it’s not too big,” he jokes.

“We’re getting a bed?”

“Yeah. We are. One day. And in the meantime, I’ve never slept better than I do in yours. With you beside me.” My heart is ... it’s going wild. Every word he says is kryptonite. I’m falling so hard for him. He talks about the future like it’s a given.

“You sound so sure.”

“I am. I’d lay good odds on us,” he says easily.

“I would, too.” I sigh. I’m so happy, it’s surreal. We’re such an unlikely pair. Our paths should never have crossed. But here we are. There’s something really right about us together. His visits have been so easy. Not a moment of awkwardness. My mother loves him. The people he’s met in town think he’s some sort of rock star and he’s nothing but gracious and patient with their questions about what he does. He brought Tripp, my neighbor's nine-year-old, a new fishing rod this weekend because he overheard him talking about his being broken last time we were down at Harps for groceries. He's brought my mama every book on Abraham Lincoln he can get his hands on, and they sit and talk outside together every night after dinner.

"Your mother home?" he asks.

"Yeah, she has a night off," I say and then nearly crack my jaw on the yawn that follows my words.

"Get sleep, my little treasure. I'll call you in the morning. Tell her hi for me," he says.

"Okay. I will." I never know what to say in return because Hayes's family isn't around. I know he's close to his brothers but he talks to them less often than we see each other. "Sleep well," I tell him

"Sweet dreams."

And then he disconnects.

When I drift off a few minutes later, it's with my pillow cradled in my arms, a smile on my face, and a song in my heart.

Chapter Nine

WILD RIVER

Hayes

One Month Later

“All of these rivers—St. Francis, the White, and the Arkansas—come together and empty into the Mississippi from this delta,” Confidence points out to me.

“So, it must have been booming once,” I say and look around at the dead downtown of Amorel. There’s the one church building that looks like an ice sculpture that’s melting and the two long park benches chained to the ground in front of the town’s police station.

“It still is,” she tells me. She’s been idly running her fingers through her hair and she slips the end of her ponytail in between her smiling lips.

“Yeah, all of these abandoned buildings scream a booming town.” I laugh and she bumps me with her hip in reproach.

“No, but the blues festival that still happens every single summer does.” Her voice is tinged with defensive love and brims with pride.

“You love it here, don’t you?” I ask her.

“I’m proud of its persistence,” she answers after thinking for a minute. “It’s seen every boom and survived every bust since it was settled in the 1800s. But ... the river has given it a constancy. It’s made the soil here some of the most fertile in the world. Most of the forests have been cut down, but look at how ardently what remains still grows. There’s only a small fraction of people who live here when you compare it to before.”

“Where’d they go?” I ask.

“To the city for jobs. Like me.” She shrugs and leans back into me.

We’re driving back to her mother’s house after a day spent sightseeing or maybe just seeing. This is my fifth trip here in eight weeks. It’s the first time we’ve ventured beyond her small town. She drove us out in her mother’s beat-up, old Oldsmobile Delta 88. I’m driving us back. The front bench seat that lets her sit right next to me is the only thing that has made driving around in a car with sponge and wires poking out of the seats, no air conditioning and a barely-functioning radio through the swampy Mississippi Delta bearable.

We roll over the railroad tracks that seem to run through every town in this part of Arkansas and turn onto her mother’s street.

“The place still calls me sometimes, my love for it ... This is where blues was born,” she reminds me for the hundredth time. I just smile and nod, grateful that the sun is setting and taking the punishing heat with it. I glance at her. I’ve noticed that when she’s happy, she tucks a lock of hair between her lips. Today, she’s done it so much I’ve lost count. She gazes out of the window as we drive into the wooded area where her mother’s house is.

“The delta is the soul of the South. And while the rest of the South is looking to become the ‘New South,’ we still own our past. Can’t forget that the same time that we gave the nation the blues, we also harbored the KKK. And then, in the sixties it was a steaming cauldron of social change. So, yes, we’re flawed, but we persist.”

We fall silent for the rest of the drive. It’s nearly a mile down this dusty road, lined with white clapboard houses that sit on at least half an acre of land each.

“Do you think you’ll want to come back here and settle?” I ask her, and my throat closes around the question because I’m desperate for the answer to be a very firm no.

“It’s home. But, it’s also got so many bad memories. Between my father and the river, living here was like having a devil at my front and hell at my back. As much as I love our way of life, I've never felt like this is where my life was supposed to take root," she says. "The first flood I was old enough to remember was when I was twelve. I saw how we were left holding nothing, and it made me want to do what I could to make sure that next time we'd do better than just barely survive. I think I can do that more effectively outside of here," she says without hesitation.

The knot in my throat unclenches, and I smile down at her as we roll into the parking spot under her mother's covered carport.

"I understand that," I say simply. Because I do. It's how I used to feel about returning to Houston permanently. But now, I can see how much potential the city has.

I push the gear shift into park, unbuckle my seat belt, and give her a kiss. She cups my neck with both of her small, strong hands and kisses me back. Her mouth tastes like sunshine and water and trees and smoke. I pull her onto my lap until she's straddling me. "You're so sexy when you're up on that soapbox," I murmur against her lips.

"Yeah, well my convictions give me the feels ..." she jokes.

I don't laugh. "I know, and that gives me feelings, too," I say, refusing to use that ridiculous slang.

She hums and rolls her hips in my lap. "Hayes ..." she drawls lazily.

The storm door at the back of the house slams against the wooden frame and startles us both.

"You two better get out of there like that before Sheriff Tommy sees you." Her mother's distinctive raspy drawl reaches us through the open window.

Confidence jumps so high she hits her head on the sagging ceiling of the car. "Ow," she complains and rubs it while she climbs off me.

"Go on." The door wrenches open, and I look up at her mother's ever present, good-natured smile.

“Hey there, Ms. Dorothea, you look nice tonight.” I smile back.

“Don’t try to charm me, you handsome devil,” she chides.

“I’m not,” I insist and take her hand in mine while I climb out.

“Well, why the hell not?” she asks and then cracks herself up laughing. I walk over to the other side of the car and pull the heavy door open for my girl.

“Hey, Mama,” Confidence calls as she slides out. She mouths a silent thank you before she leans over the top of the car to face her mother.

“Hey yourself, baby. I’ve got Bingo, and I’m gonna be late, so I’ll see you later.” She smiles at her daughter without moving to get into the car.

They are mirror images of each other. Except for the deep lines that bracket and shape Dorothea’s tanned face, they could be twins. Thick blonde hair, vibrant blue eyes, small but generous mouths. They’re even the same height. But where Confidence is shaped like a classic coke bottle—all curves, tits and ass—her mother is as spare as a reed.

“Hayes is leaving tomorrow,” she reminds her.

“I know he is. I’ll see y’all for breakfast.” She winks at both of us before she gets in her car.

“I’ll be back at the crack of dawn, so y’all should get to bed early so that when I wake you up, you don’t feel like you’ve been hit by a two-by-four,” she calls out of the open window before she turns the key and the powerful engine roars to life.

“Last one in the hot tub brings the beers,” Confidence calls out to me as she runs toward the house. In a blur of tanned limbs and blonde hair with a huge smile on her face, she disappears inside.

“Says the girl who wore her bathing suit all day. Some of us had to change.” I scowl at her, hand her a beer, and step into the huge hot tub on her mother’s deck.

She takes a swig of the beer, and some of the cold foam dribbles down her chin and lands on her bare chest. “Ooooh, that’s cold,” she purrs and casts her head back slightly, her eyes gazing downward at me suggestively. As if I need any suggestions. I lean down and lick it off and then drag the tip of my tongue up the damp, salty skin on her neck.

“Mmm, you smell like everything I love about this place,” I tell her and drag her onto my lap.

The bottoms of her bikini are crammed between the two firm, with-just-the-right-amount-of-cushioning ass cheeks that fill my hands.

“And what’s that?” She straddles me, presses her chest against mine and wraps her arms around my neck. Her breasts spill out of the sides of her skimpy bikini top and the slide of her skin against mine gets me hard right away.

“Smoke, water, trees, clean air,” I murmur in her ears.

She sighs and throws her head back to gaze up at the sky that covers us like a black, diamond-encrusted blanket. I nibble on her neck and run my teeth along her throat. A tiny shiver ripples over her body, and she drops her head onto my shoulder.

“I hated having to move back home a couple months ago. I’m still dying to get out of here, but seeing it again through your eyes has made me appreciate it all so much more.” She sighs and rolls those talented hips over me before she slips off my lap and into the water.

She reaches behind her, and a few seconds later her bikini top floats to the top of the water. She reaches into the water and pulls my already hard cock into her hands. I grip the sides and I lift my hips so I float right above the seat I'd been resting on. Her thumb swirls around the dark red, swollen head that pokes out of the water “I'm all in favor of blowjobs, but it's not worth your life, ” I tease and thrust up into her hand.

She smiles a secretive, pleased smile before she releases me. She pushes her juicy, firm breasts together and then slides forward and captures my cock in the tight channel she's made between them.

“I'll do you one better,” she says, her accent stronger with her drawled promise. She presses her lips to my swollen head and slides up, at the same time that she opens her mouth and takes me into her mouth while she uses the water and her breasts to create a sensation I've never even imagined before. I groan and grab the sides of the hot tub to keep from sliding under. “Holy shit!” She keeps her eyes on mine while she moves up and down in the water.

“Hold them,” she gasps and nods to the sides of her breasts. I put my hands there and she moves hers to cup my balls. She rolls them lightly in her hands, her up and down slide never faltering, her mouth sucking the head of my cock with her every downward stroke of her breasts.

“I'm going fucking crazy,” I groan and stroke her nipples with my thumbs.

“That's the plan,” she gasps and then she proceeds to make sure her plan succeeds.

“You're amazing,” I breathe out.

“You make me feel like I can do anything,” she says, and I start to come. Without any warning, spurts of cum shoot out of my cock and splatter on her chin and her cheeks before she closes her mouth over me and takes as much of me as she can into her mouth. My fingers dig into the abundant flesh of her tits, and I only realize how hard I'm pressing when she winces.

"Fuck, I'm bruising you," I say.

"Yes," she gasps. "I want your bruises." I buck up into her mouth. She sucks the head of my dick one more time before she slides up my body. When we're face-to-face, she says, "I want to look in the mirror on Monday and see your fingerprints on my skin and remember how it felt when you put them there." My pulse jumps in my throat. I cup her cheeks and caress them with my thumb. Her bright eyes, the ones I've seen in every dream I've had for the last two months, are fixed raptly on mine, and I decide to go for broke.

"I'm about to ask you something," I tell her.

She stills the up and down movement of her hips. "You're going to ask me something?" she says quietly.

"Yes, I am," I say softly. I drag my thumb across the lips I've been kissing all day.

"I want you to move to Houston," I tell her. "Come live with me."

Her breath hitches, and she drops her face into my neck.

"I haven't found a job yet, Hayes," she responds mournfully, and there's an instinctive tightening in my chest.

I knew this is what she'd say. I force myself to relax. But, I can't do anything about the urgent beat of my heart. It wants this too much. Need it too much.

"I can help you with your job search," I remind her.

"I shouldn't need help. I have an excellent resume. I'm the fucking expert in a whole practice area," she says, and her voice is full of frustration that cuts at me. "There's not a single environmental law practice worth anything that'll hire me. I think I've been blackballed," she fumes.

"If you would let me make a call—"

"No, Hayes. I don't want that," she fusses at me.

“Is your pride more important than being with me?” I ask her quietly.

“That’s not fair. And I shouldn’t have to choose,” she shoots back, pulling herself back from me.

“Life isn’t fair. And I don’t see why it’s a choice. Why does your pride take a hit from letting the man who loves you help you? Wouldn’t you help me if I needed it?”

“As if you’d ever need my—” Her eyes widen and her hands cover her mouth.

“You lo-love me?” she stutters through the finger she pressed to her lips.

Her wide, blue eyes are full of surprise. They glitter in the gloaming light and the ire that was in them from our argument is gone. Joy—unfiltered, unadulterated, replaces it. She’s fucking beautiful right now, and I wish I had my phone so I could capture her like this.

“Of course I do. I’m sorry you’re surprised by that,” I say and lean in to kiss her soft, pliant mouth. She doesn’t kiss me back, so I pull back.

“You don’t need to say anything,” I tell her quickly. And I mean it. I know Confidence loves me, too. Of that, I have zero doubt. So, I go back to the subject that I’ve prepared to stand my ground on. “Just tell me you’ll think about moving,” I add.

She smiles, but there’s still hesitation there.

“I will think about it, but first I want to visit. Meet your family. Is that okay? Just feel like things are more certain. Do you understand?” she asks.

“Are you not sure ... still?” I ask, unable to quell the irritation.

“About us, of course, I’m sure,” she says, and her hands cover mine. She tries to reassure me with her smile, but I don’t return it.

“You’ll never understand, Hayes, how badly I need to get there on my own. I know you’re not him. I know you’d never humiliate me like that, but I also need to be able to feel at peace when I lay my head down at night. That will come from knowing that I got a job because I deserved it and not because anyone helped me,” she pleads with me to understand.

And, I do understand. I just don't like it.

“You lying next to me without me having to think about what time we're leaving for the airport the next day would go a long fucking way to doing that for me,” I snap.

She snags her floating dark green bikini top and smiles up at me. “Come here,” she says and steps out of the tub.

“So, I'll visit?” she asks and I look up at her. Her eyes are pools of blue destiny, and I can see my future in them.

“Yes, but please let me send my plane,” I say.

“How about you just buy an economy class ticket?” she asks, and I stop and place my hands on her shoulders and turn her to face me.

“You're going to have to be comfortable with the fact that I have money. I'm not ashamed of it. I'm going to spend it. And sometimes it will be in frivolous ways that are simply about making my life simpler. We grew up differently. My world is different. And there are parts of being in it that aren't always comfortable, but they're necessary.”

“Necessary for what?” she asks.

“To preserve order. To preserve the legacy my ancestors built. To repair the damage that's been done by the vacuum of leadership my father's death created.”

“What will your legacy be, Hayes?” she asks and crosses her arms over her chest.

“I don't know. It's larger than me. My family, what I do with my time as head of it will be here long after I'm gone. And my stewardship of it will determine its future. When I was a boy, my father used to recite a line from Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra. Have you read it?”

“No, only Romeo and Juliet in high school,” she responds.

“Antony and Cleopatra’s basically the same story but with adults and in a historical setting. Anyway, my father would recite this line from it and tell me that it was the way any great leader thought about their responsibility.” I close my eyes and recite from memory.

“‘Give me my robe, put on my crown; I have Immortal longings in me.’ She was talking about dying for what she believed in. But I think of it as believing in something that will outlive you and making sure it does your name justice”

“My uncle has forgotten that. He’s been thinking about right now for so long, he’s lost sight of the future. The next few months are going to be intensely focused on trying to correct its course. But I want to focus on you, too,” I say.

“I’ll visit. With the intent on scoping it for a move,” she says.

“You’ll like it,” I say.

“I don’t doubt it’s a place I’ll like very much,” she says and smiles at me with a plea for understanding in her eyes.

“Fine,” I say and let it go because I don’t want to fight about it anymore.

“Now, come on—I have plans for you.” She pulls me to standing. “Don’t let me forget to drain this in the morning. Mama uses it almost every night she’s home, and I’d hate for her to be soaking in your cum tomorrow night,” she says and then she saunters off, that round, sweet ass completely bare as her bikini nestles into the hot crevices of her body.

Speaking of places we like very much ... I catch up with her in three strides, snag her around the hips, and hoist her over my shoulders.

She starts to pummel them right away. “Put me down,” she shrieks through a giggle. “This is my seduction, Hayes Rivers.” She wiggles and rolls.

“Oh, my Tesoro.” I tighten my grip on her and smack her ass just hard enough that I know she’ll be distracted by the sting and turned on by the promise in it. “This seduction is all me,” I tell her and open her bedroom door. I toss her onto the pile of crumpled sheets on the bed.

I pull my cock out of my shorts and run my fist up the length. Her tongue darts out and she swipes it across her pink, plush lower lip.

“Take it off. All of it,” I command.

“Yes, baby.” She spreads her legs so she’s on full display.

“For the rest of the world, you’re strong. Everywhere else, you’re untamable. But here, you’ll let me have whatever I want, won’t you?” I ask.

“Yes, anything,” she says.

“God, I want to fuck you in public so everyone can see what I get to indulge in every night.” I cup her ass in my hands, then without another word I slam into her and nearly pass out from how wet, hot and hungry her pussy is. She closes around me and her back arches off the bed, “Yes,” she moans low and deep in her throat.

“You love me, Queen?” I ask her and slam into her again. The entire length of her voluptuous, beautiful, body slides up the bed.

“Yes, King,” she groans, but the king is garbled by another groan. I pull out, throw her legs over my shoulder and close my lips around her clit and suck.

She tastes like chlorine, salt, sweat, and mine. And I eat her like she is. She holds my head in place, as if there’s anywhere else in the world I’d be right now besides in her bed, between her legs—eating her fruit and drinking her ambrosia.

I flip her on her stomach, pull her by the hips until her ass is in the air. I grab the bottle of lube by her bedside and pour it over her sweet pucker. Then, I slide a finger inside just to my first knuckle and she bears down on me like she knows what the fuck she’s doing.

“You like that?” I ask. She whimpers and nods, sending her thick curls adrift over her shoulders and down her back.

That’s my girl.

I slide another finger inside her, stretching and coaxing her open. She moans low in her throat. “Please, I want you,” she cries into the pillow.

I pour more lube over her, coat my dick and then replace my fingers with it. I press forward and probe her sweet, tight pathway to nirvana. I watch a bead of sweat wind its way down the center of her back. I lean over her and catch it on my tongue.

“Haaaaayes!” She calls my name like she’s making a wish just when I slip past the first tight ring of her ass. She moans, and the sound catches in her throat on the beginning of a sob.

“Does it hurt, Tesoro?” I whisper in her ear.

“So good,” she moans and nods, her fingers clutching the sheets convulsively. But she bears down and opens for me. I press a kiss to the center of her back and grip her hips.

“Good,” I grunt and bury myself to the hilt. I snake around her thigh and find her clit. I swirl the tight bud under my thumb and the slick evidence of her arousal coating my fingers nearly makes me blow my load.

“Take all of it.” I roll my hips. “And you’re going to love all of it, just like you love all of me.”

“Yes. So much.” She groans her agreement like she’s pledging her life to me, and I fucking want her to.

“Show me how much,” I wrap my hand around her throat, hold her hip with the other and fuck her like she’s mine to break.

And I want to break her. In a way that only I can put her back together again. When she comes, it’s with curses and my name on the back of a scream that rips out of her throat. Her body trembles uncontrollably and she collapses on her stomach; I think this could be the answer to world peace.

I flip her onto her back and lick my way up past her hip bones, swirl my tongue into her belly button, and I put my hand in the center of her chest and feel that strong, bold heartbeat. I slide farther up and replace my hand with my lips and then rest my head against her breast bone, so that her heartbeat mingles with the rush of my own in my ear.

I can't believe how much I feel for her. How much I've felt since I met her and how tied my entire future feels to hers.

Chapter Ten

RIVERS RECKONING

Hayes

“Welcome to Rivers House.” Poppy, our head of household staff smiles warmly at Confidence as we approach her in the foyer. She’s standing there like an army general waiting for her troops to fall in line so she can give them their marching orders. She’s holding her ever present black spiral notebook. A key chain hangs off the belt of her black service dress. She has one of those faces that never shows its age. She could be thirty or she could be fifty. The threads of silver in her dark hair is the only clue as to which end of that spectrum she falls on. Her warm, but restrained smile doesn’t falter once as she watches us approach.

“Ms. Ryan, I’m Poppy Patterson. I’m the house manager and I will be at your disposal while you’re our guest,” she says smartly.

“Thank you. This is incredible. Please, call me Confidence,” she says and extends her hand to shake Poppy’s while her other one squeezes my hand tightly. “I’m really happy to be here,” Confidence gushes. My stomach knots, and I wonder how long that will last.

“Excellent.” Poppy’s smile broadens for an instant before her more efficient one is back in place. “Your rooms are ready, and one of the boys is delivering your luggage now. Mrs. Rivers sends her apologies. She’s out for the afternoon but looks forward to meeting you at dinner tonight,” Poppy explains to Confidence.

“Where’s everyone else?” I ask, relieved that Eliza isn’t here.

“Your uncle and aunt drove out to Brenham today. They won’t be here all weekend,” she says with a glance at her notebook. Thomas is such an asshole. He thinks his little decampment is a slap in my face because I asked everyone to be here for Confidence's visit. Gigi's back in Italy, but she will be back next month.

"Dare is in town, but we haven't seen him." Poppy continues down her list. "But we expect him to be here tonight. His mother has suspended his credit cards. That usually lures him in," she says with a short smile. I look at Confidence and know that behind that even smile on her face, she's got to be thinking that this is totally fucked up.

Fucking Dare.

"Okay, we're going up until dinner. Thanks for the updates," I say and start to move past her quickly.

"Dinner will be served promptly at seven. Call down to the kitchen if you'd like to take refreshments in your room between now and then, but the dining room won't be available for you until dinner. The staff is setting up for this evening," she finishes.

"If you'd like to have your dress steamed or pressed while you're waiting, just dial down to the laundry and someone will come to collect it," she says to Confidence.

"Hayes, your suit is already pressed and in your wardrobe for tomorrow. Mrs. Rivers asked me to remind you that you're dining with the Bains, the Barras, and the Hassans. I've emailed you some general background information so you can read it before dinner," she reads from her notebook.

"Thank you, sounds like everything is in order," I say.

"As always," she says brightly.

"As always," I agree readily.

"Please let me know how else I may be of assistance," she says before she turns to Confidence. "Enjoy your stay," she says with a slight bow before she turns and heads toward the service wing of the house.

"Wow, is it a special occasion? You didn't tell me dinner was an event," Confidence whispers and glances back over her shoulder as if she wants to be sure no one is following us up the stairs of my family's house.

"It's not. Friday dinner is always like this. We dine with business associates and friends every Friday. Eliza and my aunt Mae usually plan the guest list, but it's nothing special," I say casually despite the knot in my stomach.

"Sounds intense," she says with a grimace.

"Yeah, well ... my family is intense. And this house doesn't help. It feels like a crypt. I spent half my life here. But I can't wait for my house to be ready because I hate living here."

"Ouch," Confidence squeaks, and her hand flexes in my grip. I realize we've stopped walking and I stare blankly at her.

"You're going to break my hand, Hayes," she complains but her eyes are full of concern as well as pain.

"Shit, baby, I'm sorry," I say. I drop her hand and sit down on the stairs just like I had as a boy when I hadn't known where in this house I would be safe.

"Are you okay?" she asks and sits down next to me.

The steps in the house are as long and wide as park benches, and I used to sit on them and read, write, listen to music—whatever. And yet, this whole house feels like a strange place.

"I don't know. I've been back for almost six months and it still feels like I'm a guest. This house ..." I glance around at the ostentatious ceiling and walls full of art that have no meaning to me. "I don't think it can ever be home. At least, not with all of these people living here. To them, it's free accommodation and they're not the least bit interested in how or why we spend so much money and time to maintain it."

"If you're not going to live here, do you think you could sell it?" she asks. I rear back in surprise.

"Of course not. I couldn't sell it. It's my family's home," I say sharply.

She looks surprised, too. "I'm sorry, I just ..." She puts a soothing hand on my shoulder.

“God, I’m sorry. Yeah, there’s just so much going on, Tesoro.” I stroke her cheek.

“I’m sorry,” she says, her face full of worry, and I feel a flash of guilt for my outburst. This isn’t how I hoped our visit would start. But I can’t lie to her, so I tell her. “I’ve been stressed out thinking about you being here. My family is complicated. We all coexist in this space. But none of us really like each other. I’m worried about you seeing that,” I confess.

“Why? You’re not them. Why would I hold it against you?” she asks. The question pisses me off.

“Because you’re only here for a fucking visit,” I say through a clenched jaw. “I want you to stay. But you’re not sure. And now my fucked-up family is going to scare you off. “

This is hard for me. I don’t do this—opening up—but with her being here, seeing her in the context of this house, devoid of warmth and love, I realize that what I’m offering her may not be enough.

“Is that what you think? That your family could scare me off?” she asks, incredulous.

“Not that I would fucking let you go. But, I don’t know how to do this. I don’t even know how to say all this romantic shit without sounding like an asshole, Confidence,” I say, and she giggles.

She sighs and stands up.

“Take me to your room. I want to show you something,” she says and holds her hand out to me. I take it and use it to pull myself up.

I open the door to my room and she starts to strip. My cock stirs at the sight of her smooth, tan skin and the swell of her tits.

“Good idea, I’ll fuck you until you can’t walk. Much less, run off,” I say and start to take my clothes off, too.

“Hayes,” she says from underneath the T-shirt that’s covering her face. “Sex isn’t always the answer,” she reprimands.

“Why not? It sure as hell feels like an answer,” I joke. Only partly.

“I want to show you something,” she says again and then turns her back to me.

“You see?” She looks over her shoulder at me expectantly. I scan her back and then I see it. My eyes snap back to hers. She’s grinning from ear to ear, those plump lips parted to reveal her white, bright smile. Her eyes are full of triumph.

I look back to her lower back, in between the Dimples of Venus is scrawled ADORO IL FIUME—I love the river—in the same font as my family crest.

I kneel down to get a closer look and run my fingers over it. Gooseflesh erupts on her skin. I press a kiss to her lower back and stand up, turning her to face me.

“What do you think?” she asks.

“You did that for me?” I ask at the same time.

“I love it,” I respond.

“Just for you,” she says, and we speak over each other again.

She cups my face in her hands, and whispers, “Ti amotu sei il re del mio cuore.” You’re the king of my heart.

I can only stare at her while my heart races happily toward the edge of the cliff called Confidence and takes a flying leap.

“You learned Italian?” I ask dumbly, too shocked to say anything that makes any semblance of sense.

She laughs. “Well, not entirely. But enough for my big reveal,” she says.

“You tattooed my family’s name on your body?” I ask stupidly.

“Well, yeah,” she says, and I don’t hear any regret or doubt in her voice. “I’ve never really been in love before, Hayes. Not until you. Not until now and I figured I should commemorate it. Because this love ... it’s everything. You’re everything. These last two months, you’ve shown me so much. Taught me so much. Shared so much with me. And I don’t want you to worry. I'm the surest thing in your life. I love you. I want to move. I'm ready to live my life. I'm ready to take a chance. You're my lover, my brother, my father, my friend, my person. I need you. It's not you I'm unsure about. It's life. Nothing your family does or says will change how I see you," she says, and when she kisses me, I almost believe her.

Chapter Eleven

FLOOD

Confidence

I don't dance now, I make money moves. Cardi B's "Bodak Yellow" bursts into my brain and I wake up with a gasp. I grab my phone and glance around the room. I'm alone. When my gaze drifts to the west-facing bay window, my heart lurches into my throat. My phone, forgotten, falls silently onto the thick down comforter of the bed. I slide off the bed and walk over to the window for a closer look.

The wind is having its way with the huge walnut trees that line the drive of Hayes's family home. They're waving violently back and forth, hurling their leaves into the air with terrifying speed. The rain is falling in sheets that look like liquid glass. The wind is blowing it sideways, too, and it's sheeting against the window.

It looks like the world is ending.

The rain started just when I landed this morning. I knew a storm was brewing in the gulf, but I hadn't really paid attention because it was supposed to miss the delta. When I stepped off my flight and saw the gates packed with stranded passengers because flights out were being cancelled, I started to worry. I hate storms, and I'd forgotten that Houston, though always spared the brunt of the wind damage, always got a lion's share of the rain when storms came into the part of the gulf where the city sat. Having a port had made it the powerhouse trade behemoth that it was. But being that close to the water also meant that its flat landscape, the bayou that ran right through the city—and its below-sea-level altitude—made it ripe ground for the kinds of floods that most other major cities had managed to design away.

My phone starts to ring again, and I dash back to pick it up. That's Cass's exclusive ringtone and I know her parents'

Meyerland neighborhood floods.

“Hey, you okay?” I ask without saying hello.

“Oh my God, Confidence. Thank God you answered,” she wails and dread fills me. “I’m so scared, I don’t know what to do.” She sobs into the phone.

“Where are you?” I ask, but I already know.

“My parents’. I came last night because they didn’t want to leave their house, and I didn’t want them to be alone.” Her speech is muffled like she’s covering her mouth.

“What’s happened?”

“We woke up this morning, and there was maybe three inches of water in their house. This neighborhood always floods, but not their house. Never. But it did today. And we did our best to get all of their art and electronics up on top of the dressers, on top of appliances. And we thought if the rain slowed down we could get out.” Her voice breaks, and she starts to sob.

“Cass, where are you now?” I ask, trying to keep my voice calm and my mind clear. They need solutions, not hysteria.

“At the neighbors’. TB ...” She sniffles “We had to swim here. My mom almost drowned us because she was freaking out.”

“What do you mean, swim?” I ask, horrified.

“Are you not watching television? We have more than five feet of water in the house,” she shouts into the phone.

“No, I’m sorry. I got in super early this morning, and I passed out. Cass, are you safe at your neighbors’?” I ask. “Aren’t they a one-story house, too?”

“They have a loft,” she says.

“Oh, good,” I sigh in relief.

“But there are twenty- four people up here. It’s small. And my mother doesn’t have her insulin,” she says, and her voice pitches in an awful spike as her panic rises.

“Okay, well, the rain will stop and the water will recede, right?”

“Yes, but not in time. There’s one bathroom, no power, and all of these people.” Her voice has dropped again and breaks on the last word

“What can I do?” I ask

“I don’t know ... nothing,” she says sadly.

“Cass ...” I shove my hand through my hair and stare helplessly at the wall.

“It’s okay. I just wanted you to know where I was. Someone’s called the city, and they say they’ll try to send a boat around before it gets dark. But once it gets dark, they’re not going to keep the rescues up. I need to get her out of here,” she says. Urgency coats her voice, and my stomach wrings in my gut while I fret about what to do.

“Listen. Save your phone battery. Let me go find Hayes. I’ll see if he can do something to help,” I say and pray I’m not over promising. But I know she needs the lifeline of hope I’m giving her, too, so I inject my voice with confidence I don’t feel.

“Oh TB, that would be great.” She sounds giddy with relief. “I’m so worried about my mom. And my dad is sitting in a corner sort of talking to himself. They’ve lived in that house for almost forty years, and in just a few hours, it’s nearly gone.” Her voice is barely a whisper when it breaks on that last word.

“Oh, babe, I’m sorry. Let me go and see what I can do,” I say and then hang up before she can respond. My fingers tremble and my stomach feels like it’s hooked to a hot air balloon.

I dial Hayes and hold my breath, praying he’ll pick up.

“Tesoro, I’m in a meeting,” he says in a hushed voice after the third ring.

“Cass just called. Her mother doesn’t have her insulin and the city is sending boats ‘round for rescue, but they’re going to stop when it gets dark,” I say.

“Excuse me, I have to take this,” Hayes says, and I hear the murmur of voices behind him before a door closes.

“Where are you?” I ask him and rummage through my suitcase for clothes. My muscles protest when I bend over and I can’t believe that a few hours ago, I’d been folded in half, trapped between Hayes’s incredible, huge muscled arms while he drilled me into the mattress and made me come so hard I know that the whole house must have heard me screaming his name.

“Oh.” He sounds like he needs to stop and think about it. “I’m downstairs. I’m having an executive team meeting,” he says. “Wait. Sugar Land’s flooding?” he asks.

“No. She’s at her parents’ in Meyerland,” I explain.

He lets out a long, low whistle and says, “Shit. We’ve had it on in the background nearly all afternoon. It’s a fucking disaster. I don’t understand how this city hasn’t done something to stop this from happening every fucking year. And why those people keep rebuilding in the same spot,” he says disgustedly.

“Her parents’ house has never flooded before. Never. This isn’t a regular storm, Hayes. And even if it had been, I don’t think assigning blame to anyone right now is helpful,” I snap at him.

“Give me an address; let me make some calls,” he says.

“How the hell do you know which side is the eastbound side?” he asks.

“I’ve heard her say that before, Hayes. Can you ask me these questions later? Please make that call.” I’m practically yelling.

“Hey, it’s going to be okay,” he says softly, soothingly into the phone.

“Don’t try to calm me down, Hayes. I’m not going to calm down. Cass sounded scared. I know you don’t understand how urgent this is because you’ve never been forced to try and stay afloat in water you have no choice but to swim through. But every second counts. Please. Make that call,” I say through gritted teeth and then hang up.

I start to throw my jeans on but realize there's no point in getting dressed. I don't know anyone in this house, and I have no clue where Hayes is in it.

I sit back down on my bed and stare at my hands. A minute later, my phone rings. "King" flashes on my screen, and I pick it up before it has a chance to ring again.

"Tesoro, I spoke to my contact at the mayor's office. They're going to add her to the emergency list, but they may only be able to take the people who absolutely need to leave," he says in a rush.

"Okay." My answer comes out in a stuttered sigh as I try to think about what I can do. I know Cass and her dad will go crazy if her mom is taken and they can't go with her.

"Listen to me. If they can't take your friend, I'll go get them myself when I'm done. My brother Beau's truck is parked at the house while he's away. It's one of those monster trucks and it's lifted more than six feet off the ground, and it'll get through that water. It only seats five; we'll only be able to take three other people."

"I can stay home to make room for one more," I say immediately. "If the rain doesn't stop and they're not rescued, they'll end up spending the night on their roof and I can't even imagine that for Cass," I say.

"Okay." He blows out a breath and says, "Let's hope it doesn't come to that. That truck is a nightmare to drive on a dry, clear day, but if the city doesn't come through, I will."

FOUR HOURS LATER

"Oh my God, TB, thank you so much," Cass cries and throws herself into my arms as soon as she and her parents trudge into the foyer. They're soaked, but safe. I look over her shoulder and take in the six other people Hayes brought with him. I only recognize Mr. and Mrs. Gold, Cass's parents. The other three are a small, pretty woman and two children, a boy and girl, who, judging by their appearance, are between the ages of ten and twelve. The girl is as long and skinny as a beanpole, and her big eyes scan the room in amazement. Her mother puts a hand on her shoulder and says, "Stop staring," and then smiles apologetically at me. I smile back and turn my attention back to Cass.

"Where's Hayes?" I ask her.

"Parking the truck. He dropped us off first. You should have seen him, TB," she says, wide-eyed. "The police put a blockade up on the street to stop any more rescue attempts. He drove straight through it. He backed up right to the front door and even though he only had enough seat belts for—"

"What is happening here?" A woman's voice, as cold and clear as a bell calls from behind us. I jump, and right before I turn around, I see the little girl's eyes nearly bug out of her head with fear before she ducks behind her mother's legs. The little boy's eyes narrow, and he steps in front of his mother and his sister.

"Uh, hi," I say and wave at the redheaded, Jessica Rabbit look alike, down to the red dress wrapped around her impossibly exaggerated curves and bright red lipstick. She stares down at me with hostile eyes and frowns.

"Who are you?" she asks through her pinched lips.

"I'm Confidence Ryan," I say and try not to sound like I want to piss in my pants.

"I don't care what your name is, girl. I want to know what you and this ragtag mob of interlopers is doing standing in my foyer?" she shouts and the little girl starts to cry.

I let go of Cass completely and walk toward her. "I don't know who you are, and I'm sorry that you're walking into an unexpected scene, but we are all guests of Hayes—" I start.

"Hayes?" she asks like she has no clue who that is.

“Yes, Hayes.” I cross my arms over my chest and eye her suspiciously. “Who are you?” I snap at her.

“I am Mrs. Eliza Rivers and this, you little guttersnipe, is my house,” she responds haughtily. Then, she pulls a small pearl handled revolver out of her purse and points it squarely at my chest in a grip that tells me she knows how to hold a gun, but no idea how to aim it. I don’t move, but my heart is sprinting like a hare running from a hunter. I stare at her, beyond shocked.

Behind me, pandemonium breaks out. I can’t hear anyone clearly, but they’re all shouting. The children are both screaming. Cass grabs my elbow and tugs me backward.

“TB, let’s go,” she says, her voice a desperate whine.

“Go where?” I shake her loose. I take a step closer to the woman pointing her gun at me and look her square in the face. “This is not your house, and it hasn’t been for a long time. I am Hayes’s guest. So are these people, including the children you’re pointing a weapon at.”

Her expression falters briefly and then she tightens her grip on the butt of her gun. “How do I know what you’re saying is true? Where is Hayes?” she asks, her voice slightly fretful. I want to turn around and assure the people behind me that everything will be okay. That she’s about as harmless as a fly. But I don’t dare take my eyes off her. Because she is actually very dangerous. Especially with her clear lack of practice.

“He’s parking. He’ll be right in. Please, put the gun down; you’re scaring the children,” I say in a voice that I hope is deferential and conciliatory.

“Well, that’s what they get for scaring me,” she says and I recoil at her callousness.

“You are a monster,” I gasp before I can think better of it.

“You bet your ass, I am,” she says jauntily.

“Eliza, what’s going on?” Poppy’s voice sounds from over my shoulder, and I still don’t dare turn around but sigh in relief that someone who can vouch for me has finally arrived.

“I’ve told you to address me properly in front of guests, Poppy,” she snaps. “This girl says she’s Hayes’s guest along with all of those people. I know nothing of it, so I’m exercising my right to stand my ground,” Eliza explains as if it makes perfect sense.

“Do you pull guns on every unexpected guest in your home, Mrs. Rivers?” This comes from Cass’s father who hasn’t said a word since they arrived.

“No. Only the ones who very clearly don’t belong,” she returns.

“El—Mrs. Rivers,” Poppy interjects and rushes past me to stand in front of her on the stairs. “You knew Ms. Ryan was visiting. I informed you that Mr. Rivers was bringing back guests to stay for the night because of the flooding,” she says. She stands right in front of the gun and puts a hand on it.

“Poppy, be careful,” I call to her.

“It isn’t loaded,” she calls back to me without turning around.

“What? Are you kidding me?” I yell and start for the stairs, too.

“Why did you tell her that? You idiot!” Eliza shouts. Poppy’s yelp of pain is a beat behind the crack of Eliza’s palm against her cheek. The room’s incredible acoustics meld the two sounds together in a sickening rhythm.

I skid to a stop right at the foot of the stairs.

What the actual hell is going on here? Did she just slap another grown woman?

“We’re leaving,” Mr. Gold says and I finally turn around to look at the poor people who have escaped one nightmare only to find themselves in the middle of another. And I’m sure they’re thinking they’d rather take their chances with mother nature than deal with this insane woman.

He’s standing guard in front of everyone else. I catch a glimpse of Cass’s face and she looks green. I can’t believe this is happening. “I’m sorry. Your rooms are ready. Please, let’s just get you dry—”

“We’ll get a room at the Ivy for the night. Confidence, you’re welcome to come with us,” he says gravely, his dark gray eyebrows drawn in extreme concern as he surveys the scene unfolding in front of him. “In fact, I would like to insist that you do,” he says. I’ve only met him once before at our law school graduation, and I was struck by how gentle and quiet he had been. He’s a small man—so much like my father, I’d thought. But without the sadistic spirit that inhabited him. What must he think of me right now? And of Hayes?

Hayes. I’d forgotten all about him.

“Where in the world is Hayes?” I ask when all other words fail me. I pat my pocket and curse my decision to leave my phone upstairs when I rushed downstairs.

“Confidence, we’re leaving. I just ordered an Uber and he’s only two minutes away,” Mr. Gold says again, and this time, his voice is firm and commanding. “Tell Mr. Rivers thank you for rescuing us. We owe him a huge debt, but we don’t want to impose, and clearly, it’s not a good time.” He nods pointedly at the insane woman standing on the stairs watching the chaos she just created with a pleased, smug smile on her face. Poppy has disappeared in the five seconds since I looked away.

“An Uber?” I exclaim. “Bu-But, I have your rooms ready. I didn’t even give you the towels,” I say, completely dejected and helpless to stop the situation from spiraling. I point to a stack of towels and a thermos of coffee that Hayes’s housekeeper, Matilda, gave me to bring down with me.

“Hey, what’s going on?” Hayes asks, and I look over to see him standing in a doorway that I hadn’t noticed beneath the stairs. The rain has had its way with him. But unlike the rest of the soaking wet people in the room, he looks more like a sea god than he does a drowned rat. His hair clings to his forehead in dark wet waves and water runs down from one of them, through his dark gray T-shirt, and it’s plastered to his body like a second skin. His jeans, the same. His eyes sweep the room, moving from each one of us to the next when he doesn’t see whatever he’s looking for on our faces.

“Mr. Rivers, I was just saying that we’re so grateful for your kindness. You were heroic today. But we’ve decided to head into Rivers Wilde for the night,” Mr. Gold, clearly the group’s designated speaker, says. “We have Carly’s insulin, and little Micah has his inhaler. So all we need is a dry, warm place to lay our heads,” he says.

“And I told you, you could do that here,” Hayes says quietly and walks over to me. “What happened?” he asks.

No one says a word.

“Eliza, what happened?” He squares his gaze on her, and even though I’m not looking at her, I see the moment he gets to the gun. His face turns white and then blood suffuses his cheeks and looks like the top of his head might pop off.

“Did you point your fucking gun at my woman?” he asks, and his voice ricochets off the walls of the house’s cavernous space in a terrifying echo. The little girl starts to cry again, and my stomach cramps into a knot. This is beyond disastrous. I can’t imagine how Hayes lives with people like this.

Eliza’s face never loses its smugness, but she starts backing up the stairs.

“I don’t have to explain myself to you, Hayes Rivers. You’re lucky I didn’t shoot her,” she says, and then like the rat she is, she turns and runs up the stairs.

“I’m so sorry. Perhaps it would be best for you to stay somewhere else tonight. But I have a suite of rooms at the St. Regis. The road between here and there is clear, and I’ll have our driver take you over,” he says to the crowd, but he doesn’t look at me. “I’ll go make arrangements.” And then without another word, he turns and leaves the room.

Chapter Twelve

Need

Hayes

“I’m sorry about last night,” I say as soon as I walk into my bedroom. Confidence is halfway out of bed and stills mid-motion. She wraps the sheet around her bare body and sits back down, her profile to me as she stares ahead for a beat and then turns to face me.

Her eyes are flat and cold, and I could kick my own ass for the way I behaved.

“For what? For not warning me that your stepmother had no clue I was coming? Or for not warning me that she’s a lunatic who’s fucking packing heat?”

I groan silently, guilt gnawing at my gut. “Tesoro—”

“Or,” she cuts in, her voice hard as nails, “is it because after she pulled a gun on me, my best friend, her family, and small children, you promptly disappeared and haven’t been heard from since?” she asks.

“I’m sorry. I needed to clear my head. I went for a drive. Yesterday was intense, and I meant to come back, but I passed out in my car and just woke up,” I tell her. I don’t tell her that I drank half a bottle of Jack Daniels and then threw it all up before I passed out. She looks like she’s ready to murder me.

“This is not what I expected when I came to visit, Hayes,” she says, and my stomach sinks. That goddamn Eliza and her crazy ass antics yesterday.

“I know. The storm threw everything off. Going out to get your friends ...” She drops her head into her hands and falls back onto the pillows. Her sheet falls, revealing her perfect, spilling-out-of-my-hands, marshmallow-soft, pink-nippled breasts. And like an addict whose poison is being served up to him on a silver platter, I start walking.

“Thank you for that,” she groans. “Good Lord. What the hell? This trip ...” She sighs just as I get to her side of the bed.

I stare down at the goddess in my bed. This nymph who has me under her control. She’s like nothing else I’ve ever known. Brave, kind, honest, funny, sexy, and so fucking brilliant. She’s the catch of the century, and she’s mine.

For now.

I close my eyes at the stab of pain in my chest that accompanies that thought.

There’s something that happens when I see things through Confidence’s eyes. She reveals my blind spots, and while I’m glad to know the places where I was failing in the basic human decency department, what will that mirror reveal when she holds it up to my family. So far, it’s revealed dysfunction and division. I’m afraid that when she leaves here in a couple of days, she’ll think less of me, and I’ll think less of me, too. I want to sanitize everything. To hide the ugly. But I’m going to be asking a lot of her. She needs to see exactly what she’s getting into. I just have to hope that when it’s over, she’ll still want me and all of the baggage I come with. And if she does, I hope it’s not because she thinks my money will make up for it.

I feel guilty for having that last thought. She’s nothing like that, and I know if I end up sleeping under the 610 Freeway, she’d be sleeping with me. I love her. She loves me. I want to show her that I can take care of her more than just financially.

“King,” she calls softly. Her hand comes up to grab mine, and I finally look at her face. She’s the most radiant woman. She’s got this peace about her that’s there even when she loses her cool.

“Yes?” I ask and trace one of her pretty nipples with the pad of my thumb. She sighs and smiles. Her eyes fall to half-mast as her nipple stiffens under my touch.

“Yesterday was crazy. Everyone was on edge because of the weather. But, I wish we could press the reset button on all of this.” She sighs. I push aside the thought that the weather had nothing to do with Eliza’s behavior.

“Come on, I need a shower; I need to eat you. I need to fuck you. Let’s do all three right now,” I say.

She smiles and lets me pull her up to sitting. Then she unbuckles my jeans, unzips them, and pulls them down at the same time as my boxers. My dick is hard and her mouth is hot when she wraps her lips around it and sucks the head at the same time her tongue flicks the slit. I pull my shirt over my head and fist my hands in her hair while she works her magic with her talented tongue. When I can’t wait for her anymore, I let go of her head and slide out of her mouth.

“Get up here,” I gesture for her to wrap her legs around my waist and she laughs her deep, throaty laugh before she does what I say. I put my hands on the curve of her waist where it flairs into her hips and lower her down onto my hard-as-a-rock dick. I walk us like that into the bathroom, and I step into the shower, press her against the wall and start to fuck her. Her hands fly up above her head and use the wall at her back and my dick to hold her up. I turn on the water and hiss when the cold spray hits my back and starts beating down on us. “Hayes.” She moans my name and I fuck her harder.

“I’m going to make you come,” I say and throw my head back into the spray of water before I lift her off my dick and put her on her feet.

I drop down on my haunches, spread her cheeks and flick my tongue over her tight puckered asshole. I keep it there, push in a little and trap the now warm shower water on my tongue and then slide down to her pussy and put her clit in my mouth with the water around it and bite it.

Her knees buckle, but the shower muffles her scream. I find that I don’t like that at all. I reach up, turn the water off and press my hand into her back to bend her in half. She braces on the wall and I slip my cock between the warm, wet lips of her pussy and drag it back and forth.

I slide up and into her in one smooth, easy stroke. She gasps and slaps a hand on the wall. I grip her hips, slide one hand to her clit and rub.

I dive into her.

Pull out.

Thrust up.

Drill hard.

Fuck her fast.

Then, I slow down and make love to my woman until she comes.

She screams my name and creams all over my dick, bucking her hips and clenching her trembling thighs so that when I start to come, my hips are trapped in the cradle her body has made for mine.

“You’re going to end me,” I groan.

“No baby, this is where you begin,” she pants, and when I pull out next, she hops down, whips around and falls on her knees.

She cups my balls with her hand and fists my pulsing dick with the other and puts me into her mouth and sucks me so hard her lips hollow.

I push her hair back off her face, and she looks up at me. Her eyes water when my dick hits the back of her throat, but she doesn’t quit. I love you, I mouth down and she winks before she closes her eyes and hollows her cheeks.

When I come, she catches what she can on her tongue. I pull her up, turn the water on and rinse her clean.

By the time we get out of the shower, we’re right again. I’m hoping that tonight’s dinner won’t be a disaster. I mean, it’s just food and a few friends. What could go wrong?

Chapter Thirteen

Let Them Eat Cake

Confidence

“I’m so glad he didn’t cancel.” The woman next to me looks down the table to where Hayes is sitting. “These flood watches are so tedious,” she says to me like she expects me to agree with him.

I force the sincerest smile I can muster. I’m sure it looks more like I’m suffering from a bout of constipation. And the churning of my stomach says that if I’d been able to put anything in it since this morning, I might actually be unable to evacuate it from my body.

Tedious is the very last word I would use to describe this dinner or this day. I can’t believe that, on my first visit to Houston, the weather has taken such a huge turn for the worse. Hurricane Harvey has dumped historic levels of water on the city of Houston. The flooding has been catastrophic for a lot of the city. And yet, here we sit.

The dining room has a glass dome in the center and the clatter of the driving rain against it reminds me of the way it beats down on the corrugated metal roof of our mobile home.

I push the food around my plate as my appetite refuses to cooperate. I’ve never heard of, much less eaten, some of the things they’ve served today. I’ve always been an equal opportunity eater. But today, not even my mother’s chicken fried steak could tempt me.

“Where did you say you were from?” The woman who hasn’t bothered to introduce herself demands.

“I didn’t,” I say and smile. I refuse to accommodate this woman’s snobbery. If she wants to know, she’ll have to introduce herself like a normal person would.

“Oh. Well.” She smiles coldly. “I’m Davina Bain. Our families have dined together for almost twenty years,” she informs me and then glances around the table with distaste.

“Though, I have to say that the quality of the attendees has been diluted since Hayes got back. He was raised in Italy. And in the countryside or something dreadful.” She frowns disapprovingly. “I heard he’s taken up with some nobody he met in Europe.” She says it like it’s a total scandal. “Anyway, you’re such a pretty thing. Who are your people? A girl that looks like you is exactly what he needs to soften up his image,” she says and look at her like she’s an alien.

“Did you really say that?” I ask and she must mistake my anger for something else because she pats my hand.

“Don’t mind all the talk about him hurting that girl,” she says, her smile thin and empty. “He’s richer than Croesus. It’ll make a couple of black eyes a year worth it.”

It takes Herculean strength to keep my hand in my lap when all I want to do is slap her. I’m reminded of something I learned from the sharp bite of my father’s rage. There are devils walking around in skin that makes them look like normal human beings.

“Who are your people?” she asks, her eyes scanning the table while she sips her soup.

“I’m Confidence Ryan,” I tell her. “I’m from Arkansas. I’m the nobody he met in Europe,” I inform her with a smile. And I enjoy the momentary flash of panic in her eyes as she realizes who she’s been talking to. It’s gone as quickly as it came and in its place is a smug, disdainful frown.

Her eyes, once friendly and bright, dim. She sniffs as if something distasteful wafted into her nose.

“Well,” her eyes flick over me as if she’s trying to find what she missed in her initial assessment. “At least you look the part,” she says before she turns away. Dismissing me in a way that feels eerily familiar. It’s reminiscent of the way Hayes looked at me that night in Italy. Like I’m beneath her. That memory still makes me queasy. Being with Hayes’s family and friends tonight has made me queasy. I look around the huge table. Almost everyone is engaged in a one-on-one conversation. Except Hayes, who's watching me with a scowl. His stepmother made the seating chart—who has a seating chart for regular dinner?—and when Hayes took his place at the head of the table, I was unceremoniously asked to vacate the seat next to him for Mr. Jones and shown to a seat all the way at the other end. Hayes didn't say a word. Between that and the rain, I feel stressed out on a level that has me wishing I could go for a run. And I hate running. With a passion.

“You understand, don't you? It's protocol,” his stepmother said as she led me to my seat. I didn't answer because I knew she didn't really care if I understood. She'd made her feelings about me plain when I saw her right before dinner. She leaned in, pretending to hug me and whispered in my ear, “Don't get too comfortable. I'll be damned if the next Mrs. Rivers is another nobody from nowhere.” Then she'd pulled away and smiled brightly and said, “We're thrilled to have you, dear,” loudly enough for everyone to hear.

I don't know if I'm going to tell Hayes any of this. What would be the point? He can't do anything about it, and I can see that he's trying hard to continue the tradition of his family. Even if they are dumb and useless ones.

We haven't had a moment alone since we came down for dinner. And now, I've been dismissed as lacking by a woman who spent the first forty-five minutes of dinner telling me all about the piping for her new window treatments.

“Most of them are fine,” the woman next to me murmurs in my ear.

“Excuse me?” I turn to look at her. She's a pretty woman in her late sixties with skin the color of hazelnuts, eyes the color of coffee, and a warm smile.

“But some of them are a bunch of stuck-up assholes.” Her whispered words are colored with humor. “We're only invited because the previous Mr. Rivers and my husband were friends. It's only since Hayes got back that we decided to come at all.

Trust me, honey, you'll be glad they don't talk to you," she says with a wink.

"I like you." I stick my hand out. "I'm Confidence. Yes, that's my real name," I say before she can ask.

"I'm Mary Hassan, and what a fantastic name," she compliments sincerely.

"Thank you," I say in kind.

"Well, I know a little something about sitting at tables you weren't exactly invited to, so I can empathize," she says. "And, I have three grown daughters. You look about their age," she says. And I think how lucky those girls must be.

Those girls are lucky to have a mother whose eyes light up when she talks about them.

"Do they live in Houston?" My heart jumps in hope that maybe I'll make some new friends.

"No. My oldest and her husband are in DC. My middle and youngest both live in the UK," she says.

"Wow, that's amazing. I just took my first trip out of the country this summer. I can't imagine living overseas. What took them there?" I ask.

"My baby got a job; she's a lawyer—"

"Oh, me, too," I say excitedly.

"Are you? I should introduce you. They'll all be here for Christmas. Just three more months," she says happily.

"I'd love that. I'm moving here. My best friend lives here actually, but I would love to meet more people," I say gratefully.

"You'll love them. My middle is married to an earl and lives in England," she tells me proudly.

"Really? What is that like?" I ask, looking around this room and thinking I can barely handle these entitled rich people. How would I deal with aristocrats?

“She had a hard time with some of the people in his circle. She’s not what a countess looks like over there, but she’s won them over now,” she says.

“That sounds like a hard transition,” I muse.

“It was. But for her husband’s sake she worked her way through it. And now, she’s just like one of the locals. She even teaches a coding course at the local high school,” she says. I smile at the pride in her voice and reach for my drink to avoid having to speak.

Hayes is no earl. But around here, he’s like royalty. And given my less-than-warm reception, I’m worried about being his partner. I think that’s where we’re going. He wouldn’t have asked me to move in with him if he didn’t think so. I wouldn’t be considering it if I didn’t, too.

She touches my arm. “I saw you come down with Hayes. You make such a beautiful couple.”

“Thank you so much.” I glance down the table at him just as a man dressed in one of the dark blue valet uniforms rushes into the open doors of the dining room and bends to whisper in his ear.

Whatever the valet says can’t be good. Hayes’s jaw clenches, and his brow furrows. Then, he tosses his napkin down on the table and stands up.

“Excuse me, everyone,” he says. I watch him in hopes that he’ll make eye contact with me. He doesn’t.

I war with myself, watching the door, and unsure whether or not to follow him. Mary touches my arm again and I glance at her.

“I’m so sorry,” I say. “What were you saying?”

My eyes dart back to the door for a second and when I look back to her, she’s smiling sympathetically.

“That’s one of the benefits of being someone’s other half,” she says. “You don’t have to wait for them to say they need you. You just go because you know they always do.”

She cocks her head to the door. “See you later,” she says.

We share a smile, mine full of gratitude for this unexpectedly kind woman being here tonight. I start to stand up and she touches my arm.

“We own Palmyra, it’s a Middle Eastern Restaurant in Rivers Wilde ,” she says. “Come visit me, I’m there on weeknights.” She squeezes my hand and I squeeze hers back.

“Oh, that’s my favorite! I’ll come see you,” I promise.

“I’m so glad he has someone like you. He’s going to need you.” She nods at the empty seat at the head of the table.

I want to ask her what she means but at the moment, I’m more concerned about Hayes. I walk out of the dining room, and the weight of the stares on my retreating back are heavy. The whispers are loud and I’m sure everyone is wondering who the hell I am. I want to turn around and yell, “I’m his,” but that would just delay. And something tells me I need to get to him as fast as I can.

I step into the hall and look both ways down the long, dark passage. I have no idea where he went. I’m turning left when a loud crash of glass has me turning right. I run down the hall. Muffled, but loud voices spill into the dark around me.

“You can’t keep doing this, Dare,” Hayes says.

My hand freezes on the door knob. This is his younger brother. The one Poppy mentioned earlier.

“I didn’t realize I couldn’t come to my own family’s home,” the other man slurs.

“I didn’t say that. I just wish you would lay off the alcohol and only God knows what else you’re putting into your body,” Hayes says, his voice tight with restrained anger. “Confidence is here, and I’m trying like fuck to make sure she wants to come back.” I know he’s been on edge about my visit. But it’s jarring to hear the anxiety so clearly in his voice.

“Well from what you told me, it sounds like she lives in some shit hole mobile home in the middle of nowhere.” I’m startled by how much he sounds like Hayes. The drunken slurring of his words is the only way I can tell the difference. That, and the ugly insult in his tone.

“Shut up,” Hayes snaps.

“I’m sure she got one look at this place and realized she hit pay dirt. She isn’t going anywhere. Trust me,” he says.

The words and the ease with which he flings them feels like a lash across my heart. Is that what everyone thinks?

“Dare,” Hayes says, the warning in his voice making the hairs on the back of my neck stand up. I’m caught between wanting to go in and needing to hear how Hayes will respond.

“Oops, I forgot. You fucked her and forget you begged me to run a background check on your little gold digger” Those words hit me like scalding water. I cover my mouth to muffle my gasp of pain.

“Dare, don’t say another fucking word—”

“What? Only you can say she’s good enough to fuck but not good enough to bring home,—” he starts before his voice abruptly cuts off and the sickening sound of crunching bone fills the air.

“You broke my nose, you asshole!” the drunken voice screams before more glass crashes to the ground. And the telltale sounds of a tussle—grunts, curses, furniture scraping the floor, glass shattering—fill the air. I open the door and see two men, both big and tall, on the ground in a hopelessly well-matched tussle.

I know I should call for help, or step in to stop the fracas. Yet, I do neither of those things. Instead, I just watch the two men fight. My eyes remain on Hayes, the man I love. He still looks exactly the same, but at the same time, so different.

I can’t move.

I can’t breathe

He ordered a background check? He knows every ugly thing about me. Anger, betrayal, and fear whirl. My head spins as those thoughts mingle with the sounds of chaos. The sounds of my childhood. Of furniture breaking, grunts of pain, the crunch of fists, the slap of skin on skin. I’m caught between the devil and hell—I don’t know which direction in this house of horrors to turn. But somehow, I manage to run until I get to our room. I sit on my bed and try to figure out what the hell I'm going to do.

I've just started to drift off when our bedroom door opens. My eyes snap open and I stare unseeingly at the wall as I wait for him to say something. He slides into bed with me. I can smell sweat, blood and liquor on him. His body is cool, the stubble on his face is slightly damp as he presses his cheek to mine and wraps his arms around me. A fraught and angry energy emanates from him. And like the fool I am, all I want is to soothe him. I lift his knuckles to my lips and kissed the sore, stiff, red joints..

He turns me around, and without saying a word, kisses me.

We make love for an hour, maybe more. We find a calm that always exists in the sanctity of our bodies' communion. When we are together like this, it's easy to forget that anything else matters

We roll out of bed and shower at 2:00 a.m. I kiss his bruises without asking how he got them. He accepts my kisses without offering any explanations. We go back to bed and do it all over again. I fall asleep on him, sated but dreading the reckoning the sunrise will bring with it.

Chapter Fourteen

Pride

Confidence

My phone beeps with a new email and I look over at my window and see the first hints of sunlight peeking through my curtain. Hayes stirs beside me and I decide to ignore my phone. I snuggle into him. “Good morning,” I whisper into the back of his warm, muscled shoulder.

“Morning,” he mumbles sleepily, his arm snaking behind him to pull me closer. “I need to tell you about last night.” His voice is partially muffled in his pillow, and he turns to face me. His eyes are clear, and I realize he’s been awake longer than I realized.

My heart falls. I’m dreading what I know I must say. What I must do.

“I already know,” I confess.

His muscles tense. “What do you know?”

I gaze at him.

I love him.

But I can’t be with someone who thinks those things about me.

I push out of his grasp and sit up and pull the covers over my chest. I stare at my fingers, twirling the rings the way he does all the time.

“You know why I wrote that thesis?”

“Huh?” he frowns, his brow furrows at the abrupt turn in our conversation.

“I wrote it because I love the river. But I wanted to protect my people from the destruction it always causes,” I choke on a sob.

“Hey ... baby.” He starts to sit up and put his arm around me. I shake my head and climb out of bed, taking the sheets with me. I sit on the large window seat, and a tear splashes on the blue gray fabric I’m cocooned in. The tiny moist spot bleeds to form a quarter-sized stain. I wipe at my eyes with a brutal pass of my hands.

I take a shuddering breath and stare at my hands while I try to collect myself. Growing up, I watched year after year as the river banks swelled when the rain overwhelmed it. And its lazy, tranquil flow would transform into a beast. It laid waste to every single plan, hope, home, heart that was in its path. When it receded, it would leave everything covered in mud and dirt. Some things would never recover. Like me. Now, I look back at him. He’s watching me with a perplexed expression on his face.

“I know rivers, but you made me forget the danger. I forgot to cage my love for you. And now, I’m drowning in it,” I whisper.

“Confidence, you need to stop speaking code. Tell me what the fuck is going on?” He raises his voice in frustration. “Why are you crying? And why can’t I touch you?” he asks, his voice even louder, and he sounds as angry as I feel. I glance at him and it pisses me off that he doesn’t look panicked or worried.

“You’ve ruined everything!” I shout, suddenly overwhelmed with anger, sadness, disillusionment, despair.

“You need—”

“I don’t need to do anything,” I say in defiance.

“Yes, you fucking do,” he snarls.

I cross my arms over my chest. “I’m not saying I thought this was going to be forever. But over the last couple of months, I’d let myself imagine the possibility ...” I say while I throw my charger, laptop, phone, and books into my shoulder bag.

“Okay.” He shrugs. “What’s changed since you fell asleep on my cock six hours ago?”

Of course. It's always about sex with him. I shake my head and slip my feet into my shoes. I can't even look at him.

Queen.

I love you.

Respect you.

All lies.

"You ordered a background check on me?"

His face pales. My stomach falls.

"Because I'm 'hot enough to fuck, but not good enough to bring home'?" my lip curls in a sneer

"Who told you that?" he asks and my heart sinks.

"Well, at least you're not denying it." Fatigue makes my sadness heavy and suffocating.

"I didn't mean—"

"I can't believe you talked about me like that," I say, my traitorous voice breaking. The warmth of his hand resting on my shoulder suddenly feels like a branding heat.

I step away. "Don't you fucking touch me," I snarl.

"Confidence, what the fuck?" he demands.

My stomach cramps and I hug my arms around my middle.

My heart is sick.

I'm sick.

How in the world could I have fallen for this shit again?

I tattooed this motherfucker's name on my body.

I square my shoulders, drop my hands and straighten up so I can look him square in the eye. "I heard you last night. I followed you when you left because I thought maybe you needed me," I tell him and watch his face fall.

He groans and for the first time since I've known him, I see fear in his eyes. My own fear feeds on it. The ache in my stomach sharpens. Things are about to get worse and I'm scared by how viscerally I feel the loss already. I've fallen so thoroughly and irredeemably in love with him. Just in time for him to break my fucking heart.

"No," he says sternly. "You've got all of that wrong. I ordered it before we were together in Italy. Weeks later when it showed up, I couldn't remember why I thought I needed it. I never opened it."

"You didn't?" I ask and I feel a flicker of hope that maybe I misunderstood.

"No," he sighs. "I decided I could overlook everything that was wrong about us. Your lack of money, your lack of a name. I already knew about the scandal surrounding your career," he says.

I pale. But I set my jaw and narrow my eyes at him.

"You've overlooked them?" I ask, almost daring him to repeat himself.

"Yes. I decided it didn't matter," he says like he's being a benevolent ruler. Like he's looking down his nose at me.

My hackles shoot straight up. "I didn't ask you to overlook anything," I hiss.

He comes to stand in front of me and reaches for me. "No," I say quietly.

"Let me explain." His voice is thick and gruff. Angry.

Fuck him.

I won't look at him. I can't.

The heaviness in my body is only outmatched by the ton of pain in my heart.

I turn to face him.

"I may not have a name. Maybe I didn't know where Positano is or what some random Latin words mean ... or whatever." I narrow my eyes at him and stab the air with my finger. "But, I'll tell you what. My mother worked her way up to manager at a small plant in Tennessee at a time when it was really hard for women to do that. While she lived with a husband who treated her like a punching bag and a son she was afraid of. And she put up with that shit for me. She worked a second job to help pay tuition to put me,” I say, pointing at my chest, “through college. And law school. Because she looked at me and saw what you and the rest of your stuck-up friends fail to see. All of my potential.”

I wave my hands in the air around my head, my fingers pointing down to my body. His expression is one of pure shock.

“I was raised to treat everyone with respect,” I continue. “I was raised to be proud of my integrity, my loyalty and my kindness. My name means something because I’ve made it mean something.”

“Confidence,” he growls.

“You don’t have the right to say my name,” I snap and his eyes widen. “I’m not going to let you or anyone else look down on me because I don’t have money and my last name isn’t on a stadium or museums or a hospital somewhere.”

“Fucking hell, Confidence,” he grinds out.

I ignore him.

“You’ve had everything handed to you. And yet, here we are.” I fling my arms wide in a sweeping flourish that covers the whole room. “In the same place. At the very same time. Who’s slumming?” I sneer. “And who’s leveled up?” I give him a hard, challenging look. “Who should be looking down on who?”

“I don’t look down on—”

“The one who’s here because she worked, scraped, and beat back the crabs trying to pull her back into the barrel?” I take a step closer to him. “Or the person who’s here because he was lucky enough to be pushed out of a gold lined pussy?” I give him a disdainful head-to-toe assessment.

His eyes narrow, his jaw flexes and he rears back. “What did you just say to me?” he hisses.

“Did you let the pretty dresses, law degree and good table manners fool you?” I ask. “I grew up with a trucker hat turned to the back, jeans tucked into my muddy hiking boots, a hunting rifle slung across my back and a bowie knife tucked into my waist. I’ve been thrown to the wolves and I have killed every. Single. One. Of them.” I am aflame with indignation.

“You need to calm down,” he says and has the nerve to reach for me.

“No,” I huff and grit my teeth. “We’re done. You are never going to insult me again. You don’t deserve me.”

I shake my head in frustration and then stand up. He moves fast and grabs me by the forearms. He presses his forehead to mine, our noses touch, our breath mingles between us and his eyes burn into mine with possessiveness and determination.

“You’re right. I don’t.” He pins me in place with his eyes “I know it. You know it. And yet, here we are. In the same place at the same fucking time,” he says, throwing my words back at me. “You take everything I give you. Even when it hurts because you know I’m going to make you come so hard you can’t breathe. You sleep next to me with your fingers linked with mine because you love me. We are not even close to done,” he grits out and I try to pull myself loose.

Right now, I’m caught between wanting to sob in his arms and wanting to kick him in the balls.

“Let go of me,” I growl.

“Never. You will not walk away from me because of some bullshit like this.”

“It’s not bullshit. I have spent the entire weekend with your crazy ass family and their friends,” I shout back at him and shake myself loose. This time, he lets me go. “Are these really the people you want to surround yourself with? You talked about your family doing good. What good does it do to get dressed up for a six-course meal just because it’s Friday? I mean, it’s like fucking Versailles. Your city is drowning and you’re dressed up because it’s Friday.”

I hurl my words like bullets and when his face turns red with anger, I know I hit my target. He grabs my wrists and pulls me back.

“You overheard me and Dare last night, but you still let me fuck you. Were planning to leave me when we woke up?” he asks angrily.

I flush because the way he says it makes it sound ... treacherous. But I shake that off because it's not remotely true.

“I didn't know what I was going to do, Hayes. I was confused!” I shout at him.

“Did you know you were going to leave this morning?” he asks me coldly.

“Yes,” I answer. He flinches.

My family is no prize and has its fair share of shit. But I don't want to live like this. I didn't escape the frying pan just to jump into the fire.

“I mean, maybe if that craziness with Eliza had felt like a fluke, or the dinner guests hadn't made me feel like something a dog dragged in from outside. Or knowing that your brother thinks I'm already measuring for drapes and counting your money. But I don't want to live in chaos with people who hate each other—and who hate me. I mean, she slapped the housekeeper!” My arms fling out in front of me. His hands take the opportunity and grab hold of me. I don't fight him. I

“I'm not them,” he grinds out.

“But you are. You can't help it. They treated me the way you did the night we met,” I say with a stony glare.

He flinches.

Good.

“You have to forgive me for that. It can't be the reason you walk away,” he says.

“It's not the only reason. Everything that's happened this weekend. I don't want to fight in the place where I'm supposed to be safe. I want a calm, quiet home. Those are my reasons.” I want to cry because all I want is for him to hold me.

“Like what?” I ask impatiently.

“You love me. I belong to you,” he whispers, and I close my eyes on a pathetic whimper. He strokes his nose alongside mine. A tear rolls down my cheek.

“You belong to me,” he says before he crashes his lips on top of mine. He snags my lower lip between his teeth and sucks it, bites it. My fingers slide into his hair, and his tongue slips into my mouth. I let him taste me while I drink as much as I can handle before my body throbs for more. And then I gather tufts of his hair into my hands and yank—hard.

“Fuuuuck!” he roars and breaks our kiss.

I scramble around the bed.

“I belong to myself,” I snarl. “And yes, I kneeled in front of you and took what you gave me. But, I will never kneel for you again.”

He looks angry, but I still see that fear and I hate it. “You better not walk out of that door,” he says.

“Or what?” I hiss.

We face each other. His bed is like a battlefield between us. I press my knuckles into the mattress and lean toward him so I can look him in the eye one more time. There’s real distress in his that shakes my resolve. Damn him for making me love him so much.

“I am not afraid of you. How could I be? When you were so afraid of me that you needed a background check—” I say.

His face is pained. “I’m sorry—”

“You should be,” I snap. “But not for me. I’ve survived worse than a man who’s too blind to see that I’m the best thing that will ever happen to him.”

My heart tugs at the nearly gray pallor on his face when I turn to pick up my things. With each piece of clothing I throw into my bag, my resolve grows. I face him again. He's watching me, his face thunderous and his body perfectly still.

"I'm leaving," I tell him.

He shrugs. "You'll be back. And I'll be waiting."

"Right," I scoff dismissively and zip up my suitcase.

"You're mine. My queen. What do you have without your king?" he asks coldly.

"All the power," I say with an equally icy tone and smile.

Then, I walk away from him.

Part II

Chapter Fifteen

The Return

Hayes

I careen through the winding and nonsensically narrow street of the Rivers Estate. The rows of manicured shrubs are nothing more than blurs of dark green as I run yet another stop sign.

On a street without a single intersection.

In a subdivision with only one house.

It's just one example of the lack of planning and the sense of entitlement that's created the mess I've been cleaning up since I took control from Uncle Thomas.

It's been eighty-seven days of inconsistencies, complaints, and so much fucking disappointment, that I'm starting to forget what it feels like to be satisfied.

A flock of baby geese step into the road just two hundred and fifty feet ahead of my speeding car. I slam hard on my breaks to stop in time. My high-performance Maserati protests with groans, shrieks, and sputters. I struggle to hold my steering wheel straight to stop the threatening spin out that's pulling my tires to the right. The acrid stench of burned rubber and the uncertainty of whether I had ten geese crushed beneath my car congeal like cooled grease in my stomach.

I peer out of my window and breathe a sigh of relief when the gaggle waddles past, completely oblivious to the havoc they nearly wrecked and how close their lives came to ending.

"Where's your sense of survival, you idiotic animals?" I chide them as I pull past them and hook a right up the dark, concrete tiled driveway. The rows of pink flowering bushes on either side were planted by my mother the year before she died.

I'm surprised Eliza didn't pull them up. She tore out the rose garden my mother planted within months of marrying my father. I pull up the drive and park under the huge carport that should have been knocked down years ago. I throw my car into park and give myself a minute to collect my thoughts before I walk into the house.

Built at the turn of the twentieth century by my great-great-grandfather, Jeb Rivers, it's one of Houston's oldest homes. As my uncle likes to remind anyone who will listen, at nearly twenty thousand square feet that sits on two and half acres of land, it's also one of the biggest and most expensive homes in the city.

Houston's nearly one-hundred-mile sprawl means that even as we get close to edging Chicago out of the number three spot on the list of America's largest cities, there's a seemingly endless supply of land that keeps home prices down. That forty-million-dollar price tag would buy a six thousand square foot penthouse apartment in New York City, max.

It's why Houston's wealthy can indulge in more cars, food, theatre and retail therapy than their wealthy counterparts in other cities. And indulge, we do. I stare out at the expanse of lawn that's bisected by a ground level fountain with a pool full of koi fish. The estate boasts a citrus grove, rose gardens, a tennis court, Olympic-sized infinity pool, and is surrounded by hundred-year-old trees. But after Confidence's visit, when I look at it, all I see is a tomb where our family's skeletons live. If I had my way, I would tear it all down.

A sharp rap on the passenger's side window of my car startles me out of my daydream. My uncle, the Crypt Keeper himself, is peering in at me. His thick silver eyebrows are drawn down over his thunderous dark eyes.

He doesn't look like an old man. He looks like an old villain. One that threatens to eat children when they make too much noise. His wide, thin-lipped mouth is moving, but my blissfully soundproof car keeps the assault from reaching my ears. I savor the quiet in my car long enough to take three deep breaths before I step out of the car into a jarringly different atmosphere.

“You’re late. The team has been gathered for more than twenty minutes,” he says. He’s got the kind of voice that’s powerful without being loud. But, the power of that is lost on me. I know that he’s nothing more than an empty vessel for delusion and resentment.

“Well, since the meeting couldn’t start without me, I’d say that I’m right on time,” I tell him. “And if you had held this meeting in the office instead of here, it would have started twenty minutes ago,” I tell him. We step in the gargantuan foyer and start up the stairs to the room that’s always used for Kingdom business. Swish’s old office.

“You forget that you’re talking to your uncle, Hayes. I will have your respect,” he says from behind me.

I stop and turn to find him standing on the bottom step, hands folded behind his back, an expectant look on his face.

I walk back down so I’m one step above him.

“You forget that you’re talking to the head of your family,” I remind him. “If you want my respect, you better set about trying to earn it.” I turn and start back up the stairs. “The mess you’ve made of things has left us vulnerable on too many fronts and has lost you any built in credibility I gave you because you’re my uncle. You’ve done a piss poor job,” I say over my shoulder.

A lawsuit filed by a group of tenants whose homes were damaged in the flood last month is just the latest in a pile of shit that’s been landing on my desk for the last three months. I’ve spent nearly all of my time as chairman of the board putting out fires. It’s meant to be a figurehead position, but with an incompetent and corrupt executive team, I’ve been forced to take a more hands on approach. None of them like it, but I don’t care.

“The lawsuit is what we called you here to discuss,” he says, still behind me as I push open the doors to the room that’s decorated like a nineteenth century country club. Whatever traces of Swish there were in here are gone. I want to hurry and get out of here.

“Gentlemen, please have a seat,” I say to the three men who stand when I walk in.

I sit down at the head of the table. “Tell me what’s going on with this.” I look at Rich Jones, the current head of operations.

He slides a folder over to me and opens the one in front of him.

“There are twenty-five thousand units that are included in the class; they represent an annual revenue of about three hundred million dollars to the Real Estate Investment Trust. Our investors expect those dividends and profit shares.”

“What’s this got to do with the flooded-out apartments?”

“Well ...” he tugs at his collar and looks around the table at the other two 80-year-old incompetents who had helped him and my uncle destroy Kingdom one bit at a time.

They all stare down at their laps.

Cowards.

“There are two main issues in their complaint. The first is that some of them were evicted without notice. The units took on water, but we disagreed with their complaints that there would be any significant problems with people living there once they dried out,” he says.

“What was your disagreement based on?” I ask.

“You’re on your own here, Rich. They’re not going to jump in and save you.” I hook my thumb at the two other men. “Tell me.”

“It was just what we thought,” he says in a high nasally whine that makes me wish hitting people wasn’t illegal.

“But some of ‘em left without notice, and we didn’t know if they would be back. There were plenty of people looking for places to rent so we filled the vacated units right away.” He shrugs his shoulders, eyes wide with complete bafflement at how what he’s saying could be construed as fraud and theft.

“It says here you emptied occupied apartments and threw away personal belongings after residents were gone for less than seventy-two hours? Is that allegation true?”

“Yes, but we thought they were moved, and we needed to turn those units over to people who wanted to pay,” he snaps defensively and wipes a drop of sweat from his forehead. I shake my head in disgust.

I reach into my pocket and pull out my phone and text my PA Muriel that I want her to find an executive search firm. It’s time for me to build my own team. I’ve had enough indulging my uncle’s ego and treading lightly.

“Well, we’re going to settle this case. And we’re going to make these people whole again. I want a report on the actual damage costs. They’re suing us, seeking general and pecuniary damages. Our exposure at trial is unlimited. This isn’t hard. Let’s give them a little money for their troubles and send them on their way.” I stand up to leave.

“On Monday, I want a list—a comprehensive one—of all other potential liabilities you’re aware of. Even if it’s just a repeated customer complaint. And I don’t mean just in real estate, I mean throughout Kingdom. I also want a report of our philanthropic spending in the last ten years. I’ve received disturbing reports about our failure to support efforts that were pioneered by the Rivers family,” I chastise them.

“The zoo doesn’t need our help any longer. Why should we continue making such huge bequests?” Eugene Kinder, the CFO, chimes in from his chair.

I’ve never liked him.

“That’s not for you to decide. I want those reports by the end of the week.” I stand. The four men all stand and offer their disingenuous farewells.

“Uncle Thomas, will you walk me out?”

I wait for him outside the door. I scan the vaulted tray ceiling. The ivory-colored, intricately-carved crown molding runs along the perimeter of the room.

A huge crown sits in the middle of the letters R and K. Rivers Kingdom. That's what this used to be. That's how people have referred to us. But we have never called ourselves kings. Not until my uncle's reign.

He joins me in the corridor. "Yes, what would you like to discuss?" His tone is formal, his eyes wary as he waits for me to speak.

"Poppy refuses to remain on staff as long as you or Eliza reside in Rivers House," I inform him.

"Well, we'll be sad to see her go," he says and adjusts the cuffs on his shirtsleeves.

"She's not going anywhere. I've told her that you will be moving out," I inform him.

His eyes nearly bug out of his head. His lips pucker like he's sucked a lemon and he seems incapable of speech. So, I continue. "In two months, members of Denmark's royal family will begin an extended occupancy at Rivers House. Poppy has arranged to have the house cleaned and the rooms prepared, so you and Aunt Mai will need to make other arrangements for accommodation. Eliza has already been informed that she will need to vacate the house," I say.

He blinks at me, his face flushed red with embarrassment. But he manages to unstick his lips, and he fixes me with a judgmental stare.

"Aren't these sort of details and message deliveries below your station, nephew? Or are you finding these more mundane and administrative tasks better suited to your capabilities?" he asks, smugness at his dig spreading across his withered face.

I shake my head in disappointment. "I'm not such a slave to my pride, Uncle, that I couldn't deliver a message that might have felt callous coming from someone who doesn't know your personal situation," I tell him.

He has the decency to look ashamed.

"Thomas, I'm not here to rub my leadership in your face," I say to the top of his bowed head.

“Why are you here? If not for the glory of it?” he snaps. His resentment is unmasked and fully evident in his eyes. I feel a pang of pity for him. He’s never been happy with his position in the family.

“I’m here because it’s my responsibility to make sure that the next heir receives a legacy that’s worth preserving.”

“As if it isn’t now? I have been a wonderful steward of this family’s interests,” he protests.

“Ah, yes, the ever-growing pile of lawsuits from clients, customers, and partners alike say that,” I retort.

“Of course they’re unhappy. They want us to live like we’re commoners. They want to pretend they’re our equals. I stopped that. You want to settle with these people? Why don’t they go find better jobs, so they can afford better than some flooded out apartment? We are not a charity. We are a business. If they think it’s not fit for human occupation, fine. They should go find somewhere else to live.”

“Those apartments are not fit for any human occupation. The reports are damning. Would you want to live there?”

“I would never be forced to make that kind of choice,” he sniffs.

“How do you know? Don’t you have the ability to put yourself in someone else’s shoes and imagine what it would be like if you were in them?” I ask in muted outrage. I just don’t understand where this man’s heart is. How he and my father were both raised by my grandparents is a mystery.

“Why would I want to imagine being them? How vulgar,” he says with a sniff of disgust.

He’s a lost cause. I just need to completely declaw him and then I’ll strip him of all his power and mandate his retirement from the board.

“You had fifteen years to do what you would. You sent me away. You made sure I stayed away. Perhaps you hoped I’d never come back. But here I am.”

“Yes, here you are,” he says with barely disguised malice.

“And here, I’ll stay.” I reinforce it with my own undisguised dislike. “You need to get used to it. Stop trying to undermine me; stop trying to make me feel like I have less right to be here than you do. I’m sorry you weren’t born first. But you need to start thinking about what your life could be,” I say with a heavy sigh.

He doesn’t respond. He just stares straight ahead in stony silence, his face completely mottled with his pent-up anger.

“I’ve rented you a unit in the Ivy,” I tell him weakly as I stand.

“No, we will not stay there. It would be an insult to the family’s honor,” he blurts through woodenly clenched teeth.

“How is it an insult?”

“They aren’t fit to be our neighbors. They’re commoners. That land was part of our dynasty,” he spits.

Loathing floods me in a rush of heat, and I don’t hide it when I look at him.

“We sold them that land. We took the money from it and made ourselves rich again. They even named it after us in a show of good faith. This one-sided feud is ridiculous. I’m not going to perpetuate it anymore.”

“My father would shudder to see how you’ve degraded our dynasty,” he says.

I’ve had enough of his shit. I step into his personal space and look him in the eye.

“It’s a family, not a dynasty. We are commoners. Being richer than all of the monarchies combined doesn’t make you one by de facto. And thanks to your inability to delegate or manage the business yourself, we’re perilously close to being in debt. We’re just regular people. We’ll never reclaim any of the land we sold to the Wildes. If you’d had any real sense of what we needed, you would have embraced them.”

His face mottles, and his already thin lips compress to leave what looks like a white gash where his mouth should be. He leans forward, as tall and straight at age eighty as he'd been at sixty.

"We are kings in our own right." His lips barely move. His eyes are hard and intense. "I will never embrace those bourgeoisie hippies who don't know the meaning of the word 'empire'. The Riverses had assets on which the sun never set. The legacy you speak of is one that was built with my grandfather's bare hands. And now you're kicking me out so some royals can come and rent this house? Like it's a fucking hotel?"

"It's certainly not a home. And I'm done wasting resources to try and make it feel like one just so you have a free place to live. I've offered you an option. If you'd rather use your fixed income to rent a place elsewhere, you're welcome to do it. But, either way, you and Aunt Mai and Eliza will have to be out of here by the time the embassy tenants are moving in."

"I won't go," he says quietly.

"Yes, you will," I tell him.

"No, I won't. You'll have to have me forcibly removed," he says.

"Fine, if that's what you want," I say with a shrug.

"I'll call the press," he says, scrambling up to his feet when I start down the hall.

"You do that. I'll make sure to set my DVR to record your dramatic exit when Channel 11 airs the story." I give him a two-finger salute and walk around to get back in my car.

"You'll ruin the family's reputation," he calls.

I make my dispassion plain in my expression.

"You've done a fine job of that yourself. Let me know what you'd like to do regarding leaving the house. I really have no problem being the bad guy. Everyone already thinks I'm a villain, why not get something in return for the headaches that come with that."

I drive down the winding road and watch the estate whiz by. When I was a boy growing up here, I never imagined I would come to think of it as a burden. A reminder of those ugly days after my father's death and the years I spent being a punching bag for self-important assholes and an ATM to any pretty girl who would give me the time of day.

I approach the private entrance to Rivers Wilde and the tension I'm carrying starts to dissipate.

The gate lifts and I drive into the enclave, established by the Wildes before I was even born. This community, developed on land that was in my family for nearly one hundred years, is one of the most sought after addresses in Houston.

The huge golf course stretches for three miles on one side of Wildewood Parkway. The grand country club rises from behind its gates like a palace. I pause at the forked road and go right to the cluster of sky-scraping residential towers called the Ivy. The glass and brick structures loom over the copse of trees planted around them. As I approach the four-lane circle drive, the guard who sits in the middle of it waves in greeting and the wrought iron gate starts its slow ascent.

"Evening, boss," Sammy, our valet, greets as he pulls my door open. "Your dinner's been delivered and is ready to bring up as soon as you call."

"Thank you." I grasp his outstretched hand, and he smiles when he feels the money in my hand.

"Will you be needing your car again, or should I park her for the night?"

I glance at the sky. It's clear and blue, but the orange tint of the clouds signals that it's dusk.

"No, leave her out. I'm going out before dinner," I tell him and head inside to change. On my way up, I call Remington Wilde. I haven't spoken to him since that day sixteen years ago. But from what I've heard, even from people who don't like him, he's a straight shooter. An honest man and a legendary attorney already. He's grown Wilde Law into one of the largest in the country and has made his name as Assistant Attorney General in the Civil Rights Division at the Department of Justice by the time he turned thirty. He's back home after his grandfather's death left him the head of the family. He's built the Civil Rights Division of Wilde Law incredibly fast. And his firm is representing the class that's suing us.

"Mr. Wilde's office," a crisp, British accented female voice answers after the first ring.

"Is Mr. Wilde there?"

"He's not available, may I take a message?" she asks immediately. Fucking gatekeepers.

"It's Hayes Rivers," I say.

There's a beat of silence, and she says, "Mr. Rivers, please hold for Mr. Wilde," and then there's a beep and Remington comes on the line.

"Who the fuck is this?" he says, just like he did that morning we met. I burst into unexpected laughter, and he joins me.

"What's up, kid?" he asks.

"I'm going to give you that, because these days, I'm good with being younger than you, especially since we're playing at the same level now," I say.

"You can't even see my level." He laughs. "You just got back into town, and you're already talking shit," he says.

"Just telling you how it is," I say.

"You have no clue how it is. You need to come kiss the rings of the men who've been running Houston while you were eating pasta on a beach in Italy," he quips. I laugh. I'd forgotten that he was a cocky asshole. I haven't seen him again since that day we met in the clearing. But it looks like not much has changed.

"I got your letter," I say and don't take his bait.

"No hard feelings, man," he says unapologetically. "But you've got to know that what Kingdom is doing is very wrong."

"You're preaching to the choir. I'm not calling to give you shit. I'm about to do you a huge favor," I tell him.

He whistles low and long. “Well, shit. Maybe I should sue you more often.” He laughs.

“You in the office early tomorrow?” I ask.

“Yes,” he says.

“I’ll come to you,” I say.

“You better bring coffee,” he says, then hangs up.

He’s an asshole. But I like him. And I think he’s going to be receptive to what I have to say tomorrow.

This lawsuit, since it landed on my desk, has been nothing but a headache. But now it’s presenting me with a multitude of opportunities. I want to hold Kingdom accountable, but I know the board and executive committee will never back me on it. So, I’ll find another way. This company is rotten from the inside out. If I’ve got to kill it to save the family name, I will. What’s left isn’t worth the paper its letterhead is printed on. And I want the family foundation that I control to be the source of the Rivers family influence.

And, I know just the lawyer to do it.

Confidence still isn’t talking to me. She left my house that day and spent a couple of days with Cass’s family in Rivers Wilde before she left for Arkansas. She refused to see me. I followed her home, and she made it very clear I wasn’t welcome.

It’s been a month and she’s returned every email and text I’ve sent with the same message, “I will never forgive you.”

I know she thinks she means it.

I mean to make sure she has no choice. Because living without her isn’t an option for me and this distance has only made that more apparent. It’s time to take control of this situation.

Chapter Sixteen

Kings Meet

Hayes

“Can I have two coffees to go? One black. One with two creams and one sugar” I ask.

“Ah, you made up with Ms. Confidence,” the man behind the counter says brightly as he rings up my order.

I’m in the middle of reading my email from Amelia, my new lawyer, and almost drop my phone at his words.

This is only my second time here. I peer at his name tag that says “Lo”. “How do you know Confidence?” I ask quizzically.

“Oh, that girl was in here making juju dolls out of stirring straws with her friend for a couple days after the storm. They were all named after you,” he says and then laughs at whatever he sees on my face.

“What’s a juju doll?”

“Ah, that’s what we call them in Nigeria. Maybe here you call them voodoo? Like the Creoles?” He laughs.

“Oh. She made voodoo dolls and named them after me?” I ask and then glance behind me to see who was snickering.

The group of teenage girls all look away when I scowl at them.

“Yes, my man. My wife has been mad at me. But I’ve never had a doll made in my honor,” he says and hands me back my credit card. I’m so dazed I don’t even remember asking for it back.

“Thank you,” I say absently and stick it back into my pocket.

“And she took her coffee just like that, two creams, one sugar. So, I thought maybe one of those was for her.”

“No. Unfortunately, it’s not.” And I realize that I’ve been drinking my coffee like this since I met her. All of these subtle ways I’ve started to compensate for her absence in my life. I yearn for her in a way that claws at my insides.

“Well, we hope she forgives you soon and comes back. We liked having her around, and she loves my lattes,” he says boisterously.

“Okay,” I say, weirded out that he even cares.

I want to ask him to tell me more, but it’s too pathetic. So, I just smile. “Well, if she comes back, I’ll definitely make sure she has one every morning.”

“Don’t worry, son. It’ll be okay,” he says. I raise my brows to show that I’m not as confident as he is.

“Listen—in Rivers Wilde, we look out for each other. It’s that small-town nosiness imported to Houston. You’ll get used to it,” he says.

“Lotanna, that line hasn’t moved since I went back to get more scones. Let the man get on with his day, cha” a petite, dark haired, very pretty woman whose name tag says Sweet calls as she walks through the swinging doors off the side of the bakery’s main dining room.

Her accent is identical to his, so I assume that she’s from Nigeria, too. “Sorry, Mr. Rivers. Lo loves gossip. He reads Ms. Regan’s column every morning and she wrote about you two a lot in the last month.”

“Regan has a column?” Regan Wilde is Remi’s twin sister, and as far as I know is married with two kids and a journalist on a local channel.

“Well, we suspect it’s her. We all just call it Regan’s column. It’s a sort of ...”

“Poison pen,” her husband provides the word she was searching for.

“Nasty, if you ask me,” Sweet says.

“No one asked you. It’s great,” Lo says enthusiastically. “Our very own town crier. Anyway, we’re all rooting for Ms.

Confidence to forgive you, Mr. Rivers. Let us know,” he says and hands me my drink.

I walk out of there and cross the small footbridge that leads to the office park of Rivers Wilde.

I thought moving to a big city would rid me of the curse of nosy Italian mamas that plagued the small village I had lived in with Gigi. But instead, I’d moved into what was essentially a small town and everyone is invested in what’s happening with Confidence and me. I’m just glad my office is downtown, twenty minutes away, tucked safely in the old Chevron Tower. And far away from the constant questions that only remind me that my girl isn’t talking to me and that I have no way of making her. Well, until yesterday.

“You’re late,” Remington Wilde says as soon as I step through the sliding glass doors of his office.

“This is all very man in the high castle, Wilde. Most executives work from home these days,” I tease.

“Good for those motherfuckers. The can-be executives. I’ll be a leader and show up to the office every fucking day.”

“You take everything as a challenge,” I scoff.

“Yes. Because I’m addicted to winning. And you’re late,” he says.

“No, I’m just not early.” I stick my hand out to shake his and we share a good-natured grin.

“So, you’re finally back and in charge?” he asks, his dark eyes narrowed in naked skepticism.

“I’m back,” I say before I unbutton my suit jacket and sit down across from him.

“I know you’re not living in that old castle up there, are you?”

“No, I bought a place in Rivers Wilde. It’s almost ready. Until then, I’m living in the Ivy,” I tell him.

“How do you like it?” he asks.

“I like it fine,” I say noncommittally.

“If by ‘fine’ you mean you like the good people, excellent food, world-class amenities, and being in the most convenient part of Houston, then I’m glad to hear it. Rivers Wilde is a tastemaker and so many have tried to replicate what we did. But there’s not another community like it in Houston,” he says.

“Cut the sales talk. I’ve already been brought down by one of your sales ninjas. And, I’m here to sell you something,” I tell him.

He chuckles and quirks his lips proudly. “Our sales team is the best in the country. We still use my dad’s training manual for our sales force. Almost thirty years later it’s still turning out fucking soldiers on our sales team,” he says and nods.

“You hungry?” he asks and nods at the menu.

“Nope, and I’ve got a chimichurri steak frites being delivered from Moxie’s at 12:30. I’m saving myself for that baby,” I joke.

“From what I heard, that’s the only thing you’re calling baby these days,” he says and takes a sip of his drink. He grins at me mischievously from behind the lip of his cup. Confidence’s hasty departure from my house and her decampment to Rivers Wilde for the remainder of her stay was clearly the subject of rampant gossip.

“I can’t believe you have time to listen to gossip.”

“Oh, I don’t. But my twin, Regan, she lives for it and you two were the talk of the town after she was seen fleeing your house in the middle of a fucking hurricane. That sounded like some drama. And your stepmother sounds like a nut job,” he says.

“Fuck off,” I gripe.

He bursts out laughing. I watch him with a bored expression.

He wipes his eyes. “I’m done,” he says.

“Good. Because it’s actually a perfect segue about why I’m here. Your lawsuit, the flood victims? You need to hire them the best lawyer you can. Kingdom is pulling out all the stops because they don't want their other tenants to get any ideas." I get straight to the point.

"What? Are you turning traitor on your own company?" he asks and laughs.

"It's not my company. But the foundation has exposure. I'm trying to limit it," I say shortly.

"You live here. So, you know what my uncle has done. And I'm trying to find a way to work around his stooges on the executive committee. I think they'd be willing to settle. I want to make sure that my first act as chairman is to settle this case," I level with him.

He assesses me for a few seconds. "So, you're telling me you're not going to be Mr. Same Shit Different Day?"

"I'm telling you that there is shit I'm not willing to attach my name to," I say honestly.

"I'm listening," he says and leans back, confident that whatever I'm about to tell him, he's already got a stronger hand than I.

But he can't. Not when he doesn't know all of the cards in play.

"You need a fucking good lawyer. I saw that Jimenez asshole listed as the attorney of record. He's going to fuck it up for your clients," I say.

"He's one of the best litigators in the country." He swats away my comments with the shrug of one shoulder.

"Are you personally overseeing this matter?"

"No, but I am watching closely. I'm the one they came to. I just can't take it on right now," he says.

"Well, let me tell you that Jimenez doesn't give a shit about them. That's going to matter because he'll give them terrible advice and tell them to take whatever Kingdom's offering."

"Okay, I don't have time to launch a search right now, Rivers. But thanks for the advice." He rolls his eyes.

“I’m not here to give you advice. I said I have a favor,” I reiterate slowly. “I know a lawyer. The one who won that huge insurance settlement for those people in the delta.”

“Ohh yeah, I’ve heard of her. Some weird-as-fuck first name, like Contracts or something, right?” he says.

“Her name is Confidence Ryan, asshole,” I say.

“You know her?” he asks with an impressed, suggestive smile.

“Yeah, I know her. She’s my girlfriend. The one you were teasing me about.” I say it and ignore the flashback of her telling me she’d never forgive me.

“Oh, shit. Regan never said her name. I had no idea. You want me to hire your girlfriend to be the lawyer for a class action lawsuit against your company?”

“It’s not my company. And I’m trying to save the small piece of it that is mine. So, yeah. I want you to hire her. She’s the best,” I say honestly.

“You know she’s not just well known because of that case. Her old firm put the word out about her, man. I heard she tried to fucking gank her last boss,” he says with a laugh.

“You’re wasting my time,” I say dismissively.

“You’re wasting your own time. I don’t want a PR nightmare on my hands by hiring some chick with a short fuse just cause you’re pussy whipped,” he says.

I ignore the jab and cut to the chase.

“Why did you take this case, Remi?” I ask him.

“Because this is my city. That flood, some of the images I saw, will haunt me for the rest of my life. It’s been a month and we’re seeing stories of families getting back in the homes. But those are the people with good fucking insurance and savings. And Wilde Law is no different from any other Wilde World enterprise. We serve the Houstonians that a lot of people have forgotten about. Not because we’re bleeding hearts, but because we’re them. The underdogs. My grandfather was the son of Irish immigrants, my mother the daughter of Jamaicans who sailed on the Windrush to the UK. They’ve had to overcome more than you can imagine to get to where they are. And Houston made all of that possible. The people who shop in our stores, the people who eat at our restaurants and buy gas from our stations. So, I took the case because I want to do something good for my people.” His voice brims with passion and I know I made the right decision coming here today.

“Then hire Confidence. She’s the best. That gossip about her is bullshit. You don’t know me well, but if you think I’d let a woman who was less than fucking incredible near my family or me, you’re crazy,” I tell him.

He eyes me with an enigmatic expression and then says, “Where is she?”

“Arkansas. “

“Your girl is in Arkansas? Why?” he asks with an annoying chuckle.

“She lives there,” I say defensively. He raises an I smell BS eyebrow.

“And I fucked up when she was here and she’s not talking to me,” I say and take a big gulp of coffee.

His chuckle turns into a guffaw.

I glower at him.

“Sorry, man,” he says and doesn’t sound sorry at all.

“Interview her. With hurricane season in Houston being an annual event, you’ll never be short of work, and she’ll draw clients for you,” I say.

“And I could get her here for you, so you could try to win her back without going to Arkansas?”

“Yes. And I went to Arkansas. Two weeks ago. She pulled her shotgun out and trained it on me. I didn’t get close enough to talk to her.”

He bursts into raucous laughter and claps his hands together.

“Oh, shit. Does she have a sister?” he asks.

“No,” I say, unamused.

“So, do you want me to tell her you asked me to interview her?”

“No. She won’t take the job if you tell her that. And I don’t want you to hire her unless you think she’s the best person for the job.”

“I’m too addicted to winning to hire losers. If I hire her, it’s because I know she’s going to deliver the best thing possible for the clients. And Barry is a shit. It would be nice to have someone more invested leading the case. So, yeah. I’ll call her. Get her down here. But we’ll have to disclose your relationship to the clients because they should know. “

“She’s not talking to me. Nothing to disclose,” I say.

“If she wants this job, she’ll have to get over that and also talk to and about you in a professional manner. No domestic drama at the office,” he says.

“Let me just tell you. When you meet her, you’ll think she’s the prettiest thing you’ve ever seen. And that’s just the tip of the iceberg.” I say.

He scoffs.

“You’ll see when you meet her. Just remember that you will have to end my life to get anywhere near her.”

He does that annoying whistle of his. “Damn. It’s like that?” he grimaces in sympathy. “Look, if that’s your girl ... you better get in there quick. Nothing more dangerous than a good woman experiencing the world without the aftertaste of whatever bullshit you made her put up with ... if she gets too much of that ... she’ll never take you back,” he taunts, but I detect the whiff of experience in his advice.

The idea of her getting over me makes me feel like I’m having an out-of-body experience. I can’t let that happen. And yet, what does it say about how I’ve treated her if she prefers her world without me in it? I mean, she’s not exactly a constant bundle of fun, but I can’t imagine life without her. The thought of it makes me howl crazy at the moon.

“If she takes the interview, I’ll let you know. But if you asked me not to say anything, then don’t go telling her yourself. I’m not trying to have her hating me because she thinks I was trying to pull your chain and used her to do it.”

“She’s too smart for that. She knows I would never do anything like that.”

“If you say so, but if that shit hits the fan ...”

“It won’t. I won’t let it. I promise.”

He eyes me.

“So, since I have no clue what the feud is about—and my grandfather’s health has failed so badly that he can’t even tell me—I think it’s time we ended it,” he says.

“Just like that?” I ask, but my respect for him doubles. I like how direct he is. And I like that he’s not interested in a grudge for the sake of it.

“Agreed,” I say.

“I’m glad you’re back. That family of yours needs new blood. Your uncle’s a cold motherfucker. I was a kid when you were, so I don’t remember much about your dad’s time, but from what I understand, it was nothing like this.” He shakes his head, and I’m embarrassed that I can’t say more than a noncommittal, “I know. I’ve got a lot to dig out of and no power; at least, not from the company. I’m just a figurehead. But I have money and discretion on how it’s spent,” I say.

“That’s all the power you need. Where are your brothers?” His pivot is unexpected, but I don’t mind. I’ve said everything I came to. Accomplished everything I needed to. So, I give him the rundown.

“Dare is raising hell in LA. Stone is saving lives in Medellin and Beau is probably high, sitting naked in a Mexican desert playing his guitar to the moon,” I say.

He laughs.

“What about your siblings?” I ask.

“They’re in Houston. Working for Wilde World. Except for Regan. Tyson manages operations for the grocery stores. We’re all grinding. My mother is between here and her place in Montego Bay. We're good. My grandfather's still holding on," he replies. "So, Italy? With your aunt? How was that?"

"It was good. I learned Italian. No pasta eating on a beach, but Positano is beautiful and she was devoted to me and making sure I would be ready to come back. Even though, it turns out, there wasn't much to come back to.

"Well, make it count, kid. And I'll call your girl."

Chapter Seventeen

Twist

Confidence

“This is incredible,” I say giddily to the very handsome, very charming man walking beside me. “What you described has me salivating. It’s the case of a lifetime. There are so many questions with conflicting federal rulings. This could go to the Supreme Court,” I say and then bite my tongue.

“Yeah, if it doesn’t settle, it has that potential,” Remington agrees.

“I shouldn’t sound so happy at the sound of prolonged litigation, should I?” I ask him sheepishly.

“You wouldn’t be worth the paper that Doctor of Jurisprudence is scrawled on if you weren’t, counselor.” He winks one of his twinkly, wide, lushly-lashed, Milky Way dark eyes at me and I nearly trip over my feet. He smiles as if to say, yeah, I get that all the time. I bet he does. He told me his mother is Jamaican and his father is a second-generation Irish American. Well, Jamaica and Ireland should find a way to merge because their citizens clearly were born to procreate with each other. He is the definition of a heartthrob. He even smells good.

We step out onto the main street of Rivers Wilde, and I can’t believe all of this is happening. “I didn’t expect to be leaving here with a signed contract. I thought we’d have several interviews,” I say.

“Well, I didn’t want to let you leave here without a guarantee that you’d come back. You’re everything these plaintiffs need, and I’m just glad you’re in a position to start so quickly,” he says, like I’m doing him a favor.

“Being unemployed for nine months finally pays off,” I joke but make sure he hears the genuine gratitude in my voice.

The day he called had been a bad day. I'd gotten another letter of rejection from a firm in Nashville, and I was down to no more than a couple of months' living expenses. I needed a shoulder to cry on, and the only one I wanted was attached to the biggest asshole in the world.

I was on the verge of calling him to yell at him—again—when I got Remington's email. It was my first interview in months. The first application that had even garnered an email exchange. When they asked me to come to Houston for an in-face interview, I had fallen on my knees in my room and cried grateful tears.

And as mad as I was at Hayes, I couldn't pretend that all of my relief was due to the chance at this amazing great job. Some of it was that fate intervened to save me from my stubborn pride.

My heart had been blown to smithereens since I left his house that night.

I grieved in silence. I pretended I was okay. I hadn't been able to tell my mother what happened because I knew that she'd never forgive Hayes.

The thought of that knotted my stomach almost as much as what he did.

I want to forgive him. So badly.

I end every night with a prayer for the grace to let go of my anger. But it eludes me. And as much as I miss him, I can't forget what he'd said about me.

I've spent the last month licking my wounds and clutching my pillow.

Every night it smelled less and less like Hayes.

And the chasm between us grew wider and wider.

Except for in one way, the way we always manage to find each other. And some nights, sleep has come only after I've called him, used his voice and my hands to make myself come and told him to fuck off before I hang up in his face. I'm still so hurt by him. Still so angry.

But, I do miss him.

Fiercely.

I just don't know how to get over "fine to fuck, not enough breeding to bring home." Every time I think about it, it burns.

"So, what do you think of our cosmopolitan suburban version of small-town America?" Remington asks. I stare back at him and smile, grateful my staring off into the distance looked like me admiring the scene instead of me daydreaming about my boyfriend.

I let my eyes sweep the street and smile.

"It's incredible," I say simply and honestly. The enclave of Rivers Wilde, carved out of three square miles in southwest Houston is the kind of place I used to dream about living when I was a kid.

We're walking across one of a dozen foot bridges that straddle the man-made shallow fountain that cuts a straight line through the community. The left northwest corner is a commercial district. It's a miniature of downtown Houston. Skyscrapers and shorter commercial buildings make up the ten blocks dedicated to the Wilde World Office Park.

On the other side of the bridge from where we are now, is the town square. It is the very center of the enclave. It's flanked by two residential communities. On the left is The Ivy. It's a golf course, country club, and a cluster of luxury condominiums in a cluster of sky-scraping high rises.

On the left, The Oaks is a suburban prototype of single-family homes that range from starter homes to million-dollar mansions.

The Market runs along the southern border of the enclave, parallel from the Wilde office park. It's one huge indoor food market. There is a greengrocers, spice markets, fishmongers, butchers, florist, cheese shops, the bakeries, everything has a kosher or halal options. The long lines that snake out of The Market's every day are due to the food counter. Over 700 feet of space dedicated to deliciousness highlights why Houston is one of the places where the phrase "melting pot" is not an exaggeration. From Afghanistan to South Africa and everything in between, the world's best cooks show off their cultural delights. And people line up to devour it. I had tamales today and they might be the most perfect thing I've ever eaten. They're only open for lunch during the week, but all day on the weekends, and I can't wait to visit.

"Irma's been here since Rivers Wilde opened its gates. And now she's a landmark in her own right," Remington says when I tell him I want to go back. "This is the dream at work. It's a community that's designed to encourage interactions between people who might otherwise see each other as foreign or different."

"That sounds amazing," I say and wish I could find a more eloquent response to his words. But I've never seen a place like this.

"You're actually in for a treat. Don, our resident Cajun, and Tommy, who owns the Vietnamese restaurant in the market, come together for a crawfish boil that the entire community turns out for."

"Crawfish?" I grimace.

"You haven't lived until you have these. Lemongrass and garlic meet Old Bay and jalapeños for the most delicious crawfish you've ever tasted." He groans dramatically and pats his washboard flat stomach.

"Well, I certainly hope you have a gym here, because it sounds like unless I plan on buying a whole new wardrobe, I'm going to need it," I laugh.

"Got that, too. Tae Kwon Do school, Barre, a dance school with classes that use everything from the ballet rail to a stripper pole. And if you just want to work out, there's a regular old sweat-it-out-on-the-treadmill gym, too."

"So basically, if you live here, you never have to leave?" I ask.

"Not if you didn't want to. And that's the point. To make home feel like enough. To create a real sense of community. One that doesn't exclude anyone who really wants to live here. Our housing runs the gamut, so whether you're making forty grand a year or 400 thousand, there's a place in your budget in Rivers Wilde," he says with the same voice as the guy on the Price is Right.

"I'm taking a tour of a unit tonight, and I'm totally excited. This sounds like my kind of place," I gush. I know I sound like a fangirl, but I can't help it. It's out of a dream.

We walk down the wide, clean-enough-to-eat-off sidewalk. Sapling trees are planted in clusters every thirty feet or so. Baskets of flowers hang from the hooks that are fixed to ten feet of brick wall in between the glass-fronted stores that line the street. There's a healthy crowd of people strolling. They stop and speak to each other. I watch as two men shake hands and then sit down on a bench outside of the coffee shop, Sweet and Lo's.

"I had the best lattes I've ever had in my life there," I point it out to Remington.

"Yeah, it's the best in town. Did you meet Sweet or Lo?"

"Yes. Lo is a hoot and Sweet wasn't sweet at all. But I love them," I recall happily.

"Here we are," he pulls open the door with the words "TWIST" scrawled in bright blue lettering on the glass door.

"So, we'll see you in the office tomorrow? We have a face to face with opposing counsel, clients will be present," he says and I find something unsettling in his voice and the way he's watching me.

"TB!" Cass shouts from behind me and Remi's eyes widen in confusion.

I say, "Don't worry. She's not crazy. That's what she calls me." I give him an apologetic smile.

He raises his eyebrows in surprise. "Nickname?" he asks.

"More like an inside joke." I give him a halfhearted smile. His is more of a grimace.

"Okay," he says, and starts to back down the street "See you bright and early tomorrow. We're really glad to have you on board," he says before he turns and dashes back up the street.

“Was that Remi Wilde? Oh my GOD. Do you know what his nickname is?” Cass asks just as I turn to face her. Her face is flushed and her hair is sticking to her face is sweaty strands.

“Yeah, that was Remi. And what was his nickname?” I ask when she doesn’t offer it up.

“The Legend. His mind, his prowess on the basketball court, between the sheets,” she chortles and waggles her eyebrows and then moves in for a hug.

I pull back. “I don’t really want those visuals of my new boss, thanks. And let’s just imagine that, hug, okay?” I eye her sweaty shirt. “Did you run from your office?” I ask her and give her a quick up and down.

“Don’t look at me like that,” she retorts, but desists in her attempt to hug me. “It’s hot as fuck and I had to walk for ten minutes to get here,” she says.

“You look like you’ve been walking for an hour,” I quip and grin at her.

“You just wait until you’ve been standing without shade in the middle of the afternoon in Houston, TX for more than three minutes,” she snaps and pulls at her shirt.

“I’ll make sure to avoid that particular situation. Can’t walk around looking like I work in a sauna,” I tease her one more time and am rewarded with a scowl.

“I’m hungry, let’s get a table.” I pull the brass handle of Twist’s glass-paned double doors open.

“Its like a fancy saloon,” she says as we step inside the restaurant. The cool air-conditioned, dark paneled room does look like something out of a western movie. But instead of sawdust littering the ground, there’s a gleaming mahogany brand with the crowned horse logo of Rivers Wilde on the floor right under the wagon wheel chandelier in the center of the restaurant.

Instead of a bar that runs the length of the wall, there’s a stage in the front of the room, complete with a red velvet curtain behind the wall of bottles. There are no seats in front of the gleaming countertop. It’s just two bartenders, one man and one woman, making drinks and setting them on the bar where waitstaff picks them up. “Shut Up and Drink” is burned into the wood of the bar.

“Wow, I’ve never seen anything like this,” I marvel.

“Hey ladies, welcome to Twist,” a small, dark-haired woman with a hugely pregnant belly approaches us when we step into the main dining room. “Your first time here?” she asks knowingly.

“Yes.” I smile back.

“Yeah, your openmouthed, wide-eyed stare kinda gave it away.” She laughs good-naturedly and then reaches for two menus that sit under a green chalkboard—“open secret” scrawled on it.

“That’s our oxymoron of the day. Well, of the week or whenever someone thinks of one and changes it. Feel free to contribute. Every week, I pick my favorite and the author gets a free entrée,” she says excitedly.

I pick up the chalk and scrawl “bittersweet” while she marks something down on her hostess stand.

“You want a booth or table?” she asks.

“Booth,” we say at the same time.

“Awesome, come this way. And I’m Angie. My husband, Jackson, and I are the managers.” Her soft brown eyes twinkle with pride. I can see why. It’s a wonderfully unique place. Nearly everyone we pass looks up to greet her and tips their heads at us as we make our way through the wide aisle between the tables in the front of the huge space.

“If you need anything, just shout. But your server will take real good care of you,” she says happily and puts the menus down on the stone tabletop of the booth she stops at.

“Actually, I need the ladies’,” Cass says.

“Just walk past the bar and down the corridor. You’ll see it on the left,” Angie says.

“Be right back. Will you get me some water, please?” Cass says and drops her bag on the floor.

“Thank you,” I say as I slide into the curved, butter yellow leather covered seats of the booth and smile up at her. The high-backed seats wrap around the table and we can’t see our neighbors on either side.

It gives us a view of the entire room. I admire how brightly decorated it is. The white brick walls are full of abstract artwork and broken up by large windows that face the picturesque strip of stores that line the street.

The artwork is all whites, blues, and yellows with splashes of red and purple that manage to look coordinated but somehow eclectic at the same time.

“It’s so private,” I say. Angie nods knowingly.

“You make yourselves comfortable and I’ll get your waters and your basket of bread right out.” She puts a hand on her pregnant belly and rubs it.

“Are you okay?” I ask, pointing with concern at her baby bump.

“Yeah, I’m fine, why?” she asks sharply, peering at me with intense anticipation on her face.

“Uh—” I eyeball and wonder why she’s acting like my answer is important. “Well, nothing ... you keep rubbing you’re belly. I was just thinking maybe you were having some pregnancy-related difficulty,” I explain cautiously.

She laughs at the joke she still hasn’t bothered to explain to me.

“Oh. Thank goodness. I was only rubbing it ‘cause I wanted to make sure you knew I was pregnant and didn’t think this was a beer gut or something,” she says and then gasps with embarrassment.

“I can’t believe I said that out loud,” she says apologetically. “Pregnancy has completely removed my already very porous filter. It’s my fourth time; you’d think I’d be over this part. But I hate that I can’t see my feet and this ass is as wide as the Houston Ship Channel,” she blurts, a pained expression on her pretty face.

I want to laugh but I don’t think she’s trying to be funny. I try to think of some sort of consolation to offer, but I have a feeling nothing I say would actually make her feel better.

“I’m sorry, you probably think I’m so vain,” she says and shakes her head deprecatingly.

“You are vain. And nobody is thinking anything except how to get you to stop talking so they can get some food,” a gruff but twangy woman’s voice comes from the booth next to ours.

“Oh, Lord, I’m sorry,” Angie smiles apologetically. “For talking and for Henny’s rudeness. Thank you for being nice.” She rolls her eyes at the booth. “Your server will be right over. Glad to have you. Hope you’ll come back.” She makes an exaggerated scowling face at the hidden booth occupant and waddles off toward the front of the restaurant.

“As if anyone could mistake that belly for anything other than another one of your giant babies,” the voice calls after Angie.

“Oh, Henny, be nice and introduce yourself,” Angie calls back without looking over her shoulder.

A gnarled, arthritic hand with perfectly, French-manicured nails comes to rest on the shared top of our booths. Right over the side where Cass would have been sitting.

“You should be thanking me,” the voice comes. I grin when a hand taps the top of our booth.

“Well, are you going to make me shift my ninety-year-old bones out of the chair, or are you going to get up and say hello?” she asks impatiently.

I giggle and slide out of the seat and step to her booth. The woman sitting there looks like she could be a fill-in for Sophia Petrillo on Golden Girls.

“Thank you,” I say cheerily.

“You’re welcome,” she says tersely and then looks up at me with a pair of dark brown eyes that are set deep in a face that’s got so many wrinkles, it's impossible to tell what she really looks like.

"Yes, I know," she says like she's bored. "I look like a bleached prune. You don't need to stare at me like you've never seen an old person," she says.

"Oh, I'm not staring cause you're old, I'm just waiting for you to tell me why I should be thanking you," I say good-humoredly. I come from a town full of crotchety old people whose bark is all lie. And I've never lived anywhere else where your elders 'spank you' even if you're not theirs.

"That girl never stops talking," Henny says. "She runs a tight ship, though. Once she gets out of the way." She raises her eyebrows knowingly and draws out that last word. "You'll enjoy every single meal you have here."

"I'm Confidence," I say and extend my hand.

She frowns and eyes me. "You look too young to have hippies for parents," she muses.

"Yeah. My grandparents' generation, I think," I say.

"You think?" She scoffs and gives me a disapproving frown. "You kids don't know your history. You should know what generation your elders belong to. Not just yours. I bet you're a millennial. You will be remembered for your selfishness," she chides. I throw my head back and laugh the first real laugh I've managed in a while. She's awesome.

"Glad you think it's funny," she says dryly. "I'm here every day, if you want more."

Cass walks up just then, looks between Henny and me and says, "Of course, you've already made a friend."

I elbow her and say, "This is Henny."

Henny shakes her head and says, "Sorry, I have a one-new-person-a-day rule. Come back tomorrow." Then she picks up her fork and knife and digs into a huge baked potato that's bursting with what looks like brisket, cheese, sour cream, chives, and butter.

I stand there and watch her for nearly a full minute before I realize she's serious and isn't going to respond. Cass doesn't wait that long before she slides into her seat.

She's gripping a menu when I sit down. "Oh, this place has the nicest public bathroom I've ever seen. It's cleaner than mine. I wish I'd known about this neighborhood when I was moving back. It's like living in the suburbs but in walking distance from all the action. I totally would have bought a unit here."

"Yeah, it's really convenient. And apparently my new boss's family owns all of it," I tell her. She squeals and clutches her menu to her chest excitedly.

"I'm the worst friend. I didn't even ask how it went. I was so excited to see you! Tell me!" she exclaims and stares at me with goopy eyes.

"Oh my God, it was amazing, Cass," I say dreamily.

"And you got the job!" she interjects excitedly.

I nod and let my grin have a moment of unfettered shine. "They want me to attend a meeting tomorrow before I leave for the case they're hiring me for. I've got some of the publicly available court records to review. So, I'm going to hole up in my hotel and study up so I can be ready. I want to make sure when I get on my flight tomorrow, he's not sorry he hired me," I tell her.

"So, you're going to leave here and not call Hayes?" she asks with surprise.

Hearing her say his name makes me flinch. Beneath the surface of my happiness for every amazing thing that has happened today has been the terrible sensation of how wrong it is that I'm here and not with him. How shallow my joy is without being able to celebrate it with him.

I forced myself to push him out of my thoughts whenever he entered them today.

"So, you're not here because you have a huge boner for Hayes Rivers?"

“Of course not,” I snap and look around the restaurant. There’s a loud din. People speaking like they’re in their living rooms instead of in a public place where anyone could overhear.

Just like home. God, I think I love this place.

“Hello? Are you listening?” Cass snaps her fingers in front of my eyes.

I turn startled eyes back to Cass. “Yes, I am. And that’s not why,” I lie.

“Yeah, right. He’s worn you down, and you got a lucky break with this offer. Two weeks ago, you would have never accepted it,” she pushes.

“Two weeks ago, I had enough money to live on for another month. Now, I don’t. It’s also right up my alley. This is a developing area of law that I kind of pioneered,” I tell her. “But, I would have taken this job anywhere in the world.”

“Aww, you should see your face. I don’t know how the hell you managed it with him, of all people, after somehow avoiding it for so long.” She shakes her head at me incredulously.

“Avoiding what?” I ask just as our server approaches with the water and bread baskets.

“Being completely head over heels in love. Wanting something more than your pride,” she says.

“Welcome to Twist,” our server interrupts as she bounces up to our table. Her wide mouth parts to reveal a perfectly straight smile that’s contagious. She’s slightly out of breath and leans on the table in mock exhaustion before she stands up again.

“I’m Kemi, I’ll be your server today,” she says and brushes a braid that’s falling over her eye out of the way before she pulls a small spiral notebook out of her apron pocket. “What are you ladies drinking?” she asks.

“I’m fine with water,” I tell her, wrinkling my nose at the menu. I hate having to decide what to eat.

“The hell she is. We’re having champagne with lunch,” Cass says, giving me a fierce scowl that dares me to argue. I don’t. I want to be excited ... I wish I didn't feel so heartsick at the same time.

"Wonderful," Kemi chirps and scribbles on her notepad. "What are we celebrating?" she asks as she writes.

"She got a job! A great one, and she's moving to Houston," she tells her and slides her eyes over to me and smiles proudly.

"Well, then, this calls for our special. It's a grilled Tilapia on top of a bed of the most delicious rice you'll ever have," she says.

"That sounds a little heavy for lunch," I say. I ignore how my mouth waters at the description. I've been eating my feelings, and it was not my imagination that my breasts are fighting with buttons in a battle for liberation that I think one more donut will tip in their favor.

"You should eat your heaviest meal for lunch, actually. So it's perfect," Cassie says.

I smile at her helplessly. "Well, my breakfast was pretty good, too," I admit.

"We'll have it," Cassie says to Kemi.

"You're in for such a treat. It's so good. The owners pick the week's special and announce it on Sunday night. It's always an amazing fusion of cuisines. I can't wait to hear what you think," she says.

Her enthusiasm is catching, and I wiggle my shoulders in excitement. "Can't wait, thanks." I smile at her.

"Awesome! Shout or wave if you need anything. Your food will be out in about fifteen minutes," she says and saunters off.

"You need to talk to Hayes," she says, and my heart thumps in my chest. I shake my head and look down at my hands.

The sounds of the restaurant clang around us, scrapes of forks on cutlery, bursts of laughter from the tables, the scrape of chairs being pushed away from tables. The dining room is devoid of any food smells. It smells nice, almost like a spa, but subtler. I'm sure if my stomach wasn't caught in my internal conflict, twisted by pangs of longing, churning from the fear that's become my constant companion, the atmosphere would be soothing.

"You okay, TB?" she asks when I don't respond and don't look up.

"No," I admit, annoyed at myself. "I miss him. I hate him. I love him so much, I don't know what to do," I confess, still looking at my hands.

"I have a feeling he feels the same way," she says kindly.

"I know—" I whisper.

"Talk to him. Don't leave town without seeing him," she says.

"You don't understand. I don't want to forgive him because I miss him. I want to forgive him because I believe he sees my worth. And not just because we have great sex or he likes the way I look on his arm. I won't be another man's project or trophy. Or whatever I am to him," I tell her.

She quirks her lips in sympathy. "Oh, honey. You're the only one who doesn't see your worth ..." she says and I rear back in surprise and hurt.

"What does that mean?" I eye her.

Her eyes soften, and her smile turns a little sad.

"It means if you did, you'd know that the only way anyone would look at you and see anything less than the amazing woman you are is if they're an idiot. And Hayes Rivers isn't an idiot. Yeah, he said something stupid to his brother. But he didn't know you from Sam when he said it," she reminds me, again.

I chafe at her defense of Hayes, of how right she is and how wrong she is. I rub a finger over the spot on my temple where a small headache is suddenly blooming.

"I would never ever insult him like that. I wouldn't look at him and see anything less than the human being he is. Yes, he's handsome. He's got a hot body. He's got pots of money and he's got power. I didn't look at him and wonder if he got rich by ripping people off or assume that because he's a big guy those things about him and his ex were true. I wondered if he would be tender and caring, constant, proud, honorable, determined, and convicted and smart. Those things have nothing to do with his money."

"You're deluding yourself," she says dismissively.

"How?" I chafe at the words.

"The wealth he was born into has shaped all of those things. Just like the poverty you were born into has shaped yours." She puts her hands up, palms facing me when I start to speak. "Hear me out, please."

"As if I could stop you," I grumble.

"I get it. You were raised to be proud of who you are. Not what you have. He was raised to believe the exact opposite. All of that honor, pride, conviction? They all fuel the need to protect the things—his name, his money, his position," she says.

"Yeah, but at what cost?"

"Whatever it takes, is what I'm sure he'd say," she shrugs. "You're such a hypocrite," she says.

"Excuse me? Is it Thursday or is it Shit on Confidence Day?" I ask.

"Isn't your whole career based on you wanting to preserve a way of life? What have you done to protect it? What wouldn't you do?" she asks.

I cradle my forehead in my hands and try to process what she's saying through a different filter.

"It's amazing that he's who you've fallen like this for. I always thought you'd need a man who would let you have your way. You're so stubborn. But you've met your match in him. I'm glad he's making you think. And I'm glad he's strong. I think it'll be good for you to not have to carry the whole world on your shoulders, TB," she says.

She covers my hand with hers to silence me.

“It’s okay to be vulnerable,” she says quietly. “It’s okay to let him close enough to hurt you again. But you have to want him more than you want your pride, TB,” she says.

“My pride?” I bristle at her characterization. “It’s not pride. It’s self-preservation. I didn’t have anyone to stand between me and the bad guy. I have always stood in the breach myself. And I love him so much that if I let him, he could really ruin me.” My confession pours out of me and I feel breathless having said it.

“I know ... And I didn’t mean to dismiss that. You just can’t let fear lead you.”

“What if he doesn’t want me the same way? What if when he gets to see all of me, he finds me lacking?” I ask and reveal the real source of my anxiety.

“Ask him. Call him before you go.”

“And say what? Can you help understand how I keep ending up with men who want me in bed, but don’t think I’m fit to be on their arm in public?” I ask quietly. Tears of shame burn my eyes.

“First of all, he’s nothing like Nigel. He respects you and he’s crazy about you. It was so obvious when you were here even with all the madness that happened. And you should have seen him driving that truck, through all that water. He did that for you.” She fans herself. “It was so ... If you weren’t my friend ...” I give her a warning look and she winks.

“Shiit. You need to spend some time in those Tinder streets and you’ll know how lucky you are,” she says.

“How’s Tinder?” I ask. “I’m sorry I’m talking about myself non-stop,” I apologize.

“You don’t need to apologize, there’s nothing to tell. I thought I met my soulmate, again. He showed up to our date in scrubs, told me he was a doctor and hadn’t had time to get home before our date.” She takes a long sip of her water.

“What kind of doctor?” I ask.

“The kind that also works the popcorn machine behind concession stand at Edwards Theatre in Greenway Plaza,” she deadpans. I choke on the water in my throat. I cough and blow my nose and she just shrugs.

“It’s a jungle out there and you’re over here hanging out with Remington Wilde, Hayes Rivers, and complaining.”

“I’m not complaining,” I croak out when I’ve recovered from my fit of laughter.

“I just hope you won’t lump them together. Nigel and Hayes. They’re not the same,” she reiterates. Her expression is serious again.

“They’re not,” I admit. “I didn’t love Nigel. Without Hayes ... I’m just going through my daily motions. But inside, I feel like I’m falling to pieces,” I confess.

“Oh, Confidence,” Cass sighs, her voice soft and sympathetic now.

“I don’t even know how it’s possible to feel like this after three months.” I put my face in my hands and groan. “And my family...”

“And I’m glad you’ve met someone who can help you so it doesn’t swallow you whole. You have so much on your plate. You do a lot for your mother,” she says. I frown at her.

“Of course I do. And I always will. It’s just me and her. She’s done so much for me. I owe her,” I remind her.

“But you also owe yourself,” she insists.

The waitress sails over, a huge tray on her shoulder and saves me from having to answer.

Chapter Eighteen

Naked

Confidence

“Can I come in?” I force myself to ask Confidence when what I really want is to shove past her and ask her what the fuck she thinks she’s doing.

She stares at me, her hair hidden in the towel she’s fashioned into a turban on her head. The rest of her isn’t hidden at all. She’s got on a light pink bathrobe that clings to her in all the right places and rubs me in all the wrong ones.

“Why the hell are you answering the door half naked?” I demand.

She crosses her arms over her chest defensively and glares up at me. “Why are you banging on my door at ten o’clock at night?” she whispers furiously and glances down the empty hallways before she grabs my arm and tugs me forward. “Come inside. The last thing I need is a complaint for disturbing the peace.”

I step into her hotel room and turn to face her.

“Why are you answering the door wet and nearly naked, Tesoro?” I ask again, my anger at the sight of her surpassing the initial insult that brought me here.

“I am not naked. I was getting out of the shower when you started pounding on the door. I wanted to stop you before you woke up my neighbors.”

“You’re very concerned about your neighbors,” I look around the spare room of the extended stay hotel. “Why are you staying here anyway? Remi couldn’t have put you up here. He has a block of suites at the Ivy’s executive suites his firm uses for interviews.”

“First of all, how do I know I’m here, and that I’m here for Remi? Secondly—not that it is any of your business—he let me choose my hotel and they’re reimbursing me. This one is fine. And third, I’m concerned about my neighbors because I think the people right next door are a family who live here. I’ve seen them taking the kids to school every morning this week. They’re asleep. So, keep it down,” she scolds.

Of course, that’s why. She’s a fucking bleeding heart. It’s why I love her.

“I’ll keep my voice down,” I concede right away. “And everything you do is my business. Because you are my business.”

She rolls her eyes but doesn’t say anything.

“Secondly, Remi’s a friend. But he didn’t tell me you were here. I ran into Gigi’s friend, Henny. Apparently, you’ve been pining over me in public,” I drawl and have to bite my lip to stop my smile when her nostrils flair.

“That old lady was eavesdropping?” she sputters.

“Don’t let her hear you call her that, not if you want to live ... and she did overhear and thought it would be such shame if you left town without even telling me you were here,” I say.

“How in the world did you know where I was staying?” she asks and tightens her belt.

“My assistant spent all day calling hotels near Rivers Wilde until she found you. And enough with the twenty questions,” I snap.

“Fine, then you can leave.” She pulls the lapels of her robe closed when my eyes drift to her throat.

“I’m not. And it’s too bad about your G-rated neighbors. They put a dent in my plans,” I tell her.

“What plans?” she snaps.

“The ones I had to fuck you so hard you’d see stars and scream my name loud enough that they’d hear you across the street,” I say.

Her entire body flushes, and her hands drop from her neckline and rest on her hips. She leans forward and gives me her most disapproving glare.

“Their presence has nothing on the fact that my body is closed to you right now. There will be no fucking tonight. And don’t call me Tesoro. We’re not that anymore,” she says angrily.

My anger spikes, too, but it’s accompanied by a sting of pain at the way the words flow off her tongue. I know she’s pissed, but it makes me feel like I’ve got a thorn stuck in my side when I hear her say we’re not that anymore. I stalk toward her.

“Then what are we?” I ask and rake my eyes over her body. Her robe is damp and I can see the shadow of her nipples.

“I don’t know, Hayes,” she lies.

“Let me fuck you. You’ll know, then,” I whisper and her eyes widen and she tenses up again.

“That’s not the answer to everything,” she says.

“Take that off.” I nod at her robe.

“No,” she says and tosses her head in defiance. Her towel unravels and falls half off her head, exposing some of her hair. She reaches up to stop its slide and I take a step toward her.

“Don’t, Hayes,” she says, her voice low with warning, but her lips remain parted and her eyelids flutter.

My dick gets hard because I know what that look means. Her gown may be drying off, but her pussy is wetter than it was when she got out of the shower.

“Take it off, Tesoro,” I say softly now, and take another step toward her. I’m close enough to grab the belt of her robe.

“I want to. But, I can’t,” she says, like the words ache when her tongue forms them. She gazes at me, her eyes limpid with need. Understanding dawns.

“You want me to take it off?” I ask.

She nods, two sharp ticks of her head and I do an internal fist bump even though I keep my expression neutral. I see the need in her eyes. Want is coming off her in waves. It's slamming into mine and envelopes us in a haze of longing.

I smile at her, a wolfish grin that says I know I'm going to have what I want. The flat of my hand cups the space right below her belly button and her shoulders lose the tension they've been holding.

I watch her face.

She watches my hand.

Her rapid breaths send my hand on a rollercoaster of swells and dips as it glides up the center of her abdomen. Her muscles flex and ripple under my touch.

"Does that feel good, my little treasure?" I ask her quietly

She closes her eyes and nods. "Better than anything has ever felt in my life," she confesses.

I splay my fingers as they pass between her breasts and wrap them gently around her throat. Her pulse races under my fingers.

"What aren't we?" I ask again.

She opens her eyes and gazes at me. My tigress—her eyes are ablaze with intensity—and yet, I feel how vulnerable she is right now.

"We're not ..." She licks her lips and her throat convulses against my hand.

I lean and press my lips to hers. Our eyes stay open and hers start to melt.

I taste everything I've been deprived of for the last month and groan.

"What aren't we?" I ask her again and tug the belt of her robe. The silk ribbon gives easily and her robe falls open. She gasps—a harsh, uneven breath—and sways forward. She still hasn't completed her sentence, but the look in her eyes tells me everything I need to know.

"We're everything, Confidence." I kiss her again; her lips cling to mine when I pull back.

Fuck yeah ...

“Tell me what we are,” I command her before I swoop down to place an openmouthed kiss on the hot, fresh, soap-scented skin of her neck.

“We’re lovers,” she whispers and lifts her arms to twine around my neck.

“We’re fighters,” she says and puts her hands on my belt buckle and unfastens it.

“We’re hunters,” she breathes into my mouth as she unzips my fly and my pants fall.

I grab the full, lush cheeks of her ass and hoist her. Her legs wrap around my waist and I lower her down onto my cock.

“We are each other’s,” I say and lift her off and lower her again.

“Oh my God,” she gasps.

I walk us back to the huge window and press her back against it.

“Yes. Your god. Your king. Your man. Yours,” I say, driving each point home with an upward thrust into her delicious pussy. “Say it.”

She shakes her head. “You haven’t earned it,” she pants. I grin into the hollow at the base of her neck and fuck her harder.

“You feel that?” I ask and press as deep as I can.

“Yessssssss,” she cries and her fingers cling into my back, seeking purchase as she starts to come unglued.

I nod. “That’s how deep I’ve buried myself in your heart. You love me. You can’t turn that off, and I won’t let you pretend you have.”

I spin her around and lay her down on the bed. I pull out and kneel next to her.

“Suck me,” I say and fist my hands in her hair. When she wraps a hand around the base of my cock, I hold her head in place and feed her slowly. She swirls her tongue around the tip and hollows her cheeks and sucks me off. My fingers loosen their grip and sift into her hair.

“You give the best fucking head, Confidence.” I fuck her face and she takes it like it’s hers. She holds my gaze and starts to finger herself until her eyes flutter closed. I glance down her body and watch while her finger slips between the bare, fat lips of her pussy. She moans around my cock and the back of her throat vibrates against my head.

“I’m going to come,” I groan.

She sits up and grabs my ass, sucking harder. Her blonde hair brushes the front of my thighs. The sight of her holding on, determined to take what I’m about to give her, sends me over the edge. She takes everything I shoot out, swallows and sucks me until my knees buckle and it takes the concerted effort of every muscle in my body not to fall over.

“Fuck,” I groan when she finally lets me slip from her mouth. I reach for her, but she rolls out from under me and runs to the bathroom, slamming the door behind her.

“Hey.” I sit up and walk over to the door. I turn the handle and it’s locked.

“No, please, don’t,” she says, her voice breaking.

I touch the door and shake the handle.

“My world feels like it’s crumbling without you, Hayes,” she sobs. “But I am so mad at you and I don’t trust you to take care of me the way I know I want to take care of you.”

I bang my head on the door lightly. Queens shouldn’t cry.

“Please, open the door, Tesoro.” I’m nearly begging.

“I’ve got to keep my head together for tomorrow. I need this job. I can’t afford to be focused on you. I need you to please keep your distance until you can show me you want more than just to fuck me until I feel better.”

“That’s not it—”

“Please. Tomorrow is a really important day,” she implores.

It feels wrong to walk away. But, I want to give her what she's asking me for. At least for now.

"I'm not giving up on us," I tell her. "I know I've got a lot to learn, but I love you. And we are fucking worth it, Confidence."

Her silence is my answer and I feel sick leaving her conflicted in the bathroom of a shitty hotel. But I also know she can take care of herself.

So, I get up.

"Call me tomorrow," I say. The door vibrates when, I assume, her head falls back or forward onto it.

"I will, please. I need tonight, Hayes. If I mess this up...I just can't do this now. Please." She sounds tired and so distressed.

My feet feel like they're weighed down with one hundred pounds of resignation as I walk to the door and leave.

Chapter Nineteen

Expert

Confidence

“What are you doing out here?” Remi’s amused voice startles me. I look up from the paper I’m reviewing and shake my head. He’s all the way at the end of the hall where the elevators are. I get up as he starts walking and try not to look like I’ve been pacing my bedroom all night and pulling my hair out the whole time.

After Hayes left, I calmed myself down, got dressed, and crawled into bed with my work. I’ve never been more grateful for a job in my life. But when I opened the case file and started to review it, my stomach had fallen to my toes. Hayes’ company is the respondent. After my experience at Lancaster, I can’t afford another bombshell about my love life. I know it’ll mean I can’t work on this case and that it might even cost me this job, but I knew I had to tell him. I’m so mad at myself for letting a man fuck up my career, yet again.

“Is the room locked?” Remi comes to stand in front of me. He looks like a taller, darker, more handsome Harvey Specter. Every single woman in this office looks at him like they all wished their name was Donna. Except for me. And not just because my heart, body, soul, and mind belonged to another, but because I would never even entertain the thought of being with a man who was in a position of authority over me. Not again.

“No. They’re all in there. Ms. Swanson and Ms. Gauthier are in the room next door. I asked them to wait there for you, because I wanted to talk to you before we go in,” I say.

Remi cocks an eyebrow at me and says, “You’re talking really fast. And can your talk wait until after the meeting? “

“No. It can’t,” I say and then take a deep, calming breath.

“You okay?” Remi’s hand rests on my shoulder and frowns down at me.

“I wanted to tell you ... I don’t know how to ...” I say and cover my mouth when I realize my tongue is tied. I’ve been practicing what I’d say since the minute my alarm went off last night, but now the words are trapped by fatigue, humiliation, and anger.

“This case. I can’t be part of it. The defendant, Kingdom. My boyfriend—” I shake my head in annoyance at myself. “It’s ... my ex-boyfriend,” I force myself to say.

“What is your ex-boyfriend?” Remi asks and looks down at me, his expression mildly baffled and I force the words out.

“Not what, who. It’s Hayes Rivers. I see he’s going to be here today. Your client won’t want that kind of conflict in their attorney. I can’t ... and I understand if that means there’s no position here for me. But I just—”

“I know about you and Hayes.”

My jaw drops and he chuckles. “I’m not running an amateur shop here, counselor. It was one of the first things personnel told me when we started checking your conflicts,” he says.

I gawk. I’ve been bracing for him to rescind his offer. I spent the evening practicing my reaction and crying so that I would be all cried out when it actually happened.

“If you don’t say something, I’m going to send you home. A tongue tied litigator is worse than not having a lawyer at all.”

My heart leaps in hope, but like I do with everything that feels too good to be true, I squash that feeling and pressure test it..

“Hayes and I are...unresolved. He’s...determined.”

Remi laughs. “That’s his middle name.”

Some of my skepticism wanes. “You really don’t care about Hayes and —”

“I don’t.” His tone is uncharacteristically clipped. “Normally, I might. I avoid romantic drama in my own life, I certainly don’t want to be a party to anyone else’s. But this is an extraordinary case. Our clients deserve the benefit of your expertise and your very intimate knowledge of their circumstances. You're the best. And that's all I care about."

Relief floods me and I expel a shaky breath. "Thank you for your faith in me," I say sincerely. He's a legend. A known taskmaster who doesn't accept anything but the very best from his associates, and exactly the kind of attorney I want to learn from. "I won't let you down."

He smiles and pats me on the shoulder. "I know. I've followed your career. I know you had a missteps, but you being so upfront about this just confirms what I saw when I looked past that stuff."

I return his smile despite the flare of pure, white-hot fucking hate in my chest when I think about how Nigel's cowardly, selfish actions will follow me for the rest of my career. But I guess it's best to go ahead and get this conversation out of the way, too. I steel myself and just say it."

"I know you've read a lot of things, but the way it was reported isn't even close to the truth." I hold his eyes even though I wish the floor would open and swallow me whole.

He shakes his head. "You don't need to explain anything. I know Lancaster, and now that I've met you, I know you wouldn't throw your career away over some bullshit like that. And I can promise you that this firm doesn't punish people for speaking the truth and doesn't harbor predators, no matter who they are."

I don't trust myself not to sob, so I just nod my head.

He glances at his watch and down the hall toward the elevator and frowns. "I don't know where Barry is, I hoped we could put our heads together before the meeting, but he's late and we need to get started. I'll be honest and tell you he wasn't thrilled I hired you."

I grimace. "Yeah, honestly, after my round with him, I surprised you did."

"He's this office's hiring partner. But this is my firm. Today, he's going to try to show me and you that you're in over your head. So it might be best if you just observe today. Because I won't step in to rescue you if you stumble."

I straighten my posture and smile with appreciation. But my spine is tingling. I love being the underdog. It makes victory so much sweeter. "Thanks, Remi. I'll watch my step."

He reaches around me, unlocks the door and pushes it open. "After you, Counselor."

A woman, with the most luscious head of thick white hair I've ever seen in my life and is seated at the table with her laptop and finishes typing something before she looks up. Her face is breathtaking. High forehead, high cheekbones, almond-shaped, dark brown eyes framed by dark, swooping brows that are keen and intense. And her skin, the color of cinnamon, is completely unlined and belies the age her hair and expression attributes.

"Amelia Patel," she says in a light, pretty voice that makes me think she must have a beautiful singing voice. "Counsel for the defendant, partner at Harvey Brooks," she adds. I know who she is. She's the preeminent authority of mass torts, and I was less than generous when I wrote about her a few years ago. She smiles expectantly when I don't respond right away.

She has no idea who I am, but the minute I say my name, she will.

"I'm Confidence Ryan," I say. Her smile disappears and she drops my hand as if she's realized she's petting a snake and turns to face Remi without saying another word.

I glance at him, and he gives me a wide-eyed what was that about? before he turns to address her.

"Confidence is our new Of Counsel. Ms. Ryan is just observing today. We just hired her yesterday and we're still in the on-boarding process, but all her conflicts cleared yesterday, so I wanted to bring her in on this conversation, since she wrote the jurisprudence on it,” he says. I swell with pride.

I smile awkwardly because after his introduction, there’s really not much for me to say.

“That’s very impressive,” Hayes says and swivels around in the chair with the abnormally high back that’s been turned to face the window.

A rush of gooseflesh runs over my body and a cold dread blooms in my stomach. I bite back my gasp and smile, even though the effort makes my face ache. I knew he was going to be here, but it’s still hard to feel comfortable given everything that’s going on between us.

“Ah, I didn’t see you, kid,” Remi says good-naturedly and walks over to Hayes, who stands up. His eyes cut to mine and his expression is completely unreadable.

“Nice view, Wilde.” He nods out the window. It overlooks the green of Rivers Wilde, and from here, with red and white awning and sparkling clean streets, it looks like something out of a postcard.

“It is.” Remi smiles, and I want to knock their heads together. “Glad you’re here, actually. We have our new lawyer here today, it’ll be good—” The door behind us opens and Barry, the Partner who is acting as lead lawyer for the case, hurries into the room.

“I’m sorry I’m late, Remington,” he says without addressing anyone else—not even the clients. They both stood up when he entered the room, and he dumps his briefcase, a box of files, and his coffee onto the table and mutters to no one in particular, “This fucking traffic is a killer,” and they sit down. His toothy grin turns into a thin and insincere smile when he looks at me.

“Oh, I didn’t realize she was joining us,” he says to Remington without addressing me.

“Her conflicts cleared, and I figured this would be a great place to get her feet wet and maybe give her a chance to give input when she gets back,” he says without any sign of irritation at Barry’s barbed words.

“We don’t need her input,” Barry says dismissively.

“Why don’t you need her input?” Hayes asks, and I stifle a groan at the tone in his voice. I wish he would look at me so I can give him a warning look. I don’t want or need him fighting my battles for me.

“Because I think we should settle,” Barry says easily, missing the thread of warning in Hayes’s voice. The clients both gasp, “What?”

“Trust me,” he says in a patronizing voice before he turns his wannabe megawatt smile on Hayes. “Mr. Rivers, I’m Barry Jimenez, the lead attorney for the class,” he says and walks over, his beefy hand extended and his chest is puffed out like he’s walking into a boxing ring.

Hayes eyes him and then his hand for a moment just long enough to be awkward before he shakes it. “We’re glad you made the time to come today and we’re fully prepared to discuss settlement. I know that’s what you want and I think it’s in everyone’s best interest.”

“We haven’t discussed this,” Remi says.

“That’s not unusual. I don’t discuss case strategy on every case with you.” He pushes a lock of his messy brown hair off his forehead, and I think he might be attractive if he wasn’t such a jerk.

“I think we should go ahead and settle.” He finally addresses his clients and reiterates with a little more deference in his voice.

“I know she’s an ‘expert.’” He makes air quotes around the word, and I dislike him even more than I did yesterday. His dismissal of me sets my teeth on edge. “But like I’ve been saying since her interview, I’m sure she wrote a great paper in law school, but in actual practice, I just don’t see how her contribution will be valuable.” He waves a hand in my direction and Hayes's lips thin and curl upward in a menacing scowl.

Barry continues to jump on the thin ice he's standing on, oblivious that he's courting danger. Watching Hayes get offended on my behalf pisses me off, because no one has offended me more than he has. And unlike loving him, the world of big law is a jungle I feel perfectly capable of navigating and defending myself.

Remi looks down at the two clients and says, "Could you excuse us, please? I'd like the lawyers to have a chance to talk before we go on. I apologize, but if you two could just wait in the small room you were in before we came in, I'll come get you when we're ready."

One of the women crosses her arms over her chest and sets her chin. "Why doesn't he have to leave?" She points at Hayes. "Isn't he a client, too?" she asks. I like her. I'm glad she's not taking their shit.

"I'm leaving, too," Hayes responds. He walks over to the women and offers each of them an arm. His face is solemn, his smile sincere when he says, "Ladies, let me escort you out. Let's leave the dirty work to the lawyers." Ms. Gauthier, the older of the two smiles prettily, her cheeks flush as she stands up and takes the proffered arm.

"Jo, he's trying to sweeten us up so they can do us wrong," Ms. Swanson says and grabs her friend's elbow and tugs her free of Hayes.

"But I want him to sweeten me up," Jo says and pulls free of her friend. She smiles up at Hayes and takes his arm and bats her eyelashes up at him.

"Your wish is my command," he says smoothly. He holds his elbow out to Ms. Swanson again and says jokingly, "Come on, I don't bite." His smile is so charming that it makes my fool heart flutter.

They walk out of the room, and when Hayes walks past the head of the table where I'm standing, our eyes meet. The air rushes from my lungs. There's unmistakable, naked desire in his eyes. It's territorial and so intense it feels like his hand is around my throat. I flush hot when I remember the way he had me last night.

He smiles and winks subtly before he continues walking.

When the door closes behind him, Barry pounces. "They're offering more money than most of these people will ever see in their lives. Litigation is going to be expensive, and this is a pro bono venture. There isn't much to discuss. I've got a trial coming up and I would like to focus. And maybe I could use Ms. Ryan for the document review there." He says this as if he's doing me a favor.

"Document review? You can't be serious," I gasp before I can stop myself.

Everyone's eyes fly to me, and I feel an immediate pang of regret and close my eyes briefly. But then, I open them and look him in his eyes. Because, truth be told, he's not wrong. I don't think I'm the smartest person in this room. About this topic, I know I am.

"I'm dead serious. I know Remi hired you. But, I made no secret of my opposition. You've got baggage, you think you're the smartest person in the room, and you clearly don't know how to be seen and not heard," he says in rapid fire succession like he's been holding it in.

I glance at Remi and he raises an eyebrow like he's asking you gonna let him get away with that?

I look around the room and wish I had a button to press pause. Inside, I'm fuming. But I won't let that show because this is how the best lawyers earn their stripes. Barry Jimenez is one of the best litigators in the country. He's won the Department of Justice's Silver Eagle Award twice. He's only one of a handful of people to ever do it. And he's doing to me what was done to him. I know if I back down, he'll lose any respect he has for me.

I remind myself that he's my boss. When I respond, I say, "I reviewed the settlement offer, and I disagree," I say simply.

“Thanks for your opinion,” he says. “Let’s get started,” he says and pulls open the file folder.

“Gentlemen,” he says to all of us and nods at the table. Lucky for me, I’ve never waited for an invitation to sit at any table and I won’t start today.

I sit down, open my file and start looking over the notes I made.

“So, we’re giving everyone six months and a five thousand-dollar voucher for furniture and clothes, right?” Barry ticks the broad terms off the list on his fingers.

“That’s right.” Amelia nods.

“I think that sounds very generous,” Remi says, and my eyes fly to him. He meets my gaze, and challenges, “Tell me why I’m wrong.”

“Yes, Coincidence, tell us why all of our years of experience should yield to your law review article,” Barry says snidely.

I eye him and let the scorn I’m feeling show.

He’s my boss, and I respect his career, and I don’t give a shit about him making fun of my name. If anything, it shows how unoriginal he is. But damn if I’m going to sit here and be quiet while he screws our clients.

“My experience may be ten percent of yours when it comes to sitting at tables like this one. But when it comes to the way the law treats uninsured, non-property-owning survivors of natural disasters, you’re not even a speck in my rearview mirror. I’m not going to sit here while you sell the people who entrusted their entire futures to you and this firm down the proverbial river,” I say. “Excuse the pun.”

“Tell us how giving them more money than they’ll ever see is selling them short? You think years of litigation while they sit in limbo is helping them?”

“I think giving them what they deserve, something that makes them whole instead of something that’s essentially a basket of fish with no way to catch more.”

“This flood will affect them for generations. Homes were lost. Valuable, irreplaceable things are gone. Their children are traumatized. They need some sort of therapy or something to help them work through some of the trauma we are supposed to be helping them.”

“Therapy? Give me a fucking break, Remi,” Barry says in exasperation.

“Remi, this feels like amateur hour,” Amelia says and I flush. “You’re putting a foal who doesn’t know how to walk into a pasture full of hungry wolves,” she says derisively.

“Amelia,” Remi says in a warning tone.

“My client and I are leaving. We will send a final settlement offer. You tell us what you think. We want to make people whole, but we’re not paying for more than that,” she says. She gathers her dark leather Gucci briefcase and strolls out.

“Conscience, we’re not talking about my children. Their children are conditioned in a way mine are not,” he says, and this time I decide his intentional flubbing of my name is actually a Freudian slip. I’ll happily be their conscience. And the champion of the people who aren’t here to make their voices heard.

“How, exactly?”

“They live in neighborhoods where crisis abounds,” he says.

“Have you been to their neighborhood?” I ask the question of everyone at the table.

Both of them—Remi included—shake their head no.

Disappointment settles heavily around my shoulders. “Why not?” I ask.

“We’ve seen pictures; that’s sufficient,” Barry says.

“That is not sufficient,” I snap. My voice is sharp, but I find it reprehensible that no one has even been there.

“Sorry, who the fuck are you, even? Why are you doing more than getting me coffee at this point?” Barry says suddenly. His temper has apparently broken free of whatever was caging it.

“Coffee? Who are you talking to?” I ask him—suddenly incensed. Propriety is forgotten.

“You,” he points at me, his teeth bared.

Remi stands up and comes between us.

“Listen, I’m not here to be a referee. Barry, this isn’t dictatorship. But, Confidence, I think we should at least entertain an offer. Let’s see what they come back with,” Remi says and the stony glare on his face doesn’t leave room for any push back.

The conference room doors open and hits the wall behind it so hard it bounces off.

“You’re fired,” Ms. Swanson says when she bursts into the room.

Barry glares daggers. “Look what she’s done,” he hisses and points at me accusingly.

“No, I’m talking to you,” Ms. Swanson says to Barry. “You are fired. We want her. You don’t care about us. We’ve been talking and we don’t want to settle. We want someone who will do what’s right and not what’s easy. And if we can’t get her, then we’ll go somewhere else, and try to convince them to hire her over there. But either way, you’re fired.” Then she turns and storms out of the room, slamming the door behind her.

“You know what? Good luck,” Barry snaps. “And Remi, just a heads-up since you’re clearly too blind to see it, but Hayes Rivers is fucking her. Or at least, he wants to.” His eyes rake over me with a lascivious, angry light in his dark eyes. “And maybe you do, too, because I don’t know why the fuck you hired her.” He gathers up his files and briefcase and storms out of the conference room.

Remi shakes his head and looks at me as he starts toward the door.

“I’ve got to leave for the day. I have a client to see. I’ve got some questions I need you to answer. And consider yourself the new lead counsel for this case.”

“You’re not going to fire me?” I breathe out in a rush before I can stop myself.

“No, I’m not,” he says like he can’t believe it himself. “You better be worth all this trouble.”

Relief—rich and hot—floods through me, and I wonder if this is how people who receive a reprieve from death feel.

“I promise I—”

“I run at seven a.m. every morning,” he says abruptly and that shuts me up and brings my eyes to his face. He’s frowning at me.

“Good ... for you?” I say when he doesn’t elaborate.

“Very good for me. And, while I’m running, I want to be reading your answers. I’ll expect them in my inbox by then. You’re down a team member, so plan on being here all night, Ryan,” he says and then he’s gone.

Chapter Twenty

Settling

Hayes

“You can’t go in there, Mr. Rivers.” The frantic voice of the woman sitting at the desk outside of Remington’s office calls after me as I walk right past her into his office.

“Wilde, what the hell—” I stop in my tracks. He’s not alone. Confidence, that asshole who’d talked to my woman like she was beneath him, and two men and one other woman are sitting huddled around the small conference table in front of the corner window of his office.

“Rivers, what the hell?” Remi stands up and looks over my shoulder.

“Mr. Wilde, he just walked right past me,” the woman says from behind me.

“Rachel, it’s fine. Just shut the door behind you,” he says to her before he looks back at me.

Confidence is watching me like a deer caught in the headlights.

“What are you doing here?” Remi asks and I look back at him.

“You rejected our settlement offer. Last week when we met you seemed ready to entertain it. Do you know how hard I had to lobby to get them to agree to the terms we presented? You will not get a single dime more out of us,” I warn him.

“Oh, yes, we will,” says Confidence as she stands up.

The other man slams his hand onto the table. “Remi, I am not going to sit here and watch this shit. You hired this person over my objection. You’re letting her pilot this and she’s decided to go full kamikaze.”

“Barry, we’ve discussed this.” Remington’s voice is low, but it’s got a thread of steel in it that raises my already high esteem of this guy even higher. It says more than the four words he spoke.

But Barry’s rage has blinded him to the danger.

“No, she wants to stick it to her ex, so she’s using this lawsuit as a weapon,” he spits out.

“I’m not her fucking ex,” I say.

“Okay, fine, her former fuck buddy, whatever,” he spits. I turn to him and look at him more closely. Who the fuck is this guy?

“What the fu—”

“Barry, you’re about to cross a line,” Remi says and shoots me a warning glance.

“You’ve already crossed one, Remi. I know this is your firm, but I’m a partner, too. And I won’t sit here and watch all of you be hypnotized by a nice ass and a smile,” he says.

“You better shut the fuck up,” I growl and Confidence stands up, her shock apparently worn enough to loosen her tongue.

“Hayes, I don’t need you to fight my battles—”

“Remi, this is highly inappropriate. You shouldn’t have hired her in the first place. But to assign her to this case—it presents a clear conflict of interest.” He cuts her off and rakes his eyes over her body in a way that nobody but me is allowed to look at her.

I walk over to him and get in his face. “You’ve got one more time to interrupt her, insult her, or look at her,” I growl.

“Or what? You going to beat me up?” he asks. “I heard you like to do that,” he says with a small smirk.

“All of you, stop it!” Confidence shouts angrily. Her fists are balled at her sides, her shoulders are hunched, and she’s squeezed her eyes shut. “First of all, stop talking about me like I’m not here,” she says. “You’re arguing about who gets to have their way. Who gets to decide. And while you’re doing that, people are living in limbo at best. At worst, they’re sheltered in homes with walls breeding mildew. They are terrified that their children are breathing mold spores when they put them to sleep in the only home they can manage to find for them.” She slaps her hands down on the table and leans forward. She looks between us.

“They’re not greedy, grasping idiots that we should pay off so we can get back to defending white-collar criminals and helping banks find new ways to screw their customers,” she hisses. She looks at Barry and shakes her head. “Do you think I want your job? I don’t. There’s a whole slew of things you know more about than I can ever hope to, but this is my specialty. And the size of my tits, the color of my hair, or the man I love, have nothing to do with any of it. This is not about you and how you feel about women or me,” she snaps. She is vibrating with passion, and she’s never been more breathtaking than she is right now.

I’m struck by the certainty of a few things. One, this woman loves me. She’s trying to forgive me. But, I also know that if her clients end up with less than what they deserve, her estimation of me will always suffer for it. And my estimation of myself, as a man who is worthy of leading this family—with her by my side—into a future we can be proud of, will suffer too.

She looks at Remi and her voice softens. “Thank you for taking a chance on me. Thank you for trusting me with this,” she says and then glances at me.

“But, I will not work in an office where you allow your employees to talk to people like he’s been speaking with me. So, if this is the culture of your firm, then as soon as this case is over, I’ll be resigning,” she says gravely.

“Confidence—” Remi starts. But she’s already turned to me.

“Hayes. What Kingdom offered is woefully insufficient to compensate the victims of the company’s negligence and disregard. You have suits that cost more than what you’re offering the individual families.”

She casts her damning eye over me again. “If you can afford to buy clothes like that, you can afford to make those people truly whole. And that's not going to come with some cookie cutter settlement in hopes that this will go away quickly. Because that's all that money is designed to do." She condemns me with her honesty. What I see in her eyes is much more than disappointment. It's disenchantment. Distance. I feel my first real pang of panic that she knows that I'm not good enough. That she really won't forgive me. The thought grips my gut in a fist of fear. My collar is suddenly too tight and I can't think of a single thing to say in my own defense.

She shakes her head at all of us. "None of you have even been to the sites. Or even talked to the people whose lives you're discussing.. They're just some figment of your imagination right now," she chastises us.

"You know what, I've had about enough of this. This is a business," Asshole says in a harsh dismissal of everything she just said.

But Confidence is not easily dismissed, and while on her soapbox, with her shield held up in protection of someone else, she is persistence personified. "You're wrong," she insists. Her voice is bolstered by her conviction.

Asshole's eyes narrow.

So do hers. And so do mine. My chest tightens and I tense and keep a close eye on him. His animosity for Confidence is rolling off him in waves. If she's concerned, she doesn't show it. She keeps pushing.

"This is the practice of law. We are lawyers. Social engineers. Or least, we should be. We are here to ensure the best possible outcome for our clients. And you want to settle because you don't think they're worth the price of seeking justice on their behalf," she accuses him.

He leans toward her. Her lip curls in disgust when he speaks, his voice is a snarl.

"You're damn straight. I am not going to worry about people who, when they die, no one will care. We represent people who are captains of industries and who will be remembered forever. The fucking flood didn't go far enough, as far as I'm concerned."

The woman at the table, a thirty-something blonde in a nondescript black suit, gasps.

"Jimenez," Remi calls his name. That thread of steel is now a fully woven rope.

"Yeah?" Barry responds as if it's an imposition to do so.

"How long have you worked here?" Remi asks.

"Five years."

Remi actually looks surprised. "Already? Damn, time flies," he says.

"Yes, and I care about Wilde Law. I'm not going to stand by and watch the firm undermined by what amounts to some sort of affirmative action hire. I know we wanted more women at the table, but let's hire them for the size of their brains, not their breasts." He shoots a venomous glance at Confidence and a rush of anger pushes me to my feet.

Both Confidence and Remi say my name at the same time.

I look to find them both watching me. Confidence with a wary alertness, Remi with anger I know isn't directed at me.

"Then, one of you better do something about it," I say and sit down.

"Barry, we'll be sure to give you an excellent reference. You're fired. Effective today," Remi says.

Barry's jaw drops, but he doesn't make a sound.

No one does.

The room had been quiet before, but now, you could hear a pin drop.

Remi turns to look at the blonde. "Mila, can you take him down with you? I'm adjourning the meeting. We'll regroup later."

"Wait, you're fucking firing me? For what?" Barry sputters, regaining his composure.

“For violating conduct clauses in your contract,” Remi says simply. His eyes hold the same steel as his voice.

Barry’s face crumbles. “I just bought a fucking Porsche and a put a deposit down for a pool,” he says.

“Nice priorities,” I say under my breath, and Remi shoots me a glare. I shrug unapologetically.

“I don’t deserve to be fired!” he shouts, his eyes wide. He looks around the table for support, but everyone, except for Mila and me has their face conveniently buried in a phone or iPad.

“You’ll get a month’s severance for every year you’ve worked here. With all of your experience and seniority, you’ll have a job in no time. Mila will make every resource we have available to you in pursuit of that. But you can’t work here any longer. It’s just that simple. I’m sure you understand.”

He lifts his head slowly and looks between the two of us wordlessly. His expression, completely blank.

“Barry? Are you okay?” Confidence asks. Her expression goes from concern to worry as she takes in the slack look on his face. Her voice triggers something in him because all of the sudden, his jaw tightens and his eyes focus their burning anger on her.

“Think you’re so clever, don’t you? Think you’re going to win a fucking prize or something for your stupid case? I can’t wait to see you fall flat on your face,” he says with a voice so cold and vicious that Confidence flinches and takes a step back. It takes every ounce of restraint I possess not to walk over and throw him out of the window.

“Barry, please stop making threats,” Mila says, sounding mildly bored. “I’d hate for you to leave with a police escort instead of on your own. But you better believe I’ve got my finger on security’s number.” She stands, folds her hands over her chest, and watches him impassively.

“Oh, I’m leaving. I wouldn’t give you two feminazis the satisfaction of seeing me really lose my cool,” he sneers.

“And you keep your shitty severance. I’m calling a lawyer. I’m going to take you to the cleaners, Remi,” he spits as he starts walking.

When he slams the door behind him, the windows of the conference room rattle from the force.

“What an idiot,” Mila says and walks over to where Confidence slumps over in her chair. I start toward her. She looks at me and shakes her head, no. Her blue eyes are glassy but unwavering.

“Are you okay?” Mila asks, peering down at her in concern.

“I’m fine,” Confidence says and swallows hard. “Violent men and I don’t mix,” she says with a nervous laugh. But I see the tremble in her hand when she pushes an errant curl behind her ear.

I want to kill that man for putting that there. I hate that I can’t walk over, put an arm around her. I hate this distance. I’m done letting it grow between us. It’s time to bring my woman home.

Chapter Twenty-One

Unexpected

Confidence

“That line outside is incredible,” I say, wide-eyed, to Remi as we stack the clothes that have been folded and sorted by gender and size into the bins lined along the 500-yard-long convention center room. The volunteers are all busy at work setting up their stations for the doors to open at eight o’clock. “They did a great job getting the word out and there are shuttles all day for people who need it,” I tell him.

“Yeah, the Rivers kid is putting his money where his mouth is, that’s for sure,” he says and reaches for another box of clothes the organizers just dropped off.

“Why do you call him ‘kid’?” I ask a question that’s been burning at the tip of my tongue.

“Because when I met him, that’s what he was. And now, because it annoys him,” he says with a laugh. I laugh along.

“You knew him when y’all were kids?” I ask, my curiosity about how his family’s community is named after another family.

“No. Our families have been neighbors for thirty years now. When they bought the land from the Riverses in the oil bust in the 80s, the name of the development was one of the terms of the contract. And they hated having to sell part of their empire to a bunch of fresh-off-the-boat immigrants who made their money selling plantains in the hood,” he says.

“Plantains in the hood?” I chortle.

He chuckles. “Yeah, we lived in one of the parts of the city that was like a food desert. No good grocery stores. Just corner stores—Popeyes, Church’s Chicken, Shipley’s Donut Shop, if you were lucky. So, my grandfather saved the money he made painting houses and opened Eat!. That was our first business.

And who knew that grocery stores that catered to every single palette it could source for would be so popular?”

“Well, apparently your grandfather did,” I say. They have three hundred and fifty stores in Texas and about two dozen in northeast Mexico.

“Yeah, and he and my dad founded Rivers Wilde. My mom’s brainchild was Wilde Restaurants, Crick Crack being the very first,” he says.

“Wow, it’s amazing you’ve done all that in one generation.”

“Yeah. We’re kind of ambitious. And Houston is the most fertile ground for ideas that are all about the hustle. My mother’s Jamaican, so she’s got to have at least three jobs or she feels like she’s being idle,” he says.

“What about your dad?” I ask.

“He’s dead,” he answers in an uncharacteristically flat, hard voice.

“I’m sorry,” I say.

“No worries, he has been for a long time,” he says, with a dismissive wave of his hand. “Anyway, so I met Hayes once—because our families were enemies in a way that felt like a law. And then I ran into him in this little patch of land between our properties on the day of his dad’s funeral. I called him kid. He didn’t like it, so I did it repeatedly and now he’s back and it’s just stuck.”

I laugh, but I don’t feel like laughing. I miss Hayes. Like crazy. And I haven’t seen him since that day in our office when I turned down his settlement offer. When this event was announced a week ago, I realized what he’d been busy doing.

“How are you guys doing?” he asks.

“We’re not. But it’s fine,” I say, and wish that was true. Fine is the last thing I am.

“Does he know that?” Remi asks, and his eyes are trained over my shoulder. I turn and see Hayes walking in.

His scan of the room comes to a screeching halt when his eyes land on me. He smiles and starts toward me. My heart leaps in anticipation. I haven't seen him in two weeks.

A man steps in his way and starts to talk. The reluctance he shows to look away almost makes up for the fact that he had to stop.

"All right, folks. It's eight o'clock and the doors are opening. Man your stations!" a woman shouts over a bullhorn and I almost jump out of my skin in surprise.

"My brother Tyson will be here, and he's going to switch out with me at eleven a.m. And I'll be back at one o'clock. When you need someone to step in for you, let me know and I'll find a volunteer."

"Okay. But I think I'll be good. I brought snacks and I'm ready," I say and rub my hands together in anticipation. Today feels like the first time I'm actually doing anything meaningful for my clients.

After we rejected their settlement offer, the case was assigned a court date. In the meantime, I'm doing my interviews with my clients and preparing for our first hearing that's six weeks away.

Right now, it feels like we'll never get the mountains of records that we've requested. Kingdom, the corporation, is doing everything it can to stall. They asked for six weeks to even produce the documents we've asked for. So, we've filed for a continuation to give us time to review them. When I say us, I'm talking about my little team of four. One of whom hates my guts. And while all of this is happening, the people in the class are struggling to get their lives back together and are living in limbo.

The Kingdom Foundation, directed by Hayes, organized a clothing and book drive. The donations poured in. Today is shopping day for the families. I got here at 6:30 to help set up, and the line had already started forming. I catch a glimpse of Hayes disappearing in the direction of the picture section. But before I can call after him, the doors open and the people file in. We're in the boys' section, "Size twelve months to four years” in the store, and before we have the chance to speak to each other again, our first customers stand at our table. Instantly, I recognize the boy from Hayes’s house the night of the flood. “Hey there,” I say.

“Hi.” He smiles brightly.

“Do you remember me?” I ask.

“Yeah. Of course. And thank you for volunteering today,” he says like he’s reciting something memorized and just remembered he needed to say.

“You’re welcome. What nice manners,” I respond.

“Well, this was all my idea,” he beams.

“Was it?” I ask and look over his shoulder to make sure no one’s waiting to actually be served. “You must be very proud of how it’s all turned out then,” I say jokingly.

He nods. “Yeah, the first time Mr. Hayes came to visit, he asked me what I thought folks needed and I told him clothes for school,” he says and my heart actually jumps.

“M-Mr. Hayes came to see you?” I ask, saying each word slowly, so that I can make sure he doesn’t misunderstand me.

“Yeah, well, more than once—and not just me. We went around and met with lots of people,” he says.

“What types of meetings?” I ask skeptically.

“Him asking questions about their living situation, families, and asking everyone to give him an idea of what they needed to feel comfortable. I took notes and he even paid me for my time,” he says proudly.

“Wow, well, that sounds awesome,” I say and smile. And this time, there’s not a well of pain behind it.

“Anyway, I just wanted to say hi. And thank you for being here and being the reason Mr. Hayes even came to visit us. He told us you suggested it,” he says.

A peal of laughter propelled by relief bursts from my throat.

“Did he? That’s awesome,” I say.

“He’s pretty cool.” The young man nods.

“See you later.” He waves and walks off.

I feel like crying at what I just heard, but I also feel completely giddy. For the last two weeks, my coffee order has been ready and waiting for me when I walk into Sweet and Lo’s. I’ve had flowers on my desk every morning, my lunch delivered every afternoon. My car washed while it was parked in the garage of my office. Hayes has been relentless in his attempts to woo me.

But this ... done not to woo me back, but because he’s a good man trying to do right is the first thing he’s done that makes me feel like maybe he sees me. That he’s not just trying to convince me, but that he’s doing it for himself, too. That thought makes me unbearably happy. I brush my tears away and turn around just in time to greet my very first customers.

Chapter Twenty-Two

Kneel

Confidence

“I’ll have the meatloaf sandwich,” I say to my waitress.

“Everything here is delicious,” Tyson says. His dark brown eyes twinkle with mischief, and he says, “including some of the diners.” He grins and then winces. He glares at his older brother. “Remi, yo,” he says in a comically, high-pitched voice while rubbing the side of his head that his brother just slapped.

“Stop talking to her like she’s one of those THOTs in that little fan club of yours,” Remi says without looking up from the menu.

“Yo, can I help it if they love me? I mean, maybe if you stopped and smelled the roses instead of trying to be some sort of superhuman legend, you’d get some of that love, too,” he says.

I look back between the brothers and shake my head. “Can you guys please stop bickering? The car ride over was enough of that to last me a lifetime. I’d like to have some quiet with my air conditioning and beer, please,” I say.

“See, Remi, she likes me.” He winks at me. “Can you stop getting in between us?” He drags his chair close to mine. “Excuse me, miss, but you’ve got some dust on your arm,” he says and brushes the remnants of our afternoon off my arm.

“You’re such a flirt, Ty,” I say with mock disapproval.

“Only with the prettiest girls,” he says and winks. His gaze drifts over my shoulder. I don’t think anything of it until I see a gleam of mischief. He slings an arm over my shoulder, and I jump in surprise and then relax.

This is how he talks to everyone. All day, his contribution was keeping the people waiting in the incredibly long lines in a good mood. And he's good at it. Charming, funny, and very nice to look at. It made me feel better. Now that we've rejected the settlement offer, things with Kingdom are moving at a snail's pace. But, this week there was a break in the clouds for our clients whose homes were beyond simple repairs. Remi took me to the land on the outer barrier of Rivers Wilde where Habitat for Humanity is going to be building homes for the residents.

A shiver passes over me and the hairs on the back of my neck stand up and I feel Hayes before I see him. Before I can turn around, I hear him.

"Remi," Hayes says in greeting and his voice ricochets through me like a canon's boom.

My heart leaps into my throat. His proximity is frying my circuits and I can't even remember what I was talking about or doing two minutes earlier.

"Ty." His voice is less friendly when he addresses Tyson.

Remi slides over and says, "Join us, Rivers."

He does and sits down right next to me.

"Confidence," he says quietly, and I shoot him a sidelong glance. I wish I hadn't.

The annoyed expression in his eyes is tinged with longing and it hits me in the center of my chest. His light gray T-shirt blends with the color of his eyes, and with the dim lighting of the restaurant, they look almost green today.

His gaze moves to Tyson who has moved closer to me since Hayes sat down. He lifts his eyebrows in his classic what the fuck do you think you're doing? look.

I give him a why do you think you have the right to ask? glare.

"Rivers, I have to tell you, I think I'm in love with her, so I might need you to back off," Ty says good-naturedly. "You gotta watch out for him. He's the most committed bachelor in town," he whispers to me.

“Tyson, please remove your arm from my woman’s shoulder,” Hayes says in a deceptively calm voice. I bristle at that.

“I’m not his woman,” I say.

His body tenses and he growls, “Like hell.”

“Well, one of you is clearly very confused.” Remi laughs.

“It’s not me,” I say.

The next second, Hayes’s hand wraps around my bicep, and he’s pulling me out of the booth.

“What in the world are you doing?” I yelp.

“You two don’t break anything,” Remington calls after us. I turn around and give him a look of complete bewilderment.

Why is he laughing?

Why isn’t he calling the police?

“Hayes, let me go.” I slap at his hand. He doesn’t even look at me.

He pulls me down a long corridor, pushes open a door and switches on the bathroom light.

“What the fuck was that?” he asks.

“What the fuck was what? I’m not the one who just dragged me through a restaurant.”

He crosses the small room in two strides and pushes me up against the sink. Not to intimidate or scare me. He’s never been able to do either. Not since the night we met.

“You’re not my woman? Are you fucking serious, Confidence?” he asks angrily.

“Hayes, what do you think—?”

“That was a rhetorical question,” he growls and cuts me off and leans toward me.

“Not for me,” I lean forward, too.

He shakes his head at me like he can’t believe what he’s hearing and takes a step back. He shoves his fingers through his hair.

“At least you’re consistent,” he mutters under his breath, but the bathroom has great acoustics and it bounces off the wall and hangs between us.

“What does that mean?”

“It means you know how to hold a grudge. And I’ve given you space to do it,” he says.

“You’ve given me space?” I gape at him.

“Yes,” he snarls and steps closer to me. “But there are fucking limits. And you clearly don’t understand them.”

“Oh, I understand just fine,” I seethe.

“No, you don’t,” he says through gritted teeth. “Because if you did, you wouldn’t be telling another man that you’re not my woman. While his arm is around you.” His eyes narrow, and his hands grip the sink on either side of me.

“Hayes—”

“You must have completely forgotten who I am.” His eyes darken and he leans into me.

“How could I?” I snap.

“Then, did you forget who we are?” He leans against the door and turns the little knob in the handle. His eyes are blazing as he strides toward me.

“I won’t tell you how that felt. But trust me when I say you wouldn’t have liked being in my shoes.”

I flush and glance away from his eyes. I can see the hurt there, and as mad as I am at him, it’s the very last thing I want to do to him.

“Tesoro ...” He grips my chin and turns my head until he traps my eyes with his. They are full of determination, and they hold me in place.

“I know you’re pissed. You have every right to be. But, don’t get Tyson’s ass kicked because you want to hurt me,” he growls.

Worry tickles the back of my throat.

“As if you’d go around beating up people because he was flirting with me.” I dismiss his threat.

He leans in and puts us nose to nose, and then he rubs the tip of his against mine.

“I absolutely fucking would,” he whispers, and I’m caught between a swoon and pang of worry.

I pull my chin out of his grip. “This isn’t a Kristen Ashley novel. You’re not Dax Lahn. I’m not Circe,” I snap.

He blinks and shakes his head in confusion. “I have no idea what that means.”

“It’s a book. And all I mean is that I’ve been trying to move on and you won’t let me.” My voice is stiff and lacks conviction. But it’s just a reflection of what’s happening inside of me. I don’t even believe myself anymore.

“Don’t fucking talk about moving on. Not when you don’t mean it,” he says.

“How do you know what I mean?” I gripe.

“You knew when you took this job that I was going to be here. You came anyway. I don’t think you did that because you’re moving on,” he pushes back.

“I took it because I needed it, and it’s perfect. If it had been in Alaska, I would have taken it.”

He rakes his eyes down my body. My white blouse feels thin under his heated gaze. I shift in my shoes when he lingers on my hips.

“You’ve missed me,” he says.

“I haven’t,” I lie.

“If I touched your pussy, what would I feel?” he asks.

“That’s one question you won’t be answering tonight.”

“I want to touch you.” He dips his head and kisses my cheek. His hand grips my hip.

“You’ll feel better when I’ve made you come,” he whispers against my cheek.

He moves so fast that my ass is up on the edge of the sink before I can protest.

“Do you want me to stop?” he asks. His finger trails up my leg and stops at my knee. Blood rushes in my ears, heat pools between my thighs.

“Of course not,” I breathe.

His fingers slip under the hem of my shorts and I grab his fingers.

“But I’m going to ask you to anyway.” His eyes fly up to mine in surprise, but there’s no anger there. In fact, I think what I see is respect.

“Why?” he asks and stands back up.

If it could speak, my vagina would be cursing me out.

“Because what I want isn’t what I need, Hayes.”

“Why are they mutually exclusive?”

“I don’t want to just be your partner in bed,” I admit.

“Oh, Tesoro,” he sighs and drags his nose across my temple before he moves us back to facing each other. He cups my face in his hands and presses a soft kiss to my lips before he pulls back.

“There’s not a pussy in this world I’d fall on my knees for. Not even yours,” he says, the fierce love and tenderness in his eyes stealing my breath.

His eyes never leaving mine, he continues. “But for this, Tesoro ...” His palms cover the space between my breasts and my heart kicks against the wall of my chest, desperate to find its way into the hand of the man it loves.

“For the love of the most brilliant woman I’ve ever met.” He kisses me again. “I would spend the rest of my life on my fucking knees.”

And then, my big, strong, beautiful man brings my entire world to a halt. He drops to his knees in front of me. On the floor of the public restroom.

“Hayes, get up.” I tug his arm. “Please.”

He grips my hips and presses his face in between my legs and inhales.

“Goddamn.” His groan vibrates against me and moisture blooms beneath his mouth and nose. “I love the way your pussy smells. I fucking miss the way it tastes. I’m dying to feel it gripping my cock.” He rubs his nose against my clit and pleasure skitters, like the kiss of butterfly wings, all over my body.

I thread my fingers into his thick, silky hair just as he leans away and stares up at me with that same fierceness.

But now, it’s laced with need.

He has the look of a predator, and I wish he would hurry up and catch me.

“I want to plant my flag there so that everyone knows it’s mine. But, it’s not even in the top five of my favorite things about you, Confidence. And it’s certainly not the only thing I want.” He looks up at me through his honest, smart eyes, and the rest of the world falls away.

“Oh, Hayes ...” I trace the line of his strong brows and sweep down the slope of his nose.

“I want your fire. I want your courage; I want your loyalty. I want your anger, your disdain, your disappointment.” I brush a lock of hair off his forehead. “I want your smiles. I want your laughter. I want you fighting for my team. And yes, I want your pussy. Every day.” He squeezes my hips, and I want to give him everything he’s just asked me for.

But ...

“I can’t.” I shake my head, caught between my fear and my love and feeling like neither one of them are serving me well right now.

“You won’t,” he chides me gently, but with real reproach in his voice. “But I understand.” He cuts off my protest. “You want to protect yourself. But you can’t. Not from me. Not from us.

It's all or nothing. And as long as we're alive, it will never be nothing."

"Hayes, don't ..." I pull back slightly and shake my head. I don't know what to say.

"I know," he says with real regret in his eyes. "I fucked up. But, I am not that asshole who treated you like you were nothing. I'm not ashamed of anything except that something I did made you feel like you were less than the miraculous person I know I'll never deserve," he says.

My hand comes to my chest and my fingers clutch the front of my blouse. "Oh, Hayes," is all I can manage.

"But, I need you to understand—" His eyes go from pleading to demanding in a blink.

"That you thought I was hiding something?" I interject.

"No," he says sharply. "That I'm responsible for my entire family. Not just the ones that are alive right now. But the ones who will be alive in a hundred years. I just had to keep the estate intact because I lost sight of that once and married someone who I barely knew."

"Well, I'm not her," I remind him.

"I know that ... and I knew it in Italy, too. By the time the report came, I didn't care what it said."

"Why not?" I ask.

"I already knew everything that I needed to know about you. You're the woman who leans in when most people lean away," he says. I want so badly to throw my arms around his neck and tell him it's okay. That I see him, and that I'll always lean in.

"I'm going to show you why us. How us. I'm asking for a lot. Your future. Your love. Your loyalty. Your body. Your children. Your life," he says. "But I'm offering you the same things in return."

Tears sting my eyes and I search his. All I see reflects my own feelings.

“I want you to be my partner. I’m not taking no for an answer, not when I know you feel the same way,” he says.

He reaches up and swipes a tear off my cheek with the pad of his thumb.

“I miss you,” I admit.

His eyes flare. “It’s about fucking time.” Fierce need replaces the tenderness, and he surges to his feet. Without pausing, he steps between my legs and pushes my knees open.

“And I’m going to let you go home without fucking you. Even though I know you want me to.” He chucks me under the chin.

“But let me tell you, when we’re right and we’re back, I’m going to wreck your pussy. I’m not good with words, baby, but when I fuck you, I feel like you always know what I’m saying.” He grinds into me.

“But let me speak your language for a minute, so that when I tell you that I love you, you don’t just hear it. You understand it. And you don’t question it,” he says.

“I know you love me. I do ...”

“Then let me show you just how much.” He takes my hand in his and puts it to his lips. “Let me show you what you’ve shown me,” he says softly.

“What’s that?”

“What it’s like to be part of a team that you can trust. That won’t let you down,” he says.

“Give me a chance. Please.” He comes as close to begging as I’d ever like to hear him again.

“Okay,” I acquiesce. “But you better not fuck it up.”

“Oh, I intend to fuck it up, but in the best way possible,” he says and then he kisses my blues away.

Chapter Twenty-Three

Biased

Hayes

“You’re early,” Confidence groans, one eye open, but squinting. Her hair is tousled all over her head and her face is creased with the indentation from her pillow. She looks like every single fantasy I ever had as a boy and everything I thought I’d never have as a man.

I hold up the white wax bag full of pastries and wave them in front of her face.

“Breakfast,” I say and drop a kiss on her warm, sleep plumped lips and step inside of her apartment.

“The place looks like nobody lives here,” I say as I look around at the blandly and sparsely decorated space. “Where did you get this couch?” I ask as I drop onto the gray loveseat. Besides the glass coffee table, it’s the only furniture in the entire space.

Well, except her bedroom. Not that she would let me in there. But the door is open, and I can see her sea of white comforters and pillows strewn all over the queen-sized bed in the center of the room.

“Ikea,” she grumbles.

“Sleep well?” I ask and start unpacking the bag.

“Uh, not really,” she says, and with a resigned sigh she sits down next to me. She draws her knees to her chest and hugs them. Her pink tank top pulls tight across her back and I watch her shoulder muscles flex when she rolls her neck as if trying to loosen it up. I slide my fingers under the drape of her hair and caress her nape until I find the knot of tension. I start to rub it and she closes her eyes and moans.

“That feels so good,” she whispers. I don’t respond. I just watch her. The skin under her eyes is dark, little lines bracket her frowning mouth. She looks tired and stressed.

“Why aren’t you sleeping well?” I ask. Her eyes open and she looks at me wearily.

“Because I’m afraid I’ve given my clients bad advice,” she says and then jerks her head to the side. “Ugh, what am I doing?” she says in a harsh whisper to herself. “I can’t be talking to you—of all people—about this.” She sighs. “I’m losing my mind; I’m so tired. And Barry getting fired has turned into a nightmare. Word has gotten around, thanks to Barry spreading it, that I asked Remi to choose between him or me. And that’s earned me a flock of ...” She trails off, searching for the right word.

“Enemies?” I offer and press deeper against the muscle in her neck.

She lets her head loll backward, and her hair spills around my hand. It’s warm and soft and my fingers immediately start to close into a fist to capture it. I want to yank her head back and kiss her like I should have when I walked in. But I relax my hand when she closes her eyes and groans.

“Enemies may be a little strong,” she says and then chuckles ruefully. “But only a little.” She shakes her head and sighs. “This is why I hated my last job. No one cares about anything but their careers, their egos, kissing the ass of the person they think can help them. And it’s like everyone here has forgotten why we practice law,” she says, her voice full of frustration.

“You’re being awfully judgmental. They’re practicing law, too. Everyone, even white-collar criminals and profit-driven, billion-dollar companies deserve a fair defense,” I push back.

“I didn’t say they didn’t. Everyone is entitled to whatever protections and remedies the law affords. But working in areas of law where there’s no money to be made is so disheartening,” she says.

“Why? I thought you were doing some good?”

“Well, we would be if law firms like Wilde did it for more than the tax write-off. Our clients are too poor to even keep a roof over their head, much less pay for our very expensive, very well researched advice. But that’s what we promised them. I wouldn’t want them to be worse off than they would have been if we hadn’t brought the suit at all,” she says and worries the inside of her lower lip.

“How’s that possible? They’ve got you,” I say.

“I’m not enough. Wilde is committing minimal resources to their pro bono cases. But this one is different. The implications of its outcomes are huge. Precedent setting potential, and it’s barely staffed. So I’m doing the work of four people because I can’t leave legal research that is going to determine what our brief argues to second year law students. This is too important. And no one else seems to think so,” she snaps bitterly, and I feel the same guilt I felt when she challenged us the day Barry was fired.

It got me thinking about what I came home to do. What I wanted the legacy of my leadership for my family to be. Did I want to reaffirm our roles as society leaders or did I want to do some good for the city that had made us rich? Did I want my name on a stadium? Or did I want to build schools? Affordable, quality housing, fill food deserts with grocery stores?

I’ve decided—and I wanted to show her, instead of tell her—what my plans were.

“What more ideal conditions would exist for it than with Wilde Law? They have deep pockets and nice office space and yeah, it’s a tax write-off, but you didn’t see other firms clamoring to take the case for free in the first place. They do good work. They have some of the world’s best legal talent to choose from,” I say and hand her one of the kolaches from Sweet and Lo’s.

“Yeah, but they don’t dedicate those resources, people, or money that the case deserves because they think their clients should just shut up and be grateful,” she says resentfully.

“You’ve got a chip on your shoulder about this,” I say and she nudges me with that shoulder.

“Hey, watch out—that thing is heavy,” I tease her. That earns me a fierce little scowl.

“I do not.”

“You do. And you tend to paint wealthy people into shapes that are distorted by your bias for, and dislike of, them,” I challenge her.

She lets go of her legs and plants her feet on the ground. Her mouth opens in an affront, her eyes wide with offense at my word.

“I am not biased,” she says in a high-pitched, loud voice.

I laugh. “Chill, it’s okay. We’re all biased. You just don’t know it. Because you’re walking around thinking that you’re being judged for being poor. You wear it like it’s Joseph’s multi-color cloak. Your suffering is not more valid because you didn’t have money at the same time, Confidence,” I say and her face turns red.

“And yes, I agree that I have an obligation to the people whose money I’ve collected in the form of rent. But you’re a lawyer, so you know that the way this plays out won’t have anything to do with what my beliefs are. It’s not a personal decision, it’s a business one. And the business will do what is best for it. It’s not going to pay them more money because we feel sorry for them,” I tell her.

“They are not them. They are us. A country is only as strong as its poorest citizens, Hayes. So you should feel sorry for us as a nation because we are poor. And it should be a personal decision. This is not about contracts to rebuild. This is about Kingdom admitting that they have contributed heavily to the catastrophe their fellow Houstonians find themselves facing, and we will, in equal measure, contribute to the mitigation of the damage,” she shouts at me.

“I agree,” I say grimly.

“God, Hayes... I’m sorry,” she says and covers her mouth with her hands. “This is inappropriate. For me to be discussing this case. And I understand about your hands being tied. I get it. You can't commit Kingdom to terms that are completely against its interests." She drops back down and rests her head on my shoulder. I wrap my arm around her and pull her into me.

"I wish I could snap my fingers and have them make different decisions. But, I can't."

"No, I know ..." she says as if she's trying to convince herself as much as me.

"Maybe I'm being crazy. I'm committing career suicide by being the architect of a case that could change the way insurance companies, cities, governments, and banks treat people who have been the victims of natural disasters. I'll never find a job in this industry again," she says.

A lightbulb goes on in my head, and I sit up.

"What are you thinking?" she asks.

"You could always come work for me," I say.

"No way," she says with an incredulous laugh. She looks at me sideways. "And have you signing my paychecks?" she groans, but with a laugh and right then, I know we're going to be okay. We always have this. Our ability to talk. Connect, argue, challenge each other and yet find humor in the midst of it all.

"Why not? Think about it. The foundation could create a legal defense fund that you could run," I say. She starts to cough.

I hop up to get her some water.

I pull open her fridge and it's completely empty. "Where's all the fucking food?"

"I don't have any," she croaks defensively.

"Not even a bottle of water?" I ask, incredulous. She shakes her head and her coughing subsides.

"Who doesn't have water?" I ask, and walk back to the couch.

"Me. I haven't had time, and I'm barely here. And when I am, it's just to sleep," she confesses.

I want to tell her that she should be sleeping in my bed, that she was supposed to be living with me. But I'm not going to ask her again. I want her to be the one to say it.

She yawns and eyes the pastries I've spread out. "Thanks for the ... croissants, but can we go out for coffee? I want to get a latte from Sweet and Lo's. They're delicious, Hayes," she says brightly. I'm glad for the subject change because it was getting too heavy.

"Croissants? These aren't croissants. They don't even remotely resemble them," I say and pick up the éclair shaped like a piece of bread.

"This," I say dramatically while I rip the dough in half, "is a kolache." I put the two halves under her nose. "Lo style," I add and her eyes light up and she sniffs the fragrant steam wafting under her nose.

"Who would give such a magical smelling miracle such a terrible name? What the heck is a koalachee?"

"You're mispronouncing it. And it was brought here by the Czech immigrants who settled in Texas. I would say I'd take you to the Kolache Factory, because growing up that's all there was. But Sweet's in Rivers Wilde is next level."

"Mmm," she moans and licks her lips. "Gimme." She snatches half from mine. "What is this magic?" she drawls excitedly.

"It's grilled chicken, eggs, and potatoes wrapped in this dough and baked," I tell her and she takes a huge bite and swallows greedily.

"Is this a Houston thing?" she asks.

"More like southeast Texas. No one else anywhere I've lived has ever heard of them," I tell her.

"Oh my God, that chicken. Does it have ... curry or something on it?" She smacks her lips together, and I frown at her in mild disgust.

"What's all the smacking for?" I ask.

She smirks and smacks louder. "I'm country, Hayes. We smack our lips when something tastes this good. This is Czech food?”

“Well, the concept is. But, Sweet’s pastries are all made with a flavor of her home country, Senegal—that’s in West Africa. And Lo, his real name is Lotanna, is her husband. He’s from Nigeria, and he’s the reason that Sweet doesn’t give away everything she bakes and makes,” I tell her.

“I love their coffee; can’t wait to actually eat there. Let me get dressed and we can head out,” she says and stands and hurries to her room. And instead of following her like I want, I pull out my phone and call Gigi.

Chapter Twenty-Four

Sweet and Lo

Confidence

Haye holds open the glass paned French doors of Sweet and Lo's. "After you."

"Thank you," I answer absently. I'm distracted by the sensory delights that started when we approached the bakery. I pass it every day on my way to work, but haven't had the time to stop. But the smell of sugar, butter and coffee that fills the air around it always makes my mouth water. But as I step around the glass window between the door and the dining room that reads, "We Bake the World.", my foodie soul is dancing a jig at all the delicious promises the scene before me is making.

The cafe's abundance of windows, on both the front street facing side and the left wall that opens onto a small garden where people are seated reading and talking, give it a warm airy feel. It's packed with people, and the only thing louder than the concentrated murmur of conversation is the whirring of the coffee grinders, the hissing of steaming espresso makers, and the background music that's too low to make out clearly, but loud enough that you know it's there. I eye the huge chalkboard behind the small hostess stand ahead of us. The menu is written in neat cursive and lists everything from pastries and sandwiches to omelets and salads and specialty breads.

I crane my neck so I can see above the heads of the people clustered and waiting to be seated in the smaller-than-comfortable waiting area. My stomach tightens, as if to remind me how long it's been since I ate. Hayes is scanning the dining room and I tug his arm to get his attention. "Think we can order and take it to go instead of waiting for a table?"

"Nope," he smiles and turns back to the dining room.

“Why not?” I complain and tug his arms until he looks down at me.

“My aunt is meeting us. She’s here already seated. Come on.” He drops that bomb then takes my hand and turns us toward the young woman smiling and waving at us from the hostess stand.

We take a few steps before I can gather my wits and pull my hand out of his and stop dead in my tracks.

The person behind me slams into my back and the sharp edge of his shoulders poke my back and the toe of his rubber-soled shoes scrape against the backs of my heels. I spin around just in time to see a very old, frail looking woman falling backward.

I cry out, my hands over my mouth in horror. She sits right where she fell, flat on her ass, her spindly green floral-painted legging covered legs sprawled in front of her like a newborn foal.

I reach down to help her up and glare at Hayes who’s just made it back to my side. He looks between us with an expression of complete bewilderment on his face.

“I’m so sorry,” I say and reach down to cup her elbow. She swats my hand away and says, “I can get myself up. I look old, but I bet you I could beat you in a race around the block.” Her voice, thin and frail, says otherwise. But she hops up in one quick, acrobatic movement. “See? Right as rain,” she says proudly.

“I’m Sally, Sally Turner.” She says her name like it’s a compliment. She’s got to be eighty years old. Her face is covered in a spray of freckles that even kiss her eyelids and lips. Her eyes, a sparkling dark brown, are full of mischief and her smile is disarmingly youthful.

“Are you okay, Sally?” Hayes asks as if he’s been saying her name his whole life as he puts a hand at the small of both of our backs and ushers us out of the way of the customers trying to get to the booth.

“Oh, I’m fine. I was just distracted by the specimen of man meat ahead of me.” She nods at Hayes and winks. “You’re Hayes Rivers. Nice that you finally came down from your tower to visit us,” she says.

Hayes, as unflappable as ever, doesn’t correct her and say that he’s actually been spending a lot of time in town. Instead, he smiles roguishly. “I heard this was the place to come if I wanted to find a pretty girl to talk to. Of course, I came to see.”

She throws her head back and laughs delightedly. “Oh, how wonderful, and you’re charming, too. Those Wilde boys pretty things up nicely. I’d say you’re about to add something better than pretty,” she says and laughs again.

“I’ll leave the prettying to the Wildes and my woman.” He slips a hand around my waist. Her eyes roam Hayes’s body like someone contemplating what part of their steak they’d like to eat first.

“Either way, we can always use another fine piece—”

“Uh, I’m so sorry I stopped like that; I’m glad you’re okay.” I interrupt her before she says any more.

“Oh, if I’d been looking where I was going, I would have seen ya,” she says. “This your fella?” she asks.

I glance at Hayes; he’s grinning from ear to ear. My heart flutters. He’s a goddamn dangerous combination of overbearing and sweet.

I’m addicted to him.

I get near him and I lose my mind. I miss being his woman and everything that comes with it and I’m so close to giving him whatever he asks for. Close. But ...

I smile serenely and say, “Not quite,” to Sally. His hand tightens around my middle.

“Well, if you’re not sure ...” She gives Hayes a suggestive sidelong glance and wink.

I laugh.

She looks back at me with an indignant glare. “Honey, if I was just twenty years younger, you wouldn’t be able to fight me for him. They don’t make men like this anymore. I suggest you get sure real quick.” She winks and strides off into the restaurant.

“Yeah. Get sure quick, Tesoro.” Hayes’s lips brush my ear, and his breath makes the hairs on the back of my neck stand up and my insides quiver. His hand slides along my waist and comes to rest on my abdomen. It takes up almost the entire space, and when he pulls me back into him, I feel like I’m melting.

“I miss you touching me, baby.” I let my head fall back and rest on his shoulder.

“Hayes Garfield Rivers, you are in public!” An irate voice from ahead of us breaks the trance and we jump apart.

“Gigi,” Hayes says and steps around me toward the dark haired, hazel-eyed beauty who but for the fact that he called her his aunt, I would never believe was old enough to be.

She glares at him. “Don’t you dare use that voice on me, Hayes,” she scolds even as she throws her arms open to welcome his hug. I watch as she embraces him, smacks his shoulders and then wraps her arms around him. He lifts her off her feet. Her eyes, closed from the instant they touch, pop open and they’re assessing and shrewd as they run over me from head to toe. She’s dressed in a navy skirt topped with a white tailored shirt with a patent-leather, nude-colored belt cinched around her Audrey Hepburnesque waist. Suddenly, my cut-off shorts feel both too casual and too short. My white camisole, too revealing and my flip-flops, downright disrespectful.

When our eyes meet, I smile my best smile and thank God I tied my unruly hair back so that at least I don’t look completely unkempt. My shoulders sag with relief when a smile—warm and real—blooms across her face.

She disengages herself from Hayes and comes toward me, arms outstretched. “Well, Hayes, look what you did. She’s as pretty as a picture,” she says to him as she wraps me in a hug that smells and feels like comfort and love. It makes me long for my mother. I wish she could see this place.

“I’m Gigi, Confidence,” she says warmly. “I think we’re going to be great friends.” She hooks an arm through mine.

Hayes doesn’t let go of my hand when I try to tug it free of his. He draws it into his lap and holds it there with the other one on top of it. I look at him to demand it back, but my words die on my lips.

He’s laughing at something his aunt just said. His head is thrown back, his teeth gleaming, his eyes closed, and I can envision my future. What life could feel like if I spent it with him. Happy, holding hands, with family who fusses, but forgives. In nice suburban cafes that smell like bread and coffee. And where everyone is welcome, especially me. So, I don’t pull my hand back. Instead, I squeeze his and rejoin the conversation just as our server comes and takes our orders.

Hayes jumps slightly and then lets go of my hand.

“What’s wrong?” I ask. My hand feels cold without his sandwiching it. He fishes into the pocket of his jeans and pulls out his phone.

“I’m sorry, I’ve got to take this. I’ve been expecting this call for two days,” he says. He slides out of the booth and strides toward the entrance.

I watch him go. His sky-blue polo neck T-shirt bunches across his broad shoulders as he turns to squeeze between the tightly packed tables. His jeans sit low on his hips and hug that fine ass of his.

“I don’t blame you, sister,” Sally calls from a couple of tables ahead of us.

I jump slightly and blush at being caught ogling. I look at Gigi and smile. She doesn't smile back. In fact, the friendly light in her eyes disappears completely. My throat convulses in surprise and dread.

"Is everything okay?" I ask.

"I need to ask you some things, right now before Hayes comes back," Gigi says the minute he's out of earshot.

"Okay ..." I say and glance toward the door at Hayes.

"I have a check in my purse for one million dollars. If I gave it to you, would you leave and never bother Hayes again?" she asks.

Shock renders me paralyzed. I think if she whistled, the air she pushed out would knock me over.

"What?" I ask, offended, incredulous and for some reason, a little afraid.

"I could go up to three million. And I will. If you'll take it," she says.

Her expression is completely neutral. I can't believe she can be so calm after what she just said.

"Are you kidding me? Why would you even ...?"

"Name your price," she says.

My heart slows to a hard, slow thud.

"What?"

"I'll give it to you. If you'll take it," she says slowly, like there's something she's trying to tell me without saying it directly. But my blood is boiling and I don't have the time or inclination for her games.

"I most certainly will not," I say and grab my phone from the table and reach to pick up my purse.

She puts a hand over mine to steady it.

"I'm sorry if that offended you. But it's not personal," she says.

“As if it could be anything but personal,” I say without a thought for who I’m talking to.

“Confidence, Hayes is all that’s left of my family. He’s also, underneath that shell he wears, desperate for a place where he feels like he belongs. I will use my money, I will lie, I will offend, and I will do whatever to help him find it. After what he’s gone through with that ex-wife—” she says unapologetically.

I lose my cool.

“I bet you never offered her money to leave him alone, did you? Why? Because she wasn’t a nobody from nowhere, right?” I say angrily. I throw my napkin onto the table and lean in so that I can lower my voice. I am not going to let her bullshit ruin this lunch for Hayes. I glance over my shoulder and see him pacing in front of the restaurant, deep in conversation. I turn back to his aunt.

“That woman is criminally idiotic. I can assure you that I am not. Money is nice. But I don’t want more of it than I need,” I tell her.

“Yeah, right,” she says dismissively.

“I know it’s hard to imagine people not worshiping the same money god as you do,” I say.

“How dare you?” she asks.

“How dare you?” I shoot right back. “You could have just asked me how I feel about him.” I’m angry and surprised by the sting of tears in the back of my eyes.

“Oh, I don’t need to ask to know it’s obvious. But in my experience, love isn’t ever enough, so I want to know what else you want from Hayes.”

“I don’t have to prove myself to you,” I say indignantly.

“You’re right,” she says crisply, her eyes narrowing on me. “But, let me tell you, If any of the things you think he’s good for are comfort or financial security, then that will prove itself, too. I’m just trying to save us all a little time and a lot of heartbreak,” she says coolly.

I don't know whether to storm off or hug her.

"Gigi?" Her eyebrows shoot up in surprise at the gentle deference in my voice.

"May I call you that?" I ask.

"Of course, you may," she says archly.

I nod and smile politely. Then, I take off the gloves.

"You've known him his whole life and you're still putting a price tag on him. And I've only known him for four months, and I already know he's priceless," I snarl.

"How dare you?" she gasps.

"You're going to have to stop saying that. I dare because no one is in charge of me but me." I point at my chest. "Yes, I want him to spoil me," I say, and she smirks knowingly. I wipe it right back off. "With respect, loyalty, and free and exclusive access to his glorious body. But, I can finance myself," I say through gritted teeth.

"Well then, why are you two doing this dance where you're not together? What are you holding out for?" she asks in frustration. I can see how much she loves Hayes; I can see how worried she really is for him. So, I decide to ignore her disrespectful questions and innuendos and put her mind at ease.

I sigh and search for the right words to describe Hayes and me right now.

"I love Hayes. More than I've ever loved another man. Ever. But, we're in a really weird place. He hurt me, and I'm trying to forgive him. Forgiveness doesn't come easily to me. But I'm trying," I tell her.

And I am. I know he said what he did before he knew me. But honestly, I'm bothered by the fact that he would say it at all. My parents didn't do a lot right by me. But, they raised me in a place where I was surrounded by a lot of other people who did do right by me. I wouldn't be who I am today without those people. They are my family. Even though I'm not there, that town, its people, and its future is the wind beneath my wings. I love them. I take my role as their daughter, sister, friend seriously.”

“What happened?” she asks.

“He insulted me,” I say.

“So?” she asks.

“So, when someone insults me, I feel like they’re insulting the people I love, too. And I won’t let anyone do that. Not even the man I want to spend the rest of my life with,” I say to her.

“The rest of your life?” She gasps. “Are you ...?” Her throat bobs.

“No, not yet,” I say. “But he loves me. I will forgive him because I can’t live without him,” I confess and my heart flutters as I say it out loud for the first time. I am certain of those things and they are the reason I’m here.

She grabs my hand across the table and her eyes shine with tears.

“Oh, my dear,” she says. I snatch my hand back.

“No,” I shake my head. “I’m not your dear,” I say plainly.

She pales a little.

“I know you were just trying to protect him. But have some faith in his judgment. And be honest with me. I hope this is just the beginning of our relationship. We should begin as we mean to go on. If you play games with me, we can be relatives, but never friends. I would much rather be friends, so please just say what you mean. And mean what you say,” I ask.

I watch her face and wait for her to respond. I hold my breath, very aware that I may have just made an enemy out of the one relative Hayes seems to hold in high regard. Besides his brothers.

She stares at me in complete disbelief for a full minute. I start preparing to explain to Hayes why I made his aunt cry or storm off or throw water in my face. Then, she lets out a hoot of laughter that sends several heads turning in our direction.

“Well, will you look at that,” she says, tears in her eyes and a huge grin on her face.

“Look at what?” I ask.

“He found you,” she says and digs into her food with gusto.

Chapter Twenty-Five

Laid Bare

Hayes

“Tell me about your aunt,” Confidence asks as soon as we’ve parted ways with Gigi. The question stumps me for a second. Not because I don’t want to talk about her, but because I’d already moved on to what I wanted to show her.

“I want to hear more about her,” Confidence says, and my heart warms because she sounds like she really means it.

“She’s everything. The reason I don’t have issues. The reason I can accept and give love. She took me in when no one else wanted me. And she put up with my shit and hasn’t held it against me,” I say and smile as I think about the way Gigi and I knocked heads when we first met.

“You love her,” she says it like it’s a question.

“Of course, I do,” I say and pull her down one alley off Rivers Wilde’s main street.

“Come on, I want to show you something.”

“What are we doing here?” she asks as we step out on the other side and onto a footpath that leads to The Oaks.

“I’m picking up my gate passes and my car. I want to show you my house.”

“You bought this house?” Confidence gasps when we step inside the two-story foyer of the red brick house nestled in between a row of other two-story red brick houses that make up this picturesque cul-de-sac on Wildetree Lake.

“Yes, I bought this house,” I respond and take her hand and start for the stairs. “When you see the view from the master bedroom upstairs, you’ll see why,” I tell her, and my excitement builds with each step up the staircase.

“This is beautiful, Hayes,” she says and glances around the house. I follow her gaze, and I have to agree. About a tenth of the size of Rivers House, this is a house that already feels like home.

“I like it,” I say, intentionally noncommittal.

“Like? How can you just like it?” she screeches and pulls her hand out of mine. She runs it up the Cherrywood stair rails and sighs. “It’s like the dream house on my Pinterest board,” she says.

“Is it?” I ask.

But I know it is. She showed me the first time I went to visit her. When I saw the pictures of this place on my realtor’s site, I knew I was going to buy it. When I came to visit for the first time, I knew right away that this would be my home. Now, I hope she’s going to feel the same way.

“I want to show you something and then I want to tell you something and then I want you to be as mad as you want about it. But when you’re done, I’m fucking you. And when we leave this house later, we’re going to be back together.”

Her eyes widen and her jaw drops before she composes herself. “Hayes ...” she starts, her voice full of fight. I yank her to me and kiss her quiet. Her lips soften and her arms slip around my neck and she kisses me back like she’s been missing it as much as I have.

It feels so good, but I force myself to stop kissing her.

Her eyes are glazed with desire; her plump lips pout when I pull back. “I’ve told you about that caveman shit,” she grumbles, but nestles into me.

“Yeah, you told me.” I press a kiss to the top of her head and wrap my arms around her.

“But, that’s what I become when I think about you. You’re mine and I’m not going to act like you’re not. Not for one more day.” I breathe in a good whiff of her hair that’s tickling my nose. She smells like sunflowers and rain. So clean and bright and strong.

“Come on.” I put an arm around her waist and lead her to the bedroom.

It, along with the rest of the house, is fully furnished and decorated.

“This room is kind of ...” Confidence looks around and searches for the right word to describe the explosion of white, yellow, and peach that is my bedroom. “I would say feminine, but that feels like a massive understatement.” She laughs and looks around.

“Do you really sleep in that bed?” She points at the white, four-poster bed with yellow drapes flowing from the top of it.

“Gigi took my ‘do whatever you want’ too literally,” I explain. “But don’t worry, baby, I plan on getting rid of it before you move in,” I say.

“Hayes, give you an inch ...” she says.

“Oh, Tesoro, by the time we leave this house tonight ...” I look at my watch and note that it says eleven a.m., “I would have taken ten miles and put in a request for another hundred. You can say no, but I want you to look me in the eye and tell me you don’t love me. Because that is the only way I’ll let you go,” I tell her.

She dips her head and hides her face, but I know my girl. She always puts a lock of hair between her lips and presses them together when she’s happy but doesn’t want to show it. She’s holding the end of her ponytail between her fingers and is holding it to her mouth for a moment before she looks up.

“And you need to stop telling me what’s going to happen and how I’m going to feel and what you’re going to do with me,” she says irritably.

I've pushed enough for now, and in a few minutes, I'm going to have a real battle on my hands, so I change the subject and steer us to the big bay window at the back of the bedroom.

"Look." I point over her shoulder into the distance.

"Oh wow, we can see all the way to the Habitat for Humanity project site." She puts her hand on her throat.

"Have you been out there yet?" I ask.

"Yeah, once. Just this week. I think it's awesome that Wilde World is giving up that parcel of land for its development," she says, and I smile.

"That's not Wilde World's land," I say as nonchalantly as I can.

"Yes, it is. It shares the wall with Rivers Wilde," she argues.

"I know. You know that the land Rivers Wilde is built on all used to belong to my family, right?" I ask.

"All of it?" she asks.

"Yes, all of it. That land beyond the wall," I say and point to the short stone wall that was built to divide the land. "All of that still belongs to us," I inform her.

"What?" she turns around to face me. "You own all of that? Habitat for Humanity is building on your land?" she asks.

"No, they're building on their land. I donated it to them. Nearly fifty percent of what's left. One thousand acres for their project," I say.

"You ... gave it to them?" she squeaks. Her head swings wildly back and forth between the expanse of green pasture land that's one of the most unique things about Houston. Urban and rural blend within feet of each other. And it's self-contained, but with easy ingress and egress to streets that are the major traffic arteries of the city make the location ideal for commuters going to all of the major commercial centers in Houston. The Galleria, downtown, Greenway, Katy, Sugar Land, The Medical Center. She stares at me for a few minutes, her face tight with concentration as if she's looking at a puzzle that makes no sense.

“What?” I ask.

She frowns. “It’s just that there’s a dissonance between your actions and words, Hayes. Last time we talked about this, you were shocked that we wouldn’t accept a settlement. Now, you’ve committed your family’s resources to doing exactly what you refused to do last week.”

“Well, it was actually almost two weeks ago, and then, I hadn’t been to see any of the properties. I hadn’t met Matt and Jasmine and their ten-month-old who couldn’t go anywhere without the machine they use to treat his asthma,” I say.

“I heard about your visits,” she says. “Your little notetaker was very proud of himself.”

“He’s a good kid. And after those visits, I decided to make that donation. Some of those units should have been condemned before the flood.” I shake my head as I remember the rubble and debris that still lay strewn in the parking lots of these units. It’s a disgrace and I couldn’t sit by while they suffered.

“Does Remi know that? Why wouldn’t he tell me that?” I ask.

“Because I asked him not to. I wanted to tell you myself, and I didn’t want you to know until I thought you were ready to hear it,” I tell her.

Her eyes narrow slightly. “Why do you get to decide what I’m ready for?” she asks.

“Because I’m the decider,” I say, mimicking George W. Bush’s infamous words.

“Oh, really?” she asks and crosses her arms over her chest.

“Yes. That’s what I do. I make decisions that I think are best for myself and my family. Sometimes they mean I will have to hurt the people I love. Not be candid with them. Move them around like pawns,” I say.

“How do you feel about that?” she asks, surprising me with how soft her voice is.

“I feel fine about it. I’m not impulsive, Confidence. When I act, it’s after long deliberation. There have been moments in my life where I didn’t think, where I just acted, and I hurt people without any really good reason. The ends didn't justify the means."

"You should hear yourself, Hayes. You're a stage five control freak," she says, but her voice is completely devoid of recrimination. In fact, I hear shades of pity, and I don't fucking like it.

"I have to be," I say tightly.

She holds her hand out to me and I step forward and take it.

She brings it to her lips and brushes the back of them in a sweeping motion. She looks up at me through her lashes, and I'm struck by how every time she looks at me, her eyes nearly lay me flat.

"You can't control people, Hayes," she whispers, and a knot tightens in my chest at the distress in her voice.

"I'm not trying to control anyone. I just take opportunities when I see them," I say and before she can cut me off, I tell her what I've been dreading. "Like when I realized that Kingdom wasn't going to do anything they weren't forced to when it came to the tenants, I knew Remi would need the best lawyer on his team."

"What do you mean?" she asks and then her eyes widen and her mouth falls open.

She drops my hand. "You didn't," she says quietly.

I'm shocked she hasn't guessed already. She jumps to her feet. "If you say that you asked Remi to hire me, I am going to walk out of this room, and if you try to stop me I will scream at the top of my lungs until someone calls the police," she yells.

Fuck.

"I didn't ask Remi to hire you," I hedge.

"But?" she bites out between her clenched jaw.

"But, I did bring you to his attention," I say.

She growls and balls her fists.

“Why, Hayes? Because you wanted me here so badly that you’d persuade your friend to give me a job I wouldn’t be considered for otherwise? How do you think that makes me feel? After everything I shared with you, you know that is the very last thing I would want,” she says and starts for the door.

My arm whips out like a lasso and I draw her to me.

“No, you aren’t leaving,” I say. “And scream because the closest house is three empty lots away. And you’ll be screaming for nothing because you know I will not hurt a hair on your head to keep you from leaving,” I say.

She looks pointedly at her arm, where my hand is cuffed around it.

I let go.

“I’m not holding you, but you’re not walking out of here over that. You needed a job. This one was perfect for you, and Remington already had your resume. He just needed someone to vouch for you. And I did,” I say. “But you know him now. Do you think he would have hired you because his friend asked him to? His twin sister works somewhere else because he won’t hire her,” I remind her.

Some of the fight flows out of her.

“Why didn’t you tell me, then?” she questions. Her voice is raised to a near shout, her eyes are pools of conflict. She’s angry, hurt, but she also ... understands.

“Because you are so fucking stubborn, Tesoro,” I say in exasperation. “You would have cut off your nose to spite your face and spit in Remi’s the minute you knew I was involved,” I say.

“I would not have,” she says.

“Liar,” I taunt her.

“I would not have. Not everything is about you,” she says.

“Liar,” I say again.

“Stop saying that,” she says angrily.

“Stop lying,” I say.

“You are not a mind reader!” she yells now. She’s practically vibrating, but with something much more potent, vibrant, and transformative than anger. It is relief and acquiescence. She’s relenting.

I press my advantage.

“You and I are cut from the same cloth, molded from the same earth, sky, water, and fire. I can read you.” I trace a line down her forearm.

“Did you do this because you wanted me to take you back?” she asks and points out at the development.

“Partly, yes. But not just because I want you on my arm and in my bed, but because I need you by my side,” I say.

“You do?” she asks, and I laugh at the surprise in her voice.

I nod over at the window, at the land. “I could have sold it. It’s some of the most valuable land in Texas. But, what’s the point of enriching my family and living in a walled off castle when the rest of the world is burning or in Houston’s case, drowning. But I wouldn’t have considered it if I hadn’t met you. At least, not as quickly,” I admit.

“So, you did it because—”

“Because I knew it was the right thing to do. The only thing I could do. You said this should be a personal problem. And you’re right. When I think about what I want the legacy of my times as head of this family to be, I find that preserving it isn’t enough - not just for the sake of it, anyway. That land has sat empty for two hundred years. It doesn’t flood, the only real expense of it are the property taxes, and because it was a donation and they’re a 501(c) (3), it’s a nice tax holiday for all of us. So, win-win,” I say with a shrug.

“My brother is on death row. He killed my father during one of their drunken rages,” she blurts out suddenly and I freeze.

“What?” I say because I don’t know how else to respond.

“Yeah, the one named Fortune,” she says.

“What happened?” I ask her.

“There was a terrible storm that night. Otherwise, I wouldn’t have been home,” she says, her tone a little wistful. “When they were both drunk, I couldn’t bear to be under the same roof. But the river was already swollen from rain a few days before, so it was flooding. I was trapped in the house, and they were fighting. Over the last beer. Fortune had opened it and Daddy snatched it from him. The bottle broke, and Fortune stuck the edge of it into Daddy’s neck and he bled to death right there while my mother and I hid under the dinner table,” she says dimly.

I convulse in horror. That’s unimaginable.

“I love where I come from, but I could never live there again. I was trapped between two terrors and it was only when one was gone that I was able to escape the other,” she says, her eyes distant and dull.

She’s drawn her knees up to her chest, her heels rest on the edge of the window seat cushion and her feet are dangling off the edge. Just then, I can see her as a young girl, sitting on the edge of a river bank, her long hair hanging off one shoulder as she looks over it at the danger behind her. Her toes being tickled by the water while she listened for the danger at her front.

“Did he hurt you?” I ask, even though I absolutely do not want to know if he did. I know that if she says yes, I will never rest well. Knowing someone hurt this woman, and I will never be able to make them pay.

“Of course, but he also made me stronger. I always fought back. I never took my beating lying down,” she says, and I want to go and find her brother and spare him the comfort of that needle.

“Well, am I free to go?” she asks quietly.

“Free to go where?” I ask, truly confused.

“Don’t you want me to leave? Isn’t this exactly the kind of thing you’d wanted to know and avoid when you ordered the background check?” she asks.

“For a smart woman, you’re pretty damn obtuse,” I say. “I told you why I ordered it, and that by the time it came through, I didn’t care what it said,” I remind her.

“And you care now?” she asks quietly.

“Did you not hear me earlier?” I ask and place my hands on her shoulders.

“Which part?” she says. Her smile is small, but it’s there, for the first time all day. I skim her arms and the sweep of all of that unbelievably soft skin at my fingers makes me want to take her clothes off and pull her supple body against mine and show her what my words have failed to.

That I need her constantly.

That she owns me as completely as I own her.

That I love her endlessly.

“The part about you and me being made from the same combination of elements. About you being mine?”

“Still?”

“Tesoro, knowing, didn’t change anything. In fact, it just showed me how alike we are.”

“Why? Are your relatives murderers, too?” she asks, and shoves her hands through her hair and looks up to the ceiling in despair.

“Maybe?” I shrug and think about it quickly. “I don’t know,” I say.

“Well, then, they’re not. If you had a murderer in your family, you would know it, trust me,” she says.

“Then, I don’t know that I would care. You’ve been shaped by the river, learned more from it than you did from the man who spawned you. You are not him. You have shaped me,” I tell her.

“Ha, right!” She laughs. I ignore her and press on. “You know the Mississippi River starts in Minnesota, right?” I ask her.

“Of course, I do,” she says.

“Well, at its mouth, it’s narrow enough that you can walk across it in less than a dozen steps,” I say.

She looks at me, eyebrows raised in question.

“You’re like that river. At least in the way you’ve affected me,” I say.

“How? Easy to cross?” she says morosely.

“Stop pouting.” I chuck her under the chin. “I mean that you started like that for me. A pin prick sized drop of water on the very still waters of my life. And the minute you touched me, you caused a ripple that blurred everything I thought I was certain of. The way I saw myself, my obligations, my future. And now, just like that river you love so much does, it winds its way south, you rush through me, and I’m drowning in you.” I kiss her quickly.

“I’m all for you loving me, but it’s not worth your life.” She uses the very same joke I made that night in the hot tub and I laugh.

“Actually, I can breathe deeply for the first time in a long time. I know we’re from totally different worlds, but I feel like we’re also from the very same one. We love our family—not just the ones who were born of our blood. My brothers, Stone and Beau, aren’t biologically related to me at all,” I tell her. “You’re not the daughter of a sadistic drunk and the sister of a killer. I’m not the scion of a line of philanthropic, but short-sighted men and faithless women. Our legacies—what we choose to leave of ourselves in this world—is up to us.”

She sighs...

“Why didn’t you tell me sooner?” I ask her.

She purses her lips and then she blows out a breath. “I don’t talk about it. No one in Amorel does. It’s our collective secret. We all like to pretend that Merle—that’s my dad—never existed and that Fortune is already dead,” she says quietly.

“And I’m ashamed of what they did and how I deny them. But to acknowledge them is to remind everyone not just that my brother killed my father, but about the blood that runs in my veins. It means something that it’s part of my history. And, in a way, that's more than just a random moment. That it shaped me. Reduced me. Just like the river. Just like I thought Nigel had done. Just like I was afraid you'd do if I gave you another chance," she says. I grasp her chin, a little more forcefully than I need to and turn her face toward mine.

"There is nothing that could reduce you. You wear your name like a crown, and it's one of the truest things about you," I tell her.

She sniffs dismissively. "It feels like a joke. And I'm afraid sometimes that it is. My brother Fortune is going to die on a table with a state-sanctioned, poison-filled needle in his arm. My brother, Happiness, ran away before he was thirteen. I can't imagine that his life has brought him much of his name's meaning." She shakes her head.

"Well, first, I think you're giving your parents a lot of credit. Your mother, I will say, seems lovely. But fortune teller didn't seem to be one of her skills. They gave you a name they liked. You've made it your own. You can decide that what you've done with your life is worth less than some whim by your parents twenty-seven years ago. But you would be lying to yourself," I tell her.

She looks up at me through her long lashes and smiles.

"You believe in yourself. Enough to see beyond your current situation and reach for more. That's more than I can say for myself. I didn't consider that your interest in me could be more than all of the things that I've used to define myself. But, I swear, by the time we left Italy, I knew I didn't care what it said, and I knew that I could trust you," I say. And then I add the part that has been a more recent revelation. "I know that one of the reasons that people think of my money when they look at me is because that's what I show them. I started changing that after your visit. If I wanted more from people, I had to give more," I say. "You asked me about wanting more from my experiences than money could buy."

"Oh Hayes," she says wistfully.

"What?"

“Thank you for speaking so my heart could hear. I don’t want to be bought. I don’t want to be wooed with flowers or nice trips. I want to be wowed by you living your best life. Because I want to live mine, too,” she says.

“Let’s do it together.” I pull her off the window seat and carry her toward the bed.

“What are you doing?” she cries. “I’m still talking ...”

“Well, when you’re done, you’re going to put your pussy on my dick and make it dance,” I say. “I just want to get you in position.”

“Aren’t you mad that I didn’t tell you sooner? How do you not have any more reaction than this?” she asks.

“I already knew,” I admit and then brace for her reaction. Her body tenses and I just hold on tighter.

“You knew?”

“Yeah. After you left that day, I read it. I wanted to know what spooked you so badly,” I say.

She glares at me.

I smile at her.

Her glare falls apart and her mouth trembles before she covers it with her hands.

“You have the heart, spirit, and courage of a queen. I’m proud to know you. Proud that you love me. You’ve taken something and made it into nothing,” I say.

She rolls her eyes. “You’ve got it backward,” she says exasperatedly.

“No. I don’t. I’m telling you that you have taken something that should have reduced you, changed you, trapped you, maybe even erased you, and you have made it something so insignificant that you can leave it out of your life story and no one will know it’s missing,” I explain.

The light in her eyes changes. It softens, becomes more luminous and she relaxes in my hold.

“You really don’t care?” she asks.

“Of course, I care. But not in the way you think. I’m sorry you lived through that. I care that you think it’s something you should be ashamed of.”

“I worry sometimes that it’s in my blood,” she whispers and clouds roll into her eyes. So, I sit down on the bed with her still in my arms.

“What is?”

“That violence. Not because I feel inclined to it. But because I always know when it’s coming. Will I pass it on? Will it suddenly rear its head?” She sounds dejected.

I squeeze her a little.

“My grandfather was a cruel man. Everyone acts like he walked on water because he donated money for a hospital and because his name was Rivers. But I know what he was. My father, for all of his failings, raised me to believe I am my own man. He sent me to Gigi to make sure Thomas wouldn’t ruin that. And as much as I resented it then, I’m very grateful for it now as an adult. Because I can see that left to Thomas, I’d probably be just like him. Forgetting that my name is more than an access card for us. It can also be one for others. There is no such thing as a generational curse. There’s intent and action.”

“Then why do you feel responsible for what Kingdom has done? Why are you spending this money and time on the flood victims?”

“Because I can. Because it’s a chance to correct the course, and I’m taking it. I’m not trying to raise people from the dead, Tesoro. Just trying to fix things going forward.”

“What if I make the same mistakes they did?” she asks.

“I hate to break it to you, Tesoro. But, you have your own flaws to worry about. You’re stubborn, impulsive, and for all your instincts about violence, you seem to walk into danger all the time. Like falling off cliffs that you go walking down at night.” I tap the tip of her nose with my finger.

“Don’t touch my nose; it’ll make me sneeze. And thanks for the praise.” She shoves my shoulder lightly.

“Tell me mine,” I ask.

“Your flaws?”

“I know ... you probably have to think really hard about it,” I joke.

“You’re possessive, cynical, and suspicious,” she says without missing a beat. I let out a bark of surprised laughter, and then I kiss her softly.

“And you’re perfect. And mine,” she adds.

A cloud breaks over us. Sun streams in, and it feels like the return from a long march, and I’m so glad to be home.

When I break the kiss, she cups my face and sighs my name.

“Yeah, that’s better. Next time you say my name, though, I want you to scream it,” I say, then stand up and throw her onto the bed.

Chapter Twenty-Six

Thunder

Confidence

I land on Hayes's mattress with a small bounce and little shriek. My heart is thudding as I push my hair out of my eyes and see him looking at me like I'm the very last meal he'll ever eat.

His nostrils flared, his eyes hot with desire, and his lips are flushed. Mine tingle, sending signals to him that they want to feel him. All of him. I've missed him more than I can say. Sex was one of the ways we communicated.

We would say "I love you," "I hate you," "I'm scared," "I'm angry" when we fuck. And now, I'm hungry to know everything he's kept from me in the time we haven't touched each other.

"Tesoro," he says huskily and pulls his shirt off. I can't believe all of that is mine. He pulls his jeans off, too, and the most beautiful cock in the world peeks out of the top of his boxers.

"Come here." I crook my finger and he lies down next to me. He slides one of his strong, warm hands up my thigh and cups my pussy.

"Fuck, you can never ever keep this from me again," he says and pinches my clit. I gasp loudly, sharply, and I rock into his hand as heat and wetness fill my panties and I press against the warmth of his palm.

He dips his head and takes my lips with his and I sob at how perfectly right it feels to have my lips in the sacred embrace of his.

"I love you so much," he whispers into my mouth. "I never want to be away from you, Tesoro. Never." He grabs the front of my blouse and yanks until the straps give ... the fabric sliding down my body sends a rush of anticipation across my skin like a river of electric shocks.

“I love you, too,” I say urgently, desperate to get these words out of the way so that I fall into his kiss and drown in the river of emotion he’s swept me away on. He gives me what we both need. He cups the back of my neck and rolls us until he’s lying on top of me, and then he slams his mouth onto mine and pushes past my lips and sweeps my mouth with his tongue. He kisses me like that and I can’t breathe. I don’t want to. I want to die with him stealing the breath from my lungs. I want to drown in him.

When he drags his lips off my mouth, he takes my lower lip with him and holds onto it with his teeth. The sting of his bite feels so good. Just like everything he gives me. Even when it hurts.

He drops his forehead onto mine. Our chests heave in unison, we breathe nose to nose, open mouth to open mouth. His eyes are shining and they hold me in a trap so exquisitely loving that I feel like I’m floating.

“I would cross galaxies for you, swim every ocean, fight dragons,” he says and his hands push my skirt up around my waist. He pushes my panties aside, wets his fingers by pressing them into my mouth and then slips his hand between us. He skims my clit with the edge of his blunt finger nail and then slides three of his big fingers into me.

I cry out at the sharp bite of my flesh stretching. He pushes them in, pulls them back out, and bends his head to my breast.

“I love seeing you like this. Your pussy is so goddamn tight, Tesoro.” He captures my nipple through the lace of my bra. He bites it and flicks the sensitive flat of it with the firm tip of his tongue.

I’m chanting his name and he finger fucks me harder, bites my swollen nipple and tears leak from the corner of my eyes as my orgasm breaks with no warning.

“Ti amo tanto,” he says against my chest and I feel the reverberation of his words in my heart.

“I love you, too,” I respond.

He kisses his way upward. His mouth is wet, his breath hot as his breathing grows more ragged.

“Sei la mia anima gemella,” he says as he parts my thighs.

“And you are mine,” I respond.

“Non posso vivere senza te,” he says and slides into me with one, deep, powerful thrust forward of his hips.

“You’ll never have to live without me,” I assure him

He grips the headboard.

“Ti fotterò così forte,” he growls.

“I don’t know what that means,” I moan when he pulls back out.

“It means I’m going to fuck you so hard ...” He bites his lip and tightens his grip on the headboard. I’m mesmerized by the flex and bulge of his big biceps over my head.

“So hard that what?”

“Let me show you,” he says and he thrusts up into me so hard my whole body slides up the mattress and the headboard rattles.

“Let me ride that wave, Tesoro,” he pulls back out of me and I smile wide, lick my dry lips and gaze up at my god of sin, my Duke of Midnight, my renaissance man, my heartbreaker, my heart fixer, my everything.

I’ll never stop falling in love with him. We make magic together.

I want to hold my breath and stop time. The feeling I have, of being enough, of being loved for all that I am, with no desire to change anything about me. With more than acceptance of the baggage I bring—with pride. I want him and this forever. Right now though, even that wouldn’t be long enough for me.

“You make me so fucking crazy.” He puts one hand on my hip and starts short, deep, hard, fast and my eyes roll to the top of my head at the intensity of his fucking. I feel like I'm being consumed.

“Sei il tesoro più prezioso che ho trovato e che vorrei custodire per sempre”

I have no idea what that means, but I remember the first time he called me Tesoro, and my heart swells. I flash back to the moment I fell in love with him. It was that night on the ledge when I was sure that I was going to die.

And my heart, facing its potential demise, made a decision. If he hadn't been there, I wouldn't have made it off that cliff. And since that night, he's owned my heart. That river will roll over the delta whenever nature commands her to without any regard for the best laid plans of mice and men. And Hayes, my river, will roll over me. And I will love him through it all because my heart has chosen him.

“I would rearrange the universe to have you,” he says, and his body flexes over me. The muscles in his shoulders and arms flex under the smooth golden-hued skin that covers his beautiful body, and his thrust is so deep and hard that I'm sure he'll split me in half.

His chest heaves and he thrusts up again.

“Rearrange me,” I sigh and he thrusts even harder.

“Shatter me,” I beg and he fucks me hard, his arms and chest flex and ripple over my head, and when I come in the most spectacular explosion of tension I've ever felt, my whole world distills to the moment that would make this act between us a covenant—a promise.

He grunts into my neck and drills me into the mattress.

Yes, I will never get enough of this.

He lifts onto his knees and grips the headboard, his lower lips trapped between his teeth, his body moving like a machine between my thighs—fast, hard and unrelenting—until he throws his head and shouts my name between grunts.

He pulls out and spurts on my stomach and thighs. “I claim you,” he pants, before he slides back into me.

Our come mingles and smears between our sweaty bodies. I lift my hips and press us together. My orgasm's aftershocks are still sending dancing, shimmering shivers of electricity through me.

Then Hayes drops his big body onto the bed next to me, and a huge cracking sound is our only warning before the entire bed collapses beneath us.

We lay on the sunken mattress and stare at each other before we burst out into laughter.

Then, as if in response to our mirth, the splatter of rain starts to beat on the window.

"It was raining during our first time in Italy," I remind him.

"Because thunder only happens when it's raining," he croons the hook to the Fleetwood Mac classic in my ear. "And I promise you, this is the only place where we'll make this kind of noise. In our home, there will always be peace, You'll always be safe," he whispers and pulls me into his arms.

And then he rolls me over, slides back into me, and we make a storm of our own.

Chapter Twenty-Seven

Surprise

Confidence

Two Weeks Later

“Hey, I’m heading to Sweet and Lo’s after my appointment at Blush. Want to meet me for coffee?” I whisper in Hayes’s ear. His eyes are closed, but he’s been awake for at least five minutes. I heard the change in his breathing when I stepped out of my bathroom. I let him pretend, though, so he could watch me. I got dressed right in front of him. His broad, sun-darkened, muscular shoulders twitched when I slipped my panties on, but otherwise, he hasn’t moved.

I inhale the scent of his sleep and sweat and our sex, and I want to get back into bed with him. But I have an appointment at Blush where it’s very hard to get an appointment. It’s one of Houston’s premier hair salons. The hair stylist, Tanaka, is one of the most sought-after stylists and colorists in the country, and she had a cancellation four weeks ago that bumped me up on the waitlist. And no way am I missing it, not even for a morning ride on Hayes’s gloriously thick dick.

“Yeah, I’ll meet you.” His sleep-roughened voice is sexy, and the way his mouth moves as he forms his words is something I could sit and watch all day.

“What time?” he asks sleepily into his pillow.

I glance at my watch and do some quick math. “Maybe around eleven a.m.?” I say.

One of his eyes pops open and he peers at the alarm clock by my bed and flips over, wide-eyed to stare at me.

“Are you having a quadruple bypass? Why does it take four hours to get your hair done?” he asks. I smack his shoulders, and then my hand goes back for a more tender caress of the skin that’s wrapped around the love of my life.

“I don’t have time to explain. Go back to sleep. You put in some good work last night. You must be tired.” I stand to leave.

His long, sculpted arm darts out, and he wraps his fingers around my wrist. I lean in for a kiss and think if I skip my stop for coffee, I’ll have time for a quick little something—not that there’s ever been anything quick and little about sex with Hayes.

The thought of coffee turns my stomach so violently that I pull back right before our lips touch and sit back down.

“You okay?” he asks. His eyes are only half open, and those beautiful wild hazel eyes, are full of real concern.

“Yeah, I’m fine. I don’t know what the hell, I just felt a little sick when I thought about coffee, which is crazy cause I can’t imagine how I’d get through the day without it.”

“Get back into bed, and I’ll give you the other thing you can’t get through the day without.” He tugs me back to him.

“No. If I don’t get this appointment, I’ll be in a bad mood until I get my hair done by her, and that’s at least a month away, if I’m lucky,” I tell him grouchily, but only because his offer is so tempting.

“I think your hair looks amazing,” he says.

“Because you’re a man and you’re fucking me. You probably don’t remember what color the hair on my head is unless I’m standing in front of you,” I joke and stand up again.

“I’m insulted. You have no idea how much time I spend thinking about your hair. Wrapped around my fists when you’re on your knees in front of me. Draped around my hips when your lips are wrapped around my cock. Falling down around me when you’re riding me ...”

“Not when it’s blowing in the wind while we stroll?” I ask and shake my head in feigned disappointment

“What fun would that be?” he asks. His grin is so wide and happy. I snap a picture of him with my phone and stare at it a beat before I look back at him. His eyes are sparkling, his morning stubble is dark and heavy, and his smile is full of contentment that I put there.

“No fun at all,” I agree before I turn to leave.

“Come back to bed,” he calls after.

“Now way. I can’t be late for this. I’ll see you soon. Bye.” I chuck a peace sign at him and then walk happily out the door.

“Well, well, well,” the dark-haired, olive skinned, handsome man behind the reception desk at Blush drawls in the most beautiful baritone I’ve ever heard.

I stop and look over my shoulder to find who he could be talking to. Because it can’t be me. There’s nothing interesting enough about me to warrant that intrigued look on his face. There’s no one there. I turn back to face him and plaster a confused smile on my face. “Are you talking to me?” I ask.

His jaw drops. His eyes bug out of his head, he slaps his cheeks and then he shrieks.

Loudly.

I spin on my heel to get the hell out of there.

“Wait, wait, wait,” he calls in that baritone again and in a display of super human speed, he’s behind me with a hand on my shoulder, stopping me.

“Where are you going?” he asks with an amused chuckle.

“Why’d you scream?” I ask him angrily and fold my arms across my chest while I wait for him to respond.

“Because you look like Jayne Mansfield, who is like, my favorite actress of all time, and then you open your mouth and sound like Dolly Parton, who is my favorite singer of all time,” he explains.

“I love and respect Dolly like any good Southerner, but I do not sound like her and I don’t know who Jayne is.”

He actually steps back, grips his chin thoughtfully and studies my chest, “Hmmm, I’m telling you. If we brightened up that blonde all over and gave you one more bra cup, you’d be a dead ringer,” he says.

“This is probably the strangest conversation I’ve ever had in my life,” I say.

“It’s not strange.” He pouts. “They’re my idols. It’s like Dolly Parton and Jayne Mansfield had a baby and sent her to deliver me from an ordinary existence.” He claps his hands together repeatedly in my face.

I smile and step around him.

“Oh, I see. You’re crazy.” I point at him with a knowing smile.

“Totally, sister, and I ain’t afraid to show it.” He winks and then we both laugh.

“I’m Noé.” He sticks out his hand to introduce himself.

I shake his big, warm, very soft hand. “What hand lotion do you use and where can I get some?”

“Oh, it’s my own special blend,” he says with a wink, and I pull my hand out of his.

“Are you making a sexual innuendo that implies that your special blend is your spunk? ‘Cause, if so, that is so nasty,” I say.

“Nasty? Oh, sweet baby Jesus. You said nasty and you sound just like Dolly! Please tell me you’re a customer and you’re going to come in at least once a week.” He throws his head back dramatically.

“I might come back once a week if this is the reception I get. I feel special,” I say with a cheeky smile.

“You are special. And hot to trot, too. But, we can’t stand here gabbing all day. Tanaka is a stickler for time, even for too-hot-to-trot blonde bombshells with great tits.” He gives me an exaggerated wink and grin, grabs me by the elbow, and leads me to the receptionist desk.

I'm totally charmed by him. People who can talk to anyone amaze me.

"What time is your appointment?" he asks as he leads me back to the reception desk.

"It's at seven-thirty. Color, cut, and blow out," I say, excitedly.

"Okay. I'm going to need you to fill out all the paperwork again," he says and hands me a clipboard.

I look down at the stack of papers and recognize the first one. "I filled these out online when I made my appointment. Why did you have me do it if I was going to have to do it again?" I say and look at him quizzically. This is one of my biggest pet peeves, so my good humor fizzles.

He frowns sympathetically, either ignoring or missing my irritation. "I'm sorry. But your submission was all messed up. Your name was off, so we thought there might be other errors. I made the executive decision to delete it and have you do it again." He pats my hand in more misguided sympathy. "Since we're worried about the time, just fill out that top form, okay? You can do the rest while you're under the dryer with your foils." He winks.

I purse my lips but fill out the form quickly. "Filling out redundant forms will not get between me and the magician who's going to be like the miller's daughter in Rumpelstiltskin and turn this hay into gold," I say and then cringe at the high-pitched fangirl tone in my voice. "Sorry," I mutter to Noé without looking up at him.

"No problem, Dolly. She's a legend and we get people in here acting like they're about to be baptized. You're tame. For now. Wait till you get done with your hair, you'll be like one of those television pastors. It's why our advertising budget is zero," he says proudly.

I hand him the paper, and he frowns. He blinks up at me and then looks back at the paper and says, "Your name is Confidence?" he asks.

“Yes. I know it’s unusual, weird, whatever. But it’s mine,” I say.

“I erased your e-submission because I thought it was an error. What a fucking fabulous name,” he says.

“Thank you,” I grin.

“But, I’m still calling you Dolly ‘cause that is how I’ll always think of you,” he says.

“Fair enough. There are a lot worse things than being named after an idol,” I agree.

“Okay, come on back. Let me get you settled in Tanaka’s chair. We book our clients so everyone has thirty minutes where they have her exclusive attention. Since it’s your first time, she’ll have a lot of questions. I’ll get you some champagne to sip while you’re chatting,” he says.

“I was thinking more like coffee,” I say and then swallow down the saliva that floods my mouth at the word. “Or maybe something that’s more suitable for morning consumption,” I say.

“I’ll add orange juice to your mimosa,” he says and walks me back to the room where one chair sits facing a full-wall mirror. Next to it is a small stand cluttered with flat irons, brushes, and bottles of product.

“Have a seat. Tanaka will be here in less than a minute.” He pats my shoulder lightly and turns to leave. “I’ll be back with your mimosa. I squeeze the juice fresh, so it will be a few,” and then he disappears through a door in the back of the room.

I stare at myself in the mirror. Do I really look like Dolly Parton? I mean, I’m blonde, short, bigger-than-average breasts, bigger-than-average ass, tiny waist that I inherited from my father. My hair is unruly, but that’s because I haven’t washed it in two days and haven’t brushed it in a day. My bare shorts-clad legs dangle several inches off the floor, the toes of my Top-Siders barely skim it when I try to reach. My stomach grumbles, and I put a hand over it. I should have eaten breakfast. I wonder if I could bribe someone to run across to Sweet and Lo's for one of their ridiculously perfect almond croissants.

"Hey, I am Tanaka," a loud, lyrical voice sings, yes, sings at me just before a very tall, very beautiful woman steps through the same door Noé had left through. She looks like Tara from True Blood, even down to the black leather jeans hugging her endlessly long legs.

"Hello ..." I do my best Adele impersonation.

"Tsk, tsk, tsk," she shakes her head. "Only I sing," she says pleasantly, but firmly.

"As it should be," I admit.

"Your hair is a disaster," she scolds. "What a waste of beautiful cuticles. You do not take care of it," she says and picks up a few strands of my hair. She pulls a little magnifying glass out of her pocket and holds my hair under it.

"What is this color at the end?" she demands, dropping the lock of hair unceremoniously before taking a step back to eye me closely.

"That's my color. I've just got through growing out a terrible brown I got from some online company that has since disappeared."

"Are you saying that's your natural color?" she asks, disbelief plain in her voice.

"Yes, it is. Why?"

"I've been trying to mix a blonde just this shade for the last six years, and I've never managed to get it quite like this." She picks the hair up again and strokes it. She slides her hand closer to my roots and says, "This color, though, it needs some help. I saw you want a color, cut, blow out?"

"Yes," I say.

"Okay, well, you've got such heavy hair, I think we should cut about five inches from the back and maybe seven from the front," she says casually.

“Um, no. I was thinking maybe half an inch off the ends,” I say.

“Well, if that’s what you want, there are about eight chain hair salons within two miles of here. Go there. They can do that. You do not need me for that,” she says, and I jump out of my seat.

“No, I don’t want to go there. But I don’t want to cut all my hair off,” I say.

“Why not?” she asks like it’s a true puzzle.

“Because that’s not what I had in mind, and you can’t expect me to just say okay when you’re talking about cutting my hair up to shoulders,” I say.

“Trust me. If you do not like it, I will do your hair for you every single week for a year and not charge you a single cent,” she says.

“Really?” I ask in surprise.

“You will love it. But yes, in case you’re truly an idiot, I will abide by my word and put up with having a person with bad taste in my chair every week for a year without getting paid a penny,” she says.

“Okay, although somehow that doesn’t sound like it would be very much fun,” I say.

“Oh, it would be a lot of fun. I do not take orders. I style what I see. The heads of hair that lead you here are all my vision—not what those men and women walked in and demanded. So, if you want to keep this long towel of hair on your head, you can go find someone else to help you with that. But I will never give you another appointment, so think carefully before you leave,” she says.

“God, you’re ruthless,” I say. I look in the mirror. I lift my hair off my neck and turn my head to look at my profile.

“It wouldn’t be that short. Your neck isn’t long enough to make that flattering,” she says.

“Please think nothing for my tender feelings, pick me apart, I can take it,” I say.

“Did you come for flattery or because you want to walk out of here looking like the very best version of yourself?”

“The latter. I’m ready. Do what you will.”

“You’ll be happy. My motto is if you leave pretty, you’ll come often. And I’ve only had two clients in twenty years leave here unhappy. And they were both insane.” She says this with a straight face.

“I’m ready. Do what you will,” I say in resignation.

“Excellent.” She claps her bejeweled hands together. I look past her into the mirror and say a silent goodbye to my hair.

“Let me ask you some questions before we go ahead with the color,” she says and pulls a small piece of paper out of her pocket. “DOB, April 25, 1990.” She glances up at me. “You need to start using eye cream. You’ve got the beginnings of fine lines that no twenty-eight-year-old should have,” she says and then glances back down.

“Yeah, just have at my ego, I wasn’t going to use it today, anyway,” I say.

“That was just advice from woman to woman. I’ve got melanin on my side, but I’ve been using eye cream since I was fifteen. I’m forty-five and look the same age as you,” she says with a shrug. “If you want to age terribly, feel free to ignore me,” she says.

I smile stiffly and make a mental note to visit Sephora before the weekend is out.

“When was your last period?” she asks. “You left that blank.” She points at the paper when I don’t answer.

“I didn’t realize that was a required question.” I frown.

“Well, there’s all this hysteria about pregnancy and hair dye, so I always ask to make sure you’re not possibly pregnant because there’s a general consensus that you don’t dye your hair until the second trimester,” she says.

“Well I’m on the pill, so ...” I say.

“Okay, great, so when was your last period?”

“Hmm, let me see. I keep track of it, so let me go see when I last wrote it in,” I say, and I pull my phone out of my purse and look at my calendar. And start scrolling.

I scroll back to September, scan the calendar and realize there’s no entry for the week my period usually shows up.

“Huh,” I say and go back to August and see the same. I look back at July and see the dates.

“Um, July 28th,” I say. And when she just stares at me, I throw my head back against the chair.

“No. I’m not,” I say unequivocally.

“Why? Are you celibate?” she asks.

“No, but I’m on birth control,” I say, and it sounds more like a plea than a statement.

“Then that baby really wanted you to be its mama.” She points at my very flat stomach and shrugs.

“How can you sound so cheery?” I snap.

“Cause I’m not the one who’s unexpectedly pregnant,” she says.

“I’m not pregnant,” I insist.

“Well, one way to find out.” She turns around and yanks open a drawer on her little stand of tools. She turns around and holds up a pregnancy test.

“Why in the world do you have pregnancy tests in your drawer?” I ask and stare at her wild-eyed.

“Ain’t I a hairdresser?” she asks impatiently. “Do you know how many times a week I see that deer-in-the-headlights look that’s on your face right now? I ask this ten times a day. Just go back to the bathroom and get it done.”

“No. I am not taking a pregnancy test just because I forgot to write down my period last month,” I say and put my hands up to ward her off. How is it possible for my stomach to feel heavy and flutter at the same time? My heart is racing, and my skin is tingling. I can’t even think straight.

“Okay, but I can’t color your hair today,” I say.

“Of course, you can,” I cry in desperation. This can’t be happening.

She sighs. “Let me be more deliberate with my word choice,” she says slowly. “I won’t color your hair today. Not unless you pee on that stick, and it’s negative,” she announces.

“Okay, fine. Don’t color my hair. I’ll get the cut and the blow out,” I say and watch her drop the test back in the drawer. I have a moment of regret where I think I should have just taken it, but I can’t do it.

Noé walks in with the mimosa on a small silver tray he’s carrying like it’s a tray of crown jewels.

“Good Lord, did you grow the oranges yourself?” she asks.

“So sorry, I had to run out to Randall’s to get the oranges. We were out,” he says and he drops the mimosa down in front of me. I pick it up and start to take a sip and my stomach grumbles. And I know I’m not pregnant. But I put it down because if I am, it would be very irresponsible to drink it without having proof. The thought of a baby—Hayes’s baby—inside of me makes me dizzy. But, at the trailing tip of the whirlwind of disbelief, panic, worry, doubt, and surprise is a bolt of joy.

Hayes.

His baby. I close my eyes and see a bundle with silky chocolate curls and glittering topaz hazel eyes.

“Come, let’s go back to the bowl,” she says and starts to stand me up.

“I’ve changed my mind,” I say before I can talk myself out of it. “I want to take it,” I say and stick my hand out.

“Okay, here you go,” she says and then points me in the direction of the bathroom.

Chapter Twenty-Eight

Distracted

Hayes

“Hayes, good morning,” Amelia’s graver-than-normal voice makes me wish I had ignored her call. I finish tying the laces of my sneakers and sit down on the bed.

“Your voice makes me think there’s nothing good about this particular Saturday morning, so let’s just cut straight to the chase,” I tell her.

“Your uncle and stepmother are mounting a petition to have you ousted as chairman of the board,” she says.

“You’re kidding,” I say and drop my forehead into my hand. That rat faced motherfucker. I’ve been treating him with kid gloves. But they’re about to come off.

“Hayes?” Amelia calls my name when I don’t say anything more.

“Can they do it?” I ask.

“Well, yes. Clearly, because they have,” she says.

“No, I mean, is there a way to remove me? I thought it was a position I held until death,” I said.

“Normally, that is the case. But there’s a clause for removal if you are unfit to hold the role. That is the clause they have evoked,” she says.

“Unfit?” I breathe into the phone in complete indignation. “In what way? By what measure?” I demand.

“By reason of illegitimacy,” she says slowly. Meaningfully.

“Illegitimacy?” I ask.

“Yes. Hayes. They’re demanding a DNA test and I would suggest you comply without any protest.”

“I don’t understand,” I say. “A DNA test for what? That would only help them if I wasn’t my father’s son,” I say angrily.

Amelia is silent.

“Are they implying I’m not my father’s son?” I demand an answer, but my throat is dry and my heart is beating faster now.

“That’s exactly what they’re implying,” she says.

“Based on what?”

“Based on what they say is a discrepancy between your mother’s medical records and death certificate. I don’t know what that means, do you?” she asks pointedly.

“Of course not. That’s ridiculous. I’ll take the DNA test today. Shut this shit down now and then I’m done playing nice with him,” I say.

“Okay. You can be done playing nice with him. But Hayes, is there any way at all, that the paternity test could come back anything other than what you expect? This is an extraordinary move they’ve made. If it’s a Hail Mary, it’s a hell of a gamble.”

“I have a birth certificate with my parents’ names on it. I have the same blood type. I look just like my father and my grandfather. This is ridiculous. It’s an attempt to embarrass me. Send me the details on when and where I can take the test. The sooner the better and I want those results expedited.” I glance down at my watch. I’m late meeting Confidence, and I almost want to text her and ask her to meet me back at her place, but I’m not going to let this asshole ruin more than he’s already tried to.

“I’ll send you the court order. I advise you to go to a random lab instead of your doctor for the test. Just to avoid any questions about tampering or manipulation of their process.”

“Fine. I’ll be looking for it. I’ve gotta go,” I say before I hang up.

I should have thanked her. That couldn’t have been an easy call to make. My mind is reeling. My uncle must really hate me to have done this. A paternity test. It's ridiculous.

And yet ... my mind is not easy. I have a kernel of dread in my gut that I will ignore until I don't have to. But it's burrowed itself into the lining of my life; its sharp, thorn-like tip burns as it embeds itself into the story of my life. And with every step I take, it burrows deeper and it feeds on years of being denied my rightful place at the head of this family. I've been too soft. I've been distracted by my feelings. I feel a wash of shame. I've had my eye off the ball trying to win Confidence back. I should have seen this coming. I let a woman pull me off course once, and I lost pieces of my legacy that my father scarified for. And I'm letting it happen again.

"But, she's not just a woman," my better angels remind me. I ignore them. I can't let this happen again.

I rush out the door, already late to meet Confidence but slowing my steps because I'm not ready for what I need to do. When I think of what my uncle's shit is about to cost me ... the kernel in my gut pops and the blooms are soaked in shock, resentment, and rage.

Chapter Twenty-Nine

Too Late

Confidence

I glance at my phone for the third time. Hayes is never late. But, it's Saturday. I was a little nebulous about the time, he just erred on the other side of eleven o'clock. I turn around and look at my hair again. She didn't do a permanent color, but she rinsed it with a golden blonde that makes it look like spun gold in the light. She cut it so it skims my shoulders. I feel naked and cold. But my face looks more ... I don't know ... visible.

I'm pregnant.

I stare at my reflection and try to see how I'm different. I must be different. Right?

Hayes and I blended our cells together to create a miracle. I think I'm in love already and all I've seen is a blue line. Hayes's DNA has coalesced with mine. That little amalgamation of us has burrowed into my womb and will take from me, blood and marrow. Teeth and bone. And a life will grow from it. I'm falling in love at the speed of light with a blue line. I do what I have been too afraid to since I took four pregnancy tests in the bathroom of Blush. I laugh.

I want to wait and get a blood test before I tell Hayes, but I'm not sure that I can. There's not a single solitary cell in my body that expects him to be anything less than jubilant when I tell him. We are in such a good place. The litigation with Kingdom is moving along, but so are his side-by-side efforts to help alleviate the suffering of his tenants while they're in legal limbo. I've watched him write checks from his personal account this week that, no matter how much money he has, must have stung a little. But he's smiled every time he's paid for something that makes their lives easier. And he's doing it all anonymously. He doesn't want the attention, and he doesn't want to cause any friction with Kingdom's board. It has just been one more thing about this man who makes me feel like he would move mountains to be with me. I feel the same way.

I can't wait to tell him what we've done together.

"Well, look what we have here," a voice from beside me calls, and my blood freezes in my veins. I turn my head slowly and take in the tall, dark blond, handsome man whose beautiful smile hides a black, devious heart.

"Barry," I say flatly and curl my lip in disgust.

"Confidence," he drawls like he's making a joke.

"What are you doing here?" I ask.

"It's a public place. Or did you have the entire town blacklist me?" He glowers at me.

"I didn't have anyone do anything. You running around ranting about feminazis and conspiracies did that."

"That mouth of yours is only good for one thing. And talking isn't it," he says.

I roll my eyes at him. "Was that supposed to offend me? Make me cry? Make me care?" I ask with contempt and malice and disgust. "You're pathetic," I spit at him.

His expression loses any pretense of charm, and he pushes himself off the window he was leaning on and walks over to me, clearly thinking he can intimidate me.

"You didn't think I was pathetic when you worked for me," he says.

"No, I didn't. But I was also clearly suffering from a clear case of extreme slumming. I'm all better now and I see you for exactly what you are," I say with a smile. I turn and start down the narrow alley that runs between Blush and Twist. I stop as soon as I realize I'm walking away from people. Away from the light and out of sight. I can hear him rushing to catch up with me. It takes everything I have to not run. I try to reach into my purse for my phone so I can call Hayes, or 9-1-1. But, my hands are trembling.

I smell it on him like I did my Dad. He's in the mood to hurt someone, and I just walked down a fucking alley. His hand closes on my arm and spins me around to face him.

"Let me go, Barry!" I yell, and he hustles me farther down the alley.

"I'm just getting started." He leans forward and puts his face in mine. "And maybe if you ask nicely, once he's done with you, I'd be willing to give you a—" My hand flies out and up before I can stop to think. The crack of my palm against his cheek and the burst of white-hot pain at the contact make me feel like I detonated a bomb.

He grabs my wrist with one hand and my chin with the other. "You fucking bitch," he grinds out into my ear. He presses his body into the back of mine and I hate myself for the sob that escapes me when his erection presses into my back. He presses his lips to my ear and whispers, "You're lucky you've got that body. Why don't you show me what you showed Wilde and Rivers that's got them so hot and bothered over you?" He grinds into me, and I scream. Loudly enough that it bounces off the dark, stone walls. He covers my mouth with his hand, but not before I can bare my teeth and bite down on his palm. I almost gag at the musty, salty taste of his skin in my mouth. But it does the trick. He lets go and I break into a run. I only get two feet before he's got me back in his iron tight grip.

The skin on my arm burns as he struggles to hold onto me. I kick him and scream, at the top of my lungs, "Hayes!" before his hand is back over my mouth and his hot breath all over my face. "You think he'll care what happens to you?" He throws me against the wall and steps between my legs. "I'm going to fuck that cockiness right out of you," he says and starts unbuckling his pants.

And I start fighting for my life. His hand is still pressed to my face, and now he's pressing so hard that I can't open my mouth to bite him or breathe.

I kick, punch, fight, slap. I might as well be fighting an eight-foot wave. He completely overwhelms me. I close my eyes and wail in my throat and beg God to make it stop. I feel his penis, hard and heavy, pressing against the bare skin of my inner thigh, and I think about Hayes and my baby and I want to die. I sob helplessly into his hand and hope he kills me when he's done. I left Arkansas to escape violent men, and he's managed to find me anyway.

A loud roar comes out of nowhere and cuts through the ringing in my head and then, I'm falling. His body is yanked free of mine, and I land with a thud on my ass, and look over to see Hayes on top of Barry. His fists are flying and making contact with sickening thuds and crunches of skin and bone. "You motherfucking piece of shit!" he yells in between his arm's wild swings.

I run to him, to try and make him stop. I'm afraid he'll kill him. But he's in a rage and doesn't hear me. I run back to the top of the alley and scream for help at the top of my lungs before the tsunami of emotions overwhelms me and I faint.

Chapter Thirty

Helpless

Hayes

“I wanted to talk to you before you went out there. Confidence is waiting,” Amelia says.

“What is it?” I ask and finish buttoning my shirt. I’m being released from the courthouse jail where I’ve spent most of the day.

She sighs and leans back against the wall. “Well, I have good news and bad news. What do you want first?” she asks.

“The good, please,” I say. “Maybe the sun will explode as soon as you’re done with the good news, killing us all in the process. And you’ll never get a chance to tell me the bad news.”

“Are you drunk?” she asks after a beat of silence.

“I’ve been in jail. The only thing I’ve had to get drunk on is the clusterfuck juice of my life. Give me the good news first,” I repeat.

“The DA isn’t pressing charges against you.”

“I wish he would,” I snap.

“Hayes, that is your anger talking,” she says like I’m being tedious.

“I want as many opportunities to tell the world what a piece of shit Barry Jimenez is. And if standing trial for defending my woman would give me just one more chance to tell everyone, I’d do it.”

“A trial would be a disaster for you right now. All of the rebuilding of the Rivers name will go down the drain,” she minds me.

“I don’t care,” I say.

“You should,” she snaps. “Here’s the bad news. Your uncle has petitioned the board for your removal, without regard for the DNA results,” she says.

“The fuck he did!” I shout and spin around to face her. “What? How? Can they do that?” I ask in alarm.

“Yes. They can. There’s a clause added by your grandfather about thirty years ago that gives them the right to do this.”

“What does it say? This clause?”

“In the event that the actions of the chairman materially damage the social standing of the organization or cause a negative light to be cast on the family’s reputation that their ability to lead the board could be questioned or challenged. Your uncle and stepmother are doing that.”

“Is this about that asshole who attacked my girlfriend?” I ask angrily.

“This is about you having to be pulled off him after breaking his ribs, his nose, and knocking out one of his teeth,” she explains.

“Well, the DA hasn’t pressed charges,” I say.

“But Mr. Jimenez is suing you civilly, Hayes. For a lot of money,” she says.

“I don’t really give a shit about the money. You think I was going to stand there, watch him put his hands on my woman, try to rape her, and just kindly ask him to stop? You’re out of your mind, and he’s lucky I didn’t fucking kill him. If I ever see his ass again, I might,” I tell her.

“Don’t say that out loud. Because if he ends up dead, whether he had a heart attack or died in a plane crash, you won’t be able to stop the rumor from suggesting you had something to do with it. You have extraordinary power. Access to an almost limitless amount of money. It wouldn’t be far-fetched to think you’d dispose of an enemy and try to make it look like natural causes. So, do not talk like that to anyone,” she says.

“Fuck that motherfucker and the law that allows him to turn himself into the victim here,” I spit out.

“Well, now he’s cooperating with your uncle. And they are coming for you hard. I’m going to file for a temporary restraining order on the action to remove you. I don’t expect it will be granted, but at the very least it will force them to present whatever evidence they have against you in their little coup d’état. That is what this is. It is full out war. They want you gone, and they’ll do it by any means necessary,” she says.

“I think you’re overreacting. They want money, not my life,” I brush her off.

“Don’t dismiss it. It’s not just money. It’s control of the entire Rivers family line and future. They want it. I want you to keep your head down. And you’re going to like what I have to say next even less,” she says.

“That is a very high bar you just set. What could be worse?”

“I want you to put some distance between you and Confidence,” she says.

“Fuck. No,” I say immediately. I feel a flush of guilt when I remember that I had even considered the same thing myself. I close my eyes to push down the rage that threatens to consume me when I remember the scene I walked in on. Her against the wall. Him between her legs. Hurting her. My stomach roils.

“No way. Are you kidding? You want me to stay away from my woman so that punk ass uncle of mine can have what he wants? No fucking way,” I say.

“No, I want you to stay away from her, so he can’t use her to get to you. He knows she matters to you, and that makes her a target. Make him think you’ve broken up. Just until it goes away. The petition he filed has rules. I’m filing the TRO today. It’ll be denied. We’ll have seven days to respond. Just think about it,” she urges me in that intense whisper she does when she’s trying to be persuasive. But I don’t need persuading.

“I’m sick of this, and I’m ready for it to be over,” I tell her.

“Good. We’re going to need to spend all week getting our response together. Now, the DNA results will come back before then, and depending on their outcome—”

“Why do I get the impression, Amelia, that you’re worried about the results?” I cut her off.

She stares at the floor. Her silence is alarming.

I press her.

“Tell me. Now,” I say. “What do you know?”

“Nothing, Hayes. I don’t know anything. But I’m worried because Swish told me something before he died—right before he died.”

“What?”

“He said, ‘Hayes is his ...’ and that was all. I don’t know what ‘his’ meant. I didn’t even make anything of it because he was so close to the end, and he’d been in and out of consciousness for two days. I have always thought they were the words of his dying mind. Until ...”

“Until my uncle brought this up.” Understanding dawns. “Shit. You think somehow, he raised me as his own, but I’m not?” I ask her.

“Honestly, until today, I did think just that. I was sure that the test would come back proving you were not your father’s son. But him filing this second motion, to have you removed, says he’s not one hundred percent sure of his position. Otherwise, he would just let the DNA test results take you out. That’s why I want to try and buy you as much good will as possible. If you are his son, then I want you to be able to fight the other charges. It’s important that you maintain an unimpeachable public reputation.”

“No, I need to focus on maintaining my unimpeachable private reputation. The woman I love and who I plan on asking to spend the rest of my life with was almost raped today. I don’t care if I get to be the chairman of the board of a company that would turn its back on people who have been harmed by its negligence. I don’t. That will not be my legacy. I have my own money. I have my own fucking name. And I have a woman who I love more than anything that I need to keep safe. I need to focus on that right now,” I tell her.

“I think distance could keep her safe. And you, too.” I dismiss her and decide to end the conversation because I’m desperate to get to Confidence and see how she’s feeling. I take my keys, phone, and wallet from the small envelope they brought in with my clothes.

“Let me know what the DNA test says, Amelia. But honestly, I am about done with this family and its shit. I’m not the head of it. I’m just the next in a line of men who have been puppets controlled by the whims of a man who has been dead for a hundred years. That doesn’t make me a ruler or king or leader. I’m just filler.”

“Hayes, don’t make hasty decisions.”

“I’m not making any decisions. For once in my life, I just really don’t give a shit,”

I tell her and walk out.

She’s waiting on a bench by the back door that leads to the exit. She’s curled up, her legs tucked underneath her, her hands wedged between her thighs. Her head is bent. She looks so small, and as I get closer the bruises he left on her become visible.

My gut knots. The door slams shut behind me and she looks up in my direction, her eyes wide at first and then softening with relief when she sees me.

“Hey, baby,” I say as I start toward her. She jumps off the bench and runs toward me. Her arms are pumping, her hair flies behind her, and her face is a mask of determination as she launches herself into my open arms.

“Hayes,” she breathes my name into my neck. She’s trembling and squeezing my neck so tightly that I almost can’t breathe. But I would rather die than let her go. My heart is in my throat as I stand there with her in my arms. Her heart thuds against my chest and she cries quietly. Her tears soak my t-shirt and I feel frustrated at my powerlessness.

“I’ve been so scared, Hayes,” she whispers against my neck.

“I’m so sorry, Tesoro.” My ribs feel two sizes too small for my body.

She's been alone all day. I hate that she felt a moment of fear. I hate that she had to worry about me on top of all of that.

I walk us out just like that to the SUV that Amelia ordered for me. It's nearly two in the morning and the few reporters who are still hanging around waiting for me to be released are snoozing when we step out. They all wake up when the door closes, but the driver has the door to my car open and we're inside before more than a few camera flashes catch us.

As soon as the door closes, I raise the privacy screen. I try to put her down on the seat next to me, but she won't let go. She's trembling. I cup her face and find her cheeks wet with tears.

Cold dread fills me. I thought I'd gotten there in time.

"Baby, did he ...?" I can't bring myself to finish the question.

"No." She shakes her head. In the dark of the car, I can't see her face, so I reach up to turn on the overhead lights. She puts a hand on mine and says, "please, don't,"

"Why?" I bring my arm down and cup her cheek. She nestles her face and her breath brushes my skin in warm puffs. "I'm just so happy to be with you. That you came for me. It was fucking awful. I haven't been that scared in a very long time," she whispers.

"Oh, baby." I feel so fucking useless.

"So, thank you, Hayes. You've saved me twice now," she says and then climbs down from my lap. She rests her head on my shoulder and by the time we're pulling up to the valet at The Ivy, she's fast asleep. I carry her up to her apartment.

She doesn't stir as I put her in bed. I lock her door behind me and tell the doorman that no one should be allowed up without her okay. Then, I get into the back of my waiting car.

In the dark of the car, I cry. Like I haven't since I was a boy. Not a sobbing cry, but hitched breaths and watery, greedy gulps of air, while my chest heaves under the weight of everything that has happened in the last twenty-four hours. By the time I get home, I'm spent.

Chapter Thirty-One

Wounded

Confidence

Since the terrible incident in Rivers Wilde, my life has been lived in hectic, noisy spaces that fall between crying jags, snatches of fitful sleep, police interviews, and worry. I went to work that Monday, despite my bruises and aches. I had nothing to be ashamed of, and I had a lot of work to do.

The pro-Barry movement has lost most of its members. But, the few loyal ones who don't seem to care that he tried to rape me in broad daylight don't try to hide their contempt. On top of that, we hit a real roadblock in the class-action suit against Kingdom. The class is divided. A lot of them want to settle. And there's talk about them breaking away to form their own suit.

Oh, and I'm officially pregnant. I went to see my doctor after getting slammed up against that wall and they did a blood test. It's official. I'm due on the 28th of May. I'm ten weeks along and I have an ultrasound picture tucked into my purse. Hayes and I have been talking every day, but that's it. He's been busy every time I've tried to see him. I thought he needed some space like I did. But, now I'm worried that he's avoiding me.

While he had been in custody after his arrest, Amelia had filled me in on what happened that morning and why he'd been late to meet me in the first place.

The memory of that night, knowing that he's alone while dealing with what happened in the alley as well as the prospect that he is not his father's son, has torn at me and kept me awake every night since I saw him.

I was starting to feel frustrated because I had been through an ordeal, too—a big one, and I didn't have my best friend's shoulder to cry on. I was pregnant and hadn't told him because I hadn't had the chance to. He hasn't answered his phone all day.

Amelia called me this evening to say she had the DNA results but couldn't reach Hayes. She said she was headed to his house, so I asked her to bring me with her. And here we are.

"This isn't a good idea," Amelia says for the fourth time in the last two minutes.

"Maybe not. But if things go wrong, I'll handle it," I tell her.

"You can't handle a man that size. What if he loses it again?" she asks.

I reach up and punch on the overhead light in her car.

"If you make one more comment about Hayes that implies he's a danger to me or dangerous at all, I will make sure he fires you," I tell her.

Her eyes narrow and she leans forward. "I've served this family for years. Swish himself trained me. I'd like to see you try to get rid of me," she says coldly.

"No. You wouldn't," I tell her honestly. "I don't hold back when it comes to him. And if you believe any of that shit his ex-wife spewed about him, you don't deserve to lick his boots, much less to be on his payroll," I growl at her.

Her eyes widen and she leans back. "I'm glad you've got so much backbone. You're going to need it. I don't know what's in that envelope, but if it's not good, things could get ugly," she says somberly. Her eyes are so grave and my heart sinks.

I glance up at Hayes's house. There are no signs of life inside. But I know he's there and I need to get to him.

"Let me just say this—since you don't seem to know—he would never touch me or anyone who couldn't defend themselves against him. He's not a bully or an abusive man. Sure, he's an asshole sometimes, but that's how he's managed to survive in this cesspool of humanity he was born into. I'm his second chance. He's mine. No matter what the results say, we'll be fine because that's what we do. I've been preparing myself, it'll be okay. You can leave."

"Okay," she says quickly, easily, and with a touch of relief.

"Okay. Give me the envelope and then get out of here. I'll find my way back or Hayes will bring me. Either way, tomorrow we get to work on taking that uncle of his down," I say and wait for her to nod.

"God help the person who comes up against the two of you. You're like two sides of the same coin," she says, her voice full of marvel.

"That's right," I affirm, glad that she finally sees it. "God help them."

I open the car door, turn around to give her one last reassuring smile and say, "I'll see you tomorrow."

I decide to knock first. But after three knocks, with two minutes between each, there is still no answer. So I use the key and let myself in.

The house is quiet. The ticking of a wall clock, the hum of a subzero fridge, the whir and click of the air conditioning coming on and the chirp of what sounds like hundreds of cicadas fill the otherwise still, dark house.

"Hayes," I call. There's no resounding echo, none of the certainty that comes knowing that you're heard, even if you're not seen. I feel my first real prick of worry for him. I should have come sooner.

"Hayes," I call out again and start up the stairs. The carpeted runner silences my footfalls, but the wooden steps still creak every other step. It's silent upstairs, too. There's a light peeking around the frame of the door that leads to his master bedroom. As I get closer, I hear his snores. I push the door open and my anger spikes.

Lined up along the foot of the bed are four empty bottles of Jack Daniels. I watch him. Even in his sleep, he's strong and powerful.

His brows are relaxed, his stubble-covered jaw is still strong, but not so rigid. His lips are parted and soft. For the first time, I see the little boy who grew up without his mother in a house that was managed like a chessboard. Manipulations, lies, and death blows.

I spend a few minutes watching him and then pick up the glass of water by his bed and throw it at him. His eyes pop open in surprise. I step back when he starts to shake his head back and forth to get the water off and wipes the water out of his eyes before he looks up at me. His eyes are murderous.

“What the hell?” he yells at me.

“You tell me!” I give him the full force of my anger, too. “I’ve been trying to reach you for days,” I seethe.

“I told you I needed a few days,” he grumbled.

“I knew you needed some time to think. And I walk in here to find you living like you’re a frat boy on spring break.” I point at the bottles lined up on the floor.

“Stop screaming,” he moans and cradles his head.

“I’m not screaming. Even though I should be. You fucking abandoned me, Hayes!” Now, I raise my voice.

“I didn’t,” he groans.

“And you abandoned yourself. We have shit to do. Shit to discuss.”

He covers his face and groans into his hands.

“You threw water at me, Tesoro,” he grumbles.

“Yeah, I know. Because I’m the one who did it,” I say with dry sarcasm. He scowls, completely unamused.

“I just needed a couple of days,” he says miserably.

“Hayes, what the hell have you been doing in here? Are you high?” I ask him.

He sits up straight and shakes his head. “I don’t know where my phone is. I haven’t seen it since the ...” He winces as if he’s in pain and says, “since the fight.”

“How did Amelia reach you then?” I ask

“The house line, like she always does. It’s an encrypted line and she’s unduly paranoid, so she always uses it to talk to me when it’s urgent,” he says. And then he shakes his head and looks at me with real confusion in his eyes.

“What the fuck is wrong with my family?” His voice is etched with pain and my heart aches for him because I don’t have any answers to that question.

“I don’t know. But, we need to talk.”

He sighs.

“I know that you have more shit going on right now than most people deal with their whole lives. But you’ve also got more power, privilege and wealth than those same people can dream about. And with all of that comes all the obligation. More money, more problems, right?”

He nods.

“So, get off your ass and put on your streetwise hat, because your uncle is playing dirty,” I tell him.

“No kidding.” He sighs and rubs his hands tiredly over his face.

“We have to think like desperate people who don’t have safety nets or moral compasses,” I tell him.

“You sound like Amelia,” he grumbles.

“You should do whatever she tells you to do,” I say.

“You’ve changed your tune. I thought she was a ‘vulture,’” he says.

“The board meeting is in two days. No atheists in foxholes,” I say.

“Do you mean my enemy’s enemy is my friend?” he asks.

“Whatever. We have a lot of work to do!” I snap impatiently.

His expression has morphed from slightly annoyed to happy.

“Why are you smiling? Do you like getting chewed out by me?” I ask.

“I don’t know what chewed out means, but it sounds like it could be hot,” he says.

“Hayes,” I huff.

“That morning, when he attacked you. I was coming to break up with you,” he says.

I freeze and stare at him. Tears, hot and unbidden, fill my eyes. My breath is trapped in my lungs, and I can’t speak.

“I wouldn’t have done it,” he says quickly and rushes to stand by me. When he puts his hands on my shoulders, I lean into him.

“But why?” I hear myself say in a voice that I don’t recognize. It’s thick with hurt.

“I had just gotten the call about the DNA test. I was angry and thought I had let Thomas get away with too much because I’d been distracted,” he says, not quite meeting my eyes now.

“By me?” I ask.

“Yes. But by the time I got there, I knew there was no way I could give you up. The sun rises and sets in your eyes, Confidence,” he says. My heart starts kicking again and my tears dry.

“But walking into that, seeing him on you. I thought ...” He swallows thickly. “I’m sorry. So sorry that I wasn’t there. I’m so fucking sorry that he put his hands on you. That I was late,” he sounds so distressed.

“Hayes, why didn’t you just talk to me? Is that why you haven’t left your house? You’ve been avoiding me?” I ask.

He laughs darkly. “No. I was afraid I wouldn’t be able to stop myself from going to that fucker’s house and setting it on fire,” he says. I grab his hand and squeeze.

“I was scared that day. But I’m okay now.” I tell him. “I just want us to focus on what we can control. And we have to get ready for this meeting. It’s only two days away.” I feel desperate suddenly to lighten the mood. I’ve spent four days in a state of complete anxiety and it’s taken its toll. As much as I'm dreading the rest of our conversation, I'm glad we have it to talk about.

I lean back on the window sill and he sits on the bed watching me with a smile on his face.

"What are you smiling at?"

"You," he says, his gaze growing more intense. "You're my everything. And I want to be your everything," he says intently.

"You are my everything, baby," I assure him.

My heart is in my throat.

And, in his eyes.

"I'm thinking about myself, my future, my responsibilities so differently because of you," he says and my heart swells. "So, yeah, I'm worried about the DNA test. But that's not what has given me nightmares. It's that I've done anything to hurt you or allowed anything to hurt you." His eyes are glittering with fire that speaks of loyalty, constancy, and forever.

"I know, baby ..." I say and want so badly to put him in my pocket and protect him from everything that's coming this week. "I feel the same way."

"You're my priority. Because you are my future. You have a view of the world that I want to use as my lens for the rest of my fucking life. Even when it feel like it's do or die, I know that you and I are a sure thing."

"Never doubt that," I say.

He runs his hands through his hair. "Everything feels so complicated, except for us."

"I don't care if I'm not the heir. I don't care if they remove me. The only thing I need is you." He stands up, naked as the day he was born. Even soft, his penis is beautiful and thick. His whole body is beautiful and thick. I let my eyes feast on him, and when I get to those eyes—those fucking eyes—I blurt out, "I'm pregnant."

Chapter Thirty-Two

Truth

Hayes

“You’re what?” I ask and sit back down on the bed, only briefly registering the cold, wet sheets bunching under my bare ass. I’m dazed and a million questions and emotions flood me as I try to recover from the curve ball she just threw at me.

“Hayes.” She walks over to me, her blue eyes crinkled in concern. “Are you okay?” she asks and then lays a hesitant hand on my shoulder.

“Did you say you’re pregnant?” I ask, dazed, but fuck me, also praying to God I wasn’t hearing things.

She nods, her eyes wide, her blonde brows raised in uncertainty.

Relief, joy, gratitude rush through me like a current and washes away my hangover, my dread and my regret.

I jump off the bed and sweep her into my arms. “Marry me,” I growl in her ear.

She throws her arms around my neck. “Of course I’m going to marry you.” She laughs happily and presses a kiss to my cheek.

I pull back and stare at her. “When did you find out?” I ask.

“Today,” she beams. “I had a blood test.”

“How far along?”

“Ten weeks,” she says, and I squeeze tight before I remember myself and let her go.

“You can hug me,” she says.

“I don’t want to hurt el bambino.” I put her down and kneel in front of her and press my cheek to her stomach. “There’s a baby in there,” I say in complete wonder and awe.

She runs her fingers through my hair and says, “Hayes, we have so much we need to talk about. I wasn’t going to tell you about the baby until later, when all of this was over, but then you said all of that romantic stuff and it just came out,” I say.

“So, what you’re saying is that you’d like to table this conversation?” I ask and stand back up. I lean in to kiss her and she leans back.

“Nah, you need a shower and a toothbrush,” she says and jumps out of my grasp.

“Go do that and then come down and let’s talk.”

I walk into the kitchen to find her sitting at the table, two mugs on the table in front of her. A white envelope sits on the table in front of her. It has my name and social security number on it. My stomach plummets to my knees. I know right away it’s the DNA test results. But, I ask anyway.

“Is that it?” I ask and nod toward the envelope.

“Yeah, Amelia gave it to me. You have to be the one to open it,” she says, her eyes dry and firm, but full of concern as she watches me closely.

“I’m okay,” I say, and I find that I am. My future is set, because Confidence and I are set. This is just a hurdle I’ve got to clear on my road to where we’re going together.

“You want coffee?” she asks and pads on her bare feet across the travertine tiled floors into the kitchen. “Were you at work?” I ask, noticing her skirt and blouse for the first time. “Yeah, this morning, but then I went to the doctor and then came here.”

I pick up the envelope, rip it open, and pull the paper out.

“Hayes, don’t you want to sit down?” Confidence sounds alarmed. I hear her hurried footfalls as she rushes back to the table, but I just stare at the paper and gather my resolve.

“No, let’s not make an event of it. I just want to know.” I unfold and read what it says out loud. “With regard to the DNA of Hayes Rivers, when compared to the DNA sample obtained from Jason Rivers, twelve of the fifteen DNA markers were a match. This indicated sanguinity but does not indicate paternity. The matching markers follow the patterns we see between nephews and uncles and grandsons and grandfathers.” I finish and look up at Confidence. Her face is pale, and her hand is squeezing her lips together.

“How is that possible? He couldn’t have been my grandfather. He didn’t have any children besides me. So, if he’s my uncle ... then what does that mean? Uncle Thomas is my father? How?” I ask. Her eyes widen and take up almost the entire first half of her face. She’s shaking her head back and forth and her eyes start to fill with tears.

I stand up and walk over to her and yank her hand down. “What does it mean? Say it,” I demand, irrational in my fear and anger. I’m demanding she answer a question she couldn’t possibly. And yet, because she’s so much braver than me, she does.

“Gigi,” she croaks like it hurts for the words to pass her lips.

“No.” I shake my head.

“Who else? Does your father have other siblings?” I ask.

“I don’t fucking know. I didn’t even know Gigi existed until I was fourteen. Anything is possible.” As it starts to sink in, other realities rear their heads. I start to pace. If he wasn’t my father, then his dead wife wasn’t my mother, either. I don’t know the name for what I’m feeling. I’ve grieved for people I don’t know. Who aren’t my parents.

“So, I’m a Rivers, but not my father’s son. Who are my parents?” I ask.

“I don’t ... I don’t know,” she says and I want to shake her.

Or shake this house.

Or shake the world.

I want everyone to feel what I'm feeling. The ground beneath my feet has shifted in a way that's permanent. I will never be the same.

"Confidence. Who am I? Who is my family? What is my family?" I shout these questions at her. The horror on her face is too much for me. I turn away from her. I'm talking to the wrong person, anyway.

I pick up the receiver of my landline and hit the second preprogrammed button and press the phone to my ear.

"Prego?" Gigi's voice is husky with sleep and I look down at the alarm clock by my bed and realize it must be one or two the morning in Positano. I haven't called her during any of this. I didn't want to worry her, and now I realize she's the only person who can answer my questions.

"Gigi, I took a paternity test," I say.

"Who's pregnant?" she asks.

"To determine my paternity," I clarify. I'm met with silence. I look up at Confidence who still looks like she's seen a ghost.

You okay? I mouth and walk to the fridge to get her a bottle of water.

She's carrying my fucking kid.

I crack it open and put it down in front of her and realize that Gigi hasn't made sound.

My heart sinks.

"You knew," I say and Confidence's hand pauses in midair on its way to put her water to her lips.

"Hayes, I—"

"You what? Whose son am I?" I ask her slowly. My heart thuds wildly. My entire body is tingling, and my head is swimming.

"Hayes, it's not that simple—" she starts.

“Yes. It is.” My hand slams down on the table before I even realize it’s in motion. Confidence jumps up and comes to stand beside me. She puts a hand on my shoulder and I want to shake it off.

I don’t want comfort. I want answers.

Gigi starts to cry softly.

“Whose child am I?” I ask her again.

“Hayes ...” She’s weeping loudly now.

So is my queen. I watch her. Want to go to her. But not until I have answers.

“Gigi, tell me. Now,” I ask, and the words taste like ash in my mouth.

“Mine,” she sobs, and I drop the phone.

I don’t remember sitting down, but I must have.

“Okay, Gigi, okay,” I hear Confidence saying, and then I hear the phone clatter into its cradle into the counter.

“My life is a lie. All of it. I’m a lie. I’m ...” Bombs are exploding somewhere inside me. My memories are imploding. My father disappears from the memory of learning to ride a bike. He vanishes from the conversations we had about the birds and the bees.

“You are Hayes Rivers. You’re a brother, a son, a friend, a lover, a father.” She takes my hand and puts it over her stomach.

“A father.” I pull her to me and press my face into the soft, tiny swell in her abdomen.

“I’m going to be okay,” I say. She’s like a shot of valium, and my pulse starts to slow.

“Hayes, the worst is over,” she says, and like the fool I am, I believe her.

Chapter Thirty-Three

HISTORY

Gigi

“I will begin by saying that I am only sorry for the deceit and the fact that I had to live my life pretending that you weren’t mine,” I say slowly and force my eyes to stay on Hayes’s face. I want to look away so badly.

Those green eyes are shuttered and as cold as chips of emerald. Except, those are his father’s eyes and they have never been able to hide the fire that is always burning inside of him. The curiosity, the feeling, the passion, the thirst for better, the compassion, and right now, the anger.

“So, you suffered?” he asks.

I nod. “Good,” he snaps and I smile. Because, there I am. That cold, unforgiving streak that makes me a Rivers and him my son.

He’s been a mirror to everything I’ve lost, and yet has reminded me how lucky I was to have had any of it in the first place.

“I did what I did for you,” I continue.

He laughs and my patience snaps. I stand up and walk over to him, plant my feet and stare down at him.

“I know I owe you a lifetime of explanations and apologies, but no matter what I have done, I have loved you first,” I say through lips that are barely moving, and a jaw that is so tightly clenched that I know I’m probably doing some real damage to my teeth.

“Yes, so much that you let someone else raise me for the first half of my life and then lived with me for the second half but lied the entire time,” he says sullenly.

“Hayes, there are some things that are more important than our individual needs or wants. Now, please, I’m here because I wanted to tell you this face-to-face. Will you let me?”

He opens his mouth to speak and Confidence’s hand slides over his and she says, “Yes, he will,” and squeezes his hand when he starts to contradict her.

I misjudged this woman, and I’m so glad that Hayes has better judgment than I do because she is exactly what he and this family needs. And she loves him something fierce.

I smile gratefully at her and sit back down.

“The Riverses founded this city. With our carpetbagging money we came and bought land, financed cotton gins, and gave the Allens money to buy the land that this city is sitting on. And then, we settled here. And in this city we are titans. Power covets power. Above all. Money and fame were never the goal. Power was how you survived. Power was what gave you the ability to execute your vision. And with it came the money, the fame, the access to anything you could ever want.

“Once you’ve tasted it, you never want anything else. That’s how we were raised. When I was eighteen, I had my coming out. It was a silly thing, but a tradition that the ruling families of Houston had started to make sure that the next generation was shaped by the best and brightest.”

“According to whom?” Confidence asks.

“According to the men who saw themselves as masters of the universe. The rules of entry were steep and enforced to the letter. Number one was no new money, which—to the founding families of Houston—was a dirty word. Either way, that was how they kept people from buying their way into the elite club they’d made. This group of people produced governors, presidents, titans. They didn’t want to share that.

“And girls like me? We went to college not to get an education but to find a husband. My parents sent me East to Wellesley College.”

“Isn’t that all girls?” Confidence cuts in again. I smile at her and think that for all her hard-earned street smarts, this girl has a lot to learn about the family she's joining.

No matter how much she's grounded Hayes, he's still got the blood of ambitious, ruthless titans in his veins. He's not chasing a win in the moment. He will always think about his place in history. Like all of the men who came before him that have dreamt about the eternal sunlight of their glorious time as rulers among men.

"Yes, it is. And all of the men at Harvard, MIT, BU, Brandies, and Tufts knew it. So on the weekends, our parties were packed with men. And that's when I met and fell in love with your father." I look at Hayes "At a party where neither of us were having a particularly good time. I tripped, he caught me, we sat down to talk, found out we were both from Houston and spent the rest of the night falling in love. When we went home that summer, we found out that my family was opposed to the match," I said.

"Is that really a thing?" she asks.

"Oh, yes. In fact, the boys in my vintage would say—"

"Vintage?" Confidence says with a scowl of confusion.

"That's stuck-up speak for 'in the same year at school,'" Hayes tells her quickly. I frown at him before I continue.

"Yes, in my year at school, they would say 'heiress or above only,' and it wasn't something they said behind closed doors. It was a rule. And for heiresses like me, the same applied. My love—he had money, but not the kind that they liked. And there was someone else they wanted for me.

"His family was offended. They decided I wasn't what they wanted for their son. And family, to both of us, was everything. We went our separate ways.

"He married someone else. I moved back East. But then, after my father got sick, I came home. We ran into each other at a fundraiser." I can't help my smile as I remember that night. Seeing him again.

"We made a choice. When we got married, your grandfather disinherited me. Made your fath—" I stop when Hayes blanches. "I'm sorry, Jason, his heir. He was a newlywed, home from Cornell with his pretty, Beacon Hill heiress on his arm. He married the right girl, from the right family, and she had good childbearing hips—as my father called them,” I recall.

“You moved to Italy?”

“Not then. Your father and I bought a farm out in Brenham. We were raising steer, and I was three months pregnant when he just ... disappeared.”

“What does that mean?” Hayes asks in a sharp voice.

“He left early one morning to go into town and just never came back home. It took me a week to call the police because I was sure he’d come back with a story about how his car ran off a cliff and he’d had to camp in the woods and wait for rescue. But after a week, I realized I couldn’t hide anymore. I went to his family. They had no idea where he was and accused me of having something to do with it. They had money of their own; they were smart and they wanted revenge. So, I hid you. Right under their noses. James’s wife’s hips weren’t so childbearing and she was ill. My father had disinherited me, and Thomas was on the verge of being expelled from West Point. We were all such a disappointment to him. The only thing he saw value in was you.

“He refused to reinstate my inheritance. But he would give it to you. If I let James and his wife raise you as theirs. At the time, I thought it was a good idea. I was beside myself with grief and without two coins to rub together. And despite everything, I still believed in the Rivers name and I wanted my son—the true oldest child—to take his rightful place. And Thomas didn’t know. By the time he came home at the end of that term, I was in Italy. James and Ann had their brand-new baby boy in their arms and he was none the wiser. I don’t know how Thomas found out.” I shake my head dismally.

“Well, Amelia has a clue. They obtained a copy of Anne’s autopsy. It says that she’d never given birth. And so, their hope is to prove that I’m illegitimate. They have no idea of the truth,” Hayes says in a low, dark voice that gives me the chills.

I want to rewind, and I want to kill my little brother. He's always been such a selfish pain in the ass.

"I don't know what is wrong with Thomas. He is so resentful of everything and I don't understand it. He says he loves his family, but he's forgotten just like our father did that family is the people who make it up. And the name is only as good as the people who bear it. I'm worried about him. That he would do this. But power is all he's ever wanted. But he's going to be sorry. This is going to open up another can of worms that none of us wants to revisit," I say.

"What? What could be worse than playing musical parents with me?" Hayes asks.

"Nothing could be worse than that," I say quietly. My heart is breaking that this is how he has to find out. But, it's time.

"So ..."

"Your father. His name was Lucas Wilde," I say and wait for the light to go on. His head draws back and his eyebrows shoot into his brow line. He shoots out of his seat and stalks over to the huge mantle over the fireplace in his living room.

Confidence's hand slams over her mouth, and her eyes dart between Hayes and me like she doesn't know where to look.

"Do you mean, the late Lucas Wilde?" Hayes asks without turning around to face me. He braces his hands on the mantle.

"Yes. Him," I say.

"The father of Remington, Regan, Tyson? Him?" Hayes repeats.

"Yes," I say.

"I thought he died when Remi was a kid," Hayes says slowly.

"No, that's when he divorced Remington's mother and ran off and married me. He was declared dead years later," I answer and find that my defensiveness is still there.

Hayes turns around then. His eyes are dark, red-rimmed and so angry that my heart convulses with the knowledge that it's all directed at me.

“You ran off with a married man who had three children?” he asks me the question I ask myself every single day.

“Yes,” I answer, and when he turns back around, as if the sight of me is too much, I look at Confidence who is staring ahead blankly, unseeingly.

I get up and walk over to stand behind him. “We were in love. And he married me,” I plead. “I know it sounds so wrong. I know we shouldn’t have been, but these things happen—”

He turns around again, his eyes narrow slits now. I flinch at the expression in them.

“You know what doesn’t happen? You don’t give your kid away and pass him off as someone else’s,” he rages.

“I didn’t give you away,” I cry. I look at Confidence for help, but she’s watching Hayes intently, her eyes reflecting the ache of sympathy inside of her.

Hayes stands up. “Wait. Remington Wilde is my older brother?” he asks in abject horror and shock. My stomach sinks and my panic rises. This could be a disaster. But I don’t dare ask Hayes for his discretion. Instead, I give him the truth.

“Your half-brother, but yes. You have the same father. Or you did,” I respond and my heart constricts at the thought of Lucas and how much I loved him. How much he loved me, how badly he wanted to raise Hayes and Remi together, even though, in the end, he chose me over the possibility of being with his oldest son.

“And Remi’s mother, grandmother, they all know this?”

“Well. They know Lucas left me. They know I was pregnant. This is why they hate us so much. But, they don’t know who you are. Everybody thinks you’re James and Anne’s child. I told them and everyone else that I lost the baby,” I say and feel like vomiting at the look on Hayes’ face.

“So, let me get this straight. I am a Wilde and a Rivers. You are my mother. I am the true heir because I am the true oldest of the oldest child. You are my mother,” he repeats.

I nod.

“I want you to call Amelia and make an official statement. Sign it, notarize it, and we’ll deliver it to Thomas’s attorneys. And then, I want you to leave and never come back,” he says quietly. Then he stands and walks out of the room. His back is ramrod straight just like his father’s had been. I watch helplessly as he walks up the stairs, his back straight, without a glance back in my direction.

I look at Confidence, unsure what to say. “He doesn’t mean it,” she says softly. Her eyes are full of pity. I didn’t expect that, not after how I had treated her and what I’ve done to Hayes.

“He does,” I say tearfully.

“You don’t know him well at all,” she says sadly and shakes her head. I’m offended and want to be mad. But, I know she’s right. I just nod. This lie has precluded a real intimacy with my child because I was always afraid of slipping up. I love him. I have been a shoulder to lean on and supportive of all his endeavors. But I also pushed him into marriage with a woman who proved to be treacherous, and I tried to run a good one away.

“Give him some time and some space, but don’t you dare walk out and never come back,” she says.

I give her a watery smile.

“And that statement, please. Send it to Amelia today. The hearing is tomorrow. We’ll want to kill this question now. And deal with the question of fitness alone ...”

She stands there, uncertain a little, and I ask, “Did you have something to say?”

“Does Remington know?” she asks.

“I don’t know, but I don’t think so. No one knew. They were just told to stay away from each other. You know? The dispute over the land was real, but what really put the wedge between us was Lucas leaving his family.”

“Was it worth it?” she asks without elaborating.

“Yes.” I answer without asking for clarification because it was all worth it.

“For the year I had with the love of my life. For the son we made together. For the life our son got to lead. I would do it all again. Hindsight is easy, but it’s what I did, and it was hard. And it took me a long time to recover. When you’re a mother, you’ll know. Doing what your child needs instead of what you or they want is hard.”

“I can only imagine,” she says, and I can’t read whatever’s really in her eyes. “We’ll see you tomorrow.”

And only because I know he’s in good hands do I let myself out of their house.

HAYES

Confidence slides into bed with me and she doesn’t say a word. She lays down so we’re face to face.

“Hey,” she says and takes my hands in hers. She lays them on the soft swell of her lower stomach and whispers, “Here we are. We’re safe in here.”

I close my eyes and make promises to that little life growing inside of my life. My love. My everything.

That as long as I draw breath, he will know only love—the tough but yielding kind—from me. That no one would be able to convince me to walk away from him.

That I’m ready to be his father.

That I’m the man his mother needs.

That I know that his inheritance is more than just money and name. It’s our values; it the synchronicity between who we are in private and who we are when the world is watching.

“Do you think less of me?” I ask.

“No. Never,” she says. Of course.

“Still want to marry me?” I ask.

“Yes, and before I start to show, please,” she says.

“Your wish is my command,” I say. They’re the last words we speak before we fall asleep.

Chapter Thirty-Four

Judgement

Hayes

Two Weeks Later

“Thank God, that’s over,” Confidence says. She steps into my side and slips her arms around my waist. We step out of Kingdom’s office building and out into the bright afternoon sun. The building is casting a shadow onto the big granite courtyard where overworked employees come to escape the air conditioning and their computers for a few minutes.

“Yes, it was ugly for a second at the end, but it’s done,” I agree.

“Will your uncle be okay?” she asks. Bleeding heart.

“He’s going to be just fine. I think retirement in exile on his ranch in the beautiful Texas hardly amounts to hard time for all of the shit he’s pulled over the last year,” I say.

We settled the case today. Kingdom paid damages that were negotiated by Amelia and Wilde Law. The Foundation established a Project School Bell that will deploy mobile classrooms to neighborhoods that are recovering from the flood so their children can continue to go to school close to home while their schools are being renovated. It’s the first in a string of programs that the foundation will fund over the next few months as part of its commitment to the city of Houston. Some of them are being done in conjunction with Wilde Law. When I think about Wilde—and Remi—my stomach contracts painfully. I still don’t know how to tell him that his father is my father. And that his father may not be dead after all.

“Hayes?” Confidence calls my name and bumps me with her hip. I look down at her, and she’s got a concerned look on her face.

“Yes, my love?”

“You okay? You blanked out for a minute,” she says.

“Yeah.” I shake my head to clear it. “Just thinking that we’ve got a lot of work to do. But at least now, I can do it without Thomas around.”

“Looking for ways to undermine you,” she adds. We start toward my car that’s idling on the curb. “The car will take you back to work, if you want,” I tell her.

“Yeah, that would be great.” She rocks up on her heels and presses a kiss to my mouth.

“Thanks for being here today. For being here every day.” I circle my arm around her waist and kiss her back.

“Hayes,” Gigi says from in front of us. She stands up from the bench she’s been sitting on. My heart hurts to see her. I haven’t let myself think too much about her. Last night when Confidence asked me to talk to her, I’d said no. I had nothing to say. She gave birth to me, but that didn’t make her my mother.

I’d said it so flippantly last night, but when I see her standing in front of me, I know it’s not that simple. Like a reel of film on a screen, flashes of our life together in Positano run through my mind. Our fights. The first time we picked figs from the tree we planted together. How she slept in my bed with me the night before I left for college and talked to me all night about growing up in Rivers House.

My stomach churns, and I slide my eyes to Confidence who has gone very still beside me.

“Gigi, why are you here?” I ask her. I don’t want to do this in public.

“Because you are,” she says simply. She looks tired. And for the first time, I can see age creeping along her pale, drawn face. Her hands are clenched in front of her and she looks so frail.

“Listen, can we talk—”

“You’re dead, Rivers.” A loud voice booms over the courtyard, and we all turn back to Smith Street to see Barry

Jimenez walking toward me, a pistol in his trembling hand pointed in my general direction.

“Oh my God, it’s Barry,” Confidence calls just as the first shot rings out. I grab both women to put them behind me and hustle them into the building. The armed security man is already rushing out, and after a second shot, Barry is tackled to the ground.

But something happens, and Gigi doesn’t end up behind me. Instead, she slumps against me and cries out in pain.

“Gigi,” I call out and let go of Confidence to lay Gigi on the ground. Her light blue dress is soaked with blood that’s gushing out of a small wound in her shoulder. I pull my tie off and knot it around her arm and press my hand to the wound. She winces.

“We need an ambulance!” I hear Confidence screaming in the background, but it’s muted by the sound of the blood that’s rushing through my ears.

Gigi grabs my hand and pulls me down to her. “Hayes,” she groans, and her eyelids flutter.

“Oh no you fucking don’t.” I shake her and her eyes open.

“Don’t use that kind of language, Hayes, especially not in public,” she says weakly.

“Well don’t you fucking close your eyes after you’ve been shot!” I shout at her.

She laughs weakly. Now I can see how much I look like her.

“God, Gigi.” I shake my head in denial that this is happening.

“Listen to me, Hayes. I know I wasn’t your mother in your heart, but in mine, it’s all I’ve ever been. You have been my every prayer, every dream, every hope. All of my love has always been yours. All I want is for you to be the man you were born to be,” she says.

“Don’t talk like you’re going to die. I’m still pissed at you,” I say.

She reaches up to pat my cheek. Her bloody hand is sticky against my face. “Of course you are. You’re a Rivers.” And then her eyes close.

Epilogue

Gigi

“Just rest, Gigi,” Hayes whispers down at me. His big hand smooths the hair off my face and I have to stop myself from nestling into his touch. I haven’t earned that. It’s too soon. I know that what happened outside his office is why he’s here. I hope it means that I’ll be able to persuade him to stay. To give me a chance to earn it.

“I—” My throat is parched. I had a tube inserted while I was in surgery and the words I want to say are caught there.

“Save your voice, we’ll have time to talk when you’re better,” he says in a voice that’s more soothing than I can stand.

His eyes, so like mine, search my face, and I know he’s looking for clues that he missed. That downward tilt on my right eye that mirrors his. The way my ears curve close and then pull away from my head. Maybe he’s even imagining how he’ll age. Will his jawline hold as firmly as mine? I lift my free hand and circle his wrist. I want to tell him that he gets this loving tenderness from his father. I want to tell him that he’s the greatest love of my life. That I only let them have him because I wanted more for him than I thought myself capable of giving. Instead, I just hold onto my son’s arm and let him look into his mother’s face properly, for the first time.

The creak of the door opening behind us startles both of us. He turns and from the way his posture changes, I know it’s Confidence. He deflates a little because he knows that he can lean on her. I love that he’s found someone strong enough to help him carry the burden of holding our family together. I think that together, they’ll do a better job than my generation did.

She comes to stand beside Hayes and wraps an arm around his waist. She squeezes him and he wraps an arm around her and holds her close. If I died, this would go down as one of the happiest moments of my life. My son is grown up, and even though I didn't do everything right, I've helped him grow into a man who is capable of love and who's not afraid to stake a claim on something he wants and then do the hard work it takes to make it his.

"Gigi, how are you feeling?" she asks.

I nod.

"Remi's here," she says. My heart plunges to my toes and my lungs constrict. But I nod.

"Are you sure you want to give it to him?" she asks. I let go of Hayes and pick up the letter I have tucked into my side of the bed. I rub the worn paper in between my fingers and nod again.

She smiles, a pained but encouraging smile. "I'll send him in. We'll be outside."

She takes Hayes's hand and they turn to leave. Just before they step through the door, Hayes looks back over his shoulder and says, "I love you, Gigi." Then he's gone.

I watch the door. My heart threatens to burst out of my chest so that everyone can see what a cowardly muscle it is. I clutch the letter that Lucas wrote Remi a few days before he disappeared. I know that this will change everything. That peace will probably never be my companion, but it's time.

Epilogue 2

Confidence

My phone buzzes from its perch on my bedside table. I fling an arm out in the dark and fumble for it. A text message from Hayes flashes and I open it.

“Press Play” And then the next message is a video.

“Where are you?” I type back.

“Press Play” is his response.

“Not exactly how I imagined our wedding night,” I grumble and sit up. I’ve been waiting in our room for an hour.

By myself.

Hayes left to get something he forgot downstairs. I spent the first half an hour getting myself ready. When I draped myself across the bed, I looked like everything I knew Hayes loved. My lingerie is a confection of ice blue lace and satin. My hair smelled like roses and my lips were smeared with cherry flavored lip balm. Now, my hair is a tangled mess, I have sleep in my eyes and I’ll probably want to brush my teeth again before I kiss Hayes.

If I ever kiss Hayes again

“You haven’t pressed play, have you? Stop being mad and watch.” His text says and so I push aside my annoyance and comply.

The video starts and my heart lodges in my throat. I clutch my chest and every drop of irritation I felt seconds of ago disappears.

On my screen, my mother and I are dancing at the wedding. We’re wrapped in each other’s arms. Our heads resting on each other’s shoulders. The look on my mother’s face steals my breath. She’s smiling. Her eyes are closed and she looks like she’s having the very best dream. We’ve been fine since Daddy and Fortune left. But she hasn’t smiled like this since long before that horrific night. We'd held each other then, too. But we'd been fused together by terror. Tonight, it had been nothing but pure love.

The song, "The Rose" by Bette Midler was her choice. And the slow, repetitive melody on piano and the gently joyous strains of the violins wrap me in the same tender embrace my mother's arms gave me while we danced. The camera zooms onto our faces for the last ninety seconds of the song and I watch as the tears run down her face and drop onto my shoulder. I hadn't felt her tears then and I watch as she composes her face and a bright smile spreads just as the song ends. The scene cuts to a white wall and I blink to clear my vision at the abrupt change in background.

Then Hayes sits down in front of the camera. "So, this is where I've been," he says into the camera. He sweeps his hand over the parts of himself that are visible in the camera. His hair is tamed into waves of chocolate silk again. The broad, bold angles of his cheekbones are more prominent than normal because he's completely freshly shaven. His tuxedo looks crisp and stiff again. When we'd stumbled up to our room after the reception, we'd been sweaty from dancing, and his collar had several smudges of my lipstick on it.

"I was watching that video while you were in the bathroom and it finally hit me what I should give you for a wedding gift. I wanted it to be something that money couldn't buy." He gives me one of his closed mouth, sexy as fuck smiles. His intelligent, oh so beautiful hazel eyes search my face as if he knew exactly where it would be when he was making the video.

"The two of you are what every mother and child should be." He runs a hand through his hair and exhales a breath. "The gesture of you dancing with your mother on what would normally be the father daughter dance is everything I love about you. Your loyalty, your pride, you love, the respect you have for where you come from and your refusal to let anyone dictate what's possible. I can't believe that you're my fucking wife. And I wanted to make you something that you could want to watch over and over again, too. Especially in the moments when I've pissed you off and you're wondering how I talked you into spending the rest of your life with me. I'm not the best with words. Especially not soft ones. But for today, I want to record some. Especially since I'm about to fuck you until you can't walk for a week." He grins mischievously.

"You are more than my little treasure, Tesoro, you are my big magic. My forever wonder. The Russian doll that never stops surprising me with the depth of your brilliance. And you're the reason I'll never doubt that love is power." His eyes pierce through the screen and wrap themselves around me.

I clutch my chest as my heart riots against it and my throat constricts against the tears that are blooming.

"Your love has changed me. You've rewritten my future. Because of you, I know that my legacy will be whatever I chose. If people look at me and see a king, it's because I'm standing next to a queen." His firm, full lips purse around the last word.

"You are my reason," he says with a fierce conviction that feels like wind beneath my wings. His eyes soften and his shoulders relax. "The baby that's growing inside of you is just the first of many masterpieces we'll make together. You are my river. You've been the making of me. And I hope that one day I'll feel like I've earned the gift of your love. It's my privilege and honor to be your husband. I love you so much. More than I'll ever be capable of expressing. Now, lay back and get ready for me. I'm walking in now."

The door opens and the screen goes blank at the same time. Hayes walks into the room. His bow tie is gone, his shirt unbuttoned completely, and his lightly-haired chest and smooth tanned skin of his muscle carved torso peek out between the gap in the stark white fabric.

"Hey, wife." His eyes are alight with a heat that singe every part of me it lands on. His eyes drag up my body and he pulls his shirt off completely. The flex of the muscles in his powerful shoulders and arms distracted me. When I look back at his face, he's standing right in front of me

“Hey, husband,” I mimic him. I sit up on my knees so I can slip my arms around his neck. His warm hands slide along the swell of my abdomen before the slip behind my waist. He pulls me into his chest and presses his forehead to mine. He closes his eyes and hums low in his throat.

“That was so beautiful,” I whisper against his lips and his eyes open and his gaze tangles with mine.

“You like it?” he asks with a satisfied smile.

I nod my answer when I find that my throat won’t release my answer.

“Good,” he says gruffly and squeezes me close. He buries his face in my neck and nuzzles it with his lips. I tighten my hold on his neck and think I might die from the intensity of the love that I feel for him. And what a way to go. I kiss the side of his face.

“I’ll watch it again. Forever. And not just when you’ve managed to piss me off.” I peck his mouth with a quick kiss to stop him from interrupting me. “I love it. And I love you. I’m the lucky one. I’m the one whose future has been rewritten. I hope you never regret letting me stand next to you. I hope you’re always proud of me.”

“Until my last breath,” he whispers before he kisses me.

Finally.

And what a kiss it is.

His lips are impatient, his tongue insistent, and I open for him. Warmth rushes through me when his tongue sweeps my mouth and I press into him as tightly as my protruding belly will let me.

We get lost in the current of love, triumph and togetherness that has become the river of our life.

Flirting with the Frenemy

Pippa Grant

A Single Dad/Brother's Best Friend/Fake Relationship/Enemies-to-Lovers Romantic Comedy

Mission: Survive my best friend's wedding, where I must play nice with my ex and his perfect new girlfriend.

Strategy: Bring the hottest fake boyfriend on the planet.

Target: Grady Rock. Master Baker. Dimples. Muscles. The unicorn of fake boyfriends.

Complication: Wyatt Morgan. My brother's best friend. My sworn enemy. Military man. Sexy as hell single dad. The man I let into my panties for one night of hot hate sex after my ex dumped me before my life fell apart.

And the man who just scared off that perfect fake boyfriend.

By pretending to be my real boyfriend.

I can roll with this though. What's the harm in Flirting with the Frenemy if it helps me get the job done?

Complete my mission and move on.

Or so I thought.

Until Wyatt kisses me again and I start feeling things I shouldn't.

The thing about weddings...nothing ever goes as planned.

Flirting with the Frenemy is a rollicking fun romantic comedy featuring a single dad military man, an irritatingly attractive blast from his past, pirates, cursing parrots, and a wedding gone wild. It stands alone with no cheating or cliffhangers.

Chapter One

Ellie Ryder, aka a woman in need of more than ice cream to fill the hole in her heart

When I rule the world, peppermint crunch ice cream will be available all year long, because assholes who break people's hearts don't restrict their assholery and heart-breaking to Christmas.

Unless, apparently, they're my asshole.

Check that.

My former asshole.

I stab my spoon straight into the cold carton that I grabbed at the store on the way here and ignore the twinkling holiday cheer on my parents' gigantic tree in the living room. It's late, so I didn't tell them I was coming over, but I don't want to spend one more night at my house this week.

Alone.

Sleeping in the bed where Patrick screwed me—and then screwed me over—just two nights ago.

Merry Christmas, Ellie. I'm in love with my neighbor.

I leave them a note taped to the coffee pot to let them know I'm here, then stomp down the stairs—softly, so I don't wake them—and turn the corner into the rec room, where I pound the light switch up.

And then almost scream.

There's a lump of a man sprawled on the couch watching a black-and-white movie, and as soon as the lights go on, he winces and throws his arm over his eyes. "Christ," he snarls.

My heart backpedals from the precipice where it was about to leap, then surges into a furious beat all over again. "What are you doing here?"

Wyatt Morgan drops his arm and squints at me. “Oh, good. It’s Ellie. Drop in to rub some salt in the wound?”

I inhale another bite of ice cream while I glare at him, because I didn’t ask him to be here, and he’s scowling just as hard as I’m glaring. “Beck’s place is downtown. Go get drunk there.” Even as the words leave my mouth, guilt stabs me in the lung.

Not the heart, because first, I’d have to like my brother’s best friend for my heart to be affected, and second, because I’m not sure I have a heart left.

I’m in a shit-tastic mood—who dumps their girlfriend on Christmas Eve?—but even in the midst of my own pity party, I know why Wyatt’s sitting in my parents’ basement, stewing himself in beer and watching It’s a Wonderful Life.

He doesn’t even roll his eyes at my order to get out.

“Beck’s having a party,” he informs me. “Didn’t want to go. Guess you weren’t invited. Or you prefer to add to the shit pile here.”

He tips back his beer, and another guilt knife attacks me, this time in the liver.

It’s entirely possible he has bigger problems than I do. I lost a boyfriend that I’ll probably acknowledge soon enough—for real, not just in a fit of anger—that I’m better off without.

The courts just handed Wyatt a final divorce decree that means he only gets to see his kid once a month.

If he travels five hundred miles to do it every time.

“Shove it, Morgan,” I tell him. “I don’t kick a man when he’s down.”

“Since when?”

“Oh, please. Like you can talk.”

It’s been like this since we were kids. My brother’s childhood best friend is the only man in the entire universe who can get under my skin and bring out my ugly faster than you can blink, and I swear he takes joy in doing it.

A ninety-five on your math test, Ellie? Why not perfect?

Nice shot, but you're still down by eight.

Who taught you to hold a pool cue, a blind monkey?

And damn if all that taunting didn't make me try harder every single time.

Because when he wasn't taunting me, he was the first one holding out a hand to pull me off the pavement or out of the mud when I inevitably got trampled trying to keep up with Beck and his friends in soccer, street hockey, basketball, and whatever else I swore I was big enough to do with them.

He eyeballs my breasts, and my whole body lights up like the Christmas lights all over downtown.

"You gonna eat that whole carton?" he asks, and he's not looking at my chest.

He's looking at my ice cream, and here I am, getting turned on at the idea that he's finally noticed I'm a woman.

I have issues.

So many issues.

I fling myself onto the couch next to him. "It's loser ice cream, so yeah, I am," I grumble. "Here. Have a bite, you drunk asshole."

Those gray eyes connect with mine, and dammit, that's straight lust pooling in my belly.

He's sporting a thick five-o'clock shadow, and even sprawled out on the worn flowery couch in my parents' basement, he exudes power and masculinity in a way I never would've expected from the skinny pipsqueak peeking out from behind his grandmother's legs on the front porch twenty-some years ago.

Or maybe it's the tight black T-shirt, with his biceps testing the limits of the cotton and detailing his trim stomach, even sitting down, and the gray sweatpants hinting at a more substantial package than I ever would've given him credit for.

Plus the knowledge that Pipsqueak Wyatt grew up to join the Air Force as some kind of badass pilot who flies untested aircraft, which takes a hell of a lot of guts, if you ask me when I'm willing to admit something like that about him.

Which is apparently tonight.

You used to like him, my subconscious reminds me, because it's forgetting its place.

I'd tell it to shut up, that I don't go for guys who don't appreciate me, except isn't that what I just spent the last two years of my life doing?

He reaches for my spoon, and our fingers brush when he takes it. A shiver ripples over my skin. I look away to watch the movie while I hold the carton for him to dig out a scoopful.

George Bailey is arguing with Mr. Potter on the TV, and I can feel the heat off Wyatt's skin penetrating my baggy Ryder Consulting sweatshirt.

I snort softly to myself.

Of course he wasn't staring at my chest. He can't even see it under this thing.

You're holding the basketball wrong, Ellie.

It went in, didn't it?

Yeah, but you could be more consistent if you worked on your form.

Damn him for sneaking into my head. Damn him for taunting me.

Damn him for being right.

Because I did work on my form, and Beck—who's three years older than I am—quit playing ball with me after I beat him in a free throw contest when I was twelve.

He said it was because he was working on other stuff with the guys, but I knew my brother better than that.

I knew he quit playing with me because I beat him.

Wyatt still took the challenge though. He'd tell me I got lucky when I won. He'd tell me what I did wrong when I didn't.

And I worked my ass off getting better and better until I beat him every time.

And then he lost interest too.

I take the spoon from him and grunt softly while I dig deeper into the carton. “You were such an asshole when we were kids.”

He grunts back and snags the spoon again. “You were such an asshole when we were kids.”

“You were just insecure about getting your ass beat by a girl on the basketball court.”

“You just hated that you wouldn’t have been half as good without me.”

I take my spoon back and shovel in. My extra-large bite of ice cream makes my brain cramp, but hell if I’ll let him see me hurt.

Not that I can hide it. I know my face is blotchy from crying before I drove over here, and my eyes are that special kind of dry that comes after too many tears.

I can count on one hand the number of times I’ve talked to him solo since he and Beck and the guys graduated high school. He’s changed. His voice is deeper, if that’s possible. His body definitely harder—god, those biceps, and his forearms are tight, with large veins snaking over the corded muscle from his elbows to his knuckles—his square jaw more chiseled, his eyes steel rather than simple gray.

And it’s not like he lost custody of his kid because he’s an asshole.

Beck was blabbering all about it at Christmas dinner yesterday. Dude got so screwed. The military gave him orders here, so Lydia moved first, with Tucker. She hated military life. But then his orders got changed last-minute so he ended up in Georgia, she filed for divorce, and he’s been fighting the military and the courts ever since to get back to where he can be closer to his kid. He’s in hell right now. And if he cuts bait on the military, they’ll toss him in jail for being AWOL. He’s fucked. He’s SO fucked.

There goes George Bailey, leaving Mr. Potter's office to go get drunk.

Wyatt tips back his beer. A holiday brew. Like that can take away the misery of hurting this time of year. I don't know why he's here instead of taking advantage of every last minute with his kid, but then, I don't know much about divorce either.

Maybe this isn't his Christmas to see his son. Maybe Lydia's being an asshole.

One more bottle sits on the end table next to him, but just one.

Drowning his sorrows with a broken George Bailey.

"I'm sorry about your shitty divorce," I say.

Sullenly.

Just in case he thinks I might have a twinge of sympathy for him. That won't do for either of us.

He sets the bottle down and grabs the spoon again.

"So you're sharing because you feel sorry for me."

"Maybe I'm sharing because I'm not a total asshole."

"But I still am?"

I heave a sigh. I don't want to be sitting here with Wyatt Morgan any more than I want to give in to the urge to go running over to Patrick's swanky condo in the Warehouse district and beg him to give us another chance.

I was supposed to be getting engaged this Christmas.

Not dumped.

And I can't tell if that searing pain in my chest is my heart or my pride.

Or both.

Probably both.

It's not like the sex was even good the other night, and he rolled over and checked his email right after, so logically, I know I'm not missing anything.

But my damn heart still hurts.

“Misery loves company more than it cares what the company is,” I tell Wyatt.

He looks at me while he shoves the spoon back in the carton, then waves a hand in a circle, gesturing to me. “This is you being miserable?”

“I know, I make it look good.”

“I thought you looked like this all the time.”

“Asshole.”

He smirks, but it’s a dark smirk. Like he wanted me to call him an asshole, but it didn’t make him feel as good as he hoped it would. “What the hell do you have to be miserable about?”

“I broke a nail.”

He snags my hand and lifts it, turning it to inspect my perfectly trimmed, newly manicured nails, and tremors skittle out from the point where his thumb rests inside my palm.

It’s like he’s turning me on.

Patrick hasn’t turned me on in months. That’s what’s supposed to happen, right? You settle down with one person and get yourself into a rut and the sex becomes routine instead of exciting. It’s normal, right?

Or you were an idiot who should’ve dumped him a year ago, my subconscious helpfully offers.

I snatch my hand back, but I’m still ridiculously aware of Wyatt beside me.

The hitch in his breath.

The subtle scent of cinnamon and beer wafting off him.

The way his gaze is still trained on me. “So you got dumped too,” he muses.

“Shut. Up.”

That would’ve been more effective if I’d been able to say it without dribbling peppermint crunch ice cream down my chin and my voice wobbling.

He reaches out and wipes the drip off my chin, and I realize he's leaning into my space.

My heart's pounding. My breasts are getting full and heavy. My mouth is going dry, even with ice cream still lingering on my tongue, and I almost choke when I swallow.

"Merry fucking Christmas to us," he says. His nose is inches from mine, and his lids are lowering over darkened eyes.

"There's no fucking going on," I point out, my breath getting shallower as I glance down his just-barely-off-center nose to his stupidly perfect lips.

"There's not, is there?" he muses while his gaze darts to my lips too. "There's only getting fucked over."

Every time he says fuck, I get a shot of heat between my legs.

"You're in my bubble," I whisper.

"Maybe I'm trying to annoy you to make myself feel better."

"Maybe if you wanted to annoy me, you should take your clothes off."

Holy shit, I just said that.

He holds my gaze for half a second, and then his shirt goes flying. He settles back against the couch, still leaning into my space, but now with acres and acres of hard chest and sculpted stomach and cut hips and that perfect trail of hair arrowing down to disappear under his sweatpants.

"Now, what are you going to do to annoy me?" he asks.

I should dump this carton of ice cream on his head.

But I want to do something else.

Something wrong.

But right? Maybe?

Screw it.

Thinking's what got me in trouble with Patrick. I thought he was what I wanted. I thought I loved him because I thought I should. I thought he'd be a good partner. I thought we wanted the same things in life.

I thought Wyatt was annoying.

But my body isn't thinking.

My body just wants.

I slap the ice cream onto the wobbly end table that my brother broke years ago, and then I peel off my sweatshirt and the stained college T-shirt beneath it.

"Annoyed yet?" I purr.

Oh, crap, I'm purring.

His gaze dips to my chest, and his sweatpants tent.

Holy hell.

Wyatt Morgan is packing, and it's making my clit tingle.

That hasn't happened just by looking at a man in months.

"Yeah," he says, his voice thick and low. "Yeah, I'm fucking annoyed."

I rise and shimmy out of my leggings, because this is a bad idea, but every good idea I've ever had hasn't gotten me what I wanted in life, has it?

"Christ, Ellie," he rasps out.

"You only wish you looked this good," I tell him, but I can't keep my voice steady either.

I'd blame the ice cream for the heady tingling in my fingers and toes, but my blood's not spiked with anything more than sugar.

I let Wyatt take his time looking at me, because I know I look good. I hit the gym for weights four mornings a week. I run marathons. I still have curves. I don't run without a heavy-duty sports bra and my ass could squash a supermodel, but I won't apologize for being built like a woman.

I am a woman. A strong, powerful, unique woman who deserves exactly what I'm seeing in the raw desire in Wyatt's gray eyes.

If he's never noticed my body before, he's noticing now.

“You need to put your clothes back on,” he says, but his eyes aren’t in agreement with his words.

His eyes are offering to use my body to make my brain forget what my heart’s suffering.

“Or what?” I ask.

He visibly swallows, but he doesn’t answer.

He doesn’t look away either.

I slip one bra strap down my shoulder, letting it hang in the crook of my elbow, not off, but not on either.

“Ellie,” he warns, his hand going to his pants over his cock, like he can’t decide if he wants to press it down to stop it, or if he wants to jerk himself off while he watches me strip.

“You’re hurting,” I say, slipping my other bra strap halfway down my arm too. I’m still covered by my simple satin demicups, but I reach behind me like I’m going to unhook the band, and we both know he’ll be getting an eyeful of my breasts if I do it. “I’m hurting. I don’t want to hurt. Do you?”

“No,” he rasps out.

“Don’t you want to just say forget them and feel good for a few minutes?”

“Yes.”

I shut down all the warning signals alarming inside my head, because they’re not all don’t screw your brother’s best friend.

Some of them are you know how long it took to forget him the last time you got a crush on him.

And some he’s unavailable, dumbass, and so are you. You know you can’t do this without feelings getting involved.

Can’t I?

“You’re probably a terrible lay,” I say as I drop my bra.

He rises, and his pants hit the ground.

So do his boxers.

I take in the sight of his cock bobbing and straining, and I have to physically stop myself from reaching for it.

He's long. Thick. With a blunt head and dark curls framing his balls, so unlike Patrick's total blondness.

"You probably lay there like a cold limp noodle," he says.

"Try me."

He's suddenly crushing his mouth against mine, and he tastes like cinnamon and beer and summer, and his skin is hot against mine, his tongue unforgiving, his cock hard against my belly while his hands roam up my sides to tease the underside of my breasts.

I moan into his mouth. He groans in response. Our tongues clash, an inevitable extension of the war we've always waged since before we were old enough to understand it. I scrape his back with my nails. He squeezes my breasts. I push his shoulders until he's on his knees, following him all the way down to the ground.

This is insane.

I should stop.

"Condom," he sputters. "Wallet."

I grab it off the end table. "Hurry up before I change my mind."

He stills.

Like he's changing his mind.

So I grab his cock and pump it in my fist before he can tell me no.

I don't want to think.

I just want to feel.

And right now, my skin is on fire, my pussy is aching, and my breasts are heavy and desperate for attention.

"Fuck, Ellie," he groans, his head dropping back while he fumbles for the condom.

As soon as he's pulled it out of his wallet, I snag it and tear it open. "Touch my breasts," I order.

"Christ, so soft," he mutters while he tests the weight of my D-cups and teases my nipples.

Every brush of his thumb over one of my tips sends a shockwave of desire straight to my core. He alternates. One nipple. Then the other. Like my body is an instrument, and he's teasing new notes of arousal to the surface.

"So hard," I mutter back while I roll the condom down his steel shaft.

I cup his balls, and the next thing I know, he's rolled me onto my back, his mouth sealing over mine again. We fumble together to yank my panties off. I part my legs and arch into him, and he pushes into me.

It's new. And weird.

But not unwelcome.

He fills me, sliding easily into my soaking heat even as he stretches my inner walls, and I tilt my hips to take him as deep as I can.

"You drive me insane," he rasps as he pumps into me.

I don't answer, because oh, yes. "There. Right there." I buck my hips, the tension building high and tight right in that deepest part of me that he hits every time he thrusts in.

"Don't close your eyes," he orders.

Against my will, I open them.

He's watching my face while he hammers inside, faster and deeper, watching me gasp in pleasure while he fills me to the hilt and pulls back just long enough to make it that much better when he strokes deep inside me with the next thrust.

How long have I hated Wyatt Morgan?

And how long have I possibly just been afraid?

Told you so, my subconscious whispers, but he hits that sweet spot deep inside me again, and I come completely undone. My orgasm roars out of me, squeezing and pulsing and spasming around his hard cock, a silent cry on my lips while he groans and strains, holding himself inside me while he grits his teeth, eyes still penetrating mine, anger simmering, pain simmering, release simmering.

The two of us are quite the pair.

And it's not nearly as terrifying a thought as it should be.

I'm panting, my breath loud in my own ears, when he suddenly freezes.

"Oh, shit," he whispers. He pushes up to his knees, pulling out so quickly and covering the goods so fast that my vagina almost gets whiplash. "Fuck. Ellie." He shakes his head, gaze darting in a panic around the room. "We shouldn't have done that."

The words take a minute to sink in.

And he takes advantage of my dumbfounded silence to hop back into his clothes. "Shit. Sorry. I—"

"Shut up." I lunge for my own clothes. Tears are flooding my sinuses, and they'll be leaking out my eyeballs in approximately two seconds if I don't get myself under control. "Just shut up."

I dive for my clothes too.

"Ellie—"

"Shut. Up."

That sympathy. That regret. That this was a mistake. It's all in the two syllables of my name on his lips.

Crap. Dammit.

He moves toward me, but I shove him in the chest until he backs off.

He's right, of course.

It's Wyatt.

He's always right. If this was a mistake, if I'm a mistake, then yeah, clearly I'm a mistake.

A mistake who thought that screwing her brother's best friend was the solution to heartbreak.

I don't look at him while I dash for the door.

"Ellie," he calls in a hushed whisper, but I ignore him.

I've already been someone's mistake recently.

And as I barrel into the cold winter night and throw myself into the car, I vow to myself that I'll never be anyone's mistake ever again.

"Never again," I whisper as I start my car.

"Never again," I whisper as I gun it on the way down my parents' street.

"Never again," I'm whispering through tears five minutes later on the I-256 loop.

I see the movement flying up the entrance ramp next to me a second too late.

There's a flash, sparks, a crack, a jolt.

Spinning.

Crunching.

Glass shattering.

Metal buckling.

Pain.

Blinding hot pain.

Never again.

It's my last thought before everything goes black.

Chapter Two

Wyatt Morgan, aka a single dad military man unaware that an unresolved piece of his past is lurking in the bathtub

Six months later...

The house is too quiet.

Probably because Tucker quit talking as soon as he saw the socks and bra hanging on the chandelier in the foyer. I give myself a mental pat on the back.

Way to go, Dad. Introduce him to party central at a young age.

If Beck Ryder wasn't the closest thing I had to a brother, and if just being here didn't already bring back the same lingering guilt that's been with me the last six months, I'd be plotting to put Icy Hot in those briefs he models right about now.

Instead, I give the living room a cursory glance and stifle a sigh while I kick my sandals off on the entry mat and nudge Tucker to do the same. Books, magazines, robot toys, and empty mugs and glasses are scattered over every flat surface of the spacious living space, from the end tables to the wide-plank maple floor. The mess ruins the effect of the tall bay windows overlooking the spruce and oaks sloping down the side of the mountain to the little landlocked town of Shipwreck, Virginia in the valley below.

A subtle scent of wood smoke hangs in the air, and the massive stone fireplace separating the living room from the dining room needs the ashes cleaned out. The kitchen is just as much a disaster, with dirty plates, cups, mixing bowls, and pots and pans scattered all about.

Use my weekend house, Beck said. Somebody should.

Go clean my weekend house, he meant.

He needs to be more careful with who he lets in here when he's gone.

A family picture on the mantle catches my eye, and I do my best not to wince.

The guilt is still there. The guilt, and the lie.

I pissed her off.

That's all I told Beck about what happened before Ellie's accident.

Of course you did, Levi had said, because he'd also been lurking at the hospital when I showed up to check on her as soon as I got Beck's text the next day. I'd never been so glad to have a buffer, and felt less like I deserved one, and after what I grew up with before my mom finally moved us to Copper Valley, that's saying something. Levi hadn't cracked a grin when he'd added, Pissing off Ellie is what you do.

Fuck, man, you got your own problems, Beck had told me. Don't put this on yourself too.

And just like that, I was forgiven.

By them, anyway.

Not by her though.

And not by me.

It's gotten easier to get back in the groove of participating in the group texts with all the guys from the neighborhood, but being here, in Beck's second—third? fourth?—home, surrounded by reminders of his sister, makes me tenser than I've been in months.

Coming here was a bad idea.

But I'm not here for me.

Not entirely.

I squeeze Tucker's shoulder. His gaze has drifted from the chandelier to the life-size cardboard cutout of Beck in his skivvies standing in the corner.

The air-brushing on that thing would be hilarious if my son wasn't gaping at Beck's six-pack. I turn the thing around, then nod toward the hallway beyond the kitchen. "C'mon, little dude. Let's go find the bedrooms."

He nods back. Sort of. I guide him past the kitchen and down the hallway toward the two bedrooms on this level. His suitcase goes into the guest bedroom, and I'm about to fling my duffel inside the master, but the rumpled sheets on the king-size four-poster bed, the glass of water on the heavy nightstand, the open suitcase next to the stone fireplace stuffed with—parrots?—and the flowery scent tickling my nose give me pause.

But it's the soft light flickering in the bathroom doorway that makes the hairs on the back of my neck stand up.

I put a hand out to stop Tucker from coming closer. "Stay here," I murmur, my pulse suddenly hammering.

Since Christmas, it's been just me. Alone. Except the one weekend a month I've flown to Copper Valley to visit my son.

Checking out an intruder? Twenty-eight days a month, I can handle that.

But on the first day I get Tucker for the summer? When it's not just my neck on the line?

This is not how our week of vacation is supposed to go.

I slide my phone out of my pocket and creep softly to the bathroom door, one hand held back to remind Tucker to stay and be quiet.

He's seven.

This isn't going to end well.

But just as I decide getting the hell out of here and calling a sheriff is probably a better idea, I see what's lurking in the bathroom.

A woman.

Alone.

In the corner tub.

Her dark hair is piled in a short ponytail on top of her head. The faint sound of country music drifts out of her earbuds. Candles line the tub shelf and the platform it sits on, causing the flickering glow. The bath bubbles are so high I can't see her face.

My heart gives a squeeze and shoots out guilt, but I tell it to knock it off.

Beck lets anybody who asks use this house.

It's not Ellie.

Her hair's too short and too dark. Ellie always has blond streaks in her hair.

I step onto the cool tile floor, and I'm about to clear my throat to get her attention when Tucker exclaims, "A bubble bath!"

The woman shrieks, straightens, and spins, wide blue eyes connecting with mine for a split second before she disappears.

One second, she's gape-mouthed and goggling like she's just as shocked to see us as we are to see her, and the next, there's a splash that sets my heart spiraling into a panic, because fuck me, that's Ellie.

A flurry of foamy bubbles shoots into the air as she goes under the water. Her arm flaps up, then the other, waving wildly like she's trying to find purchase to pull herself up. I dash across the slick tile to grab for her in the deep tub. My hand connects with soft wet flesh, and suddenly I'm getting a fist to the chest as she breaks through the water. "Back up, asshole. I'll freaking cut you!"

That voice.

It's coming out of a face covered with bubbles from the top of her head to the foam sticking to her eyelashes all the way down to the droopy bubble beard, but I know that voice, and it has my pounding heart suddenly beating from somewhere around my voice box.

"Ellie. Are you—"

The bubble eyes blink. "Wyatt?"

The shriek is amplified by the hard surfaces in the bathroom, bouncing off the glass window over the tub, the mirror, the hard floor.

She gasps, looks down and flings her arms over her bubble-covered chest, and ducks back down, but then she shrieks and disappears under the water again, arms flailing again, and what the hell is she soaking in that's making the tub so slippery?

I bend at the waist to reach into the tub and grab onto her arm and pull, but no sooner does she surface than her eyes narrow. "Let. Go," she sputters around the bubbles cascading down her face.

"So you can drown?" Christ, she nearly died the last time I saw her. I'm not letting her drown.

No matter how much she irritates the snot out of me.

Or how—

Nope.

Not thinking about Ellie in any other way than the annoying and alive ways.

Still, we're so close, I can count the specks of midnight in her blue irises and the new list of reasons she has to hate me.

And I know she's naked under those bubbles.

Not good.

Think about my kid. Remember Beck. Think about Beck in his underwear...

Her eyelids snap up and down, more heat—anger, not interest—surging out of them. "I'm not going to—fu—"

Her words are cut off as she slips and flails again. She doesn't go under, because she grabs a handful of my shirt.

And pulls.

Hard.

The floor slips beneath me, and suddenly I'm falling face-first into the bubbles.

Wet heat crashes over my face and soaks into my T-shirt. I choke on a lungful of soapy water and come up sputtering.

I probably deserve that.

And more.

“What the fu—he—heck was that for?” I spit out around a cough while I shove away from the tub though, because while I can admit to myself that I deserved that, I’m not ready to admit it to her.

I’m still pissed at her for ignoring me so effectively for the past six months.

She huddles in a corner, firmly gripping the faucet. “Get out.”

“Dad, you got bubbles on your head,” Tucker laughs. “Can I have bubbles? Can I take your picture?”

The force of Ellie’s glare is so hot I’m surprised the bubbles don’t melt. “Get. Out,” she repeats.

I swipe water off my face and ignore the stinging in my eyes. “Gladly. You’re welcome for trying to help.”

She flips me the bird.

Not the first time.

Won’t be the last.

Ellie Ryder and me?

We mix as well as water and lava.

And I don’t want to talk about how damn good it feels to finally confirm for myself that she’s still in one piece.

That she’s still breathing.

And that she still hates me.

More so, if that was possible.

I hate that she hates me, but I also need her to hate me.

We’re so damn complicated.

“Can I take a bubble bath?” Tucker wants to know while I pull him back out of the bedroom, grabbing my duffel and then his suitcase from the guest bedroom too. Water sloshes off my shirt and drips onto the runner while we head for the stairs.

Fucking Beck.

He knew.

He knew she'd be here.

Dude, seriously, get the stick out of your ass, screw your pride, and use my place out in Shipwreck. Tucker will love the pirate festival, and you're not gonna get a more comfortable bed. Or a better chance to teach him to play Pac-Man. Or a cheaper vacation. How much are you paying in alimony?

“That was funny, Dad. You were taking a bubble bath with a girl. Mom says I’m too old to take baths with anyone, but you’re way older than me, and you were doing it. Can we take a bubble bath together? I won’t tell Mom. Promise.”

My heart trips again, but this time, it’s an entirely different reason.

How much does he promise his mother he won’t tell me?

He’s already grown an inch and a half since I saw him for two short days last month.

What else am I missing?

Forget Ellie.

Beck’s not lying about how well she’s healing. She’ll be fine, and she can hate me all she wants.

Tucker’s the only thing I need to concentrate on for the next week while I’m on leave. And then every spare minute the rest of the summer until I have to bring him back to his mom.

“Yeah, bud. Let’s go see if there’s a big tub upstairs.”

Hopefully Ellie will clear out by morning.

But even if she doesn’t, we can avoid her. House is big, and we have tons to do in Shipwreck.

She might’ve invaded this house, but she won’t interfere with my vacation with my son.

Unless she needs me.

Not that she'd ever admit it.

And not that I want to admit it either.

I scrub a hand over my face as we step into the first bedroom on the second floor. The queen bed is decked out with a comforter featuring Beck making moon-eyes in his briefs, and the pillow shams are printed with matching pictures of him winking.

Crazy fucker.

“Dad? Why's your friend's picture all over everywhere? And why's he naked?” Tucker asks.

This is going to be one long week.

Chapter Three

Ellie

My doodle pad.

I left my doodle pad in the living room.

Where Wyatt Morgan is headed with his son.

I yank my dripping phone out of the water—wonderful—and hoist myself onto the edge of the tub, stifling a groan at the ache radiating from my left hip to my knee. The scars aren't red and angry anymore, but they're still ugly and twisted, and I still can't move as fast as I used to.

Especially not after slipping in the tub three times. So the answer would be yes, I still need that stupid anti-slip mat.

Dammit.

After I wipe the worst of the bubbles off my face, I do my best not to limp over the towels that I toss on the ground to prevent me from slipping on the slick tile floor. The air's cold now, but my bathrobe is warm, thanks to Beck's towel warmer.

Once I have my slippers on—simple granny slippers with, you guessed it, grippy foot pads on the bottom—and my phone in my robe pocket, I carefully creak open the bedroom door.

There are voices, but they sound like they're coming from upstairs.

It takes me longer than it should to get to the kitchen, dig out a box of Rice-a-Roni—no, my brother apparently doesn't keep plain rice here—and get my phone drying out as best I can.

And then I go in search of my doodle pad.

It's not on the glass end tables, in any of the magazine piles, or tucked into the crocheted ivory afghan on the brown leather couch. Nor is it between the couch cushions or hidden in the recliners. Not in the papers and random old mail on the coffee table, or on the fireplace hearth.

I look at the stack of magazines again, my blood pressure starting to rise.

No one gets to see my doodle pad.

Especially anyone under eighteen.

Or possibly thirty.

Or with a penis.

Or who creeps up on me in the bathtub.

My brother is getting an earful as soon as my phone's dry.

I was doodling out here this afternoon after unloading my car, which I probably should've let Monica help me with, but it's her wedding week, and I'm her maid of honor, dammit, not her friend who needs babysitting. I sat in that recliner, swiveled it to face the scenery, and drew—

Never mind what I drew.

The point is, I distinctly remember setting my doodle pad right there on the end table.

And it's gone.

Nothing else is missing.

Just my doodle pad.

A shriek of laughter from above makes me eyeball the stairs. I could go ask Wyatt where he put it.

Or be polite and ask if he's seen it. The tones of his voice carry through the ceiling as well, low, deep, and carefully modulated, because that's Wyatt for you.

Always calm.

Always in control.

Always right.

Even about mistakes. Oh, fuck, Ellie, we shouldn't have done that.

I shake my head, because the two things I absolutely will not think about are Wyatt's hot, sweaty, naked body on mine, and the sound of metal crunching on metal and glass at sixty miles an hour in the dark.

Fuck.

Now I'm thinking about it.

About the dark. And the cold. And the pain.

The chill starts in my left femur and spreads a shiver through my bladder and up into that spot right beneath the bottom of my breastbone. The scent of blood floods my sinuses. My vision narrows, my skin goes clammy, and I get that itch between my shoulder blades while my lungs shrink to the size of a walnut.

I'm drowning.

I'm drowning in hot metal and sharp glass and snowflakes.

This is not real.

I'm safe.

This is not real.

I grip the edge of the leather recliner and focus on a single green leaf fluttering on an oak in the front yard.

Cool summer breeze. Warm summer sunshine.

I'm safe.

I'm safe.

I'm safe.

My fingers tingle, and my legs wobble, but I can see past the tree now. My lungs expand a little wider, and the rushing in my ears fades as quickly as it arrived.

I'm okay.

I'm okay.

My skin prickles as the last of my panic recedes—it's been two months since the last one, I should've been done with these by now—and a reflected movement in the glass makes me tense up harder.

“Go. Away,” I grit out.

Wyatt’s at the bottom of the stairs. I didn’t hear him coming.

But I hear Wyatt from six months ago.

Fuck, Ellie...shouldn't have done that.

We made a mistake.

You're a mistake.

I squeeze my eyes shut, because he didn’t say that.

He didn’t say any of it beyond we shouldn't have done that.

But why shouldn't we?

Didn’t take much to fill in the blanks.

I was a mistake.

First Patrick—staying together this long was a mistake. If I was supposed to love you, I wouldn't be in love with someone else—and then Wyatt. Fuck, Ellie, that was a mistake.

“Are you okay?” he asks, and his voice prompts another round of cold chills.

But this isn’t the same panicked cold chills still making my thighs and knees quiver, and sending that ache deeper into my left femur.

Nope, that’s regret cold chills.

“Just a little naked,” I reply, because I am naked under my robe, and I’m apparently feeling like being an asshole.

I watch his subtle reflection in the window as his head jerks sideways, like he doesn’t want to look at me naked.

Who’s uncomfortable now?

“Beck didn’t mention you’d be here,” he tells the wall. “I didn’t mean to walk in on you. I thought—I thought one of his old flings had moved in.”

I'm fully aware Beck didn't mention me to Wyatt, because he didn't mention Wyatt to me either. I love my brother, but he's obtuse at best and mischievous at worst. "Sounds about right."

There. That was dignified and aloof without being a total asshole.

"Tucker's never been to the Pirate Festival," he adds.

I look past the trees to Shipwreck, nestled amongst more trees in the valley below.

We're 250 miles inland in the Blue Ridge Mountains in southern Virginia, an hour outside the booming metropolis of Copper Valley, overlooking a pirate town called Shipwreck, named thus because of the legend of Thorny Rock.

Thorny Rock, the pirate. Not Thorny Rock, the mountain named after him and which this house is built on. Which is a crucial distinction, since mountains can't smuggle pirate treasure in wagons, nor could they in the eighteenth century when Thorny Rock founded Shipwreck and supposedly buried all his gold here to hide it from the authorities who were on his trail.

"I'm sure you'll have a lovely time," I tell Wyatt while I tighten my robe ties.

I love the Pirate Festival.

Adore it, even.

But I'm not here for the pirates this week. Or to help dig up the town square—again—in search of Thorny Rock's treasure. Or even to hunt for the peg leg hidden somewhere around town.

Not for myself, I mean. I'm here to be maid of honor while my ex-boyfriend plays best man in my best friend's pirate wedding, since she's marrying his brother.

Apparently while Wyatt gets to dig for treasure and hunt for the peg leg and drink his heart out at The Grog.

Or maybe not the drinking part.

Not when he's here with his son.

That would be a mistake. And Wyatt Morgan doesn't make mistakes.

Not twice, anyway.

An uncomfortable silence settles between us. I want to squirm, but I won't give him the satisfaction of knowing he's getting to me.

"You looked like you needed help," he says. "In the bathtub."

I bite my tongue, because my pre-teen years were basically me telling Wyatt I'll tell you when I need help, now back off, followed by my early teen years where he grew a foot, discovered weights, got hot, and finally left me to my own devices while he did everything with Lydia.

Pretty, perfect, helpless-without-Wyatt Lydia.

Who is none of my business.

Although I'd rather think about Lydia than think about the last time I saw Wyatt.

"Thank you for trying," I say, politely, because it would make my mother proud, and my mother thinks Wyatt hung the damn moon. And I don't want to argue with him right now. I have to save my energy for tonight. And tomorrow. And the next day. All the way until Friday, when Monica and Jason are getting married in the biggest pirate wedding ever seen in Shipwreck.

"Are you...sticking around for a while?" he asks.

"All week." I study the furniture again, looking for the sparkly cover of my doodle pad, but no luck.

He clears his throat like he's eaten a bad banana pepper.

"But I won't be here much," I add "so..."

"Yeah. Us either."

Wyatt and Ellie, sitting in a tree. A-W-K-W-aaaarrrrr-ding!

"Great. I'm actually leaving in..." Shit.

My phone.

I don't have a phone.

I can drive. I've been driving again for two months. In a new hybrid car with more airbags than a bagpipe convention and sensors everywhere because other than refusing to drive a gas-guzzling tank, I didn't have it in me to argue when Beck decided it was his job to make sure I had every safety feature known to man, including the freaking color of car least likely to be in a car accident.

Except the one feature none of us thought I'd need—internal satellite phone support.

I'll always have my phone, which has a voice assistant, and that's plenty good enough, we all agreed.

I don't drive without a phone.

And I can't call Monica—or Grady, my date for the week—because I don't have a phone.

Dammit.

If I don't show up for dinner and the parade tonight, she'll send someone up here to find me, because that's exactly what I'd do if she was my maid of honor and she didn't show up for a planned event on my itinerary when I knew she was still a little jumpy driving and that she had to come down off a mountain to get there because she desperately needed space from a certain other member of the bridal party and therefore wasn't doing the easy thing and spending the week at the Inn.

I didn't tell her I was bringing Grady as my plus-one, just that I was bringing a date, so she won't know she can go to a local for help.

And the only person in the wedding party other than Monica who knows the backroads up the mountain is Patrick.

I flinch at the thought of his name, because while Wyatt was happy to tell me we shouldn't have done that, at least he didn't proclaim to love me with all his heart first.

And at least he didn't bring his smart, skinny, beautiful new girlfriend along for the week.

That would be even better.

Look, Ellie, everyone but you is worthy of love. You couldn't even get a fake date without asking four guys first.

I need to get off this mountain.

And get to that dinner.

I turn to head to the kitchen—Beck might have a spare phone in his junk drawer, not because he thinks of things like spare phones, but because he's unpredictable and just when you think he's completely irresponsible, he pulls out a spare cell phone—and for a moment, I forget that my hip doesn't like to move that fast.

My knee buckles, but I catch myself on the end table before I go all the way down.

Wyatt's crossing the room before I can think boo, but I hold a hand up. "Foot fell asleep," I lie.

Those gray eyes bore into me, and his full lips go flat. Between the military haircut, the square jaw, the broad shoulders, and that glare, I feel like I should offer to drop and give him twenty.

And no, I don't want to talk about what the combination is doing to my libido. My body doesn't get a vote in this.

It did last time, and that didn't end so well.

And I'm not talking about the accident.

I straighten myself and make my way more slowly to the kitchen.

If he notices the limp, he doesn't comment.

If he notices the go away message I'm trying to send him telepathically, he also doesn't comment.

Or go away.

"What do you need?" he asks, and I get another shiver, like he's not asking what I'm looking for in the drawer, but what my soul needs.

I jerk my head toward the island, where my phone is in a bag of rice.

“Ah. Did you take the SIM card out?”

“Yes, Wyatt, I know enough to know to take the SIM card out.”

“Right. Of course you do,” he mutters. “You need to call someone?”

I instantly feel like a jerk, because we’re not kids fighting over the right way to shoot a free throw or kick a soccer ball anymore, and we’re not whoever the hell we were six months ago when he was home for Christmas and Patrick had just dumped me and he’d just gotten a horrific divorce settlement and we were both miserable enough to think we could drown ourselves in meaningless sex between two people who hated each other.

A lot’s changed since then.

Mostly me.

“I’m meeting friends in town.” I move aside a hand squeezer, fingernail clippers, a set of cards with Beck’s picture on them, condoms, and taco sauce packets, among other things, but I’m not finding any spare phones.

Beck changes his number on occasion, and because he’s Beck, I’m pretty sure he forgets to cancel his old contracts, but if he has any spare active cell phones, they aren’t in this drawer.

I should keep a burner phone up here.

“You lost your keys?” Wyatt says.

“I need a phone.”

There’s a pause, then a heavy, “Oh.”

And now there’s also this gigantic guilt giraffe standing in the kitchen, leaning all up in my space.

“Not that it matters, because I don’t know anyone’s number,” I mutter as I realize my other problem.

“You want a lift?” he asks. “Tucker wants to see the parade.”

I open my mouth to tell him that’s not necessary, except...it kinda is.

I can either take his help, or I can scare my friend.

Monica was right on my parents' heels getting to the hospital. She's gone out of her way to have girls' nights—without Patrick's new girlfriend—because just because I'm marrying the idiot's brother doesn't mean I'm giving up my best friend. And she begged to ride out here to Shipwreck with me because you are not driving that far alone right now, period.

She doesn't sugarcoat it.

And I couldn't be more grateful.

And Grady is adorable and kind and well-loved in Shipwreck, and the perfect foil to Patrick and his wonderful new girlfriend, but he's not the kind to panic over me, because he's just a nice guy from town doing me a favor by pretending to be my boyfriend this week.

He's not actually interested.

Wyatt's watching me like he always has. Alert. Focused. Aware.

He probably watches everyone like that. I wonder how many other women have had their hearts broken just because of those eyes.

"If it's not too much trouble," I say.

"We're already heading that way."

"Right. Sure. Thanks."

"When do you need to leave?"

"We have reservations at six."

One corner of his mouth hitches. "Crusty Nut?"

I love Shipwreck. And I love that Monica loves it enough to get married here. "Not like The Grog takes reservations or has good seating for the parade."

"We'll be ready at five-thirty."

"Thank you."

It's just a ride. And I'm doing it for Monica.

And I refuse to feel uncomfortable just because he's seen me naked, played wild bucking stallion to my free-range cowgirl, and then decided to return me for a refund.

If he wants to remember that night, that's his problem.

I am officially moving on.

And I am officially not going to let him see that I care anymore.

Because then maybe I can also convince myself.

Chapter Four

Wyatt

While we wait for five-thirty, I introduce Tucker to the joy of Pac-Man in Beck's basement haven. Because modeling underwear as a second career after being in a boy band for years pays well, Beck has money to burn, and he uses it outfitting his houses with enough games to keep a man busy for three lifetimes. In addition to the old-school Pac-Man arcade game console, he has Ms. Pac-Man and Frogger, plus foosball, table tennis, pool, air hockey, and two closets full to bursting with board games. And more.

This whole house is a man cave, but the basement?

The basement is the cherry on top. Half bar with TV viewing area, half game room, it's where we always hang out when we're here on those rare days we're all in the area at the same time without other responsibilities to tackle, and some of my best adult memories have happened in this basement.

Like the Frogger weekend.

And I am never risking messing up that friendship again.

Not for the houses and the games.

But for the guys who are my only family left beyond my son.

"Run away from the ghosts, bud," I tell Tucker, who's sitting on a red leather bar stool so he's tall enough to man the controller. "You can eat them once you get the dot in the corner."

He shrieks with glee as he races the ghosts back and forth on the bottom row, until the blue ghost eats him.

As Pac-Man falls off the screen, Tucker bursts into tears. "I died!" he wails.

"Whoa, hey, it's okay."

“I died,” he wails harder.

I rub his back, because fuck, what else am I supposed to do? It seems like a silly thing to cry over, but then, he’s seven. He cried once on spring break because a worm dried out on the sidewalk.

Kid has big feelings and a big heart. There’s no way I’m breaking that heart.

The world needs more heart.

“You want to play again?” I ask.

He wipes his eyes, pushing his glasses crooked, and nods. “Uh-huh.”

“You want help?”

“Uh-huh.”

His hair smells like a fruit pie when I lean over him, and his little body is just so little. Even after growing since I saw him last. I kiss his crown and restart the game, covering his small hand with mine. “We’re going to run away from the ghosts, okay?”

“Okay.”

We die twice more before my phone alarm goes off with my two-minute warning to get upstairs and get shoes on.

Tucker heaves a grown-up sigh. “Really, Dad? The alarms again?”

“They keep us on time.”

“Sometimes you just have to live life.”

And that’s his mother coming through. I do my best to keep my expression neutral. “And sometimes, people are counting on us. And other times, we want to get to the pirate parade before we miss it.”

He pushes his hair out of his eyes and hops off the stool, dashing for the stairs and clutching his shorts, which are threatening to fall down his slender hips. “Pirate parade! Pirate parade!”

“Tucker, you forgot your...” I trail off, because he’s gone, running past the basement bar and up the stairs. So I grab the little scrap of a security blanket he still carries with him and trail after him, also grabbing three dirty glasses from beside a glittery notebook on the high bar counter as I pass, though those aren’t our mess. I get to the top of the stairs just a few steps behind Tucker, who’s staring again.

And when I look up, I realize why.

“Not. One. Word,” Ellie says.

“Daddy, a pirate girl came out of the bathtub,” Tucker whispers.

Ellie’s eyes go soft as her dimple pops out when she smiles at Tucker. She’s in a pirate wench dress, with a fluffy white blouse hanging off her shoulders and covered with one of those leather-looking thingies that ties up from her waist to her chest and gives her good cleavage—a corsage? A coriander? A makes-a-man-speechless?—and a flowing gauzy maroon skirt with black stiletto heels coming up to her knees.

I swallow hard and remind my dick that we’re here for my son to go to the Pirate Festival, not for me to lose my head. Again.

Or one of my best friends.

“You may call me Calamity Ellie, captain of the Golden Albatross,” she says to Tucker, ending on a fancy bow that has her wincing when she stands back up.

I start to ask if those boots are a good idea—she looked like she was hurting earlier, and I know she busted her leg and hip bad in the accident—but then I remember who I’m talking to, and I clamp my mouth shut and move past her to put the glasses in the kitchen.

Especially since she’s in full makeup with her hair curled special and hanging down to the tops of her bare shoulders.

She doesn’t look like she’s meeting friends.

She looks like she’s headed for a pirate battle that will be followed with a dance.

Not a care in the world.

Just time to party with the pirates.

“Girls can’t be captains,” Tucker announces as I step out of the kitchen.

I wince and angle back to put a hand on his shoulder. “Never, ever tell a woman she can’t be something. Especially Miss—Captain Ellie.”

“But boys are pirate captains.”

Ellie gives me a look that suggests this is my fault—of course she does—while she puts her fists to her hips. “Is that so, you scurvy dog? You keep talkin’, you’ll be swabbing the poop deck!”

Tucker giggles. “Ew, I don’t want to swap poop on the deck!”

“Then don’t be sayin’ there ain’t girl pirates, sonny boy.”

Ellie winks at him, then sashays past us.

With a limp that puts a rock in my gut.

I’ve never wanted to protect someone so badly while simultaneously being so irritated with her that I want to tie her to a chair and make her promise she’ll quit—quit—hell.

I don’t know what I want her to quit, but I know it’s none of my business.

Tucker falls in line behind her and also limps all the way out the door.

Hell.

Does it still hurt? Beck said they weren’t sure she’d walk again right after it happened.

But I can’t ask.

I don’t have the right.

Not with our history. All of our history.

“Set the alarm, please, powder monkey,” Ellie calls to me as though we’re kids again and she’s just trying to get my goat.

Like our relationship isn’t way more complicated than that.

Like we didn't screw on her parents' basement floor. Like she didn't tear off out of the house right afterward. Like she didn't ignore every last attempt I made to apologize.

"Are you going to the pirate parade with us?" Tucker asks her while I set the alarm and lock up.

"Nay, laddie, I be off to pillage and plunder whilst you all be watching the lesser pirates distract you."

"I'm going to dig for pirate treasure this week."

"Only the luckiest pirates who believe in girl pirate captains will find any gold."

"I know all the pirate stories, and none of them are about girl pirates."

"That's because men pirates write all the books."

"Where did you hear all the pirate stories?" I ask Tucker, and not just to distract him from sticking his foot further down his throat, which of course he doesn't realize he's doing, since he's seven. I talk to him most every night before bed, generally read a story on video chat, and I've never read him a pirate story.

"From Mr. Duffy next door. He lets me water his dog and he tells me about when he was fighting all the pirates before the war."

"Which war?"

"The Civil War."

I make a mental note to ask my ex-wife if she's aware of what Tucker's doing when he's playing outside. She'll probably tell me Mr. Duffy's a harmless old man, but Tucker can't always tell the difference between reality and a good story, and I don't want him getting made fun of at school for talking about his neighbor the vampire pirate hunter.

I hate not being close enough to go see his teachers and just be there for those minutes after school when he talks about his day.

One more year.

Just one more year.

“Keys?” Ellie says to me.

“I locked the door.”

She points to my SUV. “So I can drive.”

“No.”

“That wasn’t a question.”

“This is my car.”

“I have control issues.”

She’s got that stubborn look Beck gets when he’s determined that we’re going to play poker until he wins. And she’s not overtly setting any guilt trips, but she doesn’t have to.

She doesn’t fucking have to.

I approach and dangle my keys between us. “I’m backseat driving.”

She smirks. “Of course you are.”

But she still takes the keys.

I hold the ring steady until she makes eye contact again. “That’s my kid you’re driving,” I add softly.

She holds my gaze without flinching. “Noted. Now, if you don’t want me stealing this thing, you better get in.”

Tucker’s already in the backseat strapping into his booster seat, so I settle into the passenger seat.

Feels weird to be on this side of the car.

But I think I owe her.

She might not realize it yet, but she owes me too.

And since we’re here together, she’s going to pay up.

Chapter Five

Ellie

Shipwreck smells like fried oysters, cannon fire, and dirt. People in pirate costumes stroll along Blackbeard Avenue while locals leap out from behind barrels and out of the local shops to challenge tourists to swordfights.

It's glorious.

I tell Wyatt and Tucker to go on about their business, that I'll get a ride back with a friend, but because Wyatt is Wyatt, he insists on walking with me from the parking fields at the end of the main drag toward Crusty Nut, which has the best fried pickles and banana pudding in all of Virginia, and yes, I have sampled every banana pudding in Copper Valley, and a fair number up in the DC metro area too, so I can say with absolute certainty that Crusty Nut's banana pudding cannot be beat.

Also, if you don't like banana pudding, I'm happy to eat yours. You can have my Twizzlers.

"Tucker, have you ever seen the inside of a pirate ship?" I ask as we pass Scuttle Putt, the miniature golf course at the edge of the park. The entrance to the payment shack is shaped like the bow of a ship, complete with a mermaid figurehead above the door.

Tucker slows.

Wyatt scoops him up and puts him on his shoulders like he's light as a feather. "We'll check it out later."

"Why are you doing this?" I murmur. "I don't need a fu—freaking escort. I'm fine."

"Your brother would kick my ahem if I didn't get you back safe and sound to his house tonight, and we both know it."

"I know everyone in town, and I'll get a ride. Go away."

“Not until I see who’s driving you home.”

I pause outside Crow’s Nest, the local bakery, as I spot the owner just inside the open door, wiping down tables in a pirate costume, complete with eye patch.

Just as he’s supposed to be. “Hey, Grady. You ready?”

I smile, and he smiles back, and for the first time since Wyatt walked in on me in the bathtub, I know tonight’s going to be okay.

“You bet, hot stuff. Give me two seconds to toss this rag.”

Wyatt looks at me.

Then at Grady, who’s six solid feet of dependable, adorable muscle and dimples, topped with a thick mop of dark hair that even his hairnet can’t fully contain.

“What the f—fudge is going on here?” he growls.

“Just picking up my date. Who will also drive me home.”

“Your date.”

“Mm-hmm. Like I said, go about your business.”

Cooper, Grady’s brother, strolls out of the bakery and rubs my hair. Not because he’s older than me, but because he’s taller than me. “Still heartbroken you didn’t pick me, Calamity Ellie.”

“You’re unreliable,” I reply, earning a laugh.

“Dad. Dad,” Tucker whispers reverently while Wyatt continues to glare. “Daaaad.”

“I’m still handsomer,” Cooper points out.

I pretend to study him, then shake my head. “Nah.”

He puts a hand to his heart like he’s wounded. “Aah, Ellie. What’s a guy gotta do to get your affections?”

“You have to pick up your phone when she calls, idiot,” Grady tells his brother as he steps outside, sans the hairnet under his pirate hat. He offers me an arm. “Shall we, Calamity Ellie?”

“Who the hell are you?” Wyatt snarls.

“He’s—” I start, but I’m suddenly squished in a bride-scented hug with a fake parrot smashed into my face.

“Ellie! There you are. Why aren’t you answering your phone?” Monica demands. She’s dressed to the hilt as a pirate captain, with her honey blond hair tied back in a low ponytail under her pirate hat.

“Daddy and Miss Ellie took a bubble bath together!” Tucker announces as I pull back.

Monica’s hazel eyes dart from me to Wyatt to Tucker up on Wyatt’s shoulders, going round as a pirate steering wheel by the time they’re back on me.

Grady drops his arm and takes a step back, brows raised, a slow smile spreading like he’s coming to a conclusion.

Shit.

Shit on a cannonball. This is not how today is supposed to go.

Behind Monica, Patrick, tall, blond, and usually affectedly bored, narrows his eyes like I’m still his business. “A bubble bath? Together?”

“They were all covered in bubbles,” Tucker says with a giggle.

I laugh too, way too high. “And isn’t it dinner time?” I interrupt, because I am not going to dinner solo with my ex-boyfriend and his perfect girlfriend and once again, Wyatt Morgan is screwing up my life. He’s going to ruin my carefully crafted date routine with Grady for the week. “We should get down to Crusty Nut before the parade starts.”

The crowd’s getting thicker, so I’m not wrong.

But Monica, Jason—her fiancé, who’s dressed like a first mate but usually looks like a surfer—Patrick, and his girlfriend, Sloane, don’t move.

“You’re dating again?” Patrick asks, again like it’s his business.

“Dude, I didn’t realize,” Grady says, backing away while Cooper shakes with silent laughter at his brother’s expense.

“Wyatt and I are friends,” I say lightly in a tone that leaves my answer open for interpretation.

Wyatt lifts a brow at me while holding onto Tucker’s legs, because whatever we are, we’ve never really been friends. More like people with opposing personalities who sometimes cross paths in social circles since my brother has always thought he could do no wrong.

But if he’s screwing up my fake date for the week, he’s going to be something other than my friend.

“Why doesn’t your friend join us for dinner?” Patrick says tightly, and that’s right, you dumping asshole, I have men fighting over me.

Sloane angles closer to him. “They’re not in costume,” she points out.

Like all of us, she too is dressed like a pirate. Her costume has red-and-black striped pants loose around her thighs but fitted to her calves, a white blouse, and a leather strap over her shoulder holding her scabbard and fake sword. A matching bandana covers her hair, and she’s sporting skull and crossbones earrings.

Patrick’s costume is nearly identical, except he’s missing the earrings.

And I can’t say a thing, because I would’ve dressed us in matching pirate costumes too.

“Grady was coming with me for dinner,” I say, “because Wyatt and Tucker have never seen the pirate parade, and Pop’s less likely to harass Grady if he’s with us. Wyatt, really, that’s an amazing spot to watch the parade. Tucker will love it. And wait until you see Pop. Pop Rock? Grady and Cooper’s grandpa? He dresses up like Blackbeard every year. It’s glorious.”

I point desperately to a minute space between a lamp post and a family of six right at the curb.

“Wyatt...Wyatt Morgan?” Monica asks.

And I'm done. Totally, completely screwed. My master plan for a fake boyfriend this week is unraveling before my eyes.

So I do the only thing I can to save my pride in the face of disaster.

I link my arm through Wyatt's. "It's new," I whisper, telling my best friend of ten years a bald-faced lie that will undoubtedly kick me in the lady nuts very, very soon. Like as soon as Wyatt opens his mouth and bucks away from me. "And I didn't want to take away from his time with Tucker this week."

There's a muscle working in Wyatt's jaw, but his gray eyes aren't glaring.

Nope, they're shifting into neutral. He disentangles himself from my arm, but then wraps his tightly about my shoulders, which is a little awkward with Tucker up on his shoulders, but he manages anyway. Because he's Wyatt.

Of course he can hold a kid and me.

"I don't share," he says with a pointed look at Grady.

Cooper has a coughing fit.

"Dad," Tucker howls, kicking Wyatt in the pec. "That's Cooper Rock."

"I'm free tonight, Ellie," Cooper says. He winks at Wyatt.

"And you're staying free," Wyatt replies pleasantly.

Too pleasantly.

Like he's bantering with Beck and the guys.

"Wyatt Morgan?" Monica repeats again.

"I know that name," Patrick says with a frown.

I shrug and put on what I hope is an embarrassed smile, rather than the mortified dread I'm feeling at the farce I'm going to have to pull off all fucking week if I don't want to be the fifth wheel for my best friend's wedding to my ex-boyfriend's brother. "You know what they say about that line between love and hate."

Monica's hazel eyes are so wide under her feathered pirate wench hat that she's in danger of losing an eyeball. "Well, yeah, I mean, I always suspected as much, but...oh my god, Ellie! I'm so fuc—freaking happy for you!"

She tackles me in a hug, babbling about needing all the details while I reel a little, because what the hell does I always suspected as much mean?

"Monica, seriously, this is your week. Wyatt and I are just... we're taking it slow. He doesn't really care if Grady comes to dinner with us."

Wyatt's grip—yep, he's still holding on, despite Monica trying to strangle me with a hug too—tightens so hard that if my shoulders were walnuts, they'd be walnut butter. "Yes, I do."

"DAD, THAT'S COOPER ROCK!" Tucker hollers.

Cooper, who no longer has any shot of anonymity, steps out from behind his brother to offer Tucker a fist bump. "Give it up, little buddy. You like the Fireballs?"

Tucker nods solemnly while he looks at his fist. "Dad says loyalty's important, even in the face of great loss."

Cooper pounds his heart twice with his fist. "Dang straight. Your dad's a smart guy."

"You'll get 'em this year," Tucker declares.

Cooper winces. Grady winces. Half the street winces.

Since Chicago won the World Series a few years ago, Copper Valley's pro baseball team has taken over as the sport's most lovable losers.

And they're embracing the title with gusto this year.

"They will, won't they, Tucker?" I say.

"They really will." He beams at me like we're going to be best friends, and I think he could be right.

Monica's frowning. "I don't know if Crusty Nut can fit two more people at our table."

“It’s okay,” I tell her quickly. “Tucker will love the parade so much more from right here. He can’t catch as much booty if he’s up on the balcony with us. Wyatt’s okay with this, aren’t you, honey?”

I lift my eyes to his, and that’s a mistake.

Because he’s promising me a lot of retribution in that colorful gray gaze. And if you think gray can’t be colorful, you’ve never pissed off a gray-eyed man.

“Looks like I have to be,” he replies.

“But you have to join us for lunch tomorrow,” Monica announces. She squeezes my hand. “Oh my god, Ellie, I always thought this might happen.” She throws herself around Wyatt too, and the parrot wobbling on her shoulder, stitched to her pirate captain costume, pecks Tucker’s bare calf. “You better be good to her, or I’ll slice your nuts off with my pirate sword and tie a cannonball to your ankles and shoot you over the mountains.”

Tucker gasps.

“She’s teasing,” Wyatt tells him quickly.

Monica smiles.

It’s an ugly smile.

I like it.

Wyatt smiles back.

It’s a tight smile.

My life is going to be hell as soon as I get back to Beck’s place tonight.

“Can you drive me home?” I ask Monica. “Tucker has an early bedtime.”

“Of course!” she squeals.

Patrick’s still glaring.

And since Patrick’s glaring, Sloane the wonder nurse is also glaring.

Only Jason, Monica's laid-back fiancé who's been watching all of this with an amused smile, is still blissfully unaware of all the weirdness.

It's remarkable that Patrick and Jason share genes, because that's the only thing they have in common.

"You'll drive safely," Wyatt informs Monica.

She rolls her eyes at him. "First one to the hospital. I got it."

He finally releases his grip on me.

"Go on, get that spot," I tell him. "Tucker, you're going to love the parade."

"Can we all have a bubble bath tonight?" he asks.

"No," Wyatt and I answer together.

The adults lining the parade route all chuckle with Grady, Cooper, Monica, and Jason. "You are adorable," Monica informs Tucker. "We're going to be good friends this week."

She's not going to see them at all this week if I have any say in it.

Far better to have a boyfriend who's an amazing single dad from afar than to have to put on a show for my friend and my ex-boyfriend anyway.

Maybe this will work out after all.

"Enjoy the parade," I tell Wyatt. "I'll see you back at the house."

His lips twitch, because Wyatt and I don't do see you later.

We never have.

As kids, we'd part on me shouting shut up and let me do it my way to his fine, do it your way and lose, you crazy buttwipe. As adults, there's less shouting, but generally more eye-rolling.

Until that last time.

Over Christmas.

He bends down and kisses my cheek. “I’ll miss you, schmoopsy-poo.” Quieter, he adds, “And we’re discussing this later.”

“I’ll miss you too,” I say breathlessly.

Monica loops her arm around mine and tugs gently, prodding me into falling into step beside her.

Well, limp.

These shoes were a terrible idea.

I give Grady a quick, “Sorry about that,” over my shoulder, but he just grins and waves me off.

“Good to see you happy, Ellie.”

I don’t look at Wyatt.

I can’t.

“Why didn’t you ever tell me he was hot?” Monica asks, because she came into my life after Wyatt was already gone in the military, and I realize with a start that she’s never actually met him.

“Most of my life, I didn’t look at him that way,” I answer honestly.

“I’m gonna need this bubble bath story.”

“I’m sure it’s nothing you’ve never done yourself,” I reply.

“Your leg hurts, doesn’t it?”

“What’s pain when I look like a million Spanish galleons?”

She rolls her eyes, then glances back.

I look back too, and spot Wyatt buying a foam sword for Tucker from a passing street vendor.

Except he’s not buying just one.

He’s buying two.

He swings Tucker down, squats and holds his sword in the ready position, and then staggers in mock pain as Tucker gets him in the gut.

“Right,” Monica murmurs, fanning herself. “Not hot at all.”

That’s right.

He’s not hot at all.

I just have to pretend he is.

It’s only four days. And barely a few little lies.

It’ll all be just fine.

Chapter Six

Wyatt

I don't like leaving Ellie in Shipwreck, but she's a grown-up, she's with friends, and one of the guys from the bakery—Cooper? Hell, I haven't kept up with the Fireballs this year—came out to chat for a while during the parade, and while I won't admit it to Ellie, he passed my gut test.

Seems like a decent guy.

So does his brother, Grady, who apologized again for the mix-up and told me I was a lucky guy.

So she has good people looking out for her in a safe small town, and she'll be okay.

But after I read six bedtime stories with Tucker, promise we'll go miniature golfing and try to dig up pirate treasure and look for the hidden peg leg that's supposed to come with a treasure of its own tomorrow, and hug him tight because it's so damn good to be able to hug him—video chat and phone calls aren't the same, and now that he's starting soccer and baseball, there's less time to talk—I head to the living room to wait for Ellie to get back.

It's possible she won't come back tonight.

Cooper wasn't shy with information, and while Tucker raked in candy, pirate rings, fake gemstones, and more from the floats passing by, I found out Ellie's in town for her best friend's wedding. Most of the wedding party is staying at the Shipwreck Inn. Her ex-boyfriend—I thought the Blond Caveman looked familiar—is the best man and brought the woman he dumped her for just before her accident. Ellie's been in town a lot the last six months—especially while she was recovering at first—and Cooper's glad Beck sent someone to keep an eye on her while she's feeling so lost.

That last part is what has me dialing my buddy, even though I think he's somewhere in Europe on a photo shoot and it's probably two in the morning at the earliest wherever he is.

Hell, I don't even know if his cell number works in Europe.

But, because he's Beck, he answers on the second ring.

"Wyatt, my man, what's up? How's the house?" Beck says in my ear.

I glance at the mess in the kitchen, and I shove up to tackle it, because it's annoying me. "Occupied."

Beck laughs. "If you're there, it must be."

"Ellie's here."

There's silence, and for half a second, I think he's going to pull the Connection's breaking up card, but then he simply says, "Huh."

Not like he's surprised.

Not like he's not either.

I stack up plates, cups, mugs—someone likes tea, it seems—silverware and dirty napkins from the dining room and carry them into the kitchen.

I don't have room to call Beck on any bullshit—it's my fault his sister was in a car accident that put her in the hospital for a month and still has her limping—but if he wants something from me, he damn well needs to come out and ask before I fuck this up.

Again.

"Ryder..."

"You remember that year we played Trivial Pursuit over Christmas break and you and Ellie ended up having a ranch dressing fight in the snow?"

"She called me a cheater."

"Bro, you did cheat."

"I did not."

“You memorized the cards.”

“There was nothing else to read.”

“Whatever. The point is, think of all the good memories. How about that time she went apeshit because you were using her art projects for target practice?”

“You brought them out and didn’t mention they were—”

“Good times, good times.” He sighs happily. “Man, I wish I could be there with you guys. Wonder if you’d wrestle me over Frogger again like that time—”

“What the hell are you smoking?”

“Fresh air, man. The best fresh night air Spain has to offer. You ever been to Spain? It’s gorgeous.”

Shithead’s avoiding my questions.

He knew Ellie would be here. And he knows we can’t stand each other. I stifle a growl of frustration while I plug the sink, squirt soap in, and flip on the faucet.

“I found her in the bathtub,” I grit out. I can tell him I found her in the bathroom, but I will not confess to my best friend that we’ve gone a lot farther than that.

Being friends with Beck Ryder saved my life, and it doesn’t matter if we go a few months without talking, that will never change.

Nor will I ever do anything to potentially screw it up again.

I keep waiting for Ellie to tell him, for him to turn on me, but apparently she either doesn’t remember or doesn’t want him to know.

So I’m not going to tell him either.

“You found her in the bathtub? Doing Jell-O shots or something?”

Beck might play the egotistical, idiot underwear model, but I’ve known him for too many years for me to fall for this bullshit. “Naked.”

“Ah. Yeah, that makes more sense. Were you naked too?”

“Christ on a butter knife, you jackass. Who asks that?”

“Wyatt. You’re my bro. You think we’d be friends if I didn’t think you were good enough for my sister? Nah, man. I’ve seen how you two look at each other. Far be it from me to interfere.”

I’m momentarily speechless, because I didn’t think that was how the bro code worked. And Beck and a few other guys we grew up with made a name for themselves as the band Bro Code for a lot of years.

So don’t tell me the bro code isn’t important to him.

It’s everything.

He’s gotta be messing with me, so I go with the easy response. “She looks at me like she’d like to slice out my kidneys and roast them over a campfire.”

“Young love, man. Young love is beautiful.”

“Ryder.”

“Dude. It ever occur to you that maybe it would mean a lot to me if one of my best buddies could finally just suck it up and get along with my sister? Is that too much to ask?”

I briefly consider Levi or Davis or one of the Rivers brothers asking Ellie on a date, and I decide it doesn’t matter that they, too, are like brothers to me, I’d smash all their faces in.

“What the hell’s actually going on?” I ask.

I wash six glasses while I wait for him to answer, and when he finally does, I wish I hadn’t asked.

“You know that accident Ellie was in?”

The pit of my stomach drops just like it did when I got his text the day after I screwed up. “We all know about Ellie’s accident, man.”

“She’s been...reserved since then.”

“She wasn’t fucking reserved when she punched me for trying to save her from drowning and then dunked me in the tub,” I say dryly.

“Really? That’s great!”

I swipe a hand over my face, because I’m getting annoyed. Beck’s always lived in his own world, but this is extreme, even for him. “She dropped her phone in the tub, so it might be a while before she calls to bitch you out.”

“Even better,” he says cheerfully.

“Push comes to shove, she tells me to leave, you know I’m gone.”

“Whoa, whoa, hold up.” Beck’s suddenly serious as banana pudding, which is pretty damn serious in these parts. “Okay, okay. Yes, I knew Ellie was going to be there. That’s why I kept talking up the pirate festival for Tucker. She...needs you.”

“Your sister. Eleanor I can do it myself Ryder. She needs me.”

“Wyatt. She doesn’t know it, but yeah, she needs you. She’s just—she hasn’t been herself since the accident. And that prick Patrick dumping her right at the holidays for his neighbor—she’s always had this life plan, you know? Finish school, take over for Mom and Dad, get married, have three kids, live happily ever after. But it’s all...I mean, work’s good. It’s about all she does anymore. I told you she qualified to run the New York City Marathon this year, didn’t I? Qualified back before the accident. Now she can’t do it. She’s just...it’s like she’s giving up. She puts on the show, but she doesn’t talk about her plans anymore like she used to.”

I grunt, because yeah, Ellie was always making plans. When I’m in high school, I’m going to be on the soccer team. When I’m in college, I’m going to make the Dean’s list. When I go to work for Mom and Dad, I’m going to convince City Hall to hire us to make the building green. When I get married, I’m going to have two-point-four kids and a dog and a parakeet named Sue.

“You know what I’m talking about,” Beck says. “And the thing is...you irritate the shit out of her. So maybe...I don’t know. Just give her something normal. Annoy her until she starts planning on annoying you back. And I know she’s there at that wedding with her dickweed ex too. Drop-kick him for me a couple times, would you?"

I drop a clean plate into the drying rack before it registers that Ellie hasn't been cleaning her own dishes.

Ellie doesn't leave messes. She's too type A for that.

Something is wrong. "You know there's something really fucked up about asking me to irritate your sister."

"I wouldn't trust another soul for this job. Because I know you won't hurt her. Irritate the hell out of her, yeah. But hurt her? Not you, man."

Damn it.

I already did that, didn't I?

"Are you serious?"

"Everyone's treating her with kid gloves. She needs to know she can still do stuff."

"She's down in town in high heel pirate boots. I think she knows she can still do stuff."

"Yeah, and I'm just a dumbass egomaniac who models underwear."

Right. The Ryders know how to put on a face for the world. Doesn't mean that's the real story.

"I'm not going to try to pick fights with your sister to make her feel better." Especially not when she's just told the bride that I'm her damn boyfriend.

Which I'm still in denial about, because I'm not spending this week confusing my kid.

But I don't like how her ex was looking at her.

I don't want to let him think she's easy pickings right now either.

Beck laughs. "Like you have to try to irritate her. Just be you. It'll happen."

"Why don't you try to annoy her?"

“Can’t. She’s my baby sister, and she’s hurt. My instinct is to protect and save.”

“You just asked me to annoy her.”

“That’s different. Plus, it was Levi’s idea. I thought you two loved each other. I forgot all those times she threw dog poop at you when we were playing volleyball and you tried to help her serve better.”

I can’t believe I’m smiling over that memory, but here we are. “I was honestly surprised the day I heard she actually graduated college without getting arrested.”

“Mom says she never found where she fit in. Toss in teenage hormones and having us for role models, and she was basically doomed. But I think Levi’s right. She always hated you the most.”

“Appreciate that.”

“She can’t go too hard on you. Not with Tucker around. She loves kids.”

And I can’t go too hard on her.

Not with Tucker around.

Kid needs a good role model, not a fucked-up one. Especially since I know his mother’s dating again.

But the only thing I learned about being a good role model, I learned from my buddies’ fathers. Not my own.

“She’s gonna be okay, Beck,” I tell him. “She’s too stubborn not to be.”

“Thanks, man. I owe you one.”

“No, you don’t.”

“Quit being a pain in the ass. And don’t beat my high score on Frogger or I’ll ship you a box of dicks at work.”

“You coming home anytime this summer?”

“Sometime.”

“Swing by Georgia when you do. I need you to show Tucker that all these pillows and cardboard cutouts of you are airbrushed so he doesn't get body image issues. And bring your baby book. The one with the picture of you swimming in cake with your baby belly hanging over your diaper."

He laughs. "You got it."

I hang up and finish the dishes, clean out the fireplace, and take out the trash before settling in to listen to an audiobook in the darkened living room.

Because if Ellie's coming home tonight, we're going to talk.

About everything.

Chapter Seven

Ellie

In addition to my brain reeling from trying to keep my story about Wyatt straight all night, my thigh and hip are full-on throbbing by the time Monica pulls to a stop beside Wyatt's SUV in Beck's driveway. A single lamp shines in the front window and the porch light glows bright in the dark, starless night. Once she has the car in park, she turns to look at me. "Sorry I didn't get you home in time to take advantage of Wyatt."

"Parenting is exhausting. We'll have plenty of time later. And Wyatt knows I'm here for you this week. Like I know he's here for Tucker to see the Pirate Festival. It's just a bonus that we get any time at all."

Gag me. But she'll freak more if she knows I'm faking this, and I do not want to distract her from the joy of her pirate wedding week.

She leans over to hug me tight. "Thank you so much for being here this week."

"Are you kidding? I wouldn't miss this for the world."

"Am I a horrible person if I say I could really like Sloane if she wasn't dating Patrick?" she whispers.

"Patrick's going to be your brother-in-law. So probably."

"I meant the being disloyal to you part."

"Oh, stop. I have Wyatt. Patrick has Sloane. The world has moved on. Besides, I think I could like her too. Did you hear her story about the patient who kept trying to trade her chocolate bars for tequila? That was really funny."

"But I'm still on Team Ellie."

"We're not on teams."

“But I’m totally on Team Wyatt. I swear, Ellie, if he turns into a douche too after all this build-up—”

“What build-up?”

“You don’t spend years claiming to hate a man, then screw his brains out, then nearly get yourself killed in an accident and refuse to even admit you screwed his brains out for months afterward, and not have secret feelings for him. You just don’t.”

I gape at her.

“This isn’t about the accident, is it?” she asks, her brow furrowing in the dim light. “Because if he’s doing this because he feels guilty, and not because he’s always been unable to handle knowing that you’re his soul mate, then I might have to slice his balls off. And I don’t want to do that. Not when I think of the trauma to his kid.”

“You are such a nut.”

“And you love me for it.”

I really do. She’s like a female version of Beck. Fun, intentionally obtuse, and sometimes annoying, but always with good intentions, and always there to have your back.

I could do without the inference that Wyatt and I are soul mates though, because while it’s fantastic for a cover story, it’s horrible for my indigestion. “I hope I can be as good a friend as you someday,” I tell her.

“Hush your mouth. Who’s limping around on pirate boots to appease the bride?”

“I’m not limping.”

“You will be when I kick you out of this car so I can go back to town and break into Jason’s room for crazy parrot sex.”

“Crazy parrot sex?”

“Huh. I was going for monkey sex with a pirate theme. That didn’t quite work, did it?”

I give her one last hug before I swing the door open. “I love you, you goober. Go seduce your fiancé until you can’t walk tomorrow.”

“Well, if I must.” She winks. “Help you to the door?”

“No. I’ve got this. You go.”

“And you go have crazy parrot sex too. Understand me? And call me if you need a ride tomorrow. I mean, if Wyatt’s willing to let you out of his sight again.”

I lift the bag of two burner phones I grabbed to keep here, because no guest should ever be without access to a phone. “I should be fine, and my phone will be all dried out by tomorrow night. But thank you.”

After I assure her that yes, I also now have her phone number, Jason’s phone number, and Grady’s phone number written on a piece of paper to give to Wyatt and program into both of the burner phones I picked up at Peg Legs and Planks—yes, the hardware store here sells burner phones—I climb out of her car.

I make it to the front door without limping despite the pain shooting from my knee to my tailbone, but I refuse to let Monica see me hurting. It’s her wedding week, and she doesn’t need to worry over me.

I wave as I push open the door. She reverses in the darkness to head back down the mountain to town, and as soon as I’m inside, I crumple to a heap against the wall beside the door and let out a soft groan.

The bedroom is a long freaking way away. Past at least seven massive floor tiles in the foyer, then down a hallway the length of six football fields, through the door, and a walk from here to China to get to the bed.

Or so it feels.

Five minutes.

I just need five minutes to sit here, kneading my twisted thigh muscle and resting my achy hip joint, and then I’ll be fine.

“Need help?”

I shriek in surprise at the voice coming out of the semi-darkness, and I realize I'm not alone.

Wyatt's up.

Dammit.

"Just wondering the last time Beck's maids dusted the floorboards. Plus, you get a totally different angle on that artwork." I point to a row of prints on the wall outside the kitchen.

"The three-piece selfie of Beck's nostril?"

"Most people think it's a cave."

"Most people don't know Beck very well."

He's barefoot, in cargo shorts and a polo with a military-looking logo on his breast pocket, and when he tucks his thumbs in his belt loops and leans against the wall, my ovaries do a backflip, because yes, Wyatt Morgan is quite the handsome man.

And possibly I shouldn't have had that glass of wine three hours ago. Clearly it's still affecting my judgment.

"Overdid it?" he asks.

My eyes narrow and I start to scowl, and then the oddest thing happens.

Instead of narrowing his eyes right back at me, his lips twitch like he's holding in a smile, he lifts his eyes to the ceiling, mutters, "Dammit, Beck," and suddenly I'm more curious than I am irritated.

Until he squats down and picks me up, that is.

I yelp and try to twist, but I jolt my leg wrong and I end up gasping for breath and gripping him around the neck instead. "What are you doing?" I grit out.

"Annoying you," he says as he straightens and moves toward the hall.

He hasn't shaved. I could try to count his short whiskers if I wanted to. He's always clean-shaven. Maybe he's being a pirate this week too.

“You are not welcome in my bedroom.”

“That’s seventy miles away or so, isn’t it? Which part of Copper Valley is your house in again?”

“Quit being a smart-ass.”

“I don’t need help.”

I am such a liar. Every step he takes closer to the bedroom is like a weight being lifted off my shoulders. One less step I have to take...two less...three...

“Don’t even—” I start.

His lips twitch again.

Right there. Right in front of my face. His lips are twitching.

Like I amuse him.

I don’t amuse anyone. Annoy them, yes. It was one of the reasons Patrick broke up with me. Ellie, you’re just...so perfectionist, it’s annoying. I’m well aware that my project managers back home at work are relieved as hell that I’m on vacation, but I also know that having high standards is the only way I’m going to continue my parents’ legacy and grow their business when they retire in a few years.

Which is in a few years.

Not right here.

Tonight.

With Wyatt not even breaking a sweat or straining while he carries me into the master bedroom, despite the weight I’ve gained since the accident.

“Thank you,” I grumble when he sets me gently on the bed.

“You’re not really welcome.”

I gasp in surprise.

He purses his lips together and turns, but not before I see his gray eyes twinkling.

Twinkling.

Like he's enjoying being a shit.

"I should ask you to fetch my pajamas, but I sleep naked, so there's no point," I announce.

"You want a cowbell so you can call me to hang up your dress when you've flung it across the room?"

There's no heat in his words. It's like we're playing a game not to see who can be more insulting, but who can be more outrageous.

Because there's no way in hell anyone would give me a cowbell.

There's also no way in hell he's flirting with me, which is the other possibility reeling through my mind.

"I prefer a foghorn." I bend to tug my boot off, and another splinter of pain makes me suck in a breath.

I really, really overdid it tonight.

Without looking at my face, Wyatt bends over my feet and tugs my boots off, first my right foot, then ever-so-carefully my left foot.

I duck my head, because there's a sudden burn in my eyes that's drifting into my sinuses as well. "Please don't be nice to me," I whisper. "Not when we're alone. Though you owe me pretending to be my boyfriend this week, because that was a shitty thing to do to Grady."

"I just wanted to confirm your feet stink. And they do."

I shove him without thinking, because that's what we do. "They do not."

"I called you."

And now I want to hit him for real, because the shift in his tone means he did just say exactly what I thought he just said, about exactly what I've been afraid he'll want to talk about, and we are not talking about this. “My phone got busted in the accident. It’s apparently a recurring problem.”

“Beck had you a new phone with your same number sitting by your bed the minute you were conscious.”

“So?”

“So, I tried calling you for weeks.”

I swallow hard, because he’s not taking my easy excuses. And the truth isn’t nice. “I didn’t want to talk to you.”

“You usually don’t. But—”

“No buts. Thank you. I can get my dress.”

“I didn’t mean to hurt you.”

“All water under the bridge. You were right. It was a mistake. Didn’t happen. Moving on. Okay?”

He takes my chin in his fingers and lifts my face until I can’t help but look at him while he studies me with those intense gray eyes.

His lashes are stupidly thick. They’re not long, but they’re thick. And his nose is slightly off-center, but not in a weird way. Just in a rugged way.

And his lips—

I’m breathing too loud. And he’s watching me too closely.

Like he can see way down deep to the fourteen-year-old girl inside who turned around one day and realized that one of my older brother’s best friends was cute. And a little awkward, and still annoying with the way he always seemed to know everything, but also reliable and familiar but...new.

And dating Lydia Baker, who was smart and pretty and on the cheerleading squad. Not the head cheerleader, but still a cheerleader.

He was seventeen to my fourteen, which was basically illegal, and because I’ve always been that girl who knew everything, yes, I knew he was illegal, and I knew why I got all warm in my belly when he looked at me, and I was also pissed that I couldn't control my body's reaction to him.

But I don't feel like I know anything tonight.

I don't know who I am.

I don't know why I'm here.

I don't know what I want.

Not past the next five minutes, anyway.

It's not the first time I've felt this way.

And the last time ended with me broken.

"Was it my fault?" he asks.

"You weren't driving the car, Wyatt."

"But it was my fault you were."

It wasn't. He didn't force me into the car. He didn't choose my route. He didn't make me do anything.

He even tried to stop me.

"It takes two. Quit being the martyr."

"Nobody trusted Beck to give us the truth about how you were doing. And you wouldn't answer your phone. I was scared shitless."

"I'm fine. Same old annoying Ellie."

And there he goes again, seeing right through me. "Yeah. Same old annoying Ellie."

Dammit. I whimper out a laugh, because it's so damn normal to have Wyatt calling me annoying that I'm in danger of crying. "Shut up."

"Annoying, know-it-all Ellie," he adds.

I reach out to shove his shoulder, but there's no speed or force behind my hand, and I end up resting it on his bicep instead.

"Mansplaining Wyatt," I whisper.

His eyes are boring into mine the same way they did that night while he plants his hands on either side of my legs. "Planner

Ellie.”

“Stick up your butt Wyatt.”

“Refuses to take help Ellie.”

“Refuses to admit anyone else can know how to do anything Wyatt.”

Our faces are drifting closer. This is a bad idea. We’ve been here before, and it ended in disaster. Worse than disaster. I need to shove him away for real.

Or...we need to practice so that on the rare occasions this week when we have to be seen together in public for whatever reason—Shipwreck isn’t that big—we can fake affection.

“Jumps to conclusions Ellie.” His breath tickles my nose.

“Obnoxious—” I start, but I stop when our lips touch.

A shudder races through me, but it’s not a bad shudder. It’s not a good shudder either. It’s my body craving human affection while my mind recoils in fear, because the last time I was here, with Wyatt, his perfect lips rubbing mine, his hot breath lighting up my veins, it literally changed the entire course of my life.

Maybe this is what I need to do.

Maybe kissing him will end this weird limbo I’ve been in. It’ll make the pain in my leg go away. I’ll find my balance at work again. The stars will realign, the man of my dreams will walk in the front door, I’ll start running again, and I’ll be living the life I always wanted to have.

I won’t care that Patrick’s life went on perfectly with his nurse girlfriend. I won’t care that my injuries might be more than skin and bone deep. I won’t care that I have to pick a new future for myself.

My free hand loops around his neck and drifts up to rub the prickles of his short hair. He suckles my lower lip and leans me back to the pillow, deepening the kiss as we go.

This isn’t the kiss we had at Christmas.

No, this is a who are you? kiss. It's an I've been worried sick over you kiss. A let's do this right kiss.

I've hated this man most of my life, from the day his grandmother knocked on our door and asked Beck if he could come out and play with the short, wide-eyed, floppy brown-haired boy with the stained T-shirt, through my pre-teen years when he grew into an obnoxious know-it-all, into my teen years when he didn't even acknowledge I existed anymore.

I shouldn't like kissing him.

Last time he kissed me, he told me it was a mistake.

And it was. It was the biggest mistake of my life.

But now I'm stroking my tongue against his and my breasts are aching for his touch and my clit is pulsing with a desperate need for attention.

I haven't had sex in six months.

Not since Wyatt.

Not since the accident.

I part my legs, and pain erupts in my left thigh. I break the kiss with a gasp, Wyatt and I make eye contact, and he leaps off the bed. A brief flash of terror skitters over his face before he rubs his hands into his eyes and takes one more step toward the door. "Do you have pain meds somewhere?"

"That bad, was it?" I deadpan while I rub my thigh.

He watches my hands and doesn't even spare me a dirty look. "For your leg."

"I'm fine."

He mutters a curse and stalks into the bathroom. I hear him riffling through my crap, and I don't bother telling him to stay out of my stuff since he won't listen anyway, and a pain pill sounds like heaven.

Not quite as much heaven as him kissing me, which is a paradox I don't want to deal with right now, but I take some comfort in knowing he'll see my vibrator if he looks hard enough, and let him think about that all night long.

He returns, slaps a prescription bottle on the nightstand, and marches out of the room.

My body sags, and I realize I must look crazy in my pirate wench costume. My mascara's probably running, and who knows what's happened to my lipstick.

I'm unscrewing the bottle when he appears in the doorway again with a glass of water. I ignore it and swallow my pill whole, almost choke, because I hate taking pills dry, and then reluctantly gulp the rest of it down with a glass of water.

"Give me your phone," I say crossly.

He hands it over wordlessly.

I hand it back because it's password-protected and glare at him.

He unlocks it, still without saying a word, and once again gives it to me.

Once I find Beck's number—what the hell? They freaking talked earlier. My brother is dead—I program it into one of the burner phones, then surrender Wyatt's phone to him. "Thank you."

"You're welcome."

We're the most obnoxiously polite people in the world right now.

He stares at me a beat too long.

I stare back.

You're not a bad kisser.

"You're on the hook for playing my boyfriend all week," I inform him. "My smitten boyfriend who adores me. And don't try to get out of it. You asked for this when you ruined my plans with Grady."

"Fine."

"Fine?" What the hell? He's not going to argue?

"Yes. Fine."

"I'm telling Beck."

“So he can blab to Monica that it’s fake?”

“So he doesn’t freak out when he sees you grabbing my ass in any of Monica’s photos.”

He smirks. “So that’s what you want from me.”

“Yes, Wyatt. I want you to be a total Neanderthal and take me on every horizontal surface in Shipwreck, and then I want you to fondle me in public until we both get arrested for indecent exposure, because you’re so manly and I just can’t resist the allure of your testosterone.”

He smirks again. “Goodnight, Ellie.”

I scowl, because he’s not taking the bait, and I’m out of other ideas to annoy him. “Goodnight, Wyatt.”

He snorts softly, which feels like him getting the last word, when he’s probably making a not-so-silent commentary on me getting the last word.

I don’t snort back. For the record.

Not until he closes the door anyway.

Chapter Eight

Wyatt

Tucker and I are at the island in the kitchen, chowing on eggs, Mrs. Ryder's biscuits—god bless that woman for teaching me to cook—and bacon, debating if we're going to play miniature golf at Scuttle Putt first or go check out Davy Jones's Locker—Shipwreck's water park—when the doorbell rings.

We both look at the tablet hung under the cabinet, because everything around this house is wired with security cameras, including the doorbell. Half a biscuit falls out of Tucker's mouth. "Dad..." he whispers while I take in the muscled guy on the front porch with a bicycle leaning against his hip and a white bakery bag in hand. "That's Cooper Rock. Cooper Rock came to see us."

"Yeah, bud, looks like he did."

While I'm sitting there growling to myself, wondering why a pro baseball player is dropping by at this hour of the morning, Tucker takes off like a shot, dashing to the door and flinging it open. "Cooper Rock! You came to see us! Can I have your autograph? Can we play catch? Can you please win today? I know you can win. You won a game just last week. You can do it again."

I put in the alarm code while it beeps in warning, then pull Tucker off the guy, who's grinning in amusement once again. "Gonna do my best, little man. You like donuts?"

"Yeah!"

"Have to save two for Ellie, but here, you can have the rest."

"Eggs first," I tell Tucker, rescuing the bag before he can make off with it and eat all seven pounds of donuts inside.

"But, Dad—"

"Go on. You were almost done anyway."

He looks back at Cooper. “Can you sign my arm?”

“How about a pirate sword?”

“Yeah!”

Cooper points to a sword on Beck’s entryway table. “May I?”

I hand it to him. He pulls a Sharpie out of his back pocket and scribbles his name, then presents it to Tucker, who stares in awe.

“How’s Ellie?” Cooper asks.

I cross my arms and study him carefully, because I don’t care if he plays baseball or if he’s a fucking priest, and I don’t care how nice he was last night, I want to know if he has ulterior motives for asking. “Fine,” I say shortly.

“She’s still sleeping,” Tucker offers.

Cooper clearly tries to swallow a grin, though I don’t know which of us he’s more amused by.

“She should be, the way she was dancing last night.”

“She was dancing?”

“But don’t worry. We helped her get up on the table and made sure she didn’t fall down.”

“You—”

“Man, you should see your face.” He shakes his head. “She sat at the balcony table at Crusty Nut most of the night, then did the mini-golf course with her friends. But good to know she’s in good hands.” He slaps me on the shoulder and turns, straightening his bike as he flashes Tucker a grin. “Thanks for the support, little man. Stay strong, okay?”

My boy nods. “The Fireballs are gonna come back and win the World Series this time for sure! I’ve waited seven years for this.”

“Yeah, I’ve waited twenty. And I gotta run, or I’m gonna be late getting back to the city for practice.”

“Hit a home run!” Tucker yells, but I hear something else too.

Something that distinctly sounded like a woman yelling, “Oh, fuck!”

Somewhere beneath us.

I peek in the donut bag, which sends the heavenly aroma of fried dough and sugar wafting into the foyer, and I spy at least a half-dozen cake donuts smushed in there.

“Eggs,” I remind Tucker, and while he slumps off to the kitchen, I open the door to the basement and head down.

The game room’s open. Ellie’s on a stool, muttering enough fucks to make a pirate blush while she bangs on the controller on Beck’s Frogger arcade game.

The pink in her cheeks and that stubborn set to her jaw make my dick twitch.

Kissing her in December wasn’t a fluke.

Is she obnoxious? Yes. Short-tempered? Sometimes. Determined and smart and driven and unstoppable?

And now my pants are getting tight. Because there’s nothing hotter than a woman taking charge and going after what she wants, and that’s what Ellie Ryder has done every day of her life.

While thumbing her nose at me.

“Work work work, you son of a bitch,” she growls.

“Donut?” I ask.

She throws a wild-eyed look over her shoulder. “Frogger is broken.”

I almost drop the bag, which would be a catastrophe, and not only because they smell delicious, but also because I’d have to clean it up. “What? No, it’s not.”

“DO NOT TRY TO MANSPLAIN ME.”

I growl while I cross past the ping-pong table, pool table, and foosball table to the far wall. “I’m not—what the hell is—dammit, Ellie, this is called denial, because Beck’s gonna—oh, fuck.”

The screen on the arcade console is one big squiggly mess of greens and blues. Ellie hits the buttons, and nothing happens. “I can’t unplug it myself,” she grumbles. “I can’t freaking bend that way.”

I toss the donuts on the ping-pong table behind me and shift behind the machine.

“Wait!” she shrieks.

“What?”

“Beck’s high score. He’ll kill you if his high score is gone.”

I freeze.

She’s right.

He hit seven hundred thousand something points over a weekend about two years ago. It was one of those rare times we were all around—Beck, me, the Wilson brothers, the Rivers kids, Davis, Ellie—and the whole weekend turned into one big party of watching Frogger and drinking beer and eating pizza and shooting hoops under the stars and just having fun again.

No worries, no responsibilities. Only fun.

Like when we were kids.

The whole crew will have a fit if that score’s lost.

It would be like losing the weekend.

It’s all we did that weekend.

“Can’t you take out the screen and shake it and make it work?” she says desperately.

“But maybe it’s the video card. Maybe if we get the video card out, we don’t have to reset the whole system.”

“Dad? Can I have a donut now?”

We both whip our heads around to look at Tucker, who’s wearing a milk mustache and a yellow streak that I expect is egg down his Fireballs T-shirt, which isn’t what he was wearing five minutes ago.

Also, did he just hear me say fuck?

Shit. I need to remember he can hear me. Bachelor life on base isn't good for a kid-friendly vocabulary.

"Yeah, bud. Help yourself."

Ellie's watching me with wide eyes, like she has an idea.

Like she's thinking nobody would say a word if Tucker spilled milk on the video game.

He's just a kid.

And it could be our secret.

And—

She breaks eye contact, shaking her head with a high laugh. "We are terrible people," she whispers. Then she shrieks. "No! Don't hit the reset button! Maybe we can unplug it without losing the high score, but reset will definitely erase it."

We're an hour and a half by car into Copper Valley. The city's our best bet for getting the system looked at, but just because it has a million residents doesn't mean a single one of them will specialize in fixing a vintage 1980's arcade game.

Beck said he had to go all the way to Atlanta to get this one.

"Two options," I tell her. "We call a repair guy, or we reboot and hope for the best."

"What if we can't save it at all?"

"Whatcha doin'?" Tucker asks. He's standing at the ping-pong table, donut in one hand, rubbing the top of a sparkly notebook next to it with the other.

"Mr. Beck's game broke. We're trying to fix it. Hang tight, bud. We'll go golfing soon, okay?"

"Okay," he replies around a mouthful of glazed donut.

"Did you go out for donuts at Crow's Nest?" Ellie asks. There's pure lust in her eyes. And her voice. And my dick notices.

"Cooper Rock biked up to drop them off for you."

She blinks at me.

Then blinks again.

And then she busts up laughing.

At me.

“Feeling inferior?” she asks.

“You want me to pull this plug?”

“No, I don’t want you to pull the plug! I want you to fix it.”

This is new, Ellie asking me for something. Usually she’d tell me to go away, that she’d do it herself.

We’re like...a team. It’s weird. But not unpleasant.

I yank out my phone and start googling, because if we’re going to work together, I’m going to have The Google on my side before I do anything stupid.

“Look up if the high scores are erased if you unplug it,” Ellie tells me.

“Who’s mansplaining now?” I mutter, which earns me a light shove in the shoulder.

My skin tingles under my shirt, like I’m in danger of getting struck by lightning, and I concentrate on reminding myself that getting Ellie riled up is good for her, and has nothing to do with me.

Even if I did toss and turn half the night thinking about kissing her again.

“Alright, we shouldn’t lose the high score if we reset it by pulling the plug,” I tell her.

“But it’s old,” she points out. “Are you sure that’s accurate for old machines?”

“You’re right. We did just invent radio signals two years ago. I should check out this internet that’s been around since the twentieth century some more.”

“Fine, Mr. Expert. Pull the plug. But it’s on you if the high score’s lost.”

“I wasn’t the one who broke it,” I point out.

“I wouldn’t have broken it if—”

She cuts herself off sharply, pursing her lips and looking over at the Ms. Pac-Man game.

Was she about to say if you hadn’t kissed me?

I don’t remember who kissed who, but I’d take the blame.

It was worth it.

“Leg hurt too much to sleep?” I ask while I bend over behind the machine again and trace the right cord to the outlet.

“Yep.”

“Huh. My lips bothered me all night. Probably need Chapstick. It’s the elevation. Dries you out.”

She doesn’t answer, but she doesn’t have to.

I’m getting her goat.

I can feel it.

Plus, I’ve been practicing since I realized I annoyed her when I was about thirteen.

I know how to shoot a basketball, Wyatt. I don’t need you to show me how.

Damn if I didn’t have some fun telling her she was doing it wrong just to see her face light up in independent indignation for the rest of high school. It was almost as good as having my own little sister.

Until it wasn’t.

Because Ellie Ryder grew up, and she grew up stronger and faster and better at every sport she tried, and maybe it’s ego, but I swear she wouldn’t have been half as good if I hadn’t goaded her.

And I noticed. Believe me, I noticed. Even when I knew I shouldn’t, I did.

I yank the plug, and the fan inside the machine whirs to a stop. After counting to three, I plug it in again, then straighten to watch the screen.

Ellie's rubbing her thigh, and I wonder if it's aching this morning.

Not that she'd tell me if it was. She doesn't admit weakness.

Not if she can help it.

The game flickers to life, the screen back in normal operating mode, and I breathe a sigh of relief while Ellie sags next to me.

Close enough that she's almost sagging into me, matter of fact.

"Oh, shit," she whispers.

Tucker giggles.

"Watch your mouth," I mutter, but I realize she's gone pale. "What?"

She points to the screen.

To the top. Where it's supposed to say HI-SCORE 701,400, but instead says HI-SCORE 0.

"No, no, no," she groans. "Do you know what this means?"

"Beck's gonna kill you," I offer. I've got sweat gathering at my collar, because Beck's gonna kill us.

Dating his sister might be okay—not that I have time in my life for that even if I'd let myself imagine it—but killing his Frogger score?

We're both dead.

But I can't say that to Ellie, because now I have to annoy her. It might be the only thing I do right for my buddy this week.

He spent hours. Hours. And we killed his high score. On his favorite game. Fuck, we all pitched in, egging him on, bringing him pizza. Levi even wiped his chin a few times so he didn't have to break from playing.

It's just a game.

This is stupid.

Except it's the memories. And the glory. And Beck's favorite game.

Tucker giggles again. "Daddy, what's a ball chain?"

"What's a what?"

"A ball—"

Before he can answer, Ellie's shrieking again. She leaps off the stool, almost goes down to her knees, but doesn't stop as she dives for the notebook in his hands. "Ohmygod, that's not for you!"

She snatches the notebook, but not before I see—a drawing of a short penis? And two boulders?

"I like Dick and his Nuts," Tucker says. "They're funny."

Her face is a cherry tomato with eyebrows and flashing blue eyes. "Please don't open random notebooks and sketchpads in this house. You don't know what you're going to find, and my brother has some very adult things that you shouldn't see."

Beck doesn't have notebooks and sketchpads.

Beck plays video games when he's here. Sometimes poker.

But he's never doodled or written stuff a day in his life.

Ellie, on the other hand...

"Not one word." She lifts her palm to me and hobbles out of the room, but not before grabbing the donut bag too. "Not a single word."

"Hey, you've got some Frogger to catch up on," I call after her. "Seven hundred thousand points worth."

She glances back at me, sees Tucker isn't watching, and lifts a middle finger.

I stifle a grin, because that attitude?

That's pure, classic Ellie Ryder.

And seeing her coming back in full force is more relief than I can ever admit to anyone.

Especially her brother.

Chapter Nine

Wyatt

Tucker and I are on the eighteenth hole, after having survived leaving the house with Ellie insisting she didn't need a ride anywhere and that she'll make sure none of Beck's notebooks get left out again.

I smirked at her, letting her know I didn't believe her, and she flipped me another bird when Tucker's back was turned.

On the miniature golf course, we've made it past the English cannon attack hole, the mermaid hole, the hurricane hole, and more, to finally reach the Kraken hole. It seems wrong that we've come this far just to lose our balls to one of the sea monster's mouths—or possibly his eye sockets—but I guess that's the life of a pirate.

“Dad! Dad, I got it in his nose! Did you see?”

“You gave him a golf ball booger. Good job.”

Tucker throws his arms around my waist. “I'm so glad you're my dad.”

My sinuses get heavy and I blink a couple times before I hoist him up for a hug. Most days, I feel like I get more wrong than I get right, and I don't have a clue what he'll think of me when he grows up—I'm supposed to be there for him every day, not just calling him at bedtime from Gellings Air Force Base five hundred miles away in Georgia—but he still seems to think I'm good at the dad job for now.

“I love you,” I tell him.

“I know,” he replies, and I set him down with a chuckle. “Your turn, Dad. I'll bet you can get it right in his forehead. That's the hardest shot, so they made the hole really big. I'll bet even Cooper Rock couldn't get it in his forehead.”

I oblige and sink my ball into the Kraken's forehead, which, indeed, is the biggest hole. But I don't tell him that makes it the easiest, because I like being his hero.

"Someday, I'm gonna be a putt-putt master just like you," Tucker informs me.

I take his hand while we head over to turn in our clubs. "Someday, you'll be even better than me."

"Yeah, because I'm gonna be Captain America one day," he says sagely.

"Captain America? Who wants to be Captain America when you can be Blackbeard?" the wizened old man behind the counter says with a wink while we hand him our clubs. He's sporting an eye patch, a pirate hat, and a parrot on his shoulder.

"Fucking Blackbeard," the parrot says.

"Hush, hush, Long Beak Silver." The old pirate—pretty sure they call him Pop around here, head of the Rock clan—looks sternly at Tucker. "Don't ever let your grandkids parrot sit. They teach terrible words. But I'll get 'em. I'll get 'em all. I'm fixin' to set every one of 'em up with the love of their lives, and that'll teach 'em."

"Empty threats," a pretty woman in jeans and a Shipwreck T-shirt says as she strolls in the door. "If you were going to set us up, you would've done it by now."

"Maybe I should practice on this young man."

Tucker giggles again. "I don't want to fall in love with a girl. I'm only seven."

"Hmmm... Then maybe I should practice on your dad."

"He's in love with his work."

Pop and his granddaughter both cough, identical blue eyes twinkling while I scrub my hand over my face to keep Tucker from seeing the irritation blossoming.

His mother shouldn't say things like that in front of him. I'm not married to my work.

I have split priorities between family and country. Whereas she—

Nope. Won't help. Not going there.

“Ah, a tough case,” Pop says. “Good. It'll just prove to my grandkids that it can be done.”

The woman rolls her eyes. “Have no fear,” she tells me. “You're safe.”

“You hungry?” I ask Tucker.

“I was hungry back before we jumped over the alligators, but they scared the hungry right out of me. I could be again though. Let me check.” He pats his stomach. “Hey, belly, you want some food?” He cocks his head, then nods. “It says yes, Dad. We want more donuts.”

We escape the matchmaking old man and head down the street to check out the wait at Anchovies, the pizza joint in the middle of Blackbeard Avenue. The hairs on my arms rise to attention a split second before I realize who's in front of us in line.

Ellie's best friend.

The bride.

She's in jeans today, but her T-shirt has a skull and crossbones on it, and she's wearing pirate boots and parrot earrings.

“Oh my gosh, it's Ellie's Wyatt,” she says.

Dammit.

Small town. Guess it was bound to happen.

The two men and the woman with her all glance back at Tucker and me, and I instinctively grip his hand tighter while I nod to her. “Morning.”

“We're not going to have to fight over who gets to sit with her, are we?” she asks.

The Blond Caveman goes stiff, earning a suspicious look from the redhead with him, but doesn't explain where Ellie is right now.

“I love Miss Ellie,” Tucker declares. “She shares her donuts.”

With some of us.

I didn’t get any.

The bride—Monica, I’m almost positive, who Beck’s mentioned a time or two, said she was Ellie’s best friend since college—squats down to Tucker’s level. “Do you want to sit with us so we don’t have to fight over her?”

“Yeah! And I’ll share my shaker cheese with her to thank her for the donuts.”

“Perfect. Jason, sweetie, make it a table for seven,” she tells the longer-haired blond holding her hand.

“We wouldn’t want—” I start.

“Don’t be silly. They have to push two tables together for a party of five anyway, so we’re being more economical. Plus, who wouldn’t want to eat with a kid this cute?”

Tucker grins up at me with his crooked, oversized front teeth, unruly brown hair, button nose, and dirty glasses, and I can’t help smiling back.

I should object more, but it’s likely me joining them for lunch will piss Ellie off.

And that is my secondary job for the week, right behind having fun with Tucker and right before losing sleep to try to recover Beck’s high score on Frogger.

Oh. And that whole playing her boyfriend thing.

Which I intend to enjoy every minute of.

Just to watch her ex squirm.

If he hadn’t pulled the dick of all dick moves—who dumps someone on Christmas?—she wouldn’t have been at her parents’ place looking for someone to share her misery with.

Easier to blame him the more I decide he’s a turdnugget.

“How was the parade?” Monica asks Tucker.

“Where’s Ellie?” Blond Caveman asks me while Tucker tells Monica he liked the parade.

I know his name, but I prefer to call him Asswipe. Since I can't do that in front of my kid, Blond Caveman it is.

"She's getting fitted for a peg leg," I tell him.

"Seriously, Patrick, I just told you," Monica says with a sigh. "She's parking her car and fighting with Grady about accepting a ride in a golf cart."

"You didn't drive her?" Blond Caveman says.

"She wanted to not share the rest of her donuts, since Cooper Rock delivered them," Tucker announces. "He signed my pirate sword. I wonder if he signed one for Miss Captain Ellie too?"

"Cooper's signed tons of things for Ellie," Monica tells him. "But she doesn't usually keep them. She donates them to auctions for pet shelters."

"Like for dogs and cats?"

"And sometimes goats and snakes and hedgehogs."

Tucker frowns, like he's pondering a shelter for goats and snakes and hedgehogs.

"I told you I could walk," says a familiar voice that sets Dr Pepper buzzing through my veins.

We all turn as Ellie gives an exasperated sigh, then leans over to hug the Rock guy who was supposed to be her date last night. He's driving the golf cart that she's climbing out of. "But thank you."

"It's worth it just to watch you have to take help," he tells her with a flirty grin, and I consider how much more attractive he'd be with a broken face.

I scowl at him.

He catches my gaze and winks. "Got a live one there, bro. Lucky man."

"What is with all the men in my life being ass—uming blockheads?" she finishes as her gaze lands on Tucker.

"Hi, Miss Ellie!" Tucker calls. "Did you bring more donuts?"

“Not unless we’re having pizza donuts for lunch,” she replies.

“Did you beat your dad in golf?”

“No.”

“There’s always next time. High five for trying.” Her gait is stiff, but she’s smiling at Tucker like she can feel no pain and she bends over to high-five him.

“Could you beat my dad in golf?” Tucker asks.

“Every time,” she tells him.

“Because I let her,” I add.

With a smile.

Like our relationship thrives on one-upmanship.

“And isn’t that the sweetest?” she says tightly with a smile of her own.

“Miss Captain Ellie, I want a llama someday,” Tucker declares.

Ellie gasps. “No way. Me too! Aren’t they so cute?”

“I’m going to name mine Llama Llama Ding Dong because my teacher plays that song all the time.”

“You—I—do you know you’re freaking adorable?”

“Yeah.”

He grins. She ruffles his hair, then moves in to greet Monica with a hug. When she’s done, just to piss her off—and to watch the Blond Caveman fume too—I wrap an arm around her shoulders and kiss her flowery-scented hair.

I have a role to play.

I’ll explain it to Tucker later. Shouldn’t be too hard. We’re old friends.

Not sure how I’m going to explain to my dick that we’re not doing this for real again, but it’ll live.

“Enjoy your ride?” I ask.

“Quit trying to help me walk. I can do it myself.”

“I can help you walk, Miss Ellie,” Tucker offers.

“Aww, that’s so sweet of you, but I have to eat with—”

“All of us,” I interrupt.

“We get to have lunch together!” Tucker says. “Captain Monica says so. Can you teach me to draw a—”

“Pirate?” Ellie exclaims desperately. “Yes. I can teach you to draw a pirate. Or a parrot.”

“The golf man’s parrot said a dirty word.”

“Aw, Pop Rock’s working at Scuttle Putt today? His parrot usually does say dirty words. He’s a very salty bird.”

Our table is called, and we head inside with Tucker proudly holding Ellie’s hand. “Be careful, there’s a chair,” he tells her, steering her around one of the thick wood tables in the treasure-themed dining room.

“Thank you so much, gallant sir,” she replies, then adds under her breath to me, “Why are you here?”

“Serendipitous timing. And fate, of course. I sensed you’d be here, and I missed you.”

She looks at me closer, and there’s a gleam in her eyes like she’s gearing up to top me in the lovey-dovey new relationship game.

Which shouldn’t be a big surprise. She’s always been bright.

“Here, Miss Ellie. You sit on the end so you can put your foot up if you need to.”

Tucker helps her gracefully into a chair—as gracefully as a seven-year-old who barely hits four feet tall can—and gives her a funny look when she replies, “Thank you, kind sir, you may kiss my hand.”

“It’s what gentlemen used to do for ladies,” I whisper to him.

He wrinkles his nose at me like I’m asking him to hug an eel. “Dad, I like her, but I don’t want to kiss her.”

“Here. No cooties. Like this.” I bend over, take Ellie’s hand, and press a loud, smacking kiss to it, but I also trail my fingers down her palm.

Lightly.

Where no one can see.

Goosebumps visibly travel up her arm, and there's a tremor in her hand before I lower it, still holding on.

"See?" I say to Tucker. "Nothing to it."

I help Tucker into his chair on her other side and take the liberty of sweeping her short, dark curls back from her cheek before I pull out my own chair and sit.

Something squishes under my ass, and I register cold liquid on my left butt cheek the same moment a woman behind me shrieks.

I leap up as fast as I can, bumping into a passing server, who dumps a pizza all down the back of the woman who just got sprayed with—with what?

Whatever it is, it's red and sticky and why the fuck is there a bottle of ketchup in a pizza joint?

"Oh my god, you sat on the French dressing!" Blond Caveman's girlfriend says. Her eyes are round like she's both horrified and trying not to laugh.

"French—what?" Tucker asks.

"The French dressing," Ellie tells him, and I can hear her trying not to laugh as she scoots her chair, winces, and tries again to rise. "They put it on the pizza here, and—oh. Right. Bad time. Sorry."

"I'm so sorry. Oh my gosh, ma'am, I'm so, so sorry," the server is babbling. "Sir. I'm so sorry. I don't know how—why —"

I try to help her pick up the pizza. "My fault," I tell her. "Should've looked before I sat."

Ellie's sucking her cheeks in, face pointed at the ground. Tucker looks like he can't decide if he's supposed to laugh or cry.

“Daddy made a big boo-boo,” I tell him.

“This isn’t funny,” Monica whispers, like she’s talking to herself, while her face contorts with the effort of holding in laughter.

Her fiancé is on the ground helping me, lips twisted in a wry grin. “Could’ve happened to any of us, man. Ellie, sit. We got this.”

A manager rushes over, and Blond Caveman’s girlfriend leaps into action, checking the woman behind me for pizza burns. “I’m a nurse,” she says, like she just remembered. “May I?”

“Wyatt?” Ellie whispers in a strangled voice.

“Yeah?” I grunt while I swipe at melted cheese on the old wood floor.

“I’m sorry you’re having a shitty day.”

All of a sudden, the woman we’ve accidentally assaulted with French dressing and pizza bursts into laughter. “What are the odds?” she says.

“I’m really sorry, ma’am,” I say again.

“Honey, I was just sitting here mad because I have to go see my sister-in-law, who’s always talking about all the terrible calamities that happen to her, like getting a wart on her knee, which is a pretty lame calamity, but that’s my sister-in-law for you, and now I got a story that’ll top her for life.”

“Ma’am, we’re still going to have to comp your pizza and give you a coupon for more. And a free T-shirt,” the manager says.

“Can I get one of those glow-in-the-dark cups and a pirate mug too? I’ll pay for it, but I’m telling her I got it all for free.” She cackles as she rubs the French dressing on her shirt with a napkin. “She’s gonna be so jealous.”

“Her mug’s on me,” I tell the manager.

“I’ll buy her an Anchovies hoodie,” Jason pipes up.

“Put one of them squeezy treasure chests for her on my bill,” a grandma two tables over calls. “This is the best entertainment I had since Blackbeard stripped for me two nights ago.”

Half the people in the restaurant groan. “Didn’t need to know that, Sandy!” someone calls back.

“There are kids in this place, Nana,” the manager chastises.

“A stress chest? That’s it?” someone else says. “Cheapskate. I’m getting a whole set of mugs for her.”

“And I’m buying that table’s dinner,” another voice chimes in, pointing at us.

“Root beer all around!” someone hollers.

Despite sitting on French dressing for the next hour—the remains of which Ellie slathers all over her pizza and talks Tucker into trying too, after she’s taught him how to draw a pirate face—lunch is just as much fun as Scuttle Putt was, except with more sea shanties and souvenirs. Monica’s toned down the shrieking about Ellie and me dating, and instead is peppering me with questions about being a flight test engineer. Except for the occasional snide comment about my pay grade, the Blond Caveman keeps his attention focused mostly on his phone. Jason tells us all about the last time he went to Africa with the nonprofit he works for, and then brags on Monica’s recycled artwork.

And Tucker gets to color a pirate ship that Ellie draws him on the paper placemat, which keeps him happy long after he’s done eating. He’s loaded down with more loot than he picked up at the parade by the time we leave.

“This town is crazy,” I mutter to Ellie once we’re back out on the street, stuffed with the best thin crust pizza in the entire state.

“Customer service and reputation above all else,” she replies. “Welcome to the Shipwreck family.”

Two pirates on unicycles are juggling back and forth right in the center of Blackbeard Avenue, and the Sea Cow Creamery across the street is handing out free samples to anyone willing to shout Ahoy, matey! to distract them.

Everyone’s smiling despite the pirate insults flying.

Everyone except the Blond Caveman.

He's scowling at me.

And I'm ignoring him.

"You guys are coming with us to Cannon Bowl, right?"
Monica says.

"Wyatt promised Tucker a trip to Davy Jones's Locker," Ellie says with just enough regret in her voice that I almost hope Tucker announces he'd rather go bowling.

He doesn't, of course.

Kid loves a good water park.

But I make sure to kiss Ellie goodbye before the bridal party departs. A good kiss.

The kind of kiss that suggests there's more waiting where that came from.

And hell if I wouldn't kiss her longer if I could.

Blond Caveman glares at me.

And I decide I'll be perfectly content playing her boyfriend for the rest of the week.

"Dad, friends kiss, right?" Tucker asks as we head to the car for the swim bag and more sunscreen.

"Grown-up friends do sometimes, yes," I tell him.

"Does that mean you're getting married too?"

I never should've gotten married the first time, but I thought it was the right thing to do. No chance in hell I'll do it twice.

I squat down to his level. "You know you're number one in my life?"

"Behind your job."

I shake my head. "I do my job to keep you and your friends and your friends' families safe. Because I love you first, even when my job keeps me away. I miss you every day. And I might have special friends come and go, but you will always be most important. Okay?"

He frowns like he wants to ask more, but just says, "Okay."

And once again, I wonder how much I'm messing him up.

But this is my life in the Air Force. I move. I make new friends. They leave. I make more friends. Then I leave. It's the life a lot of military kids live too.

You have to say goodbye a lot, but you meet a hell of a lot of good people along the way.

I'll miss it when I'm done, which will be sooner than I ever wanted, but the odds of me having a long career in the Air Force close to Tucker are slim to none.

"We're pretty dang lucky," I tell him. "We got to share lunch with a bunch of people who think you're awesome."

He grins at me. "That's 'cause I am awesome, Dad."

He sure is.

Chapter Ten

Ellie

I spend the rest of the day feeling weirdly lonely despite being with Monica and Jason.

Yes, and Patrick and Sloane too, but it's weird to hang out with a man I've seen naked, knowing he gets naked for someone else now, so I'm concentrating on my best friend instead.

And not on Wyatt.

That kiss.

Tucker and his sweet insistence that no one else could ever draw pirates like I could.

"The parents get here tomorrow," Monica tells me with a nose-wrinkle as we reach my car in the parking lot. She insisted on walking with me, and since we haven't had much alone time the last few weeks aside from driving out here, it's good to have a few more minutes of us time. "My mom still doesn't understand the pirate wedding thing, but I think when she sees Jason sword fight the mutinous pirates who want to steal me after we say our vows, she'll get it."

I laugh. "I love you."

"Of course you do. Everyone else you know is B-O-R-I-N-G." She gives a mock eye roll, and we both crack up again, because there's nothing remotely boring about the people I've known longest in my life.

Beck and half the guys we grew up with have been world famous since before I graduated high school, and it hasn't always been easy to find the true friends from the people who just want to get close to Beck and his Bro Code bandmates. But Monica's all country, all the way, and she always has been. She couldn't pick a boy band out of a lineup, and she'd rather drool over Orlando Bloom in Pirates of the Caribbean and Captain Hook from Once Upon A Time than check out my brother's Instagram page.

She also always asks me to turn the cardboard cutouts of him around whenever she stops by his house.

Or my parents' house after Beck's been there and left a few more.

He's such a goober.

"Seriously, though, I will completely understand if you beg off anything with Jason's parents. I sometimes wonder how he came out of the same gene pool as the rest of them."

"Every family has a black sheep." The Dixons' is Jason. He works for a nonprofit whose mission is to provide clean drinking water in third world countries, instead of going into the banking business with his father and brother.

Or even into the socialite business with his mother.

It's been long enough since Patrick and I broke up that I've finally been able to see clearly how my priorities have been messed up most of my life. I thought having a solid career, a stable husband in a complementary career, and adorable children to carry on the Ryder family environmental engineering firm was what it's all about.

But the idea of being one-half of a power couple doesn't appeal to me anymore.

And the more time I spend around Patrick, the more I question everything I ever wanted.

He spent half of lunch checking out his phone. He missed an entire two games of bowling for an important work call. And it wasn't until Sloane took his phone away at dinner that he finally engaged in a conversation that wasn't about his travel, clients, or work hours.

Or baiting someone. Like Wyatt at lunch.

The military? That doesn't pay very well, does it? Oh, that's right, you're divorced. I would never let my child go a week without seeing me.

When we were together, I thought he was charmingly cynical. Now, I can see he's truly an asshole in the way that makes Wyatt look like...not such an asshole.

And Patrick learned it from his parents.

"There's no way I'm making you face Jason's parents by yourself. I'll be there, and if they get snippy, I'll just mention how many of my other ex-boyfriends sent flowers after my accident."

Monica sighs. "They're just so oblivious sometimes."

I bite my tongue.

My brother is oblivious. The Dixons are just mean.

Except Jason.

Who's jogging into the parking lot now after stopping to help talk Pop Rock's cussing parrot off a roof. "Sorry, ladies," he says as he joins us. "Stubborn bird. How's the leg, Ellie?"

"Good." It's almost the truth, comparatively speaking. "You guys aren't going to The Grog without me tonight, are you?"

"Nope, we're saving that for tomorrow after our mothers drive us nuts," Monica replies happily.

Jason shakes his head, making his curls shake too. "They mean well," he tells her. He gives me a sheepish grin. "And I told mine to be nice to you."

"Don't worry about me. I've been through worse. You just enjoy your wedding week."

"Are you having fun?" Monica asks.

"Of course."

"Don't even try that with me. You're one degree of separation from needing to meet Willie Nelson for a joint. Do I need to talk to Wyatt about your need for backrubs and wine this week?"

"No, he's got that covered."

"So what's with the weird tension between you two at lunch? And don't tell me you were embarrassed about the dressing, because your brother models underwear for a living. Nothing short of full frontal exposure in public is grounds for you to get embarrassed.”

Oh, no, she noticed? I drop my voice and try to come up with a reasonable explanation. “Tucker found my doodle pad this morning.”

When the idea of a seven-year-old looking at Dick and the Nuts doesn’t seem to faze her, I add, “While we were trying to fix Frogger.”

“Holy shit, you broke Beck’s Frogger?”

“Ssshhh! We’re going to get the high score back,” I say quickly. I have no idea how, but we will. “And did you miss the part about my doodle pad?”

“No, I’m trying really, really hard not to laugh at how Wyatt must’ve handled his son getting an eyeful of a penis cartoon. It’s easier to do when I’m concentrating on the threat of your brother banishing you from ever using his weekend house again. Remember the time we snuck up here for my birthday party?”

“Oh my gosh, and all your friends from work?”

“And the poor shaved poodle?”

“And the stripper?” we say in unison, and we both double over laughing, which sends a jolt of pain to my knee, but screw it, laughing feels too good.

“You had a stripper?” Jason asks mildly.

“A pirate stripper,” I explain.

“A really bad pirate stripper,” Monica adds.

“He tripped over his scabbard and accidentally mooned us trying to turn on his music.”

“He was so cute.”

“In a frat boy out of his element kind of way.”

“We ended up getting him drunk and tutoring him in calculus.”

“He still emails me his grade reports. I think he’s graduating next year.”

Monica’s eyes dance. “He is? We should go to his graduation! Engineering school, right?”

“No, he decided political science was more his speed. His parents are crushed, but he’s riding a 4.0 since he switched majors.”

“We are so going to his graduation.”

“Hey, Ellie, you need a ride home?” Grady Rock calls from the edge of the makeshift parking lot.

“Got my car right here, but thank you,” I call back, patting my white Prius.

“Still happy to give you a ride. My TV’s out. Can’t watch the game.”

“Go crash Cooper’s house.”

“Pop’s there.”

“Go see your grandfather. It’s good for your soul.”

“Not when Nana’s with him. They’re disgusting. Heard she was telling stories at Anchovies about him stripping for her. Would you want to watch that?”

“We’re going with her to make out on the couch,” Monica tells him.

“Fucking hell,” he mutters loud enough to carry. “Next time, then.”

He waves good-naturedly and heads down the road.

“Aww, now I feel bad,” she says. “Where’s he going to watch the game?”

“His TV’s not broken,” I tell her. “He’s just spreading that rumor so the rest of his family doesn’t crash his place.”

“Seriously?”

“How do you know all this?”

“Spend enough weekends in Shipwreck, you’ll know what color underwear everyone wears too.”

“What color underwear are you wearing today?” Jason asks Monica.

She grins at him. “Want to see?”

“Ack, not here.” I shoo them both away. “Go on, go do your soon-to-be-newlyweds thing somewhere else. I’ll see you at breakfast.”

We pass around hugs, and I climb into my car for the drive up the mountain. The sky’s still a hazy gray-blue, but the sun’s dipped below the mountain ridge to the west and dusk is settling. I make it home without incident before darkness has fully engulfed the roads, and when I limp into the basement from the garage, I find Wyatt and Tucker snuggled on the basement couch watching the Fireballs game.

They’re oddly adorable, odd in the sense that I shouldn’t find anything about Wyatt adorable. He’s a military man through and through, his body a machine, his mind sharp, his expectations high, his hair short.

But sitting there with his legs propped up on the coffee table and his arm tucked around a sleeping, bony little boy in pajamas and messy hair, he doesn’t look like a military man.

He looks like a father.

Mortal.

Compassionate.

Vulnerable.

Holding his world.

A world I always wanted but might never have.

He glances up at me and shakes his head. “Hurting again?”

“No.” It’s habit to be a petulant ass around him, and I sigh, because now I’m frustrated with myself. “Yes.”

“Sit.”

I limp to the edge of the couch and sag into it, then dig into my purse for the over-the-counter painkillers I prefer to the prescription stuff.

He passes over a stainless steel water bottle, and I thank him politely.

Because I cannot use Wyatt as a punching bag.

I'm better than that.

Plus, my problems aren't his fault.

And I really do need to be able to pull off looking like one half of a happy couple in front of Patrick's parents tomorrow.

They're the worst, and they'll throw the sharpest darts.

I lift the footrest with the controller sitting in the couch's cupholder and look at the screen after passing Wyatt's water back. "Do I want to know who's winning?"

"Maybe if you're a Pittsburgh fan."

The inning comes to an end with the Fireballs striking out, and I wince as the score flashes on the screen. "Can't win them all."

"Still three innings to go."

Tucker snores, and a gentle smile softens the hard angles of Wyatt's face. I turn my attention to a commercial about jock itch. "Too much fun wore him out?" I ask without looking their way.

"He's an amateur."

A surprised laugh slips out of me, because fun and Wyatt aren't two things I usually put together.

Except they probably should be. Anyone who hangs out with my brother knows a thing or two about fun.

"I'm sorry about Patrick," I tell him.

He shifts, and I realize he's watching me, puzzled.

"For him being so rude at lunch," I clarify.

"Happens," he says with a shrug. "Not your fault."

“It was my fault I dated him,” I mutter.

“True enough.” The puzzlement fades into a frown. “Think I deserve to take some shit. I still haven’t said I’m sorry for what happened. Six months ago. For making you upset enough to leave. But I am. Sorry, I mean. I didn’t mean to hurt you.”

I freeze for a half a second, because he’s not supposed to say he’s sorry. “Can’t live in the past,” I say quietly.

I should go check my phone to see if it’s working yet, but I want to sit for a little bit longer first. Not for the company, I tell myself, but for the rest.

The game comes back on, and he shifts. “Before I forget…”

He holds out my phone.

A shiver rolls through me, because was the man reading my mind?

“It works, and I didn’t prank call anyone.”

I stare at the device stupidly for longer than I should before taking it. Our fingers brush like they did over ice cream at Christmas. I remember the feel of his lips against mine, and a flush heats my entire body. “Thank you.”

He frowns. “You okay?”

And there’s more stupid staring going on as I blink blankly at him, because there’s something in his tone that’s not quite normal.

“You didn’t yell at me for not letting you do it yourself,” he clarifies.

“Twenty-something years of yelling at you hasn’t worked, so maybe it’s time I give it up.”

He shifts to lean over and touch the back of his hand to my forehead. Tucker grumbles in his sleep, but doesn’t wake up.

“Yep, definitely warm,” he says. “You should probably strip.”

“Excuse you?” I gasp.

He grins. “Ah, there she is. Just checking.”

“You’re trying to annoy me?”

He looks down at Tucker, glances at the game and winces as Pittsburgh gets a double off what should've been a single, then looks back at me. "You remember we used to play basketball at the Rivers house?"

"I remember you used to think I couldn't keep up."

"You couldn't, but that's not the point."

My breathing is coming easier as we slip back into the old habits. "You are so lucky that innocent child is sleeping on you right now, or you'd be dead."

"I used to wait until you'd sink the perfect shot, and then I'd tell you that you could've done it better, just to watch the steam roll out your ears. And it's still that easy."

I gape at him, because he does it on purpose?

And what does it say about me that I still take the bait?

"You-you're—you're an ass," I gasp.

Tucker stirs, and I slap a hand over my mouth.

Wyatt just shrugs, but not the shoulder that would disturb Tucker. "I have to have some flaws. Otherwise I'd be insufferable."

That is not the guy who's been Beck's best friend for over twenty years. I narrow my eyes at him, but I don't call him on it. Because I have the oddest feeling that's exactly what he wants me to do.

But I can't resist asking, "Why only to me?"

He holds my gaze longer than I expect. "Because I was so tired of being coddled, and you gave it right back, every time."

Just because I don't know what he's talking about doesn't mean he's not telling the truth. And there's a truth so clear in the ring of his words that I get a bone-deep shiver.

"Who coddled you?" I ask.

He shakes his head with a snort. "Better question is who didn't?"

"Why?"

He glances at the TV, and just when I think he's not going to answer, he does.

"Last guy my mom dated before she finally realized what she was doing to both of us and moved in with my grandma to reboot her life was a first-rate asshole," he says. "Let's leave it at that. But it meant my gran went around the neighborhood looking for any parents who had enough control over their kids to make them look after me."

"Beck didn't coddle you."

"At first he did. All of them did. I might've been small and damaged, but I wasn't blind."

My heart's starting to hurt, because no kid should ever feel damaged.

"Didn't mean I could take care of myself though. That I didn't need it. Wasn't big enough for that." He shakes his head. "Thought I could. But I couldn't. And Beck saved my ass when I got into it with his best friend. Could've left me behind. Instead, he dropped him. Hard. Broke his nose. Got a detention in sixth grade. And then he thanked me for showing him what a douche Andy Brentwood was. Dude all but saved my life and thanked me for it."

I swallow hard. I remember Andy, vaguely, but I never gave any thought to why Beck stopped talking about him. "That's not coddling you. That's doing the right thing."

"I started it. He got detention. I got chocolate chip cookies and milk. From your mom. From Mrs. Rivers. From my grandma. I shared so the Wilsons would teach me to lift weights and so Davis would teach me his Tae Kwon Do moves. I didn't want to be fucking helpless."

The groan of the crowd carries through the television, even at low volume, and I glance at the game, almost relieved by the distraction.

I had no idea I'd been being an asshole to a kid who'd had enough asshole in his life.

And that doesn't make me feel any better about my life choices.

Two-run homer. Fireballs are down by six now.

In the fifth inning.

It's going to be a blood bath.

Copper Valley's home team has never won a World Series, but they've never been quite as bad as they are this year either.

Even with Cooper Rock and his unbelievable gymnastics at second base.

"I always appreciated that you didn't cut me any slack, and I admired your determination," Wyatt says, speaking so softly I half think my ears are playing tricks on me. "If you could be that determined, then I could damn well be that determined too."

When I glance at him, he's still staring at the game.

But I know he said it.

And I know he knows I heard.

He settles deeper into the reclined seat at the other end of the couch. Tucker sighs and snuggles closer to him.

Little Tucker, safe, happy, and loved.

I overheard Wyatt telling Beck once, about eight years ago, that he didn't want to be a dad. He didn't know how. He was going to mess it all up, and it wouldn't just be himself, it would be him and a wife and kid.

But Tucker?

That kid is so very, very loved. With two parents who might live in different states, but still happy. Well-adjusted. And loved.

And I realize I need to go.

Not so I can check my email and any messages that came in while my phone was drying. Not so I can call Beck and give my brother grief for sending Wyatt here during Monica's wedding week.

No, I need to go before I start seeing Wyatt as the man I glimpsed the night we hooked up in my parents' basement six months ago.

The angry father who just wants to be with his son.

Because that man is dangerous to my heart.

Chapter Eleven

Wyatt

There's exactly one sound that I will move heaven and earth to stop, and that's the sound of my son in pain.

Except as I sit here with Tucker sleeping peacefully on me, listening to Ellie limp up the stairs, I want to tear something in half to make her pain go away too.

I shouldn't. We're not exactly the enemies we were as kids, but we can't be much more than casual friends, or one of us will start wanting something the other can't give.

And she won't be the one unable to hold up her end of making something work.

No, that would be all me.

I hear every step as she makes her way slowly from the kitchen to the bedroom upstairs. Not because she's walking loudly. Not because there's a lack of insulation. But because I'm listening for it. When the distinct sound of running bathwater carries through the pipes behind the walls, I get hard as a brick.

She's taking a bath again.

And there's nothing I can say to my dick to convince it she's getting wet and naked for therapy and that there's nothing sexy about her soaking in a tub of hot water and bubbles.

I don't have enough fingers to count the number of times I've heard someone say Ellie's annoying, or god knows, the number of times I've thought it myself in my lifetime, but at Christmas, and again now, I'm getting pissed thinking about it.

She is smart. She is brave. She is strong. She is determined.

Why does that have to translate to annoying?

Why does she have to be disparaged for wanting something and going after it?

She's not power-hungry. She doesn't tear people down. She just wants her own bar set higher, and she doesn't apologize for it.

I force myself to sit through the rest of the game, which is painful more for knowing Ellie's upstairs naked than it is for watching the blowout. Tucker doesn't wake up when I carry him upstairs and tuck him into the queen-size bed that makes him seem even smaller, and my heart lurches even though I know he's getting the childhood every kid deserves, safe, happy, and loved, despite the hiccup with me not being able to leave Georgia to join him in Virginia yet.

He's not growing up hiding in shadows.

He has a capable mom who takes good care of him when I can't.

He's not me.

And I'm sure as hell not any of the sorry excuses for human beings my mom used to date.

I should go to bed too, but I'm restless, and I want a snack, so I creep softly downstairs. I expect Ellie's in bed, but I hear her voice drifting down the hall when I get to the kitchen. "Don't even try to play innocent. You did this on purpose."

I swallow a grin, because it doesn't take a rocket scientist to know who she's talking to, and I'm not surprised to hear the echoes of Beck's voice, even though I can't make out the words.

None of my business—he can tell her whatever story he wants, and she won't believe him, because she shouldn't—so I dig into the fridge instead.

The same carton is sitting there, right in front, calling my name, just like it has been since I spotted it yesterday.

A take-out carton of banana pudding from Crusty Nut.

Ellie would probably kill me if I ate it.

There's a line between annoying her and going too far, and I can't decide which side of the line eating her leftover banana pudding would fall on.

On the one hand, it's not a donut. On the other, it's still banana pudding.

"He has a what?"

The surprise and sudden hush in her voice makes me pause.

"You're lying," she says. "Because it doesn't make any sense. He freaking carried me to my room last night."

And now I'm interested.

I grab the banana pudding, pop the lid, and snag a spoon and meander down the hallway. Beck's voice gets clearer.

"—undiagnosed cardio-telepathy-rhymmeria. He's being a stubborn goat and refusing to admit something's wrong, so we need you to be extra nice to him. And watch out for his kid too."

"Rymmeria? What's a—Beckett Ryder, so help me, if you're lying to me—"

"Ellie, it's three in the morning here, I have a ten-hour plane ride tomorrow, and I'm talking about one of my best friends. Do you think I'm lying to you?"

"Yes." There's a hint of doubt in her voice.

Beck grunts in frustration. "You really want to take that chance? If he has a heart attack on your watch, you're going to feel like an asshole for the rest of your life. He might even get kicked out of the Air Force."

I knock and don't wait before pushing the door open. Ellie gapes at me wide-eyed from the bed, holding her phone out in front of her. "What the hell are you—do you have a heart condition—is that my banana pudding?"

She starts to leap, winces, looks down at her white tank top that leaves little about her nipples to the imagination, and pulls the covers up to her neck. "You are dead," she tells me.

I cross the room to lean into the screen on her phone, which puts me right in the sweet spot to have Ellie's dark hair tickle my face while whatever fruity bath crap she used tonight fills my senses.

Beck grins on the other end of the video call. "Wyatt, buddy, how you doin'?"

"A heart condition?" I say.

"Ellie was all we had on short notice to watch you, but you're gonna pull through." He winks, his blue eyes the same as Ellie's, though his face is sharper and his hair weirdly more styled. "Hang in there. More help's on the way."

"We beat your high score in Frogger," Ellie growls at the phone.

Beck's eyes go round. "The hell you did."

"We did," I agree. "Ellie ditched wedding stuff all day today to cook for me, and Tucker kept running to refill my Dr Pepper."

"Prove it, motherfuckers."

"Maybe tomorrow. I'm tired, and we didn't get any sleep last night," Ellie replies.

"You two couldn't get along well enough to tie a shoelace."

We make eye contact, and I don't have to know what she's thinking to know that I'm thinking the same thing.

What's the one thing worse than ruining his high score?

We move in sync like we've planned this, and suddenly I have my fingers threaded through the loose tendrils of her curly hair to cradle her scalp while she fists my shirt at the collar and pulls me to her mouth, still holding the phone out in front of us.

I don't know if I'm kissing her or if she's kissing me, but our tongues are clashing just like they did at Christmas, and her sweet taste is the perfect complement to the lingering banana pudding flavor in my mouth, and she's making whimpery moaning noises that might be real or might be for show but I don't care, because fuck, this feels good.

So damn good.

Just like it did six months ago.

“QUIT FUCKING MY SISTER’S MOUTH, YOU ASSHOLE!”

I don’t want to. But Ellie starts to pull away, so I let her go. She smiles sweetly at Beck, holding the phone close enough to her face that I’m not in the picture anymore. “We totally beat your Frogger score,” she informs him.

He’s glaring at her, jaw flapping like he wants to say something.

“Also, I think I’d know if Wyatt had an undiagnosed heart condition. Especially after what he did to me this morning.”

I start to talk, because isn’t undiagnosed kind of hard for anyone to know if I don’t even know it?, but she holds up a hand, and since I don’t actually want to give her a reason to notice another condition that kissing her makes me suffer from, I shut my mouth.

“You—” he starts.

“Goodnight, Beck,” she finishes sweetly. “I have to go do... something.”

She hangs up the phone and flings it on the bed, then grabs the banana pudding that somehow ended up on the nightstand. “Thank you for delivering dessert. You may go.”

I watch her for a minute, and when she looks at me, the craziest thing happens.

We both start to grin.

“Davis,” we say together, and it’s suddenly a race to see who can call him first.

There’s no telling if he’ll answer—there’s a lot I’ll never know about Davis Remington, despite living next door to him for half my childhood—but if he can’t do what we need, he’ll know who can.

My call goes to voicemail, and I start talking two seconds before Ellie does. “Dude, it’s Wyatt. Call me. It’s about Frogger.”

“Davis, it’s Ellie. Beck’s on my shit list and you owe me one for you know what, so get your ass up here to Shipwreck yesterday.”

She hangs up and pulls the banana pudding out of my reach. “Don’t even think about it.”

“What does Davis owe you for?”

“Sexual favors.”

My blood pressure goes past red to black. “The hell he does.”

“Why did you kiss me?”

Of course she won’t shy away from asking. “So Beck knows there’s something worse than losing his high score in Frogger. Why did you kiss me?”

“Because you’re a good kisser.”

Of everything she could’ve said, that’s the last thing I expected.

But it shouldn’t be.

It’s Ellie. She charges in like a bull, fucks up, adjusts, and then hits it out of the park.

She’s unstoppable.

“That’s not all I’m good at,” I tell her, and I think that damn frog from the game is sitting on my vocal cords, because that came out way huskier than it was supposed to.

Like a promise instead of a threat.

“I’m aware,” she says, equally throaty, but also equally tentative.

If that was all she said, I could walk away. But she adds, “I don’t hate you, you know,” in a soft whisper, and I sink to the bed next to her, because I’m pretty sure that was an invitation.

“And if you were suffering from a real heart condition, I would help you,” she continues, softer still.

It's like Christmas all over again, hiding out in her parents' basement after finding out I lost the battle to keep Tucker in Georgia with me while I waited for orders to Copper Valley.

"You'd make a terrible nursemaid," I say hoarsely, because someone has to stop us from doing what I'm thinking of doing every time she lets her gaze drift to my lips like that.

"You'd make a terrible patient."

"I should leave."

"Why did you tell Beck you were going to make a terrible husband and father?"

How did she know that? "Listening in on people's private conversations, nosy-ass?"

"Don't get high and mighty with me. I know you too well."

"Ellie—"

"Was I that much of a mistake? At Christmas?"

"No. Yes. Fuck." I rub a hand over my eyes. "The guys—your family—they're all the family I have left. Them and Tucker. I don't want to mess that up."

"Do you honestly believe any of my family would put up with you if you weren't good enough for all of us?"

"Don't be nice to me."

"What if we were nice to each other?" she whispers.

"Ellie—"

"Shut up, Wyatt. I'm not asking for a relationship. I'm asking for a friend. I don't want to go to Monica's wedding by myself. I don't want to feel broken. I want to dream again. I want to know I can be normal again. I want to believe in the future. I can't—I haven't—I don't know if I can—"

She stops with a growl of frustration. "Never mind. Forget it. I ___"

I have my hands in her hair again before I can think, kissing her hard and ruthless and unapologetically.

The last thing she did before her accident was, well, me.

If she needs help getting back in the saddle, then I guess the least I can do is, well, her.

Whatever she wants. As far as she wants to go.

That's what you do for a friend, especially a friend you didn't realize you needed until it was almost too late.

Right?

Chapter Twelve

Ellie

Something this stupid should not feel this right, but dammit, when Beck told me Wyatt had heart problems—even when I didn't believe him—my own nearly stopped beating.

Until Christmas, Wyatt was the annoyance from my childhood. But he grew up.

I grew up.

And then I stumbled into my parents' basement with a carton of ice cream, and now I'm back with the last person who saw me before I wasn't me anymore.

And he knows it, or he wouldn't be here.

He wouldn't stay, pretending to be my boyfriend with history hovering at the edges of the tension between us.

He tastes like banana pudding and feels like forgiveness, and if I think about this too long, I'm going to chicken out, so instead, I toss the pudding on the other side of the bed and give in to the sensations of his mouth, his lips, his breath, his grip on my hair, the hard plane of his chest against the extra fluffiness mine's acquired this year.

"Tell me to stop," he murmurs when he pulls out of the kiss to lick a path along my jaw.

"I'll kill you if you stop."

"Sweet talker."

"My nipples are hard."

"Dammit, Ellie. I can't—I'm not—you deserve—"

"Shut. Up." I'm drenched between my legs, and I can feel my pulse in my clit. "I know who you are."

He nips at the tendon between my neck and shoulder, and I grip his solid shoulders to hold him where it feels good. “More there,” I beg.

He nips again, then licks at my sensitive skin, and I shift on the bed to carefully part my legs while he gently swipes my hair to the side, his fingers brushing the back of my neck and making me whimper in pleasure.

“There too?” he asks, rubbing his thumb at my nape.

“Mm-hmm,” I manage.

“Relax, Ellie.”

“I don’t know how to relax. I was born this way. Take your shirt off.”

“You first.”

If he thinks I’m going to balk, he can think again. I whip my tank top over my head and let him see all of me. The fuller breasts. My tight nipples. The scars that are barely noticeable on the side of my left breast now.

He traces them anyway, because of course he notices, watching my chest with dark, hooded eyes. “Where else?” he asks hoarsely.

“Lose the shirt,” I rasp out.

His eyes lift to mine, and there’s raw hunger that I’ve never seen there before. Instead of ripping off the cotton shirt, he lifts it slowly, inch by inch, revealing the chiseled abs, the flat pecs, copper nipples pebbled hard, his arms flexing when he finally pulls it over his head.

“Show-off,” I whisper.

“Look who’s talking,” he replies, bending to suck one of my nipples into his mouth.

Pleasure rockets from my chest to my core, starting that long-forgotten spiral of need deep inside me.

I forgot how big his hands are until he cups my other breast, fully covering it despite the two cup sizes I’ve gained. While he suckles harder on one nipple, he circles the other with his thumb. I arch into his touch. “Oh, god, yes,” I moan.

I’m so damn glad he doesn’t have a heart problem.

“Lie down,” he says gruffly, pushing me with his body until I’m on my back, head on the pillow, the covers low on my belly. He starts to pull them off, but I grip them tight.

“Not yet.”

He replies by moving to suck on my neck again while his hand slips under the covers and over my panties.

I part my legs more, and he dips his fingers between them over the thin cotton barrier. “Fuck, Ellie, you’re soaked,” he moans.

“Touch me, Wyatt.”

He covers my mouth with his again, his tongue gliding against mine, his hard body pinning me down, one hand stroking my hair while his fingers slip under my panties to trace my seam.

We both groan into the kiss, and I suck hard on his tongue when he slides one digit inside me.

He moves slowly, carefully, while I test arching my hips into his touch. “More,” I whimper.

“You are so damn hot.”

We dive back into the kiss while he adds another finger. I reach between us and fumble with the button on his shorts. When I finally reach inside and wrap my hand around his solid cock, he jerks his fingers hard inside me, reaching that desperate, aching, needy spot deep inside. “There,” I gasp, squeezing him harder.

“Christ, Ellie, that feels good.”

“Deeper, Wyatt, right—oh, god, right there.”

I pump him faster while he drives his fingers deeper. I lift my right knee to give him a better angle, jerking on his cock and tightening my grip until—

Until the tickle.

The tickle behind my left eyelid.

“Oh—ah—no—ahh—”

“Come for me, Ellie,” he pants. “I can’t—you need to—you can do it—”

“Wya—ah—ahh—”

“That’s it, baby. That’s—”

“Ah-CHOO!”

My orgasm explodes, and pain explodes in my nose as the sneeze rockets through me and my head collides with Wyatt’s. Something hot and wet squirts up my breast and into my armpit, and Wyatt grunts out a fucking hell before leaping back, covering his cock with one hand and his eye with another while he dashes to the bathroom, his shorts falling to his knees.

My eyes are stinging, my nose throbbing like someone’s hammering a nail into it, and my pussy is still having orgasm aftershocks like it’s no big deal that I just sneezed all over Wyatt and head-butted him in the middle of a heavy petting session.

I sneeze again, pain shoots through my entire face, and I stifle a whimper.

“I’m sorry,” I call weakly.

Wyatt reappears in the doorway with his shorts back on and a fuzzy gray dog in his hand. I think. My vision’s a little blurry with all the heat in my eyes, and I don’t know where a fuzzy gray dog would’ve come from.

“Are you okay?” he asks.

“I’m sorry,” I babble again. “Did I hurt you? I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to—I didn’t realize—that’s only happened one time before—”

“Didn’t need to know that,” he mutters.

He rubs a towel—not a fuzzy gray dog—over my chest and side, and I realize he was in the middle of his own orgasm when I gave us both broken faces.

“Am I bleeding?” I whisper.

“No.”

“Is your eyeball okay?”

“Um...thank you for the orgasm. It was very nice.” Oh, shit. I’m going to have a swollen nose for Monica’s wedding. I’m going to ruin her wedding pictures.

Then I remember this is Monica, and she’ll spend the rest of her entire life telling people I helped beat off the pirate vagabonds who tried to kidnap her from Jason at the wedding, and I even have the bruised nose to prove it, and I snort out a laugh.

And then I whimper in pain, because snorting and broken noses don’t mix.

“Holy hell, Ellie,” Wyatt mutters. “We have issues. Can you walk? How’s your leg? Get up. You can sleep in the guest room. I’ll clean this up tomorrow.”

He’s still holding his eye while he finishes wiping me off.

“Are you sure your eye’s okay?”

“Yes. Go on. You can’t keep going on no sleep.”

“I can clean this—”

He stands, plants his fists on his hips, spreading those shoulders even wider and holy banana pudding, the man could probably crack a walnut with those ab muscles.

He clears his throat. Oh, right.

He’s glaring at me. “I’m aware you’re perfectly capable. And I’m going to clean this, including the banana pudding, and you’re going to go to sleep anyway. Say thank you, Wyatt.”

I glance over and realize there is, in fact, banana pudding spilled all over the comforter.

“Thank you, Wyatt,” I mutter with a sigh as I silently mourn the lost dessert.

“Are we done arguing now?”

“Are we ever?”

His lips twitch again, and dammit, now I'm on the verge of smiling too, despite the pain still radiating out of my nose.

"Make you a trade," he says suddenly.

"Why do I not trust you?"

"I'll let you clean this up tomorrow if you show me that notebook you took away from Tucker this morning."

I scurry out of the bed as fast as my leg will let me go. "Fine. I'm going. But if this swells up and bruises, I'm telling people I tripped while saving Tucker from a rabid coyote."

"And I'll tell them you threw a log at me when I tried to help."

"Perfect."

Before I can limp out of the room, he snags one of my hands. I glance up at him, suddenly aware that I'm standing here in nothing but my bare breasts, soaked panties, and the mangled scar on my left leg.

But he doesn't look down.

Nope, not Wyatt.

He simply presses a kiss to my forehead. "Friends?"

"Can I still tell you not to tell me how to do things?"

"And definitely give me your wrong opinions when I'm doing something not your way."

I ignore the sarcasm. "Only if you agree to do the same."

He snorts softly, and I'm pretty sure it's a snort of laughter and not utter and complete frustration. "You're one of a kind."

"And thank god for that. Beck would never keep up if there were two of me."

I swear he's smiling when I leave the room.

Mostly because I'm not sure my ego could take the hit if he was vehemently agreeing with my awful attempt at a joke.

Chapter Thirteen

Wyatt

The sound of the house alarm buttons being pushed wakes me from a dead sleep at 4:30.

Someone's breaking in.

I fly out of the bed and land on soft feet, and I don't bother pulling on a shirt, because it's not going to be any protection against an intruder. I hit the bottom of the stairs when the lights flicker on, blinding me.

"Freeze, asshole!" Ellie barks. Something whizzes past me and thuds against the door.

The dark figure next to the alarm panel sighs. "A guy drives all night to answer a distress call, and what does he get? He gets a dildo launched at his face. Nice, Ellie. Real nice."

"Davis?" she shrieks.

The slender, man-bun-wearing, bearded intruder bends over and grabs the massive purple thing from the floor. It's longer than his tatted-up arm. "Does that even fit? Put your fists down, Wyatt, it's not about her honor. You see the size of this thing?"

Ellie snatches it back, but once she has it, she grabs it by the base with her other hand and wipes the first one on her shirt.

"Go put pants on," I hiss at her.

"It's like a swimsuit, Morgan," she snaps back. "And this isn't mine. It was in the drawer in the guest bedroom."

All three of us momentarily stare at the two-foot-long, six-inch-thick dildo dangling from her fingers. I try not to look at the mangled, leathery scar on her thigh, but my stomach still dips thinking about what she's been through.

"You should mount it," Davis says, nodding to the dildo.

Ellie goes stiff like she's going to beat him with it, and I'm about to slug him when his lips twist in a familiar smirk.

"On Beck's bedroom wall," he finishes.

His dark eyes flit between us. "And you two should be more careful when you're having sex. Looks like you had a threesome with a boxer."

Ellie's eyes bug out.

"We weren't—" I start, yanking my hand away from where it instinctively went to test the tender skin around my eye, but Davis pops a rare full grin and turns to the door to the basement.

"What'd you do to fuck up Frogger? And where's the coffee? If I'm gonna fix this, I need fuel."

"Screen went out, so we pulled the plug to reboot." I jerk my head back at Ellie. "Please go put pants on before Tucker comes down here and sees you walking around like that, because he'll tell his mother and I'll never hear the end of it."

I can deal with the guilt of seeing her scars.

But I really don't want Tucker thinking about women in underwear any younger than hormones finally make him.

"And don't forget my coffee, wench," Davis calls.

"Oh, go cut your hair," she replies good-naturedly with a smile.

She heads to the kitchen, swinging the dildo of indeterminate source, and I'm pretty sure she's going to at least wrap it in a garbage bag, if not take it all the way out to the trash herself.

I follow Davis into the basement. He was the youngest in our group growing up—of the guys, so excluding Ellie—the slowest to warm up to people, and he was the first to want to call it quits on the boy band thing. I don't know exactly what he does for a job now, but I know it involves computers, coding, and the nuclear reactor a couple hours south of here.

"Should've told us you were coming. We would've left the light on."

“Three calls in an hour, and you thought I wouldn’t come?”

“Three?”

He smirks again. “I don’t know what you told Beck, but he wanted photographic proof that his score’s still the highest.”

“I kissed Ellie. On video call with him.”

“About damn time, dude.”

“Shove it, Remington. Not going there.”

He flips on Frogger and whistles low. “You wiped it.”

“Can you write a new high score on it?”

He gives me a don’t be a dumbass, of course I can look. “Gonna take donuts and coffee. Wouldn’t mind pretty company.”

I spread my arms. “I’m free until my kid’s up.”

“How’d Ellie break it?”

“Maybe I did it.”

“Dude. If it was your kid, you would’ve just told Beck. If it was you, you would’ve just told Beck. If you’re calling me to fix it, it was Ellie. Man up and do something about it already.”

Easy for him to say.

He has a career—and a bank account—that mean he doesn’t move every one to four years unless he wants to. He doesn’t have an ex-wife and a son to take care of, and no idea what he’s going to do to support them if he has to leave the military next summer because of orders anywhere but Copper Valley. And he doesn’t have a clue how ill-prepared I feel to be a good partner to anyone, let alone my best friend’s sister.

Help her heal?

Yeah. I’m in.

Anything more than that?

I’m not the man for the job.

Chapter Fourteen

Ellie

“Oh my god, what happened?” A human-size tropical bird—I mean, Monica rushes to join me outside The Muted Parrot, Shipwreck’s bright, cheerful coffee shop, four hours after Davis made his unexpected appearance Wednesday morning.

“One of Beck’s friends showed up in the middle of the night,” I tell her. “I didn’t get much sleep.”

“Because he gave you two black eyes?”

“Oh! Oh. That. No, that was me walking into a cabinet door.”

“You had sex with Wyatt!” Monica whisper-shrieks like I didn’t just give her a perfectly reasonable explanation that had nothing to do with having sex with Wyatt. She claps her hands, and her fake red, yellow, and blue feathers all flap up and down with her as she bounces. “I knew it. I knew you weren’t fake-dating him just to make Patrick quit acting all superior.”

Oh, shit, I’m totally transparent.

“Of course I’m not,” I whisper back. “I sneezed right as I hit the big O and we knocked heads and I can never have sex with him again.”

She looks around.

I do the same.

Because I really, really shouldn’t have said that.

However...it will be a great reason to break up with Wyatt at the end of the week. No blame. Just the simple truth that it’s dangerous for us to be together.

There’s no sign of Patrick anywhere—yes, I continue to worry he’ll realize I’m a loser who’s still not dating—which probably means he’s on a work call. I wonder if Sloane’s bored out of her mind, or if she’s taken to mindlessly playing Treasure

Hunter on her phone like I used to when I was waiting on Patrick to end one of his important work calls so we could go somewhere.

Some days I get really pissed at myself for not seeing the signs sooner that he didn't check the box for good husband material, even if his resume did. I like to think he changed while we were dating, that he wasn't always a workaholic tool, but what does that say about my influence and our relationship?

You drive men to work too hard so they can avoid you.

Lovely.

Monica pulls me into the coffee shop. She lifts two fingers for the barista, who doesn't bat an eye at getting a sign language order from a parrot, and she points at the back table, then drags me around the seashell-themed room until we're in the sun room at the rear of the restaurant.

Cautiously, it should be noted, but she's still dragging me over.

We have to look crazy, even in Shipwreck. Me in a knee-length denim skirt and a different Jolly Roger T-shirt from yesterday, as requested, and her dressed like a five-and-a-half-foot-tall parrot. I'm pretty sure the costume is just to annoy Jason's parents, but not completely sure.

I'm also impressed that she went through with it. I thought she was kidding when she showed me the costume online.

"Do we all get parrot costumes?" I ask as she pulls out a seat and points a wing, gesturing me to sit.

"No, I got you a monkey costume. Explain to me exactly why you think you can't have sex with Wyatt."

"We'll both end up dead."

She makes a go on gesture, like being dead isn't reason enough to not have sex. It also makes her beak flop around her head, and her brightly-colored feathers all dance with the motion.

I lean in close and lower my voice. "The first time we had sex, I had my car accident. We...messed around a little two nights ago"—yes, yes, it was just a kiss, but I'm warming up to this story—“and Beck’s Frogger game died mere hours later. We were in the middle of you know last night, and I sneezed and gave us both black eyes. We are not supposed to have sex. I can take a hint from the universe.”

“Wait. You said this happened mid-orgasm? Like, you got off, so the sex couldn’t have been bad.”

Bad? It was so far the opposite of bad that I don’t have a word for it.

And that was just his fingers.

I might burst into flames if we ever went farther.

“Ellie! You’re seeing someone? That’s fantastic.” Libby Rock, the middle-aged proprietress of The Muted Parrot, tucks her pirate wench skirts under her and pulls up a chair after setting a plate of scones on our table. “Who is it? Is it that handsome single dad from your lunch yesterday?”

“I heard Pop’s going to play matchmaker for all your kids,” I tell her in a desperate bid to distract her.

It doesn’t work. “Meh. He says that every couple months like clockwork. Tell me it’s the single dad. He’s a handsome one. And those muscles—mm-mmm. And so very polite and apologetic after the pizza mishap.”

“The pizza mishap!” I say triumphantly. “He kissed me on the sidewalk, and then the pizza mishap happened too. This is not a coincidence.”

“Ellie thinks she and Wyatt are cursed and should break up,” Monica tells Libby.

“Ah. Fear of commitment. Natural, after what happened with the last one she dated.”

“Monica’s marrying that last one I dated’s brother tomorrow,” I remind Libby.

“But she’s not marrying that barnacle you escaped from, thank goodness. They’re brothers, not clones. Now, you explain to me what’s bothering you about committing to this nice young man.”

“His name’s Wyatt,” Monica supplies. “The hot single dad. He’s in the military and flies experimental planes. Total badass with a big heart.”

“Not helping,” I tell her.

“You’re welcome,” she replies, lifting a scone. “Oh, white chocolate raspberry. Libby, you are a goddess.”

“Come, come, tell us the problem,” Libby says. “Physical, emotional, or vaporal?”

“Vaporal?”

“Pits, feet, or ass stinks?”

Monica chokes on her scone.

“He smells very nice,” I concede, because despite actually having a good excuse to fake break up with him—since we’re only fake dating—I am willing to be his friend.

For Beck’s sake.

One day, my brother’s going to crack the wrong joke and need the rest of us to fall in line to get him out of trouble, and Wyatt and I sniping at each other won’t help.

“Does he have performance issues?” Libby asks.

“No matter how I answer that question, it won’t be three hours before everyone in town thinks they know everything there is to know about my sex life.”

“Two lattes and an ice pack,” the barista says, setting coffees and a bag of ice with a dish towel on the table. “And this is why I recommend padded headboards.”

“Your face does kinda speak for itself,” Libby tells me with a grave nod of her short graying curls.

“I walked into an open cabinet door.”

“I threw out my hip trying a new position once. Took me four days to walk again, but the memories last a lifetime. Ah, to be young and nimble again.”

“Wyatt’s stationed in Georgia, and my job is in Copper Valley, okay?” I need something, or I’ll be hearing everyone’s opinions on my love life before we make it the two blocks to the town square to try our hand at digging up old Thorny Rock's treasure. "Yes, we have attraction, but we have other things working against us."

"But only until his commitment with the military's up," Monica points out. "Less than two years, right?"

"And he's divorced." I feel like a heel tossing out that tidbit, but anything to get them to think he's not perfect. "You know the odds of divorce go up once you've done it the first time." Isn't that what they say?

Libby and Monica share a look. "Cold feet," Libby declares.

"And some history," Monica agrees. "Ellie. I don't hang out with your brother's crowd ever, and even I know Wyatt only got married because she was pregnant and he thought it was the right thing to do."

Libby frowns. "Boy didn't know to use a condom?"

"He hooked up with an old girlfriend after his mom's funeral," I whisper, because I feel like I'm cheating on Wyatt by telling other people his business, but I don't want them thinking he goes around having unprotected sex with any woman who'll have him. He used a condom with me at Christmas, and we didn't get far enough to need one last night. "I haven't asked, but you know those things break sometimes. Cut him some slack. And Tucker's an awesome kid."

Monica smiles at me over her latte. She's a smiling parrot bride, but she looks like a cat with a canary.

Libby smiles too. "Well then. Clearly you're right, and you two aren't meant for each other."

I'm being reverse psychologied. It won't work. "Exactly." I'm oddly deflated, like I do actually care that we could have a real chance. Or maybe I'm getting that good at subconsciously acting.

Monica and Libby share another smile, and Libby pushes back from the table. "You two enjoy your coffee. Monica, hon, you let me know if there's anything we can do to help with the wedding. Love your costume, by the way."

“Thanks, Libby.”

“You bet.”

“Where’s Jason?” I ask her when we’re alone again at the table.

“Picking out our shovels,” she answers cheerfully. “Eat up, Ellie. We’re about to dig up gold.”

Chapter Fifteen

Wyatt

Davis declines joining Tucker and me down in Shipwreck for the kick-off to the treasure dig, so it's just the two of us walking along Blackbeard Avenue, heading for the center square. We haven't yet figured out any of the clues to find the hidden peg leg around town, but neither of us cares. We're having fun with everything else.

"Dad, can I get a tattoo?" Tucker asks.

"What? No. You're seven."

"Motherfucker! Motherfucker!" a voice calls.

I clap my hands over Tucker's ears and look around at the various tourists joining us on the sidewalk, but they're all just as confused as I am.

Grady Rock pops his shaggy head out of the bakery. "Hush your craw, Long Beak Silver. There are kids around."

We all follow his gaze to the cannons sticking over the edge of the roof at Cannon Bowl next door, where old Pop's parrot is perched. "Eat shit," the parrot replies.

"Ah, go walk the plank," Grady says.

The parrot waddles to the end of the cannon, lifts a foot, sways, and plummets toward the ground.

Everyone gasps, but the bird flaps its wings at the last second and takes off across the street to perch on the movie theater's marquee.

"Asshole parrot," Grady mutters as he ducks back into his shop.

I let go of Tucker's ears, but he's stopped and is staring in the bakery window. "Those tattoos, Dad," he says.

Oh. Right.

The temporary tattoos that are in baskets all over town. “Oh. Yes.”

We grab a handful inside, and Tucker tells Grady he makes the best donuts in the universe, and I end up getting both of us a plain glazed donut for fuel for the dig, though I’m eyeballing the banana pudding donuts. “Banana flavoring?” I ask Grady.

He shudders. “Vanilla pudding with real bananas. They’re new. Want one?”

“Ellie will.”

That earns me a knowing grin. He glances down at Tucker then back to me, and mouths, padded headboards.

I give him a glare that usually makes lieutenants quake, but he just grins bigger.

“Tucker, say thank you for the tattoos,” I instruct.

“Aahnk oo,” he says around a mouthful of donut.

We make it to the crowded town square just in time to see Pop in full pirate regalia making a speech about the pirate Thorny Rock on the makeshift stage in the center of the square. Tucker tugs my hand, and I follow, thinking we’re heading for a better view, or to get closer to what looks to be the line.

But nope.

He’s pulling us over to gawk at a group in full costume.

The men are dressed as pirates, but the women are a dog, a monkey, and a parrot.

“Do you think that one uses bad words?” Tucker asks me while he points.

The parrot turns our way, and—oh, hell.

It’s Monica.

She waves and gestures us over while the crowd applauds Pop.

“I love your feathers,” Tucker tells her, reaching out to pet her stomach.

“Whoa, bud, we ask before we touch,” I tell him.

Monica offers an arm instead while I nod to Ellie, who's decked out in the monkey costume. The inside corners of both her eyes are swollen and purply-red, stretching halfway across her lids, and there's no mistaking that she took a hit to the face.

Just like there's no mistaking I took a hit to my right eye, though my bruise is smaller.

She's ridiculously adorable in the costume though.

"That thing hot?" I ask her.

"Not yet, but it will be soon." She casts a glance at the rising sun in the clear blue sky, and I swallow a smile.

"Don't even think about it," she says when I reach for my pocket, like I'm going for my phone to take her picture, but there's an easy smile that she usually doesn't have for me, and seeing the friendliness lifts a weight off my chest I didn't realize I was carrying.

So we can be friends.

"Mr. and Mrs. Dixon, have you met Ellie's boyfriend?" Monica asks, turning to an older couple I hadn't realized was with the group, since they're not also in costume. "This is Wyatt and his son, Tucker."

I stifle a wince, because Tucker heard that. Does a seven-year-old understand the difference between girlfriend and girl friend?

Doesn't matter, I decide. Ellie's my best friend's sister, so odds are, Tucker will see her again. It's okay for him to know grown-ups he can trust, even if he doesn't see them often.

Mr. Dixon—tall, white-haired, and stuffy—barely spares me a glance, but his wife—slender, in pearls and a pantsuit—looks me up and down. A haughty smirk makes her thin face even less attractive. "Dear god, what happened to your face?"

"He accidentally got hit with a log when he was saving a baby from a wolf," Ellie says.

The woman looks at her, and her lip curls as she leaps to the conclusion everyone else apparently has this morning. She turns back to me. “And what do you do?”

“My dad’s a superhero,” Tucker announces.

“An actor, hm? I suppose that shouldn’t surprise me, given the circles Ellie’s close to.”

“I’m in the Air Force,” I correct.

“Oh. A working man.”

“He has a really cool job testing airplanes,” the Blond Caveman’s girlfriend says, surprising me.

Surprising the Blond Caveman too, by the looks of the what the hell? look he sends her way.

“How do you know what he does?” the caveman asks.

“Ellie told us about it at dinner the other night. Remember?” She smiles at me. “My brother’s a commercial pilot. So thank you.”

“I, ah, work on military jets,” I tell her.

“An airplane’s an airplane in my world, and I like knowing my brother’s safe when he’s in the air.”

“I like being safe in the air too,” Jason announces.

I start to explain that I’m more engineer than pilot, but Ellie jumps in before I can, tugging my arm like the good girlfriend she’s playing today. “Guys, don’t embarrass him. How much you want to bet Monica finds the most pirate gold?”

“I’m gonna find all the pirate gold!” Tucker announces.

“He has a son, Ellie?” Mrs. Dixon says with a nose lift.

“No, that’s a random kid he kidnapped with candy and donuts yesterday, but he’s cute, so we’re making him an official pirate with us.”

Monica coughs. Her fiancé clears his throat and swipes a hand over his grin. The Blond Caveman glowers. Ellie slips her hand lower until our fingers are intertwined, and fuck me, I could do this all day. “Come on. Are we digging for gold or what?”

“Mom, Dad, you go first,” Jason says.

“I can’t believe I’ve lived an hour from here my entire life and never knew I could come here to dig for pirate gold,” the Blond Caveman’s girlfriend says, falling into line.

“Dad, can we get two shovels?” Tucker asks.

“How about you help me?” Ellie says to him.

“Yeah! I’ll dig for you, Miss Captain Ellie. Does your leg hurt today?”

“Not too bad. Thank you for asking.”

“Me and Dad got donuts, but we ate them already.”

“The banana pudding kind?”

Tucker wrinkles his nose. “No, plain. But Dad said he’d get you one of those pudding ones later. Can I get another donut later too?”

“Absolutely,” Ellie says at the same time I say, “One’s enough for the day.”

Ellie bends down. “I’ll sneak you one when he’s not looking,” she whispers.

Tucker giggles.

And I shake my head at both of them.

“Is she bringing him to your wedding, Jason? He’s rather... plebian,” Mrs. Dixon murmurs loudly in front of us.

“So am I, Mom,” Jason replies.

“Honestly, I don’t know why you let Monica have a maid of honor who broke your brother’s heart. Not that he can’t do better, but it’s still rude.”

“So is talking about people behind their backs, Mrs. Dixon,” Ellie says cheerfully.

The Blond Caveman sends Ellie a murderous look.

She smiles back.

“I like you having other enemies besides me,” I tell her softly, and she snorts.

“Speaking of,” she replies, just as soft, “we can’t have sex anymore. It’s too dangerous.”

That’s a challenge if I ever heard one. “We’ll discuss this in bed tonight.”

“We will not,” she whispers.

“Bathtub works too.”

She gives me the old Ellie Ryder you’re pissing me off glare, and I don’t even try to tuck in a grin at how easy it still is to get her.

She huffs as she obviously realizes what I’m doing.

“Or maybe over strip ping-pong?” she murmurs.

Dammit.

There I go, popping a boner in public with my kid with me again.

She doesn’t look down, but she smiles triumphantly like she knows she won this round.

And honestly?

I’ll give it to her.

Because I like that smile.

She works hard. She’s dressed in a monkey costume in eighty-degree weather to make her best friend happy. And when I went snooping on her social media pages last night, I discovered post after post of shared help find this pet a home messages.

The last time she posted a personal picture was before Christmas.

Nothing about her accident.

Nothing about recovery.

The only pictures of her were posted by her parents or her friends.

So seeing her smile?

It’s like watching her come back to life.

Beck might've been pulling her leg about me having a problem, but he wasn't lying about Ellie's accident affecting her.

Monica's grinning widely as she hands me a shovel. "Get to work, Wyatt. This gold won't dig itself up. Show me those muscles."

The Blond Caveman yanks a shovel out of the pile and stalks off. "C'mon, Sloane, I'll show you how a real man digs for treasure," he says.

Monica and Ellie share a look. Tucker looks up at both of them, and says, "C'mon, Miss Captain Ellie. I'm gonna be a real man too," and even the Blond Caveman's girlfriend cracks up.

"Dad, I'm going to beat you," Tucker adds.

"Oh, you think so?"

"He's totally going to beat you," Ellie says.

He grins at me behind his glasses. How will I survive having to give him back to Lydia at the end of the summer?

I shove away the panic, because that's a problem for another day.

For now, I have pirate treasure to dig.

With my fake girlfriend.

Who just might be turning out to be more than I ever thought she could be.

Yep. Saving that problem for another day too.

Chapter Sixteen

Ellie

My brain is broken.

It's like the How we feel about Wyatt switch got flipped overnight, and now, instead of annoying as a gnat, he's at hot as hell.

Or possibly I'm overheating in this monkey costume.

But watching him shovel dirt in the town square is making me horny in ways I can't ever remember being horny.

He hasn't even taken his shirt off, and he's still smokin' hot.

"No, Miss Ellie, let me do that for you," Tucker says.

He's skin and bones, but he's putting his all into thrusting the short shovel into the soft earth, shrieking with glee every time he finds a plastic pirate coin.

I should really talk to Pop about getting some biodegradable pirate coins.

Yes.

That.

I should concentrate on how I can help make the Pirate Festival more earth-friendly.

Not on the way Wyatt just wiped his face with his T-shirt, exposing half of his six-pack and making ten women around us drop their shovels, including a pirate wench who just murmured, "I'd tap that."

"He's taken," Monica tells her.

"Lucky woman."

My cheeks burn, but I don't disagree. "I can dig a few shovels," I tell Tucker. "I'm not helpless."

"I'm being shrivelpuss," he informs me.

“Chivalrous,” Wyatt corrects with a grin.

“That means helping people because I’m a gentleman,” Tucker explains.

“And you’re doing a fantastic job,” Wyatt agrees. “But if Miss Ellie wants to dig some, you can let her have fun too.”

“But she’ll get her monkey fur all dirty.”

Such a sweet kid. “You’re the most chivalrous pirate I’ve ever met,” I tell him.

“Oh! Look! I found a pearl necklace!” Sloane exclaims.

All of the Dixons whip their heads around to look as she pulls a string of Mardi Gras beads from the ground.

“Those are fake,” Mrs. Dixon sniffs.

Sloane drapes them over her neck. She’s not sweating at all in her dog costume, nor does she seem at all the least bit offended that she had to play the dog. “They’re a fabulous addition to my collar, aren’t they, Patrick?”

He rolls his eyes. “Sure.”

“Are we nearly done?” Mrs. Dixon asks Jason.

“No way,” he replies. “We could dig for days and not find all the treasure they hid here.”

His mother goes pale. She takes a step and her heels twist in the dirt. “This is a safety hazard.”

“That’s why there are signs everywhere to wear boots,” Jason tells her.

“Big eyesore the rest of the year, isn’t it?” Mr. Dixon says.

“They’ll plant flowers in half of it and sod the rest when the week’s over,” Wyatt tells him.

I shoot him a look.

“I read the festival website,” he says. “You hot? Want a break?”

“Oh my god, Ellie, you’re so red you’re purple. Go sit down,” Monica orders.

“I’m fine,” I tell her.

It is really hot in this costume.

“Wyatt, do you know the most important thing about a wedding?” Monica asks.

“The bride’s always right?”

“Correct. Now go make sure Ellie sits down and has something to drink.”

Tucker looks wide-eyed between all the adults.

“You can stay with me, because you’re a good pirate treasure digger,” Monica tells him.

I squint my eyes at her, because is she trying to get me to strip for Wyatt?

She doesn’t bat a lash of acknowledgment.

“Can I, Dad? Please?”

“We’ll be right here,” Monica tells him. “And Jason knows CPR, and he always carries a first aid kit.”

That’s such baloney, and judging by the way Wyatt’s lips twist and his eyes narrow, he knows it.

“If she dies of heat stroke, it’s on you,” Monica tells him. “Are you a good boyfriend or not?”

“All right, all right. C’mon, Ellie. Let’s go get you out of this costume and into some air conditioning.”

“She loves the banana pudding at Crusty Nut,” Monica offers.

“I know,” he tells her.

Of course he does.

He fought me over which one of us got to put the bedspread covered in last night’s banana pudding into the washing machine this morning.

I let him win, but only because I had a call come in from an employee who needed to take an emergency sick day because her daughter was diagnosed with appendicitis.

And also because I know he didn't forget the deal he offered, whereby he'd get to see my doodle pad.

"I'm not that hot," I tell him when he stops beside me.

"Just dead sexy hot," he replies.

Heat funnels to my core, and I try to stutter out a response, but before I can, he bends and tosses me over his shoulder.

I gasp in surprise.

"That hurt?" he asks quietly.

"No," I answer honestly, half-surprised.

"Good. Tell me if it does. And don't be a stubborn ass." He turns, and adds, "Tucker, I'll be right over there if you need me, okay?"

"Okay, Dad."

He marches across the field, me hanging on with my monkey butt in the air, and while I get the occasional twinge in my leg, it doesn't hurt.

I can't see Tillie Jean's face when Wyatt marches us into the Crusty Nut, but I can hear her. "Table for two?"

"By the window if you can," he tells her.

"How about the balcony, sugar?"

"Is it out of the sun?"

"You bet."

"Sounds great."

"Sorry about my butt, Tillie Jean," I offer.

"Cutest pirate monkey butt we've had come in so far this morning," she replies. "C'mon. I got a table with an umbrella and a great view of the treasure hunt."

"You got clothes on under that?" Wyatt asks while he carries me up the stairs.

I'd argue about this, but I'm tired of arguing with him. "Enough that I can unzip," I confirm.

“Hot dog, it’s my lucky day.”

I shouldn’t be amused, but once again, Wyatt made a joke, and now I’m laughing.

He finally puts me down next to a wrought iron patio table and lets me take my own seat under the umbrella Tillie Jean cranks up for us. After standing at the railing a minute, he waves at Tucker across the street, and then takes his own seat.

“Did Monica just set us up on a date?” I ask him. “I mean, not that she doesn’t believe we’re dating, but...like on a real date. Alone. Is that what this is supposed to be?”

“That depends. Who’s paying?”

I toss a sugar packet at him. “Very funny.”

He smiles at me, and hello, gooey insides. Wyatt Morgan is not supposed to turn me all mushy and sappy.

But he’s doing an excellent job of it.

I wave a hand at my hot face, then belatedly realize I can unzip my monkey costume. I pull my arms out, and breathe a sigh of relief when the light summer breeze touches my bare skin.

Wyatt swallows a smile and glances at the menu Tillie Jean left.

“Has Beck called you today?” I ask him, because Beck’s a safe topic.

Kind of.

He shakes his head.

“Does that make you nervous?” I ask.

He frowns slightly, like he’s puzzled, then shakes his head again. “I think he’s trying to set us up.”

“Look, we can be friends, and it’s nice of you to humor me with claiming to be my boyfriend this week, but we seriously cannot be anything more.”

He leans back in his chair and watches me while our server delivers water glasses and asks if we need another minute.

“Yes,” he says at the same time I ask for a basket of gold nuggets—aka fried pickles—and a banana pudding.

“Hush,” I say to his raised eyebrows. “Patrick’s parents make me nervous, okay?”

“Make it two, please,” he tells the server, and she scuttles away with a smile.

Like she, too, thinks we’re on a date, and she, too, thinks we’re cute.

Not good.

Because even if Wyatt was relationship material, I’m not.

Chapter Seventeen

Wyatt

When our server leaves, Ellie leans into the table. “Why would Beck be trying to set us up?” she half-whispers. She doesn’t look annoyed.

More like anxious.

“He’s worried about you,” I tell her.

“Did you...tell him?” she asks.

She doesn’t say what, but she doesn’t have to. I shake my head. “You?”

“It was none of his fucking business.” She huffs. “That didn’t come out right.”

I start to smile, but she chews on her bottom lip, which simultaneously sends blood flowing straight to my cock and puts my pulse on high alert, because the Ellie I’ve always known would’ve rolled her eyes and said she was fine.

“Can I tell you something?” she asks.

“Why me?”

“Because if you tell anyone else, I can deny it because of our history.”

That’s the Ellie I know, and for the first time in my life, I’m finding her huffiness utterly adorable. “Then absolutely.”

“I don’t know what I want to do with my life.”

“I recommend not marrying your ex-boyfriend.”

She kicks me under the table, and I feel marginally better about myself for that smart-ass comment just popping off my tongue.

“When I graduated high school, I told myself I’d have a master’s degree in five years, a husband in eight, and kids in ten,” she tells me, which isn’t a surprise in the least. “And that I’d work my ass off to earn every promotion I got with my parents, because I know they’ll leave me the company one day, but I don’t want it just because I’m their daughter. I want to earn it. I’ve been saving up to buy them out five years before they think they want to retire because Beck’s right, they’re workaholics and they don’t realize how old they’re getting.”

“You should probably not use the word old when you approach them.” Dammit, I’m terrible at this. “I mean—”

She cuts me off with a flutter of her hand. “I have two years to practice. I’ll get this.”

“Of course you will.”

“See? That’s the thing. I can tell you what I want professionally. But I don’t have a clue what I want in my personal life anymore.”

“You don’t want a family anymore?”

“I don’t know if I...if I can.” The words come out like they’re physically painful, and the sudden understanding hits me like a sock to the gut that pushes it into my chest to suffocate my heart.

I never wanted to have kids, and then Tucker happened, and I can’t imagine my life without him. We talk every night during the school year—I got him a phone over Lydia’s objections, and because he’s seven, he doesn’t know yet he can push limits—and it’s the best part of every day.

Ellie’s always wanted kids. Always.

Life’s not fair.

I swallow hard. “The accident?”

“I haven’t been...regular...since. And my doctor...doesn’t know yet. She says I need more time to heal, but the best way to find out is to...try. And I don’t have anyone to try with, and I’m not in any position to do it all by myself, or even ready at this point, and I never wanted to do it by myself anyway. But I just—” She looks away and cuts herself off with a shake of her head.

“Does your family know?”

“Of course not. They’ve barely gotten over the trauma of the phone call. I’m not putting this on them.”

“Ellie. They’re your family.”

“And they can’t fix it.”

I rub a hand over my face, wincing when I accidentally hit my sore eye, and stifle a sigh. “I don’t know what all’s going on inside your head right now, but I know your mother, and I know she’s always been the best listener, with the best advice, and she might not be able to solve anything, but she can sure as hell make anyone feel better.”

“I didn’t say I feel bad about anything.”

“But you don’t know what you want out of your personal life,” I point out. Helpfully.

“Never mind. Forget I said anything.”

“You know your worth as a person is more than just whether you can have kids and walk without a limp.”

The edges of her pursed lips go white as she glares over the railing at the park.

“If anyone can beat this,” I say, “you can.”

She doesn’t answer.

“Fuck, Ellie, Beck said the doctors weren’t sure you’d ever walk again, and look at you, being a dumbass and pushing your limits and giving them the double bird while you dance on tables.”

I get a reluctant grin.

“And scientists have made huge advancements in anatomically correct, realistic looking robots, so there’s even a chance you’ll be able to at least look like you’re married before you’re fifty,” I add.

She spins in her chair and lunges for the ketchup, and before I know what’s happening, I’m staring down a squeeze bottle.

“That wasn’t very nice,” she says primly.

Her eyes are dancing behind the bruises, and dammit, she's pretty when she smiles.

And when she threatens me with a ketchup bottle.

"You can try it," I tell her, "but I'm a quick draw with the mustard."

Her gaze darts to the yellow squirt bottle on the table, then back to me. "You think so?"

"I could definitely sword fight you with it."

"If you want to get stabbed in the heart with a ketchup spout."

"You'd go for my heart?"

"I'm ruthless, Morgan. Ruthless."

"But have you studied the art of war?"

"I've studied the art of not getting trampled by my dear brother, which is the same thing."

"Is not."

"Oh, please. It is—hey!"

I snag the mustard bottle and point it at her while she's distracted with arguing.

"I should squirt you," she says, but she's smiling so big she can't get it out without a laugh.

"Wouldn't be the first time."

"Oh, like yesterday was my fault?"

I want to kiss her.

I want to lean across this table and kiss her until neither one of us can breathe, and then I want to kiss her more.

Because she's strong. So fucking strong. She's what I want to be. What I try to be.

Unstoppable. Undaunted by a challenge. Fearless.

"All your fault," I say. "You set me up."

She's leaning in like she feels it too. Like she would kiss me too.

She's still pointing the ketchup bottle at me, but it's Ellie, so naturally.

"You are so full of baloney."

She's a Siren, beckoning me with her wide smile and daring insults. She's bold and driven and fun.

I miss fun.

"You like baloney," I remind her.

She wrinkles her nose.

"You did. When we were kids."

The ketchup bottle wavers. "How do you even remember that?"

"It was horrifying."

"You used to eat canned meat. You can't talk."

We're so close, the nozzles on our condiment bottles are touching. "And how do you remember that?"

"My mother tells the story every time your name comes up. That poor Wyatt Morgan, we had to introduce him to real lunch meat. Think what would've happened to the boy's diet if he'd never moved in down the street."

"Lies. All lies." So very close. I could kiss her. I shouldn't, but I could.

Her gaze dips to my lips, a smile growing, and I'm nearly there when she suddenly jerks back and squirts ketchup across my shirt.

She gapes for a minute at me, suspended in shock. "Oh, shit," she gasps. "I didn't mean—"

I squeeze my bottle and get her with mustard across her chin and neck.

She squirts again, and I dive out of my chair to miss the red stream. "That was an accident, you jerk!" she shrieks.

"Likely story," I retort, aiming the mustard just to her right.

A bird squawks indignantly. “Motherfucker, kiss my ass.” There’s a flap of wings, and Long Beak Silver shoots into the air with a streak of yellow that wasn’t on his feathers before.

We both stare at the bird.

“Oh my god, you shot Long Beak Silver,” Ellie whispers in horror.

“All your fault,” I repeat, hastily stealing her ketchup bottle and moving all the condiments two tables away.

She’s wiping the mustard off her face when Davis appears at the top of the stairs. His man bun is freshly straightened, his beard thick enough to be hiding a squeeze bottle, and he’s shaking his head. “Foreplay?”

“Shut up,” Ellie says.

I grab a napkin and wipe the mustard she missed under her jaw.

“How’s the patient?” I ask him.

“Sitting pretty with Ellie at 802,700, but I could change that to my name.”

“You are a god,” Ellie tells him. “I could even kiss that flea-infested beard. Sit. Lunch is on Wyatt.”

“So generous,” Davis replies. “Where’s your kid?”

I point to the treasure dig. “With the human parrot.”

“Ah. Anyway, bill’s in the mail. I’m heading home.”

“But you just got here,” Ellie says while I add, “Kick up your feet and stay a while.”

“No can do. I’ve got a reactor to hack.” He turns his gaze to Ellie. “We’re even now. Don’t break it again.”

“Swear on the penalty of having to watch Beck do a photo shoot, I will not touch Frogger again for the rest of my life.”

“Kiss her for me,” he adds to me. He gives us both a salute and disappears down the stairs again.

“You are not kissing me,” Ellie whispers.

“Now it’s a challenge,” I tell her.

“I’m so freaking serious, Wyatt. We can be friends, but we cannot touch, kiss, get naked, take baths, or do any other thing that people who date do. We will literally die. The universe does not want us together.”

And on top of that, she has a life in Copper Valley, and my situation is complicated.

“We have to touch at the very least,” I point out, because I’m apparently a masochistic idiot. “I’m your boyfriend this week. Your wedding date. Remember?”

“Fine. Touching. But only in public, and only when absolutely necessary. And we should probably both wear protective gear to bed—which we’re going to separately—and take shifts sleeping in case the house burns down around us.”

I don’t bother trying to hide my grin. “Sure. We’ll set up a schedule.”

“Don’t mock me. I’m serious.”

“As a heart attack?” I prompt.

She swats at my hand. “Do not tempt fate,” she hisses.

“All right, all right. No touching, no kissing, no nothing unless absolutely necessary to sell your story.”

“Thank you.”

She smiles.

I smile.

Boundaries should be a good thing. I don’t have room in my life for falling for Ellie Ryder. Not with the added complications it would bring.

But agreeing to her new terms feels more fake than pretending to be her boyfriend for the wedding.

And I don’t want to think about what that means.

Chapter Eighteen

Ellie

Because a wedding at the Pirate Festival is a big deal—especially since Shipwreck is competing with the Unicorn Festival in the small town of Sarcasm not ten miles away—Monica and Jason are guest judges for the pirate costume, ship model, and food contests, and the entire wedding party is invited along to help offer opinions. So Wednesday night, Wyatt, Tucker, and I join Monica, Jason, and their families at the Deep Blue Retreat Center, where dozens of pirate ship models are on display in the semi-circular conference room, which has windows overlooking the soft, hazy mountain ridges on either side of Shipwreck.

“These are amazing,” Monica says as we walk along the curved row of tables holding the ships submitted by the school-age kids in Shipwreck. Some are made of Legos, some out of popsicle sticks, some out of clay, but they’re all adorable and really cool in which details the kids picked to highlight.

Almost all of them have a fake bird, and at least half have signs added about no cussing on deck.

My personal favorite is the one made out of recycled food containers, and I know Monica’s totally going to vote for that one too, since her day job is making art out of recycled materials.

“Dad, can I make a pirate ship?” Tucker asks.

“Sure. I’ve got some Legos for you at home.”

“No, Dad, to enter in the contest!”

“Next year, bud. They’re closed this year.”

“I’ll judge your ship, Tucker,” Monica tells him. “And I’d bet it’ll be awesome.”

They're best friends since hanging out digging for treasure this morning.

"How's your leg today?" Monica's mom asks me as we make our way to the next room, which has tables and tables loaded down with pirate-themed food.

"Better than a peg leg," I tell her.

"Dad! Dad, can I have an octopus?" Tucker asks.

Wyatt catches him by the shoulders. "Slow down, there, Captain Hollow Leg. See Miss Monica's scoring chart? She needs to decide what's pretty before we taste it, and then she has to rate how good it is."

"No need to worry, we have extras for the wee ones." Pop Rock ambles over, dressed today like his ancestor, Thorny Rock. "Right this way, right this way."

My stomach gives a timely growl, and Monica laughs. "Go on, Ellie. All of you. We'll be done soon."

"I've never eaten a hot dog in my life," Mrs. Dixon murmurs to her husband. "This is the most undignified festival I've ever seen."

"I think it's fun," Sloane declares. "They say fun cures constipation."

Patrick shoots her a look. She smiles back tightly.

And Wyatt and I share a look.

So there's trouble in Patrick-Sloane land.

Pop opens the door to the center's industrial kitchen, and oh my word, the food.

So much food.

Plates and platters of entrées, appetizers, sides, and—"Cookies!" Tucker exclaims.

It's the same food out on display—deviled egg ships with pirate flags, island pizza, quicksand dip, pirate eyeballs, hot dogs cut into wedges with the bottom half sliced to give it octopus legs, meat cannonballs—except there are paper pirate plates and napkins and a huge bowl of pirate punch that's obviously been dipped into.

"Eat up, me hearties," Pop says. "That there be kiddie punch, because me blasted crew drank up all the rum last night."

"Are these meatballs made with chicken?" Mrs. Dixon demands, pointing to the pirate eyeballs.

Monica's mom smiles. She's dressed like a hippie pirate, with a scabbard tied over her flowery muumuu and a pirate hat on her short graying hair. "Yes, Caroline, they're chicken. I called ahead and checked because I knew you'd prefer it."

Wyatt and I both turn around before Mrs. Dixon looks at either of us. He dives for a plate to help Tucker make a few healthy choices before getting to dessert, and I take a minute to wipe the smile off my face as I pretend to decide between the quicksand dip and shovels—aka hummus and vegetables—and the grilled parrot—aka chicken wings.

Ultimately, both win.

We all load up our plates and carry them into the center's dining room, where other judges are eating and discussing the festival. Monica's mom takes the seat beside me at the rectangular table, and Wyatt and Tucker pile in across from us.

Jason's family sits at the table behind me, and I breathe a sigh of relief that I can make any face I want without fear of getting an earful of loudly murmured insults.

"Ellie, honey, how's work?" Monica's mom asks.

I tell her about a few of the projects I've been overseeing. My parents' environmental firm has contracts to retrofit several aging buildings around Copper Valley to improve energy efficiency. We're also working on initiatives with the local government to promote more recycling options around the city, and we've been branching farther and farther into other parts of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

She asks Wyatt about his job, and he downplays the whole flies jets with untested systems thing, because god forbid the man toot his own horn. Tucker's too busy chowing down on everything on his plate to talk. He has a smear of ketchup across his face, which makes me smile, both because Tucker gets cuter every day, and also because it makes me remember holding Wyatt at ketchup-point this morning.

But then I'm frowning, because I'm not supposed to let myself find Wyatt attractive, since it's bad for our health.

And I probably shouldn't get attached to his son either.

Monica's mom asks how we met and started dating, and we trip over each other telling contradictory stories that all make Tucker giggle, but we're saved by Monica dropping into the seat on the other side of her mother.

"Don't listen to them," Monica says. "Their relationship thrives on one-upping each other. The real story is that they've been in love since they were teenagers but were both too stubborn and scared to do anything about it until recently."

I open my mouth to argue, but I realize she's boxed us into a corner.

She grins at me.

And Wyatt leaps up, uses his chair as a vault to fly across the cafeteria table.

"Wha—" I start, turning to watch him leap across the table behind us too. "Oh, shit."

"Oh my god," Monica gasps.

Jason drops his plate upside down and rushes to the table too, where Wyatt's lifting Caroline Dixon off her chair and giving her the Heimlich.

Her eyes are huge, her face mottling, lips parted and bluing at the edges as she struggles to breathe.

Wyatt thrusts his fist under her breastbone once, twice, and on the third thrust, a piece of meatball flies out of her mouth and lands square on Patrick's plate. I don't know where Sloane or Mr. Dixon are, but they're not at the table.

It's just Mrs. Dixon and Patrick, who's now rushing toward his mother too.

She gasps and sags and makes a very unladylike expression that's too garbled to fully be called an expletive, but I'm pretty sure she just said fuck.

Wyatt helps her to sitting. "Okay now?" he asks.

She gulps hard, panting, and nods without looking at him.

"Back up, give her space," Patrick snaps. He shoves Wyatt out of the way and squats. "Are you okay? Is anything broken? Did he crack a rib?"

"He saved her life, you jackass," Jason snaps, approaching quickly from the other side of the long table.

"Quit fighting," she rasps out. "And hand me a drink."

Adrenaline belatedly makes my veins fizz. My legs wobble while Wyatt quietly steps away from the Dixons and returns the long way to our table.

"My dad's a hero," Tucker whispers.

"You're damn right," Monica says softly, her voice thick too.

Her mother's fanning her face, eyes bright like she's fighting back tears. "Lordy goodness," she murmurs. "That was scary as all dickens."

Tucker's eyes are huge, borderline scared, and I reach across the table to squeeze his little hand. "Hey. It's okay."

"Did she die?"

"No, sweetie. She's okay."

He glances at his plate, full of hot dog octopi and big chunks of fruit and cookies. Then back at all the grown-ups fussing and panicking belatedly at the next table.

"Just chew it good," I tell him.

He nods and gives me a brave smile, and I suddenly don't know how I could do it.

How do you protect someone you love so much from ever getting hurt? Or let them hurt when they have to?

How do you survive it?

My respect for Wyatt is growing by the second.

Parenthood isn't for the weak.

Monica heads to help Jason, and her mom sinks back to her seat, but I watch Wyatt casually walk past two families at the end of the rows of tables, all gaping at him like he's the hero Tucker knows him to be, while he keeps his head down, hands in his pockets.

He doesn't look up until he's back in his seat next to Tucker, and then, his focus is all on his son. "Ah-ah, I saw that. Fruit swords before treasure cookies."

Tucker grins, his fear fading with Wyatt beside him again. "Good job, Dad."

I could probably explain what I do next, but I don't want to.

Let's just say it ends with me bending across the table, grabbing Wyatt by the cheeks, and planting a kiss worthy of a hero on his lips.

And there might've been some belated applause.

For him being a hero, I mean.

Not for me kissing him.

Because that would be ridiculous.

And dangerous.

But two hours later, I'm grateful to be safe and sound back in Beck's house. No deer or foxes or wolves darted in front of my car, and clearly they didn't get Wyatt either, since he pulls up right behind me.

Neither of us has said another word about Mrs. Dixon choking.

Or about me kissing the stuffing out of him.

And I'm not planning on mentioning it.

Especially the kissing part.

Until I walk through the basement door from the garage and realize there's a huge water stain over the bar. "What—" I start, and then I know.

“The dishwasher,” Wyatt and I say in unison.

“I started it before we left.” He scrubs a hand over his face.
“Davis probably didn’t notice.”

I just gape at him and continue to point at the ceiling.

“I know, I know,” he sighs. “I’ll go get towels.”

I should argue that I’ll clean it up. That this is my fault for kissing him. But I know he’ll insist on helping, and then we’ll be within looking distance of each other, and I’m really, really starting to be convinced that we probably shouldn’t ever even live in the same town. “I’m going to bed. And I’m locking the door,” I inform him.

He smirks. “You’re ridiculous.”

“Dad, can I watch baseball?” Tucker asks through a yawn.

I don’t wait to hear his answer, because I’m already starting to get attached to both of them.

The universe is being a real dick.

Or maybe I need to quit looking for what’s easy—like Wyatt just landing in my lap this week—and actually figure out what I want to do about getting my life back on track.

He was right this morning.

The doctors didn’t know if they’d be able to repair my hip and leg enough for me to ever walk again.

But here I am. Limping my stiff self up the stairs.

I am going to be physically fine again.

It’s time to figure out what the rest of me needs.

Chapter Nineteen

Wyatt

The things I do for my friends.

When Beck asked me to irritate Ellie, I had a vague idea what I was in for. A prickly porcupine sniping at me? Yep, because I knew just how to poke it. Glares hot enough to melt iron? Wouldn't have her any other way.

That uncomfortable feeling in my dick every time I thought of her naked?

Can't say I haven't been dealing with that anyway these past six months, when I wasn't letting the guilt seep in.

Getting my toes done with Tucker, Ellie, Monica, Jason, the Blond Caveman, Sloane, and the mothers of the happy couple? At the Yo Ho Ho Spa?

Didn't even cross my mind.

But here I am, in a fancy-ass massage chair with one foot soaking in a tub of flowery-scented water while a woman I've never met buffs, slathers, rubs, and does all kinds of weird shit to the other.

Tucker erupts in giggles every time his pedicurist tries to touch his feet, so she's given up and is letting him suck on a pirate lollipop and just soak his toes in the bubbly spa water.

"Smile, honey," Ellie says from her seat on the other side, holding up her phone to get a selfie of the three of us.

I glare at her.

She smiles bigger.

Tucker laughs.

"Beck gets this done all the time," she tells me.

“He also parades around in his skivvies. Are you texting this to him? I will...” I wiggle my brows at her, a clear threat to kiss her, or touch her, or cause some other disaster to befall us “...if you text that picture to anyone. Or post it on social media. Or do anything other than delete it.”

Her brows twitch like her face is battling between scowling at me and giving me the I dare you look.

“It takes a man very secure in his masculinity to get his toes done,” Monica calls to me from her seat in a massage chair on the opposite wall.

The Blond Caveman has his nose tucked inside a financial magazine and ignores her.

Jason grins at me. “She’s right, you know.”

“Oh, hush. Wyatt has no issues with his masculinity,” Ellie says. “You should’ve seen him mopping the floor of the kitchen last night.”

“You should’ve seen us mopping the floor,” I tell her.

“I was a big helper,” Tucker says proudly. “I mopped buckets full.”

Monica sends a quizzical glance at Ellie.

“Dishwasher flooded,” Ellie explains.

“Well, thank god it was Beck’s house,” Monica says.

I choke on a laugh, because that, at least, is the truth. I texted him a picture and told him Ellie and I got carried away doing the dishes.

He replied with a picture of his middle finger, and his assistant pinged me two minutes later to say that she’d scheduled a drywaller to come in and repair the water damage next week, and to enjoy washing dishes by hand in the meantime since the earliest she could get a new dishwasher was five to seven days.

This morning, I woke up to a message from him that he couldn’t ask for a better boyfriend for his sister, except maybe Levi, because his ass is nicer than mine.

I haven't told Ellie, because we'll sort that all out after the wedding's over, when she doesn't need me to play this role anymore.

I hope I don't lose a friend over this.

But if I do, I probably didn't deserve him as long as I had him anyway.

"Want me to paint pirate flags on your toes?" my foot lady asks.

Ellie dissolves in a fit of laughter.

"You don't have to get nail polish," Monica tells me with a grin.

"Yeah," I tell the lady. "Pirate flags."

Ellie laughs so hard she has a coughing fit that ends with her gasping and rubbing her leg, but she's still smiling, so there's that. Her foot lady has to stop. Jason gives me a thumbs up. The Blond Caveman rolls his eyes behind his magazine, which he's not using very effectively to block his face.

When we're done, I have pirate flags on my two big toes, and I look like an idiot, but I don't really care. Tucker thinks it's awesome and begs me to take a picture to send to his mom.

I oblige while I'm waiting to pay, and when I get to the front, the cashier smiles. "Mother of the groom took care of you, your son, and your girlfriend. Go show off those pretty toes, and come back and see us again!"

Outside, Mrs. Dixon is speed-walking toward the hotel at the end of the street. Jason and Monica and her mom are talking to Ellie and Sloane while the Blond Caveman makes a phone call.

I stop next to Jason. "Your mom didn't have to pay for us."

"It's the only way she'll say thank you." He claps me on the shoulder. "Don't mention it or she'll get bitchy again. We're heading to the food trucks on the square. You guys coming?"

"Wyatt promised Tucker another trip to the water park," Ellie answers for us. "They'll catch up with us later."

“You want to go with them?” Monica asks. “We’re just going to be walking and stuffing our faces and badgering Patrick into wearing a pirate hat and an eye patch. You’ll have more fun at the water park.”

“I didn’t bring my swimsuit.”

“I have six.”

“Monica.”

“Oh, hush. Don’t give me that I’m here for the bride stuff. When’s the last time you went down a water slide?”

“I can’t—”

“And the lazy river? You love the lazy river.”

“Babe, you love the lazy river,” Jason says. “Let’s all go.”

“Yeah!” Tucker cheers.

Ellie tries to send Monica another meaningful look, but it’s completely lost on the bride.

“Nobody cares about your scar,” I tell her quietly.

“I care,” she mutters.

I study her a minute.

She’s not meeting my gaze, and her cheeks are going pink.

She’s soaked in the tub at least three nights this week, so I know the water itself isn’t the issue.

It’s the swimsuit.

“Give me thirty minutes,” I tell her.

Her brows furrow. “For what?”

“A solution. C’mon, Tucker. We’ve got a job to do.”

“You’re not bailing on us, are you?” Monica asks.

“Nope. Meet you there. Make sure Ellie’s with you.”

I don’t know if my idea’s even possible, but it’s worth a try. And if there’s anywhere that can pull it off, it’s Shipwreck.

Chapter Twenty

Ellie

I am in severe like with Wyatt Morgan.

The man found me scuba shorts.

He activated Shipwreck's gossip network and found me scuba shorts that cover me down to the knee, completely hiding my scars.

We spend the entire afternoon at the water park, destroying our pedicures, Jason and Wyatt trying to out-cannonball each other, floating around on the lazy river, helping Tucker learn to swim, laughing as he climbs through the two-story pirate adventure sky fort with its water cannons and dodges the water that dumps out of the giant bucket on top, and soaking up the gorgeous afternoon sunshine.

I bypass the water slides, but Tucker and Wyatt go down them a million times.

Monica declares it naptime around five and gives me a gentle push toward Wyatt's car. "Go home. Jason and I are having a pizza-in-the-room night and leaving the families to fend for themselves. We'll see you for the rehearsal in the morning, okay?"

"Not The Grog?" We missed it last night with all the worry over Mrs. Dixon almost choking.

"Oh my god, Ellie, I am so tired," she says with a laugh. "Besides, I think Jason's feeling neglected."

"If you need anything—"

"My mom's here. And you know all I have to do is lift a finger and any of the Rock family will be right on it."

"C'mon, Ellie," Wyatt says. He waves at somebody on a bike, and the rider slows as he approaches, a double-handled plastic bag dangling from the handlebars. “Train’s leaving in three minutes.”

“Mr. Morgan?” the kid on the bike says.

“Is that fried chicken?” I ask, sniffing the air.

“And potato salad, french fries, banana pudding, and a funnel cake. Ordered it all from the food trucks.”

“Jason, I’m sorry, I’m marrying Wyatt tomorrow instead,” Monica announces.

“Shut your mouth, he’s mine,” I retort without thinking.

She grins at me, and I feel my cheeks heat up.

And not because of all the sun this afternoon.

“Girls are weird,” Tucker announces. “I’m never getting married. Except maybe to my sister if I ever have one. Can I have a sister?”

For once, Wyatt seems to be speechless.

“You should ask Santa for a sister,” I tell Tucker while I herd him into Wyatt’s SUV. “Sisters are the best. I know, because I am one.”

“Sisters are annoying,” Wyatt corrects.

“He’s just jealous because he never had one,” I whisper to Tucker, who giggles while he pulls his seat belt over his booster seat. “Sisters are totally awesome.”

Tucker loops his arms around my neck and hugs me tight, and surprised, I hug him back.

“You’re awesome, Miss Captain Ellie.”

“Not as awesome as you.”

We make it back to Beck’s house without incident and dive into the food like we haven’t eaten in a week. Tucker tries two bites of banana pudding and declares it gross.

“Then I guess it’s my paternal duty to eat yours,” Wyatt announces.

“Hello, we share it,” I argue.

“He’s not your kid.”

“Tucker, may I please have half of your banana pudding?”

He looks between us. “It’s nice to share, Dad,” he finally whispers.

“It really is, Dad,” I agree.

“Bath time for you,” Wyatt tells him without answering either of us.

But he leaves half a carton of banana pudding in the fridge when he takes Tucker upstairs.

I clean up the dinner mess, realizing with a start that it’s been days since I cleaned up in here, yet everything’s nearly spotless anyway. Except for our small dinner mess, of course.

Because Wyatt takes care of things.

I’ve sometimes wondered why Beck stayed close with him. Once the guys started their boy band adventure, an entire new world opened up. Beck, Levi, Tripp, Cash, and Davis could’ve gone anywhere, done anything. They each lost a few friends along the way—money changes things—but Wyatt was the one constant outside immediate family.

And I think I get it now.

Just like we called Davis to fix Frogger, any one of the guys from the neighborhood could call Wyatt, and he’d have their backs. He’d do anything they needed done.

Including keeping an eye on a sister they’re worried about.

Once the dishes are put away, I fix myself a cup of tea—a new habit since the accident—snag my doodle pad from the bedroom and carry it out to the living room. Tucker’s crying upstairs. Wyatt’s talking to him softly, steady, calm, his deep voice reassuring me too even though I don’t realize I need reassurance, nor do I have any idea what he’s saying.

It's just the calming cadence of his voice.

Nothing could be that calm and soothing if there was actually a problem. Poor kid's probably exhausted from too much fun.

I glance at email on my phone, decide there's nothing that can't wait until next week, and toss it aside to open my doodle pad instead.

I doodled all the time when I was a kid, but sports, clubs, and other extra-curriculars didn't leave me much time for it in high school or college. It wasn't until I was forced to take two months off work for recovery this winter that I picked it up again.

And it turns out, I realize as I flip through the pages, I had a lot of anger to work through this year.

Dick and the Nuts was supposed to be fun, about a schlong and a pair of peanuts—no, not testicles, actual peanuts, like the legumes—who set out to take over the world despite one of the nuts being on crutches.

Dick was supposed to be a funny, lighthearted evil genius.

He's actually everything I hated about Patrick by the time he broke up with me. Addicted to his job first, his phone second, his bloodline third, and everything else was just gravy. I met Patrick at a fundraiser for Jason's company—clean water and green energy pretty much go hand-in-hand, and my parents like to send corporate dollars from Ryder Consulting toward various nonprofits every year—and I thought we shared a lot of the same passions in life.

I don't know if I looked at him through rose-colored glasses that first year, or if he slowly changed away from the man I thought he was when we met, but by the time this past Christmas rolled around, I was more angry that he'd kept me from meeting my goal of being married and pregnant than that he hadn't proposed.

I should've realized that meant I wanted the wrong thing out of our relationship, but it took a car accident and, honestly, this week for me to fully connect the dots.

There's more to life than marking off checkboxes.

I'm smiling to myself over the Nuts—I named them Joe and Bob, because I'm creative like that—and their plan to put Dick in a trance so they can run the controls on the spaceship to blast the earth with a laser beam that'll give everyone the giggles so they can rob all the chocolate shops they want without anyone raising an alarm, when Wyatt steps down the stairs.

He disappears into the basement, and when he returns with an armful of sheets and the comforter for Beck's bed, I start to get up.

"Move one muscle, and I'm calling Beck and telling him we're getting married."

"That would show the Dixons," I reply. "And you know that's the fastest way to get Beck here. He loves weddings. And me. And sometimes you."

Wyatt grins.

I grin back.

He's not winning this round.

"I'll swap out your bubble bath for itch powder," he offers.

"You would not."

"Wanna bet?"

"You don't have itch powder."

"Last time I stayed here, your brother salted my sheets and put a life-size taxidermied bear in my bedroom to scare the shit out of me. I owe him. So yeah, I brought itch powder."

And I'm suddenly quite certain I don't want the man making the bed I'm going to sleep in tonight.

I start to move again. "Sit," he orders.

Damn, that military order voice is hot.

Hot hot.

And that's why I sit.

Because if I follow Wyatt into the bedroom, the mattress won't be the only thing undressed.

“Thank you,” I say, conceding with a regal nod. “Also, if you itch powder my sheets, I’ll itch powder your underwear.”

He just grins again.

Which is also freaking hot.

I go back to flipping through my doodles. After a few minutes, Wyatt appears again. He stops in the kitchen before joining me with a water bottle in one hand and the rest of the banana pudding in the other. He claims the recliner angled to give him a view of both me and the scenery of the town below—or it would, if dusk wasn’t falling—and props up the footrest. “Trade you,” he says, lifting the banana pudding and pointing to my doodle pad.

I hesitate only a moment before I lean over, ignoring the twinge in my hip and thigh, to snatch the pudding and toss him the notebook.

“I was kidding, Ellie.” He holds out my book for me to take it back, but I shrug.

“I was going to show you anyway.”

“Why?”

“To scare you into your senses so you’ll quit trying to kiss me.”

He smirks and settles deeper into the recliner as he flips the cover open. “Do I want to know where you got the inspiration for Dick?”

“You don’t recognize him?”

Dick’s a short, squat, not very pretty penis. He looks nothing like Wyatt’s package.

“Can’t say I do,” he replies easily, completely bypassing the opportunity to ask if I’ve gotten an eyeful of my brother without the sock the photographers make him put in his briefs.

It’s an old joke. Possibly we’ve worn it out.

Also, possibly I don’t want to think about my brother in his underwear. It’s been nice having the cardboard cutout of him in the corner turned around.

Wyatt's perceptive gray eyes skim the page, and he snickers.

"Not a word on my talent," I warn him around a mouthful of heaven. I mean, banana pudding. My mom makes awesome banana pudding, but there's something about the meringue on Crusty Nut's banana pudding that puts it head and shoulders above.

"I was laughing at the Nuts," he tells me.

"Oh. Then maybe you do have good taste after all."

Sparring with him is so easy. We've done it a million times. It's habit. But it's also comfortable, which isn't something I ever noticed before.

Maybe it's never been comfortable before.

Or maybe we've both grown up.

Considering how long we've each been legal adults, it's probably past time.

"Why'd you date the Blond Caveman so long?" he asks as he flips another page.

"Ambition made me blind. Why didn't you quit the military?"

His smile fades into a resigned scowl. "Paperwork and networking failure."

"Networking?"

"Need a job to pay child support. Don't have enough experience yet in flight test to be valuable to anyone who'd hire me in Copper Valley. And my request for a waiver to get out of my service commitment got lost on some colonel's desk. Found it last week, got denied."

"Beck always said you'd be career military. That it suits you."

"Shit happens. Rather have Tucker than a long career though." He skims the next page and cackles.

Wyatt Morgan.

Cackling.

Because he thinks my doodles are funny.

My nipples go tight and a familiar heat pools between my legs.

“Broccolisauruses? Eating underwear models?”

“Beck might’ve pissed me off that day.”

“What’d he do, tell you that you couldn’t do something?”

“He asked me to be his date to some gala in Paris.”

He glances at me in surprise. “That pissed you off?”

“You want to know the last time Beck asked me to be his date to anything?”

“Ah.”

I think he’s done, that he gets it, but instead, he shuts the book and looks at me. “Ever consider he finally realized what he almost lost?”

I open my mouth, but I suddenly don’t know if he’s talking about Beck, and the possibility of losing a sister, or himself, and the possibility that he might’ve lost an opportunity.

With me.

Which is crazy, because I have always irritated the shit out of him.

I used to run marathons. I knew I was pretty—I’m Beck Ryder’s sister, for god’s sake, last year’s People’s Sexiest Man Alive, and we’re clearly related—and athletic and smart. I didn’t have insecurity issues, and so when Wyatt was willing to do the naked tango with me, I assumed it was because he wanted the same thing I did.

A little human companionship and confirmation that I was still attractive to somebody.

And possibly he was a little tipsy.

And angry. And hurt. And lonely.

Just like I was, except I wasn’t tipsy.

And maybe, just maybe, seeing him lonely and hurt and angry, made me realize what I’d been missing all those years between hating him, then crushing on him, then hating him.

That I wouldn't have given him a second thought if there wasn't something there.

"I considered a lot of things after the accident," I tell him. "But it's complicated. I don't want pity dates. But I don't want to take anything for granted either, so I understand other people not wanting to take people for granted. But I also wanted everything to go back the way it was before. Except it can't."

"Embrace what's better, Ellie. Change what you can change. Fix what you can fix. Accept the rest."

"You mean like accepting that the house will burn down if we sleep together again?" I whisper.

He gives an exasperated laugh. "Sure."

"Okay. Good. Glad we agree on that."

"You gonna eat that?" he asks with a nod to my banana pudding.

Our banana pudding.

I lean over and hand it to him.

"Did you spit in it?" he asks suspiciously.

And I laugh.

Because we're a little messed up, but for the first time in my life, I'm really glad to have Wyatt as a friend.

Chapter Twenty-One

Wyatt

After a long and restless night, Tucker and I agree he needs to learn to play air hockey more than he needs to go dig for more pirate treasure or hunt for the peg leg that apparently still hasn't been found in town. Ellie was up early to take the box of parrots into town and get ready for the wedding, but she hung around long enough to have breakfast with us and draw Tucker a parrot for him to color later.

We're scrambling away for the puck mid-morning when I hear the door open and someone hit the security keypad.

"Stay here, bud," I tell Tucker.

I creep softly up the stairs, half expecting to see Beck, and instead, I get a glimpse of an older couple.

My eyes sting and my chest swells, because these two people are the closest thing I have to parents in the entire world.

"Morning," I say.

Mrs. Ryder turns, her bright blue eyes land on me, and her face lights up in a familiar smile that her children share. "Wyatt! We thought you'd be down in Shipwreck with Ellie."

She smothers me in a hug, which is impressive, considering I have over half a foot and at least thirty pounds on her. Mr. Ryder squeezes my shoulder. "Hanging in there?" he asks.

"Always. You, sir?"

"Can't complain."

"Where's that little boy of yours?" Mrs. Ryder demands. "I have presents."

"You didn't have to—"

"Hush. This is what grandmas do."

I know a thing or two about arguing with the Ryders—all of them—and I know it's usually pointless.

Sometimes fun, but always pointless. “Yes, ma'am.”

I help Mr. Ryder with the luggage while Mrs. Ryder heads downstairs to hug Tucker. After they're settled, Tucker talks them into heading to town with us for pizza.

Doesn't take much. Just him looking at Mrs. Ryder and asking if she's hungry for pizza too.

Tucker chews her ear off about the pirate festival on the drive down the mountain. I smile as I listen to them chattering back and forth, but worry's creeping in.

Tomorrow, we leave to drive home to Georgia. Monday, I go back to work. He starts at a summer camp that my boss swears his wife loves for their kids.

And we won't have Ellie with us.

For the majority of my life, that was just fine with me. She was irritating, obnoxious, and a general pain in the ass.

Now?

Either I need to see my doctor for an issue with sudden flaming indigestion, or I'm going to miss her.

Because maybe the problem was never that she was irritating, obnoxious, and a general pain in the ass.

Maybe the problem was that she was everything I wanted to be, and then everything I wanted, and nothing I thought I could have, or deserved to have.

Working hard to make something of myself in a career and being the best father I know how to be isn't always enough to erase the seeds planted in my subconscious in my early childhood that I was nothing but a pest.

“Work going well?” Mr. Ryder asks.

I tell him about my current project, an upgrade to radar sensors on the newest fighter platform, and he tells me about a windmill farm project their company's been doing for a cloudbased server complex south of the city, closer to where Davis lives.

“Still looking to get out in a year?” he asks me.

“I’m ready.” I’d stay in until retirement if I could—I like knowing my job supports my country and ultimately helps protect my friends and neighbors, and the work is challenging and rewarding—but the odds of being able to get stationed and stay stationed at the base just north of Copper Valley, and therefore close to Tucker, are slim. “Just waiting for the clock to tick down or a waiver to come through.”

“You want a job, you know where to find us.”

“Appreciate that, sir.”

Not that I plan on taking him up on any offer without knowing I’ve earned it. It was hard enough letting them pay for me to take my SATs so I could apply to college.

Which is exactly the sort of thing that family does, and one more reason I need to not fuck around with Ellie.

Her family means too much to me.

Hell, they’re why I applied for an ROTC scholarship the minute I hit campus.

So they wouldn’t feel like they needed to help me through.

That was before Beck and the guys hit it big with Bro Code, and before Ellie landed herself a full ride.

And if I mess things up with her, I’ll never again hear the chatter in the back of the car with the way they’ve adopted Tucker as a surrogate grandkid. I won’t feel like I still deserve to be treated like one of their own.

If Ellie and I were both in this for the long haul, that would be one thing.

But she doesn’t even want to touch me for fear the world will crumple around her.

So I’ll keep my feelings to myself, and Tucker will keep his second set of grandparents, and life will go on, just as it always has.

Except different.

We park once again in the field at the far end of Shipwreck and head down Blackbeard Avenue into town. Mr. Ryder scans the street. “Where do you suppose Ellie is?”

Spotting the bridal party isn’t easy this morning—no bright parrot costumes for the wedding day, apparently—but then I notice the English colonists.

And the woman who looks like Kiera Knightly in that pirate movie.

“Ah, there, I’d guess,” I tell Mr. Ryder. I don’t see Ellie, but Monica, Jason, Sloane, and the parents are in full colonial regalia. It appears Pop Rock is spending the day playing the role of a governor with the powdered white wig.

This town.

I wave to Monica down the block when she glances our way, and her face lights up as she waves back.

“Oh my heavens,” Mrs. Ryder murmurs with a smile. “I can only imagine what her bridal gown will look like.”

We meet up with them two shops down from Anchovies. Ellie’s still not with them.

Neither is the Blond Caveman.

A slither of unease works its way down my spine. Not because I’m worried Ellie still has feelings for him, but because I don’t trust him.

Especially when Mrs. Dixon’s face lights up at the sight of the Ryders. “Michelle! Christopher! How lovely to see you both again.”

She leans in for cheek kisses with Mrs. Ryder and to embrace Mr. Ryder.

Behind her back, Monica rolls her eyes so hard her tongue sticks out, and I realize maybe I’m not so bad.

All I want is a little love and acceptance.

These people, though—they’re in it for the social status.

“How is the environmental business?” Mr. Dixon asks, engaged for the first time all week.

Mr. Ryder shakes his hand. “Good, good.”

“You know our bank will be more than happy to help you out anytime you want to get out of that old neighborhood you’re still living in. Upstanding family like yours should be in a house fitting your station.”

Jason sighs.

Even Sloane seems surprised.

“We could never leave our home, but thank you,” Mrs. Ryder informs them. She easily executes a side-step to hug Monica. “You look beautiful, sweetie. We’re so happy for you two.”

“I’m so glad you came,” she replies.

When Mrs. Ryder turns to Monica’s mom, I lean closer to the bride. “Where’s Ellie?”

She points to a bench at the edge of the park, then frowns. “I think we pushed her too hard this week. She’s limping. I told her to stay there, but—”

“Is she okay?” I ask at the same time Mr. Ryder asks, “But where is she now?”

“Miss Ellie kissed my daddy,” Tucker announces.

Festival-goers keep passing by, a band of pirates leaps out into the middle of the street for an impromptu swordfight, and complete silence descends inside our group while the Ryders turn to look at me.

It’s not that I didn’t know this was coming.

Ever since the moment Ellie informed me that I owed her for ruining her wedding date, I’ve known I’d have to face her parents.

Her brother.

Our friends.

Explain it to Tucker.

“Oh, Wyatt!” Suddenly, Mrs. Ryder is squeezing me tight.
“Oh, this is wonderful.”

Mr. Ryder’s grinning at me, and I’ve never felt so loved while hating myself quite so much at the same time, because soon enough we’ll have to stage a break-up, and I don’t know the next time I’ll be able to look any of them in the eye.

“We should go find her,” I say gruffly.

“Absolutely,” Mr. Ryder agrees. He pulls his phone out and dials, and we all listen while the ringing rolls to voicemail.

Ellie’s safe here. She can take care of herself, and the locals know her well enough that if she gets into trouble, or gets hurt, they’ll be right at her side. She probably had to find a bathroom.

Or she went for banana pudding.

But the Blond Caveman is missing too.

I scan the square with its upturned dirt and more festival-goers digging for gold, the benches around it, up and down the sidewalk, but I don’t spot her.

“Tucker, you want to hang with me?” Monica asks him, like she knows I’m about to head off to find her.

“Is that your real hair?” Tucker asks.

She nods and squats in her huge colonial princess dress, tilting her ringlets at him. “It sure is. Want to touch it?”

I don’t want to leave him here. I have no idea what the Ryders will think of me when this week’s over, and so I’m clinging to the one thing I know I’ll still have.

But he drops my hand to inspect Monica’s hair, and somebody needs to find Ellie.

Mr. Ryder inclines his head back toward the Crusty Nut. I nod and take off into the dug-up square and toward the bench Ellie was last seen sitting on.

I’ve barely passed the back edge of the building to my left when I hear voices.

Familiar voices.

“Why are you doing this to me?” the Blond Caveman demands.

“It’s not about you, Patrick. This week is about Jason. And Monica.”

“I meant shoving that asshole in my face.”

There’s a beat of silence before Ellie asks, “What are you talking about?”

“You, all over that jerkoff friend of your brother’s.”

I turn the corner and spot them. He’s blocking her against a dumpster, and I’m about to say something when Ellie speaks.

“Your insecurities and delusions are not my problem. You don’t get an opinion here. Now move.”

“You’re not listening to me—”

“And I don’t have to. We’re done. We’ve been done. Your opinion has no bearing on my life. Shut up and let me go.”

“I’d do what she’s asking,” I interrupt. “She has a mean right hook.”

I don’t add so do I, because I don’t actually make a habit of punching people, so all I have are gut instincts and the overwhelming desire to protect and defend what’s mine.

And by mine, I mean my family.

And no, I don’t want to talk about the way my heart is pounding or my muscles tensing to leap, because I will move heaven and earth and travel to the depths of hell to make sure Ellie’s safe—physically, mentally, emotionally, spiritually, all of it.

Safe. Sound. In one piece.

Fuck.

Fuck.

I’m in love with Ellie Ryder.

The Blond Caveman has four inches on me, but I will flatten him if I have to. And based on the curled-lip scowl under his powdered wig and the way he's flexing his arms under his vintage navy uniform, he's thinking he'd be happy to take me out too.

His lips part. "Shut your—"

"Your parents are here," I tell Ellie.

She smiles, and dammit, she's pretty.

It's not the colonial dress or the funny wig with long black curls either. It's the way she doesn't hold back on letting the smile spread cheek-to-cheek. The warmth in her eyes. The stubborn set of her shoulders.

Pretty?

No.

She's everything. The whole package.

"They must be disappointed," the Blond Caveman sneers.

"That I'm happier without you? Not really." She leans toward me, and I wrap an arm around her shoulders while she slips away from him. Her pulse is fluttering fast in her neck, and I want to lay him out just on principle.

And then I want to carry her to the nearest dark corner and inspect every inch of her to make sure she's okay.

And then I want to kiss her. Fuck, I want to kiss her.

"Let's go," she says to me.

"Your girlfriend know what you're doing?" I ask the Blond Caveman while I twist so I'm between him and Ellie.

"She knows I defend helpless women, and she thinks it's hot."

Ellie chokes on air. I'm suddenly unable to stop a snicker.

"What the hell are you laughing at?" he snarls.

"We better go quick," I mutter to Ellie. "You okay?"

She leans on me while we hasten back into view of the street, and it's going to hurt like hell when I can't touch her anymore.

“I was such an idiot,” she sighs.

She’s limping more than usual. Not good.

“How heavy is your wig?” I ask her. “Is that what I smell?”

“You’re probably smelling your own armpits,” she says, but she looks up at me and smiles with none of the old you irritate the shit out of me that’s always been there.

No, this is I love flirting with you.

It’s messed-up flirting, but that’s what it is, isn’t it?

Flirting.

That’s what it’s always been.

We were just too stubborn to see it.

Or to admit it.

And no small part of me wishes we could go back to that.

Because leaving Ellie Ryder?

This is going to suck.

Chapter Twenty-Two

Ellie

By the time we're doing our last-minute hair and makeup fixes in a small tent just down the hill from the gazebo at the far end of Blackbeard Avenue where Monica and Jason will take their vows, I can't decide whose mother is happier—Monica's, or mine.

Definitely not Mrs. Dixon. She's getting an artsy-fartsy daughter-in-law from her black sheep son while her favorite son's girlfriend has been giving him the cold shoulder all afternoon.

But mine?

She's in utter heaven over me and Wyatt dating.

Next week just might kill her.

This isn't good.

"Jeez, Mom, maybe you should've adopted Wyatt and kicked me and Beck to the curb," I tell her while she fusses over my short curls. Any minute now, Pop's going to call us up for the wedding.

She swats my arm. "You hush. You know I love all my children equally. Wyatt just needed me more than you, Beck, and the rest of the boys and girls."

I'd be offended, but we were raised by a village. I was just as likely to get grounded by Mrs. Rivers as I was by my own mom. "He's lucky he had you," I tell her, and crap.

Now she's crying, and it's going to make me cry too, but not out of happiness and joy.

No, my tears will be all guilt.

And possibly grief, because Wyatt isn't an asshole, and he isn't a thorn in my side, and I don't know what to call him, but the fake part of fake boyfriend feels more wrong than the boyfriend part.

Which is impossible, because we really would die, and Tucker deserves to grow up with a good father.

“Stop, stop,” Monica says, bustling over to hug her. She’s changed from her colonial gown to a pirate wedding gown, an eclectic mix of formal and buccaneer, with pirate boots under her lacy hoop skirt and a leather corset embroidered with skulls and crossbones for her bodice. She has a bandana over her ringlets and giant hoop earrings dangle to her shoulders. “No crying until you hear the vows. They’re beautiful. Ellie, how’s your leg? Do you want me to send one of the Rock boys for a chair?”

“I’m fine,” I tell her.

Okay, maybe I’m not quite as fine as that, but I can make it through the wedding before I need to lay myself up for a week to recover.

Alone.

Probably here in Shipwreck, because even without a dishwasher, Beck’s house is still super comfortable, and it has internet, and I can borrow the laptop Mom brought to telework for a week.

The house will be weirdly empty, but it’ll be nice to be alone again.

All alone.

With no one to talk to.

No one to poke. No one to share banana pudding with.

No little voices shrieking with laughter over bubbles or drawings of pirates or parrots, or asking to share a donut.

No one to kiss and cause the house to collapse around us with.

Dammit, I can’t stop this weepy-eyed stuff.

“Monica, honey, it’s time,” her mom whispers.

Monica squeals, and her eyes go shiny too. “Oh my god, I’m marrying Jason,” she whispers.

I squeeze her in a hug. “I’m so happy for you.”

“Go on, go walk the plank—I mean, walk the aisle so I can get hitched.”

My mom scurries to join Dad, Wyatt, and Tucker in a row of seats near the gazebo. The list of invited guests is small—a few friends and coworkers from Copper Valley, and a few aunts, uncles, and cousins on both sides—but the people of Shipwreck have turned out in force to watch.

And participate, though most of the guests and tourists who are also gathered beyond the reserved seating don’t know that yet.

Mr. Dixon escorts Mrs. Dixon down the plank—I mean, aisle. Then Grady Rock escorts Monica’s mom. And then it’s time for Patrick, fully costumed as a member of the English Royal Guard, to walk me down the aisle.

I tuck my hand into his elbow, but while his powdered wig amuses me, I keep as much distance as physically possible while smiling at Jason, who’s standing with Pop on the gazebo steps.

“We don’t have to be like this,” Patrick mutters.

I keep smiling. “There’s no we, and if you don’t shut up, I’m telling your girlfriend you dumped me, since I know she thinks it was the other way around.”

He blanches.

We reach the gazebo and I gladly drop his arm. Wyatt’s scowling. My dad doesn’t look very pleased either.

But then the pirate band—yes, the pirate band—strikes up “Here Comes the Bride,” and everyone rises as Monica emerges from the tent.

“Oh, god, she’s gorgeous,” Jason says hoarsely.

He’s utterly adorable in his first mate getup. We all know who’s going to captain the ship of our life, he told Monica when they were discussing formal wedding wear. I'm wearing the first mate outfit.

Monica's mom is already crying. Mine's dabbing her eyes in the next row back.

I wonder what Wyatt's thinking about while he watches my best friend walk down the aisle.

His own wedding?

Or maybe Tripp's, which was utterly gorgeous and completely opposite of this small-town pirate affair, because when a former boy bander marries a Hollywood A-lister, you're damn right it's spectacular.

But he glances back at me, and I'm suddenly quite certain he's not thinking about weddings at all.

There's something raw and unguarded and beautiful in his gray eyes. Regret mixed with hope.

My belly dips to my toes, adding an extra shiver to my bones along the way.

I like Wyatt Morgan.

I like Wyatt Morgan.

He's loyal. He's protective. He's smart. He's brave.

He adores that perfect, sweet, happy little boy fidgeting next to him.

He's a survivor.

Wounded in his soul, but still here. A good friend to my brother. The son my mother would've added to her household in a heartbeat.

The man who pushed me to be better since he got his own footing in the neighborhood.

Jason kisses Monica's cheek as she joins him on the gazebo steps. "Now, now, save that for marriage, boy," Pop says, and everyone laughs.

I take her bouquet—a red rose, a black rose, and a purple rose, tied together with a Jolly Roger ribbon and stuck in a rum bottle—and step back to let the wedding begin.

I might get a little teary-eyed too. The way Jason's just watching Monica, like he's the luckiest first mate to ever board a ship, like the only thing he needs in his life is her... Just swoon.

Thank you for finding me my missing puzzle piece, Monica told me once not long after I introduced them. But these two, I'm certain, would've found each other one way or another.

They were meant to be.

Wyatt's watching me. I can feel his gaze.

And it's not annoying, or haughty, or critical.

It's hot.

And not just he wants to see me naked hot. But he feels it too hot.

Monica and Jason say their vows. Monica's mom cries. My mom cries. I cry.

Tucker cries, because, "Dad, I don't like it when people cry."

Everyone laughs, and I wish I could hug Tucker the way Wyatt is now, just scooping him up and patting his back. "It's happy tears," I hear him murmur.

"I don't like it when you cry either," Jason tells Monica.

She wipes her eyes as she laughs. "It's joy leaking out my soul."

Joy.

They have joy.

I've always had plans. Calendars. Deadlines. Tasks. Life events to check off.

Maybe what I really need is joy.

Laughing with someone when the dishwasher leaks. When he accidentally sits on a squirt bottle of French dressing. When we knock heads in the middle of an orgasm.

I glance at Wyatt again.

Joy.

Oh my god.

He's my joy.

My laughter.

My strength.

My challenge.

My motivation.

My rock.

My joy.

His eyes are misty too, but he doesn't look away.

I suddenly don't care if I can never get pregnant or give birth.

I don't care if I never have a big wedding.

I don't care if nothing on the outside looks perfect.

I just don't want Wyatt to leave tomorrow.

"The rings!" Pop calls.

My mom gasps. Tucker leaps to his feet and points past the gazebo. Wyatt's eyes leave mine, and they go comically wide. He starts to his feet too.

My dad's jaw is flapping.

I turn to look, already smiling, because I know what's coming, except—

"Goats?"

Monica shoots me a look and laughs like I'm crazy, but then her eyes, too, go round as a ship's wheel.

Because there's an army of goats cresting the hill and charging the gazebo.

The wedding guests are laughing.

So are the tourists.

But the locals who are in on all the wedding plans?

They're not.

Grady looks at me and mouths, Goats?

I shrug, because I don't know where they came from.

"The rings!" Monica says to Pop, who's also staring in surprise at the herd.

"The rings," he agrees.

Only Jason seems amused.

Confused, but also amused.

Pretty sure real pirates could invade his home and he'd just stand there watching. Unless they tried to take Monica as part of their booty.

Then I think things would get ugly.

Patrick hands Pop the rings.

A goat barrels into the gazebo from behind, darts across, and head-butts Pop's knee.

"Oh, no, you didn't, you little sucker!" Grady yells. "Charge! That powder monkey's making away with our pirate captain!"

"Little fucker. Little fucker," Long Beak Silver improvises from atop the gazebo.

"Dad—" Tucker says.

"I know. Don't repeat it," Wyatt tells him.

"The pirates—" Tucker says, pointing.

Sit, I mouth.

He narrows his eyes at me while two dozen locals dressed like pirates charge up the aisle and around the chairs toward the bride and groom, yelling and waving swords.

I grin back at him.

And then a goat rams my left leg, and I gasp and buckle.

"With this ring, I thee wed!" Monica yells.

"With this ring, I thee wed!" Jason yells back.

I know he's supposed to unsheathe his sword and battle the pirates, but stars are dancing in my vision as a goat jumps on my knee and tries to lick my ears.

“I now pronounce you pirate and wife!” Pop yells.

“Back, you little fucker.” Wyatt sweeps the goat back, and then I’m up in his arms. My dad’s right behind us.

“Ellie. Hospital. Now,” my dad orders.

“It’s fine,” I say.

I want to watch the show.

And grip Wyatt a little tighter.

And, yes, probably pop a painkiller—the over-the-counter kind, because I’m sure the pain will recede soon—or maybe two.

“Dad, the goat’s licking me and the pirates are fighting,” Tucker laughs.

“The swords!” I gasp. “Wyatt, the guests need their swords!”

“I got ’em, Ellie,” Sloane calls.

And she does.

She’s handing out foam swords to all of Jason and Monica’s friends, who are leaping into the fray and battling the pirates who are trying to weave around the herd of goats to get to Monica.

“Back, you scurvy dogs!” Jason yells. “You’ll never take my bride! Piracy can’t stop true love! Only death can do that!”

“My hero,” Monica cries happily.

He scoops her over his shoulder as Sloane throws me a sword.

“Behind you!”

She hasn’t given one to Patrick.

And he has four locals surrounding him.

“Babe, some help?” he says.

“Eat shit and die, you cheating asshole,” she replies.

Mr. and Mrs. Dixon gasp in horror.

And that's before Grady's younger cousins attack them with foam swords. "Plunder the booty!" one of them yells.

I bash foam swords with Tillie Jean, defending Wyatt while he tries to get us out of the mess of goats and pirates.

"Tucker! Careful!"

"I've got him, Wyatt," Mom calls. "He's a good pirate fighter. You get Ellie to safety!"

She bops Grady on the head with the butt of her foam sword, and he staggers dramatically, trips over a wooden folding chair, and faceplants in the ground.

"Oh my god!" I gasp.

"He'll be fine," Tillie Jean says while I continue to fight her behind Wyatt's back. "The only person I know with a thicker skull than Grady is Cooper."

My dad stabs Tillie Jean in the back with his foam sword, and she makes a dramatic pirate death too, yelling, "My brothers in pirate arms are coming for you, Captain Monica!" as she croaks out her fake last breaths.

"Good one, Dad!" I call.

"Safety," he replies pointedly as he turns to help Mom defend Tucker against two more local pirates and the random goats.

Everyone's laughing.

Wyatt's dodging goats and tourists, not breaking a sweat, not even breathing hard as he carries me down behind Jason, who's running with Monica tossed over his shoulder. They're both laughing in glee, and I wonder if they'll still go straight to The Grog for the reception, or if they'll be fashionably late to their own party.

Probably late.

I take advantage of the fact that Wyatt's supposed to be my boyfriend to bury my face in his neck.

It's pretend, universe. Don't strike us with lightning, I plead.

Dammit, he smells good.

“Thank you for being my hero,” I whisper against his hot skin.

“Thank you for letting me.” His voice is thick, and he knows.

He feels it too.

The inevitable.

Destiny.

The reason he moved in on our street when we were little.

The reason we’ve always irritated each other.

The reason he was just out of reach when I finally noticed him.

Because it’s been building up to this moment.

This exact moment here.

When he can be my hero.

And I can finally let him.

“Ellie?” he says thickly.

“Mm?”

“I don’t want to let you go.”

My heart swells three sizes and glows, radiating every ounce of affection I’ve ever denied having for this stubborn, strong, dependable man. “Your arms will eventually fall off,” I whisper. “But you’ll still be my hero even if they do.”

“I’m going to miss you.”

While Jason hustles Monica toward the Shipwreck Inn, Wyatt turns us down a side street and into a small public garden. He yanks on the wrought iron gate, and it shuts us inside with a clink.

“Are you kidnapping me?” I ask breathlessly.

“I’m seizing the moment.”

The Shipwreck Gardens are small—it’s more like garden, singular, surrounded with an ivy-covered wall, a fountain featuring a statue of Thorny Rock and his pirate treasure chest standing proudly in the center.

Wyatt sets me gently on a bench with my back to the shops on Blackbeard Avenue, so I can see the roofs of the town's cozy houses beyond, and the gently sloped, blue haze-covered mountain peaks around us, and he squats on one knee in front of me.

My eyes bulge.

At least, until he ducks his head and laughs. "God, Ellie, it's so easy."

"You—you—" I sputter, but then I'm laughing with him.

Laughing and cradling his head as he laughs right there in my lap, over the crazy colonist dress I wore for Monica because I would've gone to her wedding dressed as a half-naked mermaid if she'd asked me to.

"How's your leg?" Wyatt asks as we both regain control.

"Oh, it aches like a mother," I reply cheerfully.

"Overdid it?"

"Times ten."

He rubs his hand softly over my thigh through the fabric.

"What do you need?"

"Warm bath, Motrin, and rum." My fingers rest on his shoulders, just enough contact to make me feel grounded.

"And maybe more of that."

"This?" He tests the pressure on my muscle, and I sigh and nod.

"Is it supposed to still ache?"

"Muscle and nerve damage on top of newly healed bone. Eventually it'll probably only be bad with weather changes, but apparently broken hips and femurs like to take their sweet time to heal."

"No crutches?"

"I graduated crutches early, thank you."

His lips twitch while he watches me with those intense gray eyes. "You're a fighter."

“I’m tired of fighting,” I whisper.

His gaze searches mine like he’s asking if I’m tired of fighting the pain, or tired of fighting him. “That’s just because you know you’ll never have a cooler wedding,” he whispers back.

My jaw drops a split second before the laughter overtakes me. “You are such a—such a—” I gasp out, searching for the right name to call him.

“Stud,” he supplies with an eyebrow wiggle, and it’s so un-Wyatt-like that I double over in laughter.

Except doubling over puts my face right next to his, and he’s smiling, his eyes alive and happy and twinkling with utter mischief, and this is everything.

He’s everything.

Everything I never knew I wanted, wrapped up in one Wyatt-shaped package.

I don’t know who starts the kiss, but once his lips are on mine, I know I won’t be the one to break it. He’s still massaging my leg while he loops his free hand behind my neck. I cling to his polo shirt, and almost laugh into the kiss thinking how crazy the two of us must look.

Him dressed like he’s a tourist from this century, me decked out like some kind of island colonist from the 1700s, a baby goat bleating beside us...

It’s the goat that breaks us apart.

Mostly because I can’t laugh and kiss him at the same time.

I need more practice.

More time.

“Ellie?” he says softly through a chuckle.

“Hmm?”

“I’m going to make love to you, and the world’s not going to end.”

“That’s a terrible idea,” I choke out.

“Challenge accepted.”

Chapter Twenty-Three

Wyatt

The list of reasons I shouldn't be playing with the hem of Ellie's skirt is longer than my arm. Tucker could catch us here. Ellie's parents. The baby goat that got through the gate could try to help. Someone else could walk into the gardens.

I could get in serious trouble and lose my job for indecent exposure.

But when Ellie's only objection to me snaking my hands up under her skirt is that we're tempting fate, I run my hands over her knees and up her thighs.

She shudders and widens her legs as her lids get heavy. "We're not supposed to do this," she whispers.

"I like you," I whisper back, "and I want to make you feel good."

"I take no responsibility for your son becoming an orphan," she informs me.

I have zero fear that her belief that we're physically dangerous is accurate. It's superstitious nonsense, and it's not like Ellie to believe in it. "What are you really afraid of?"

I don't expect her to answer me, so I dip my thumbs low on her inner thighs. She's not flinching away from letting me touch her scars, and I wish I could kiss her where she hurts and make it go away.

Her eyes squeeze closed as her legs fall open wider. "I'm afraid I'm not lovable."

My heart cracks in two.

I didn't know I had it in me for my heart to crack for another person, but it did. Split. Right in half like someone attacked it with a rusty butter knife.

“Why?”

“I’m stubborn.”

“Determined,” I correct.

“Annoying.”

“Says who?”

“You.”

“Only to get your goat.”

The baby goat bleats again, and her lips wobble upward. But her eyes—Christ.

Her eyes are breaking my heart. “I’m too career-minded.”

“You have a calling.”

“I didn’t pick it.”

“Didn’t have to.”

Her skin is so soft, and I can smell her arousal through the layers of her dress.

“I don’t know what’s important,” she insists. “I can’t prioritize people over things. I don’t know how to let go and trust someone else. I can’t—”

“You’re Ellie Fucking Ryder. Yes, you can.”

“Why do you believe in me?”

“Mostly to piss you off.” I wink at her and stroke the edge of her panties, and she huffs out a smile and a groan.

“Wyatt.”

“Come see me in Georgia.”

“What?”

“Come see me. Me and Tucker. Spend the weekend with us. In two weeks. Three weeks. Whenever you have a free weekend. Come see us.”

She blinks quickly, but not fast enough to erase the sheen in her eyes. “Why?”

“Because I’m going to miss you.” Honesty makes my voice raw. I never thought I’d get married. Never trusted that I could fall in love and know how to do it right.

But Ellie?

She won’t let me do it wrong.

Because she’s Ellie. She’ll push me. She’ll teach me. And if she’ll love me, she’ll love me.

“Wyatt,” she whispers, and then her hands clasp around my ears and she’s kissing me.

Softly.

So softly.

Like she’s learning me. Memorizing me.

Savoring me.

I stroke the center of her panties, and her groan vibrates against my lips. I stroke her again, and she arches into my touch while she nips my lower lip. “More,” she says into our kiss.

So I give her more, stroking and teasing and touching her while we kiss, slow and easy, then slow and deep, then hard and desperate while she jerks against my fingers. I slip two under her panties, find her entrance, and thrust into her slick heat.

But it’s not enough.

I don’t want to just feel her.

I want to taste her.

“Wyatt,” she gasps when I duck under her skirts. “We’re—someone could—ohmygod do it again.”

I push her panties aside, put my mouth to her pussy, and I devour her sweet center. Her hips buck into my mouth, and fuck, I could stay here all day.

I don’t care that I can’t see a thing. I don’t care that it’s hot as hell.

I don’t even care that we could get caught at any minute.

I just know I'm finally right where I'm supposed to be.

Loving Ellie.

Pleasuring her.

Her gasps are muffled, but she's holding my head steady through her skirt, urging me higher, left, right there oh my god more right there suck me harder Wyatt yes harder YES.

I slide two fingers deep inside her hot, wet channel, and when my lips find her sweet little nub, I nip gently, then suck it, and she's suddenly clamping around my fingers, her thighs squeezing my head while she comes for me.

"Yes," she gasps. "Wy-aa-aah—"

I tense, and sure enough—

"Ah-choo!"

Her walls clench tight around my fingers again, spasming harder and coating me, and fuck if her coming doesn't make me about to blow my own load in my pants.

"Dammit," she mutters, but it comes out on a half-groan while her pussy's still coming for me.

She sneezes once more, and I pull my fingers out, gently replace her panties, and peek out from under her dress.

"Baaah!" the baby goat bleats.

Ellie's wiping her nose with her arm. Her cheeks are rosy, her body slumping on the bench.

"It was messy," she grumbles, pointing to her nose. "And we're probably going to get eaten by baby goats in our sleep. But thank you. That was the best orgasm I've had in years."

I frown. "So I have work to do to be the best ever."

She snuffles. "You really want to do this again?" she asks, gesturing to her snotty face with the healing black eye.

God, she's gorgeous. And so very Ellie.

"Yes," I tell her. "Preferably soon. And often."

The hesitation in her bright blue eyes wavers, and then she's laughing again, leaning in to kiss me. "You know something worse than goats will happen now, right?"

I grip her chin. "Nothing. Bad. Is. Going. To. Happen."

One eye wrinkles.

"I like you, Ellie Ryder." I love you, but I don't want to scare you.

"I like you too, Wyatt Morgan."

"Then don't be afraid." I lean in to kiss her again when we hear the gate rattle.

She jerks back, and I straighten too when I recognize that voice.

"But I want to show you the fountain!" Tucker says.

"Leg better?" I ask her.

She smiles softly. "Nature's miracle cure worked."

"See? That's not bad."

"Hmm."

I can still taste her on my lips, and I'm more than a little sore and eager in other parts of my very unsatisfied anatomy, but I take a seat next to her, cross my ankle over my knee, and fling an arm around her shoulder while the gate creaks open.

She glances at my crotch, then back up to my face. "Not going to complain?"

"About getting to eat you? No. Are you going to complain about it?"

"No," she replies with a smile.

"Good. But I'm sneaking into your bed tonight after your parents are asleep."

"Are you?" she murmurs as Tucker races into the garden and spots us.

"Yep. And I can't wait."

She lays her head on my shoulder as her parents follow Tucker, who's talking a mile a minute about the goats and the pirates and the wedding and acting out a sword fight.

"This isn't fake anymore, is it?" she whispers.

"No, ma'am," I whisper back into her wig.

And I'm not sure it ever was.

Chapter Twenty-Four

Ellie

Monica and Jason's party at The Grog is more fun than I've had in months. Possibly years. There are pirate jokes and impromptu sword fights and a limerick contest with a bunch of implied words to protect the innocent ears in the room. Tucker makes friends with Monica's cousin's daughter, who's a year younger than he is, and the two of them spend the evening playing pirate and talking about Pokémon cards and video games.

Nobody talks about work or where we'll be next week, except Monica and Jason, who will be on a cruise in the Bahamas.

My parents want to know about when Wyatt and I hooked up though.

"A psychic set us up," he says, which makes my mom spit her ale.

"I watched him lift a burning car off a baby and decided he was okay," I say, which is lame after his answer, but Mom stops the third degree, and I find I can breathe again.

I don't mean to rub my leg, but it's aching after coming down off my post-orgasm high, and suddenly Monica's next to us. "If you don't take her home and get her a hot bubble bath and a glass of wine right now, I'm going to ask the Rocks to blacklist you from Crow's Nest and Anchovies," she informs Wyatt.

"It's your wed—" I start, but she clamps her arm around my head and her hand across my mouth and gives Wyatt the I'm watching you hand gesture, then points to the door.

"We both have cars here," I say, but it comes out as "ee owe aah rrr rr" with Monica's hand still over my mouth.

If it weren't her wedding day, I'd lick her hand, but honestly, I don't know where it's been, and I like Jason, but I don't want to accidentally lick his penis sweat.

“We’ll drive your car back, sweetie,” Mom says.

“It’s like she doesn’t know you at all,” Wyatt whispers.
“Sweetie?”

Monica snorts with laughter.

So does my father.

“I’ll go get Tucker,” Wyatt says to Monica.

“Oh, we’ll bring him home,” my mom says quickly. “He’s having so much fun.”

He’s drinking root beer and completely missing all of his dart throws, which is about the cutest thing I’ve seen all day.

“Out! Out!” somebody suddenly crows. One of the wandering goats has wandered into the bar.

“Goats a normal part of the festival?” Wyatt asks.

Grady Rock pauses on his way to the animal and shakes his head. “Never. Don’t know where the damn—darn things came from.”

“They’re homeless goats?” Dad asks.

Grady leans down and gets it by its horns. “Or somebody over in Sarcasm sent them,” he mutters.

“Wouldn’t they have unicorn horns if Sarcasm sent them?” I ask.

He glares at me. “You’re lucky you’re cute, or you’d be really annoying.”

“They could be wild goats,” Wyatt points out. “Nomadic mountain goats. Psychic nomadic mountain goats come down to make sure you don’t call very nice women annoying.”

Mom coughs to cover a laugh when Grady pins him with a look. “So let’s move the goats to your bedroom and see how you feel.”

“Aren’t they the cutest, Chris? We should take one home,” Mom says to Dad.

“Nomadic mountain goats wouldn’t take well to domestication,” he replies.

“Dad! Dad! Can we keep a goat?” Tucker barrels over, wedding cake frosting on his cheek. I wipe it off while Wyatt shakes his head.

“Your mother would kill me. You ready to go, or do you want to stay a while? I have to take Miss Ellie home.”

Tucker frowns at me. “Does your leg hurt, Miss Captain Ellie?”

“Just a little,” I tell him.

“I got a cut on my finger.” He shoves the digit an inch from my nose, and I draw back to peer at the pinprick-size dot of red on his middle finger.

“Did you get in a sword fight with toothpicks?” I ask.

His eyes go wide. “How did you know?”

“That’s how I get all my best cuts.”

“Tucker?” Wyatt asks.

“I wanna stay. Me and Sophia’s gonna play darts some more and pet the goats.”

Grady groans as he wrestles one goat out, but two more come in.

“You be good for Mr. and Mrs. Ryder, understand?”

“Yeah, Dad!”

He catches the little boy by the hips before he can dart away.

“And when they say it’s time to go, it’s time to go. Yes, sir?”

“Yes, sir. Can I go play darts now?”

“Hug first.”

Tucker launches himself at Wyatt and squeezes. “Love you, Dad.”

“Love you too, bud.”

He scampers off, and Wyatt shoots a look at my parents. “He’s a little sugared up.”

“Psh. I raised Beck. I can handle Tucker on a little sugar.” She and Wyatt trade keys so we don’t have to swap Tucker’s booster seat.

“I’m becoming displeased,” Monica says.

“Want me to toss them, babe?” Jason asks.

“Yes.”

“We’re going,” Wyatt tells them, pulling me to my feet. He frowns, and shakes his head as he looks at me. “Nope. Not that way.”

“What—” I start, but before I can finish, he’s hefted me over his shoulder again like a sack of potatoes.

“Leg okay?” he asks.

“This is really annoying.”

“I’m so tempted to slap your ass, but that would be a bad example for my kid.”

“And my parents are watching.”

“I know. Your dad’s glaring at me.”

I manage to shuffle around until I can see my dad’s upside-down face.

And Dad’s not glaring.

Nope.

If anything, he’s watching me like he’s realized his baby girl is all grown up. “Drive careful,” he says gruffly to Wyatt.

“Always,” Wyatt replies.

And despite that lingering fear that something terrible is waiting around the corner, because holy hell, that was quite the orgasm Wyatt gave me before the reception, I’m not the least bit concerned about making it back up to the house safe and sound.

It’s Wyatt.

Dependable, reliable, smokin’ hot, likes me Wyatt.

“I’m sorry I didn’t call you back,” I tell him as we leave The Grog.

He doesn’t ask when.

Nope.

“You needed your energy to kick recovery’s ass,” he replies.

I could argue that I owed him an hour of my time. That it wasn’t nice of me to let him worry. Or any other argument in the world.

Instead, I murmur, “Speaking of asses....” and take advantage of being carried over his shoulder, which puts me in a great spot to not only ogle his, but also squeeze it.

His pace speeds up, and there I go again, laughing.

I haven’t laughed this much in ages.

And all it took was learning not to hate Wyatt.

Who knew?

Chapter Twenty-Five

Ellie

We ride in companionable silence up to the house.

Holding hands.

While my heart pounds in my throat.

Everything's different, but it's also right.

Wyatt knows my cranky sides. My stubborn sides. My ugly sides. He knows what he's in for.

And he wants it anyway.

Despite who I am at my worst.

And he's not pretending to be anyone he's not either. I know this side of Wyatt. I've seen him with my brother. With the other guys we grew up with. With their sisters.

With Tucker.

Even with Lydia.

The difference is, he doesn't hold back with me.

He lets me see his ugly sides too.

He's barely turned the car off in the garage before I lean across and grab him by the shirt and pull him in for a kiss.

I've always hated that Wyatt always seems to know exactly how to do everything.

That hatred does not extend to how well he kisses.

No, I'm seriously enjoying that right now. From my roots to my toes. Every bit of me is lit up, turned on, and ready.

"Ellie," he gasps, pulling back. "Inside."

"Race you."

"Okay, gimpy."

“Oooh, you—”

I cut myself off, because he’s flinging open the car door, and there is no way I’m not even putting up a fight.

Or maybe I’ll fight dirty.

“Wyatt? I don’t think I can walk by myself.”

I bat my eyelashes.

He snorts with laughter.

I grin.

And he circles the car to pull me out. We stand toe-to-toe, belly-to—huh.

“That’s not your belly,” I whisper.

He looks down between us. “No, it’s not.”

“So it’s not some kind of intestinal protrusion either?”

“You are a pain in the ass,” he says with a laugh, and then I’m up in his arms—not over his shoulder, but cradled close to his chest while I loop my fingers together behind his neck.

I press a kiss to the pulsing vein under his rugged jawline.

“You don’t suck at that,” he says huskily, so I kiss him again. Except this time I graze my teeth over the throbbing vein and follow it with a quick swipe of my tongue.

He stumbles through the door and puts me on the ground. “Do you know what I need?” he growls.

I arch my belly into his hard length. “I have an idea.”

He nods. “That’s right. Strip darts.”

My eyes jerk wide, and he grins. “C’mon, Ellie. You’ve gotta earn this body.”

“Oh, those are fighting words,” I say, my own smile growing in direct proportion to the arousal pinging through my veins.

Strip darts.

This is going to be fun.

I take the lead, ignoring the twinge and fatigue in my leg to pull him down the hall and around the corner into the game room. I hit the lights, and he instantly turns the knob to dim them.

“Ah, a real challenge,” I say softly, drawing my fingertips down the corded muscles on his forearms. “Throwing pointy objects in the dark.”

“Guess you’ll have to trust me not to miss.”

I let him grab the darts out of the board while I lean against the pool table, and when he returns, he hands me the set. “Ladies first.”

“Oh, no, I’m much more motivated at seeing what I’m working toward. Gentlemen first.”

The challenge in his smile is pure Wyatt, but it’s also...more.

“Rules?” I ask.

“One of us gets a bullseye, the other takes something off.”

“And one of us misses, we take something off.”

“In a hurry?”

“With the way you play darts, I’d never get my shoes off if I had to wait for you to hit a bullseye.”

“Prepare to lose your socks, Ellie Ryder.”

He throws his first dart, and it impales the wall six inches to the left of the board. “Bullseye,” he declares.

I shriek with surprised laughter. He grins, and pulls off one shoe. “So close,” he declares, and now I’m almost bent double.

His second dart gets closer to the board. “You’re gonna be handing me those pantaloons next,” he says while he kicks off his second shoe.

“Pantaloons?”

He gasps a mock gasp. “You’re not wearing pantaloons? Ellie, did you go to your friend’s wedding commando?”

“You know I didn’t.” But the idea of being commando, of being able to push him to the ground, straddle him, and take him inside me in an instant, is doing exactly what he wants it to do, and my panties are getting soaked again.

He grins like he knows it, and takes aim again.

This time, his dart doesn’t even stick. It bounces off the Dogs Playing Poker poster two feet to the left of the board.

“Damn,” he says, but he doesn’t sound the least bit unhappy.

Nor does he look the least bit unhappy when he shucks his khaki shorts and stands there tenting his St. Patrick’s Day boxers.

I’d laugh at the boxers, but there’s nothing funny about how hard he is.

No, that’s just plain intriguing. And arousing.

“You’re up,” he tells me, handing me my three darts.

“I’d say you’re up.”

“Recurring problem around you.”

“My nipples are commiserating.”

His eyes go dark. I turn to take my first throw, and he brushes my hair off my neck and presses a kiss to my nape.

Oversensitive aftershocks from his touch ripple across my skin. The dart doesn’t even reach the wall.

“Do that again,” I whisper.

“Ah-ah. You need to take something off first.” His breath is hot on my ear, and he follows the chastising with a nip to my earlobe that has me whimpering in pleasure.

“Shoe,” I say, holding out my foot for him.

He bends and obliges, pulling off my boot. “Cheater,” I whisper when my sock comes off too.

“Just saving us some time when you miss again.”

I line up for my shot, and he lines his erection up with the top of my ass, then dips his head to nibble at the crook of my neck while I fire the dart.

“Bullseye,” I gasp.

“Bullshit,” he says with a chuckle.

“But I hit the board.”

“Barely. Gotta lose something, Ellie. It’s the rules.”

“Fine. You may remove my other shoe.”

God, this is fun.

He obliges again, and this time, he doesn’t let my foot go until he’s kissed a path from my ankle bone to my knee.

“Cheating,” I gasp.

“Well, yeah,” he replies with another smokin’ hot grin.

This is the side of Wyatt I’ve overlooked for years. The fun, playful side. He’s always been obnoxious and buttoned up and stiff, perfect for a military career, but that’s not all there is to him.

I could throw my last dart before he tries to distract me, but what’s the fun in that?

And sure enough, as soon as he’s straightened and behind me, his hands are on me again, this time high on my waist. “Need pointers?” he asks.

“I think you’re already giving me pointers.” I arch into the bulge against my lower back, and his breath hitches.

“I’ve been giving you pointers all day, but you haven’t noticed.”

“I’ve noticed.”

“You gonna throw that last dart?”

“Debating if I want to hit a bullseye and make you lose the shirt.” It’s so freaking right here in his arms.

“Not the boxers?”

“You’re a big fan of torture.”

“That too.”

He nuzzles my neck again. I toss my last dart, and I don't even care where it landed, because now I can turn in Wyatt's arms and kiss him.

I know this might be a mistake, but if I don't have Wyatt, I'm going to die.

So I'll either die because the universe is a dick and doesn't like us together, or I'll die because I can't have him.

I'd rather go out happy, thank you very much.

“Want—you,” I whimper into Wyatt's kiss.

“Never knew—needed you—so bad,” he gasps between kisses as he tugs at the zipper on the back of my dress.

And I get a sudden chill, because this is where it started.

In a basement.

Without thought.

“Ellie?” Wyatt murmurs, his hand stilling.

“Can we really do this?”

“Yes.”

“But should we?”

He threads his fingers through my hair and presses that thick bulge into my belly. “What are you afraid of?”

He asks it like whatever it is, he's going to leap onto his magical unicorn and ride it into battle and slay my fears. “That we'll break,” I whisper.

“Or maybe we'll finally get it right.”

“What if the house burns down?”

I feel his smile against my lips. “The house is not going to burn down.”

“How can you be sure?”

“Neither one of us were in the right headspace for this six months ago. But now? Today? You didn't look at your ex once during the reception. I wasn't there for him. I was there for you. Deny it."

I open my lips to do just that, but I realize he's right.

I forgot Patrick was even there.

"I just didn't want you to feel self-conscious."

He chuckle-snorts, and I giggle, because we both know I wouldn't stroke his ego.

However, my fingers are trailing down his pecs and abs looking for something else to stroke.

"Do I need to get a bullseye to get this dress off you?" he asks.

"No, you need to pull the damn zipper down."

"Now?"

"Yes, please."

"Look at you, using your manners and everything." He tugs on the zipper once again, and cool air hits my back.

I push his shirt up, revealing that chest that I could spend days exploring, and my nipples pull so tight I feel it in my clit when he reaches behind himself with one hand to pull the shirt over his head and the rest of the way off.

He brushes my dress off my shoulders, and then I'm standing there, in just my panties, while he whispers my name in sheer reverence.

I step out of the puddle of fabric, and he snags it, tosses it on the pool table, then scoops me into his arms and lays me on it.

I tip my head back and laugh, because my brother would kill me if he knew what we were doing.

Wyatt hooks his thumbs in his boxers and pulls them off in one smooth motion, and all thoughts of anything except him flee my mind. He disappears, ducking beside the table, and I whimper.

"Condom," he says, returning to crawl onto the pool table with a foil packet in his hand.

“This thing won’t break, will it? That would be awesome. Death by sex on a pool table.”

“I got a private Bro Code show with this as their stage once,” he replies. “It’s solid.”

“Ew. Maybe we should move to the foosball table. It’s clean, right? Bumpy, but clean?”

“Have you met your brother? He licks his players for luck.”

We both crack up.

But only until he dips his head to tease my nipple with his tongue.

Then nothing’s funny.

But everything’s perfect.

Right.

Glorious.

“My turn,” I gasp when he pinches my other nipple. “Roll over.”

“No.”

“Wyatt—”

“I love that irritated note in your voice. It makes me so fucking hard.”

I look down as he pushes up onto all fours, and whoa.

He’s definitely hard.

“C’mon, Calamity Ellie. Tease me.”

I push him onto his back and twist, and my stupid leg twinges. But before I can moan, Wyatt kisses me and gently caresses my leg and hip. “What’s more comfortable for you? A bed?”

I shake my head, because dammit, I still want to be the kind of crazy that has sex on pool tables. And it’s not the table. “I don’t know. Just—I don’t know how I bend best.”

He grins like that’s a challenge. “Then let’s start with what we know works.” He leans me back again and kisses me, and his long fingers trace a path over my hip to my panties.

I gasp as his knuckles graze the cotton over my clit.

“But you—haven’t—not—”

“I have a few years of taunting you to make up for,” he says as he moves to kiss a path down my jaw to that sweet, sensitive spot at the base of my throat.

“I was—you were—oh, god, Wyatt.”

“I’m going to take your panties off.”

My yes comes out garbled as he peels the waistband down over my hips, taking special care around my scars, kissing my breasts, my belly, all the way down until he’s nipping at my inner thigh.

My pussy’s aching. “Touch me,” I gasp, widening my right leg.

“Soon,” he says, still pressing soft kisses on my sensitive skin.

“Now.”

He kisses lower on my leg, heading for my knee. “If you’re in that much of a hurry, maybe you should touch yourself.”

He lifts hooded eyes to mine. Touch yourself, Ellie. Turn me on by touching yourself.

I hold his gaze while my fingers drift between my legs to stroke my slick folds. “Like this?” Oh, god, that feels good, but it’s not enough.

“More,” he rasps out.

I flick at my clit, and my legs open wider, because it’s not enough. “I want you,” I tell him.

“Say it again.”

“I want you.”

“Say my name.”

“Wyatt, I want you.”

Finally, finally, he crawls back up my body until his sheathed length is pressing at my entrance. “Here?”

“Yes.”

“What about tomorrow?” he’s teasing me, gliding his thick head along my seam. “Will you want me tomorrow?”

I grasp his cock and stroke him, and oh, so hard, like iron, and I can feel his pulse in the thick veins circling him. “Tomorrow—argue with you—at breakfast—over toast,” I gasp. “Next week—fighting—who pays for dinner.”

“And next month?” he asks, finally, finally inching inside me toward that needy emptiness that might be in my pussy or that might be in my soul, spreading me and teasing at how well he’ll fill me when he gives me everything.

“Next month—surprise you—on a Tuesday—on my knees.”

“Fuck, Ellie.” He shoves deep inside me, and I cry out in relief at being connected to him. “I don’t want to let you go.”

“Then don’t.”

“You feel so damn perfect.”

He slowly pulls almost all the way out, then pushes back in again, hitting that oh so perfect sensitive spot deep inside me.

“Again,” I gasp.

“Want you every day,” he says as he thrusts into me again.

Every day. No one wants me every day. “You’re craz—aaaah, oh god, Wyatt, more.”

He thrusts again, not too gentle, not too hard, and the anticipation is building, the tension tightening, my pussy swelling and going hypersensitive with every stroke inside me.

“In my bed,” he says.

“On the kitchen table.”

“In the shower.”

“In the backseat of your car.”

“Under the stars.”

“On top of the Eiffel Tower.”

“In your parents’ linen closet.”

I laugh as he thrusts in again, and everything swirls out of focus while my climax hits hard. “Ellie,” he cries, his dick pulsing inside me in time with my pussy squeezing and spasming around him.

“Wyatt,” I gasp when he pumps once, twice more, pushing me higher and farther and deeper until— “Wy—ahh-ahh—”

He pushes up, his dick still straining deep inside me, and when I sneeze, he gasps. “Christ, Ellie, that feels amazing.”

I’m still twitching and spasming around him, and here I am, laughing. “My sneeze?”

“Fuck, yeah.” He drops his head into my shoulder, panting. “Was that it? I could take another sneeze. Christ.”

I laugh, and another tingle of pleasure lights up my clit. “You’re crazy.”

“Crazy for you.” He kisses my shoulder, my neck, up to my lips, where he lingers, lazily kissing me and letting me trace his jaw and stroke his short, soft hair. “I think I’ve wanted you my entire life. I was just too blind to realize it.”

“Too scared,” I whisper.

“That too.”

“Are you still scared?”

He lifts his head, and serious Wyatt is back. “Depends. Were you serious about surprising me in Georgia with a blow job?”

I gape at him for half a second.

He cracks a grin.

“You—” I start, but he swallows my tirade with another kiss, and truly, kissing Wyatt is better than strawberry daiquiris on a beach.

I don’t know what tomorrow will bring.

But I know one thing.

It will be the first day of the rest of my life with Wyatt.

Chapter Twenty-Six

Wyatt

Ellie and I are fooling around in the master bathtub when the text comes in that the Ryders are on their way back with Tucker. She goes pink in the cheeks. “My parents know what we’re doing,” she whispers.

I kiss her forehead before I reach for a towel. “And they approve, because I’m awesome.”

Her lips twitch. “Or maybe because they know I can keep you in line.”

“Nah.”

I’m smiling as I disentangle my legs from hers and climb out of the tub, and not just because her eyes go dark and smoky again as her gaze wanders down my dripping wet body.

No, it’s because of the peace.

The utter contentment.

I never wanted to get married because I didn’t think it was in my genes, in my bloodline, to be capable of being a good husband and father. Fate proved me wrong on fatherhood.

And this sensation that I’ve found a missing piece of myself, and that she’s sitting right there in the bubble bath, turning down the music and tucking her hair behind her ear. “Did you grab my dress from downstairs?”

“I didn’t mean you had to. I could’ve gotten it. I just—”

I silence her with a kiss, which might be my new favorite hobby.

Kissing Ellie Ryder.

Who knew?

“I left your shoes for you to get yourself,” I tell her. “But I’ll probably go get them anyway because you’ll get mad and insist you’re perfectly capable, and then we’ll have some silly little fight that’ll end with me needing to stroke your pussy, so —”

“Same old stubborn Ellie.”

She rests her hands on the edge of the tub and leans her chin on them, watching me dry off. “Provided we don’t die, we’re never going to be bored, are we?”

“I might be.”

She gets me with a surprise slap to the ass, then shrieks as she slips under the water.

I give her to the count of one-half before I’m grabbing her arm and pulling her up.

“Okay?” I ask.

She blows and spits at the bubbles around her mouth. I grab my phone and angle it toward her like I’m going to snap a picture, and she rolls her eyes with a laugh. “Go ahead.”

“Nah, I don’t—”

“Oh, no. I want you to remember this for the rest of your life. Get in here. Selfie with me.”

When I get down on my knee, she scoops bubbles onto my head and dribbles them on my nose.

And we’re both smiling in the picture.

“Crazy woman.” I wipe her face with the towel and set out another on the floor for her when she gets out. “You hungry?”

“You know what sounds good?”

“Banana pudding?”

“Tea. I have chamomile sometimes to help me fall asleep when I’m achy.”

“With banana pudding?”

“We’re out.”

I put a hand to my heart and stagger. “You’re right. We can’t be together. We’ll run out of banana pudding and die.”

She throws the towel at me with a laugh. “Shush and go heat me some water, powder monkey.”

“Yes, ma’am, Calamity Ellie.”

While she takes her time getting out, I toss on sweatpants and a T-shirt, fill a tea kettle and turn on the burner, then head downstairs to get her shoes. Tucker’s left his security blanket down here again, so I take it upstairs too, all the way to his bedroom, and pull out pajamas for him since he’ll probably be dead on his feet at this hour.

Hope he had fun.

I’m on my way back downstairs when I smell it.

Smoke.

“Wyatt?” Ellie calls, and there’s no mistaking the panic in her voice.

Nor the blare of the smoke alarms that suddenly explode in the house.

I tear down the stairs and land in a cloud of smoke just outside the kitchen. Ellie’s in here, coughing, and flames are erupting from the stove. “The towel!” she shrieks, then coughs again.

Fuck.

I snag the flaming fabric and fling it in the sink, then turn the faucet on. “Get out,” I tell her. The smoke’s not too thick—I don’t think anything else is burning—but the smoke alarms are still going off and the towel’s still flaming in the sink.

I turned on the wrong fucking burner.

I turned on the wrong fucking burner.

And there was a damn towel on it.

And I nearly burned Beck’s house down.

After promising her that would never happen.

“Hi, yes, there’s a fire,” I hear her say. “It’s at... Oh my god, I don’t know the address. Beck’s house. Beck–Beck—what’s my last name? Yes! Beck Ryder’s house. On the mount—yes!”

The alarms are screeching. She grabs my arm. “Wyatt. Out. Both of us. 9-1-1 says we have to get out. Now.”

I spray the last of the embers and check the stove, which is off. “It’s out, Ellie.”

“You are not going to die in a house fire on my watch, goddammit, get the fuck out!” she shrieks.

She doubles over, coughing, then says, “Yes, we’re still here,” and that’s when I hear it.

The high-pitched panic.

“Ellie—”

“Out!”

She’s in a bathrobe, and she’s limping hard. The haze isn’t thick enough to mask it. “Please get out,” she adds, and now there’s a choked sob in her voice, and shit.

I sweep her up and head for the door. “Okay. We’re getting out. It’s okay.”

As soon as we’re outside, she twists. “Let go.”

Tears are streaming down her face.

“Ellie—”

“No. No. Don’t. Back up.” She retreats down the sidewalk to the driveway. The yard is too sloped for her to head there, and the limp is breaking me. “Yes, we’re outside. We’ll stay out.”

She’s crying.

Ellie’s crying.

Ellie never cries. She tells those tears to back the fuck up and get out of her way.

But she’s crying. On the phone with a 9-1-1 operator.

“Ellie. Stop.”

Headlights flash up the driveway. The Ryders are back. They stop mid-way to the house, and Mrs. Ryder flies out of the passenger seat. “What happened? What’s wrong?”

“We burned the house down,” Ellie sobs, letting her mom gather her up while the alarm blares inside.

“We didn’t—” I start, but my objection is cut off by the wail of a fire engine’s siren in the distance.

“A fire?” Mr. Ryder asks.

“I set a towel on fire. It’s out. It’s fine. It was an accident.”

“It’s because we—we—”

“Ellie, it’s not—”

Sometimes I wish my hair was long enough to pull it out, because that might help distract from the ice-cold fear settling into my chest.

Both the Ryders look at me, but Tucker leaps out of the car, fear written all over his little face, looking so fucking much like the kid I remember being at his age, and my throat closes up and my eyes sting and I grab him tight. “It’s okay,” I say as he starts to cry too.

“Miss Captain Ellie’s crying,” he sobs. “Is the house gonna burn down?”

“Hey, no, no, everything’s fine.” Everything’s not fine.

“Take me home,” Ellie whimpers. “Mom? Take me home. I want to go home.”

“Honey, it’s late,” Mr. Ryder says.

Headlights flash again, but instead of a firetruck, it’s a fire engine red sports car.

Hell.

“Ellie—” I start again while I hug my son and my best friend steps out of his car and the closest people I have left to parents gape at me in utter confusion.

“We can’t, Wyatt,” she says, her words muffled against her mom’s shoulder but still clear as day to me. “We. Will. Die.”

“We—”

“When’s the last time you ever accidentally set a towel on fire? Never. Ever. Because it’s you. You don’t make mistakes. We are not supposed to be together.”

“Ellie, sweetie, what’s all this?” her mom says gently. “Honey, everyone makes mistakes. The house is fine.”

Beck looks up. “My house is on fire?” he asks.

Curiously. Not mad. Just confused.

Despite the alarms still blaring inside.

“No,” I tell him.

“Burned to the ground,” Ellie sobs.

“It’s not—” I start.

“IT WILL BE. Mom. I want to go home.”

Beck looks at me, shrugs in bewilderment, and then saunters to his sister. “C’mon, Ellie. I got you.”

“She’s in a bathrobe,” I say.

“I’m commando,” he offers.

Tucker’s still crying. The sirens are getting louder. And when Beck helps Ellie shuffle past us, she doesn’t look up when she whispers, “I’m sorry, Wyatt.”

Having my arm gnawed off by a bear with dull teeth would be less painful than the searing ache shredding my heart. “Ellie —”

Beck shuts her in the car, and he, too, doesn’t look at me as he walks around to the driver’s seat. The engine roars back to life, and he pulls out of the driveway thirty seconds before the fire truck screeches to a halt at the house.

“The fire’s out,” I tell the firefighters, but the words are hollow. “Kitchen accident.”

They still file inside.

Mrs. Ryder wraps her arms around both me and Tucker, and I wish I was seven again so I could cry too.

Because it's Ellie.

She's strong. She's smart.

And when she's fucking determined, there's nothing in the world that will stop her.

And she's determined that I'm not good for her.

I grip Tucker tighter.

One day, he'll grow up and leave me too. And we still have the teenage years to get through, when he'll probably hate me.

"I love her," I whisper to Mrs. Ryder.

"I know, honey," she says softly. "I've always known. She'll come around."

I shake my head, but I don't answer.

Because she won't.

She's made up her mind.

And thirty minutes after I thought I was finally in, finally right, it turns out I'm out.

Chapter Twenty-Seven

Wyatt

It takes less than an hour for us to get the all-clear to head back inside, but it feels like weeks. Especially with a sleeping Tucker in my arms. He's dead weight once he drifts off.

"Watch those towels," one of the firemen tells me as they depart.

"Yeah. Got it."

I get Tucker put to bed, and I'm about to collapse into my own bed in the next room when I realize I left my phone in the master bedroom downstairs before the fire. On the off-chance Ellie's willing to talk to me, I don't want to miss her. I hit the bottom of the stairs and realize Beck's back.

He's lounging in the living room. Alone.

"Where's Ellie?" I can't help it. The question rolls out.

"Cooper's place."

"In her bathrobe?"

"Doesn't really need clothes for sleeping, does she?" He grins at me, like nothing in the fucking world is fucking wrong, and I consider decking him. He might have two inches on me, but I have more muscle.

Plus, hitting something would feel damn good right now.

Maybe.

Probably not.

But it's worth a try.

"Want a beer?" he asks me.

"No." I scrub a hand over my face. "Yes."

"Awesome. What've we got? Smells like toast. You hungry?"

“That’s burnt dish towel.”

“Eh. Never liked that one anyway.” He leads the way into the kitchen, digs into the fridge and emerges with two bottles of Sam Adams. “Ping-pong?”

“You know I’ve been sleeping with your sister, right?”

“There a reason I’m still standing?”

His blue eyes flicker over me, and for half a second, I think he’s going to deck me. “Looks like she already got you.”

“She sneezed.”

“Son of a bitch.” He gets me with a jab to the shoulder. “Keep that shit to yourself.”

I recoil. “Hell, you do that—never mind. Don’t want to know.”

“Exactly, motherfucker.”

He shoves the second beer at me. “Ping-pong. Now.”

We troop down to the basement, and he flips on the lights. If I wasn’t watching, I wouldn’t have noticed him casting a glance at the water stain in the ceiling.

“Didn’t mean to break your house,” I mutter.

In the game room, he claims the far end of the ping-pong table and tosses me a paddle. “Talk.”

I set my beer aside and serve a ball.

And while we battle it out for superiority in ping-pong—he’s winning, because I have no heart left to put in it—I tell him everything.

Everything.

Starting with Christmas.

He doesn’t say anything for three games after I’m done. It’s past two in the morning. We’re just standing here, hitting a ping-pong ball back and forth, beers gone, the ball hitting the table and our paddles the only sound.

Finally, he tosses his paddle to the table. “You love her?”

My chest threatens to cave in. “Yes.”

“Huh.”

A Beck Ryder huh can mean anything from you’re in my seat to clogged the toilet again to oh, good, meatloaf leftovers. “Huh what?”

He shrugs. “All she’d say was Tucker needs him alive more than I need to bang him again. I think you’re fucked.”

“Thanks. Helpful. Real helpful.”

“And Mom’s making pancakes in the morning. Told me to tell you to sleep as late as you want, she’ll make you more.”

I dig the heel of my palms into my eye sockets, because I don’t want pancakes.

I want Ellie to have some faith that we can do this.

But I’m supposed to leave to drive back to Georgia in a few hours, because I go back to work Monday.

“You believe we’re cursed?” I ask Beck.

“Nah. Met too many witch doctors over the years. Your case is too boring.”

He was always unpredictable even before the boy band days. Now, he’s unpredictable with a worldly bent, which is mildly terrifying at times.

“Can you convince Ellie?” I ask.

“You want me to convince my sister that I know more than she does about something? Dude. It’s one thing to say you love her. It’s another to act like you don’t know her at all.”

“The Ellie I know would say screw the universe.”

His smile drops. “Yeah. Fucking Blond Caveman.”

I start. “You—”

“Her ex. The douche-nugget.”

“Didn’t know you called him that too.” A thought strikes me, and I squint at him. “Was this your plan when you asked me to annoy her?”

“That you break my dishwasher and burn my house down?”

“To hook me and Ellie up.”

“Nah. That was Levi.”

I owe another buddy a text. “Levi,” I repeat doubtfully.

“After you showed up at the hospital, he said the only other time he’s seen that look on a man’s face was Tripp, when Jessie had all those complications with delivery.”

“You miss the part where it was my fault she was on the road?”

“Oh, go shove your responsibility complex up your ass. You weren’t the drunk shitbag who hit her, and you weren’t the fuckweasel who dumped her on Christmas Eve. She made up her mind she wasn’t staying at Mom and Dad’s that night the minute she saw you, and we both know it. She just wanted to pick a fight, just like you wanted to pick a fight. It was shitty timing, but it wasn’t your fault. Got it?”

“Yeah,” I mutter.

I don’t know if I believe him yet, but I hear him.

Maybe Ellie’s right.

Maybe we are safer apart.

Chapter Twenty-Eight

Ellie

My leg is pounding like a mother, there's an annoying light shining directly at my eyelids, something smells faintly like moldy gym socks, and there's a godawful racket coming from outside the doorway.

Sounds like—

Oh, dammit.

Sounds like my brother trying to hit those falsetto notes Levi can reach but Beck most definitely cannot. He's not bad, but they didn't add him to the band for his musical talent.

Nope, they added him for the eye candy.

Blech.

He bursts into the room, and I remember I'm not at his house.

I'm at Cooper Rock's house half a mile up the road. Because Wyatt and I tried to burn down Beck's house last night.

"Is your house still standing?" I ask, realizing I'm croaking like a frog, and also that I don't give two fucks.

The universe spoke.

I listened.

And it hurts like hell.

"Damn straight," he says. "C'mon. Get up. They haven't found the peg leg yet. I want to go look, but I can't go without a disguise."

"Go buy yourself a peg leg." I shove my head under the pillow, which smells like mothballs, and I really don't care.

Yum, mothballs.

Like death, but mothier.

“You know you broke my best friend’s heart.”

“Talk to the universe. I’m saving his life.” My voice cracks, and I want to hit something, but I also want to roll over and go back to sleep and hope that when I wake up in five or six years, I won’t have residual pain in my leg and Wyatt will have found a safe, kind, motherly type of woman that he’s madly in love with who gives him blow jobs every night after she bakes cookies for Tucker.

Okay, maybe I’m not willing to go that far. I didn’t even get the chance to give him a blow job before fate decided blowing up Beck’s house was more important.

Great.

Now I’m dictating when his imaginary girlfriends can go down on him.

And possibly my eyes are leaking.

And if any asshole woman bakes Tucker cookies—

I squeeze my eyes shut, because Tucker’s adorable and sweet, but he’s not mine.

“Eeeelllllliiiiiiiiieeeeeee,” Beck whines. “Get uuuuuuuuuuppp.” He pokes me in the back.

I let him.

He pokes me again.

I still don’t move.

When he pokes me the third time, and I still don’t react, the big lug sits on me. Right on my back with his bony butt.

“Aaahhlp!” I grunt. “Get off.”

“I missed my sister,” he declares.

“I can’t breathe, you ass.”

He moves to sit on my calves, and now, even if I wanted to, I don’t think I could bend right to punch him. “And what do I come home to? A woman who’s not my sister walking around in my sister’s body. What did you do with Ellie, Fake Ellie?”

Where'd you put her? Are you from Zygorb? Are you an alien wearing my sister's skin?"

"You are annoying as hell."

"I'm annoying? You're the one who's pulling this shitty woe is me, the universe hates me, and for once in my life I'm gonna just lay down and take it because I'm afraid to love somebody who might actually break my heart shit."

I freeze.

Because that might be hitting too close to home.

"Go. Away."

"Wyatt's a good dude, Ellie. And he likes you despite you."

"And he flies in airplanes for his day job and we can't even kiss without dishwashers leaking and towels catching on fire and Tucker deserves to grow up with a good dad."

Beck heaves a loud, annoyed sigh and climbs off me. "Fine. Have your pity party. But if you don't get up, I'm calling Monica, and you know she'll skip her honeymoon to be here."

"Dick move. And you'd put her on a private jet and upgrade her to the fanciest cruise in the world to make it up to her."

"Yeah, but she won't know that when she comes running."

Which is why she's my best friend.

My best girl friend.

My best friend friend might be—dammit.

"And I'll send Mom," he adds. "Oh, and by the way, Wyatt was pissed when he found out Cooper lives so close. Dude thought he was bicycling up the mountain to deliver you donuts because he's angling to get into your pants. Isn't that a hoot? Ten minutes, Ell. And then I'm singing again too."

He heads out the door whistling like he has freaking sunshine in his sparkly bright soul, and I realize I'm naked.

I'm naked, with a healing black eye, a sore hip and thigh, and a big ol' pile of ash in my chest.

But that's how it has to be.

Because I've hurt enough people in my life.

I won't put Wyatt in danger. He deserves better.

Chapter Twenty-Nine

Ellie

I'd planned to stay in Shipwreck through the weekend for recovery time, but with Beck back, the odds of having a minute of peace are nil. Not because he's always as annoying as he was this morning, but because he'll be calling anyone he can to hang out while he's in town, which will undoubtedly be three days or less.

And I don't want to be in the house when he sees the new high score on Frogger.

Too many memories.

So I convince my dad to ride with me back to Copper Valley before lunch.

When we hit the 256 loop around the city, my eyes sting, because we're officially now out of the country and out of the mountains. It's back to the hustle and bustle. Traffic. Billboards. Skyscrapers.

Dad's quiet the entire ninety-minute drive. When I pull into the driveway of the red brick colonial in the middle-class neighborhood where I grew up, with the old basketball hoop still over the garage door, my eyes burn again.

Dad squeezes my knee. "Been through a lot this year."

He doesn't tell me I'm overreacting. Or that it's okay to be scared, but not okay to let fear rule my life, or any of the other things I logically know.

That's not how Dad works.

Probably because all the rest of us finally talked him into silence over the years.

But he does offer me a scoop of homemade peach cobbler if I want to stay a few hours.

So that's how I find myself curled up on my parents' couch, watching the Fireballs get creamed in high definition, while my dad cuts and sugars early season peaches for our late lunch of peach cobbler.

I don't realize I've drifted off to sleep until the doorbell rings, and when I wake up, I'm disoriented and confused, and it takes me a minute to remember why my heart hurts.

Wyatt.

He probably hates me.

I hope he does. That'll make it easier for him to move on.

I curl tighter into a ball. The game's over, and now an old Meg Ryan and Tom Hanks movie is on.

"Ellie, I'm going for a walk," Dad calls from the front door.

"Kay," I answer, frog voice and all.

I haven't had any peach cobbler yet, but I should go home. I don't have any food. I need to do laundry. And catch up on work email.

Plus, I could stop at a pet shelter on the way and ask to play with the dogs for a few hours. Guaranteed pick-me-up.

Since Beck sometimes shares my social media posts about dogs that haven't found their forever homes—always with a caption like Sharing for my sister, who wishes she'd been born a dog so it would be socially acceptable for her to lick my face—I'm undeservedly welcome at all the shelters in the metro area.

I'm staring blindly at Meg Ryan's profile on the television when the hairs on the back of my neck prickle, and the pile of ashes in my chest gives a big ol' whomp.

There's a shadow in the doorway.

A Wyatt-size shadow. Or possibly more than a shadow.

That whomp turns into a staccato beat of whomp after whomp after whomp.

“Please,” I whisper, and I don’t know if I’m asking him to stay or leave. I just know it hurts.

It hurts to think about hurting him.

It hurts to think about losing him.

And it hurts to be terrified that disaster is waiting around every corner if I reject both of my first two options.

He steps slowly into the room, eyes trained on me, searching, asking.

I don’t even have to look him in the eye to know.

He’s not afraid.

He’s not afraid of anything.

“You okay?” he asks, and that voice.

God, I love his voice. Rich and smooth and warm, like hot chocolate after a day playing in the snow.

“Fine,” I say hoarsely, and we both know I’m lying.

I can’t tell if he’s tired, frustrated, or all of the above, but I do know the yellowing bruise on his eye is all the reminder I need of the danger of the two of us getting together.

“Where’s Tucker?” I ask, and dammit, there’s another flame attacking the ashes in my chest.

“With your dad. He’s not too happy about the drive coming up.”

The drive.

He should’ve already left.

Instead, he’s still here, lowering himself to the couch on the opposite end of where I’m curled up, and it’s all I can do not to crawl across the cushions and into his lap to hold him and tell him how sorry I am.

For everything.

For being a shithead when we were kids. For seducing him at Christmas when we were both hurting.

For not answering his phone calls after the accident.

For pushing him away.

“I love you,” he says quietly, his voice husky but strong. No hitch. No hesitation. “I’ve spent my whole life afraid of what it would be like to love you, but I do, Ellie. I love you.”

“You shouldn’t.” He’s going to break me.

“I never thought I was built for marriage. I never believed in forever. But I look at you, and I can feel it. I can see it. You? You’re everything I never knew I wanted. Never knew I needed. I didn’t believe in forever until I believed in you.”

Break me? No. Destroy me. “We’re—we’re dangerous, Wyatt.”

“If there’s anyone in the world who can give the universe a middle finger and tell it to kiss your ass if it thinks it’s going to stand in your way, it’s you.” He sets a piece of paper on the cushion between us. “I don’t care if it takes you two hours or forty years. I’ll wait. You will always be the only woman I’ll ever love.”

My breath hitches when he takes my hand and kisses my cheek, because yes, he’s everything I want.

Everything.

But I’m terrified.

My entire life, all I wanted was to meet the goal.

Of course I dated Patrick. He checked all the boxes. Handsome. Successful. Smart.

We could’ve had a lovely marriage where neither of us actually had to love each other, where there was no danger of a broken heart, because all we wanted was someone to be married to.

But I could have so much more.

Laughter. Joy. Tears. Heartbreak.

With a man who knows me. Who gets me. Who accepts me.

All of me. The good and the bad. The pretty and the ugly. The broken and the whole.

If I'm willing to go for it.

Wyatt doesn't pause on his way out the door.

He doesn't have to.

Because he's tossed the ball back in my court. And left his address, his home phone number, and his work phone number on the couch between us.

It's my turn to decide what to do.

If I'm going to do anything at all.

Chapter Thirty

Wyatt

I fucked up.

I fucked up hardcore. And I hate fucking up.

I also hate hundred-degree weather with humidity so high you can't get your balls dry when you get out of the shower in the morning, but that's life in Georgia.

I hate hearing from my colonel that there's nothing we can do right now to reapply for early release from my service commitment.

I hate that I'd be arrested for being AWOL if I left Georgia forever anyway in August when I have to take Tucker back to Copper Valley.

And I hate that I feel like a shitty parent because I hurt, and I don't know if I'm making this the best or the worst summer of my son's life.

"Wow, Dad, you missed that by a mile," he calls with a laugh as I jog after a baseball in my backyard. The live oaks provide enough shade to block the sun from helping the grass grow. Or maybe the grass has also lost the will to live in the damn heat.

My hand's sweating so bad my glove can barely stay on.

But Tucker's grinning and squealing and laughing while we play catch, which is really more him flinging the ball wildly about the backyard while I try to aim to gently toss a baseball into his mitt.

I love Saturdays.

And I hate Saturdays.

"Does Miss Captain Ellie know how to play catch?" Tucker asks when I toss him the ball.

"Yep."

“Is she as good as you?”

“Don’t know, bud.”

“Can I see her when I go back with Mom?”

“That’s up to your mom.”

“Ha! Dad, you missed again.”

I sure did.

I bend to grab the ball as my phone rings, and when I see who’s calling, I almost drop it.

Both the ball and the phone, actually.

“Hey, bud, I gotta take this,” I say. “Throw it at that back tree for a bit, okay? Be right back.”

“Okay, Dad!”

I angle around to the side of the two-bedroom brick house I’m renting a couple miles from the base and put the phone to my ear, my heart in my throat. “Ellie?”

“I thought of you while I masturbated last week and then I ran over a squirrel.”

My lungs freeze and I grunt out an unintelligible answer.

She barks out a high-pitched laugh. “Kidding. I mean, not about thinking about you while I masturbate. I mean about the squirrel. Nothing bad happened.”

“Fuck, Ellie,” I manage, because now I’m hard as a pipe and so damn glad to hear her voice and terrified what she might say next.

“And I’ve kissed your picture every night this week before I went to bed, and all that happened was I ran out of milk.”

Her voice is wobbling, which is understandable, because my knees are wobbling too. “And?” I ask.

“I miss you,” she whispers.

“I miss you too.”

“Did you know the odds of getting in an accident and having your house burn down in the same lifetime are less than your odds of getting struck by lightning?”

I have no idea the real statistics. “Of course. I remember all the Trivial Pursuit answers I read.”

She laughs, and it sounds watery, and I wish like hell I could hold her right now. Or just look at her. “Shut up,” she says, but there’s none of the old venom or irritation.

This is all playful Ellie.

Hesitantly playful, but playful.

“When I’m right, it’s my duty to tell you so.” My cheeks crack with the effort of smiling, and my heart’s buzzing like it’s hooked up to a car battery. But this is what we do.

We give each other shit.

“Fine, Mister Smartypants. What are the odds I’m in your driveway?” she asks.

I freeze.

But only a split second before I’m striding to the front of the house.

The back bumper of a white Prius comes into view.

My pulse amps higher.

She’s here.

Ellie’s here.

I drop my hands to my side, just staring while she pulls herself out of the driver’s seat. She cut her hair shorter, so it’s framing her ears with crazy, beautiful curls. Her blue eyes match the deep summer sky, but the hesitancy in them almost makes my knees buckle.

“You drove,” I say dumbly.

Her lips hitch toward the sky. “The whole way. After I told the universe I was coming to talk you out of your pants. And no vultures attacked my car. Bears didn’t dash in front of me. Random ice storms didn’t pop up out of nowhere. My hotel didn’t burn down. And so I don’t have to interrupt the space-time continuum and bring about another ice age.”

I'm supposed to smile, but I still can't believe she's standing here. "What—why—"

She limps as she starts around the car, but holds a hand up when I move toward her. "Do you know what irritates the fuck out of me about you?"

My eyes shift toward the side of the house, but I can hear Tucker still laughing in back, so he missed that little F-bomb. "How perfect I am?" I guess, even though I'm so far from it.

"Exactly. You even knew I was going to say that."

Her gait is smoothing out as she rounds the car.

My fingers itch, and my arms are aching to hold her, but I wait, because I know she'll read me the riot act if I try to make this any easier on her.

"I'm not perfect, Ellie."

"Do you remember what you said? That if anyone would flip off the universe and do what I wanted anyway, it was me?"

She stops inches from me, the waver still in her voice.

I nod.

"You forgot a part."

"What part?"

"The part where I won't have to do it alone."

"I thought that's what you were afraid of."

"I don't want to be afraid to live."

"That's my girl."

"I love you, Wyatt." She finally closes the distance between us and lines her body up with mine, her hands sliding up my chest. "Do you still want me?" she whispers.

"Always."

"Even if always is only like thirty more seconds?"

I laugh, because she's teasing. And she's here. "Ellie Ryder, I will love you long after my heart stops beating. And that, you can count on."

She pushes up on her toes while I angle my head down to meet her, and there's no head-crashing, no black eyes, no sneezes, just her lips teasing mine, here, real, here, in the hot Georgia sauna, her hands exploring while I crush her to me because I am never letting her go.

Ever.

“Dad! Are you—Miss Captain Ellie!”

The joy in Tucker's voice puts a lump in my throat, and I'm blinking hard as Ellie pulls back and leans down to hug my son. “Hey, kiddo. You teaching your dad to play ball?”

“Yeah, he's kinda bad. He keeps missing the ball. Are you better?”

“Probably not.”

“That's okay. We have ice cream when you're bad.”

I choke on a laugh. “We what?”

He grins hopefully at me. “Right, Dad? Ice cream. Miss Captain Ellie, can you stay for ice cream? My dad's grilling burgers later too. You can have his. He'll go to the store for more.”

I gape at him, because he's moving in and pulling smoother moves than I have.

But Ellie hugs him again. “You are adorable.”

“I don't think he needs encouragement,” I tell her.

She rises and smiles at me, but as she does, something white lands in her hair.

My jaw slips.

Her brows furrow, and she starts to reach for her head, but I snag her hand. “Don't. Just... Hey, Tucker? Go get the gloves and bring them inside, okay? We'll get ice cream. We'll get ice cream right now.”

He giggles. “Miss Captain Ellie, a bird just pooped in your hair!”

“Go on,” I say, giving him a gentle shove in the right direction.

“Are you kidding me?” Ellie mutters.

I can’t decide if I want to laugh or if I need to go into full-on overprotective mode, but as soon as Tucker turns his back, she lifts a middle finger to the sky. “Bring it, asshole,” she mutters.

“If you really meant it,” I tell her, “you’d use both middle fingers.”

Something squawks, and a bird bounces off the neighbor’s side window. It falls on the ground, leaps to its feet, bounces around like it’s dizzy for a minute, and then takes off again in the opposite direction.

Ellie dusts her hands. “That’s right. Who’s in charge now?”

I don’t bother stifling a smile.

Because that’s my girl.

Epilogue

Ellie, aka a kickass hottie who's not taking any grief from the universe (and yes, Wyatt insisted that's how she be described for the rest of her life)

A year after Wyatt invaded Beck's house to dunk me in the tub—yes, that's my story, and I'm sticking to it—we're back in Shipwreck for the Pirate Festival with Tucker, and this year, we have a strategy to find the peg leg.

"It's in the fountain!" Tucker shrieks while we stroll down Blackbeard Avenue with all the clues printed out.

"Ssh," Wyatt murmurs. "Don't tell the whole town. They'll beat us to it."

Tucker grins.

He's grown at least six inches since last summer, I swear he has.

"Race you there, Miss Captain Ellie," he says.

I pretend to swoon, mostly to take advantage of the opportunity to lean into Wyatt's solid body. "I can't possibly race if I don't fuel up first."

"Dad! Dad, I need four dollars to buy Miss Captain Ellie a donut," Tucker says.

"A plain donut?" Wyatt's nose wrinkles.

"A banana pudding donut," Tucker says in exasperation.

"But she'll be useless after that," Wyatt replies dramatically. "All I'm so full. Tucker, you have to carry on without me."

Tucker giggles.

"I will not," I declare. "You're just trying to sneak your way into eating half my donut."

As if I won't share with him.

He flashes my favorite smile as he hands Tucker a ten. "Also possibly true."

Tucker scampers into the bakery while we watch, Wyatt's arm casually slung around me. He kisses my crown. "He's getting too tall," he grumbles.

"I hear it happens." I squeeze him around the waist. Because of a couple scheduling snafus, it's been six weeks since Wyatt saw Tucker.

But he starts a new job at the base just north of Copper Valley in three weeks, and the three of us are hanging out every last minute of those three weeks until he reports for duty. And once summer's over, we'll get Tucker every other week.

Every week of the year.

Grady waves at us from the counter after giving Tucker his change and a donut bag, and the not-so-little boy scampers back to us. "He has unicorn donuts, Dad!"

"Oh, that's trouble," I murmur. "Sarcasm won't like that. But it's not like they get the monopoly on unicorns just because they have a unicorn festival."

Wyatt watches with his jaw moving up and down while Tucker pulls a pastel rainbow painted donut with a cotton candy horn out of the bag and bites into it.

I follow suit and pull out the banana pudding donut, which is oozing on the edge, and take a giant bite that makes pudding and banana slide down my chin.

"You two," Wyatt murmurs with a grin, wiping my chin for me and licking his thumb.

"C'mon, guys!" Tucker says. "It's at the fountain, I know it is!"

We trail after him, sharing the banana pudding donut, with Wyatt staying pristine and clean, and me getting pudding all over my pirate festival T-shirt.

It's my compromise with the universe.

I sometimes get dirtier than I should be, and it lets me have all the sex I want with Wyatt without making me crash, burn down houses, or accidentally kill small rodents.

Okay, okay.

The universe and I don't actually have an agreement.

I just finally decided to stop being scared, and chose to be happy, and cut back some on my hours at work, and I'm finally running again.

Not marathons yet, but I'm running.

A year makes a huge difference.

Especially with a helper for my physical therapy exercises.

Or a drill sergeant.

Depends on if Tucker or Wyatt has the job.

But if it's Wyatt, I usually pencil him into a new cartoon of Dick and the Nuts, and always in a compromising position.

Since we're the only two who ever see my doodle pad anymore, it's worked well to keep the spark alive between us.

Or possibly the fun.

Not that we need much help.

"It's like we never left," Wyatt says as we cross the street toward the garden. The wild goats are still here, and the townspeople of Shipwreck have adopted them all.

Beck's house is still standing.

Although the Frogger score has me slightly suspicious.

"Here! I know it!" Tucker calls. "Right here!"

Wyatt tucks in a smile.

I know that smile

It's a something's up smile.

"What?" I ask.

He lifts his brows like he has no idea what I'm talking about.

“Hmm.” I squint at him.

His lips spread in a full smile, and he pats my ass. “Doesn’t take much to make you suspicious, does it?”

“With you? Never.”

Tucker’s leaping around the fountain. “It’s here! It’s here!”

“Where?” I ask, following him around the statue of Thorny Rock.

“There!” he cries, pointing to Thorny Rock’s leg.

“Tucker,” I say, laughing, “he’s always had a peg leg. We’re looking for a wooden peg leg not attached to a pirate.”

I lean into the statue, half-expecting Wyatt to shove me into the fountain. “Tucker, bud, I really don’t—”

I turn, and I stop, because the two most important men in my life are both down on one knee behind me.

Tucker giggles. “Or I might be wrong,” he says, his bright brown eyes dancing.

Wyatt’s smiling too, but it’s a solemn smile.

“Calamity Ellie,” he says, taking my hand, “will you do us the honor of being my pirate captain?”

“And my powder monkey!” Tucker pipes up. He fishes something out of his pocket, and suddenly I’m being presented with a plastic pirate ring.

Which is almost as beautiful as the diamond Wyatt’s now holding out.

I think.

I can’t tell exactly through the blur clouding my eyes. “Yes,” I tell them both.

One of the town goats bleats in approval from its spot on the bench where Wyatt did heavenly things to me last year, and I’m laughing through tears as each of them slide a ring onto my fingers.

“Fucking weddings,” Long Beak Silver says from the wall above us.

“Go walk the plank, you bad bird,” Tucker chides.

And the bird does.

And when he catches himself before he hits the ground, he recovers by swooping straight at my head.

I duck, my foot slips, and I go ass over teakettle into the fountain.

“Miss Captain Ellie!” Tucker shrieks.

My legs are all akimbo, my butt soaked, my T-shirt dripping, and I’m touching slimy quarters and pennies in the bottom of the fountain, but as I look at Wyatt, all I can do is laugh.

And not just because he’s doubled over as he holds out a hand to help me up.

“Maybe it’s Shipwreck,” I say while he hoists me out of the fountain. “Because this doesn’t happen anywhere else.”

“I think it’s life, Ellie,” he says. “Now you get over here and kiss me before I take my ring back.”

You can’t say I won’t be a dutiful wife, because I do get over there and kiss him.

I rub my wet, soggy, slimy body all over him, laughing while I kiss him, but I kiss him.

Because he’s my best friend.

My everything.

And my one true love.

Bonus Epilogue

Wyatt

There's nothing quite as beautiful as watching Ellie pause in her yoga routine next to the bar in Beck's basement to smile at her ring. Tucker's passed out cold upstairs after more fun at the pirate festival than even I thought possible, and though he'll be up with the sun, I have plans for this pretty lady that involve getting her naked ASAP and neither of us sleeping for hours.

"That as far as you can stretch?" I ask. "C'mon, Ryder. You're barely touching your knees."

She rolls her eyes, but she's still smiling. "With my nose, you big jerk. Like to see you try."

I settle on the ground next to her, on my hands and knees, and I bend over and kiss her knee. "See? Nothing to it."

"You goober," she says with a laugh, rubbing my short hair and catching me by the back of the neck so she can kiss me.

And so I can kiss her back.

If I live to be two hundred, I'll never get tired of kissing Ellie. I sometimes can't believe I spent so many years thinking she was just an annoying twit, because this Ellie is all heart.

And too many people overlook it because she's also determination and grit and honesty. But it's all driven by that heart that she puts into everything.

She pushes me onto my back and straddles me. "Have I told you how much I love my rings?" she whispers, because yep, she got more than one.

"Nope. I'm pretty sure you hate them and you're just humoring us."

She laughs. "You're absolutely correct. But since they come with Tucker, I guess I'll keep them." Her hair tickles my cheeks as she bends to kiss me, and I thread my fingers through the soft, curly locks while I tease her tongue with mine.

Her phone buzzes on the floor next to us, but we both ignore it. Her fingers are trailing over the vacation stubble on my jaw, and there's nothing I love more than her touch on my face.

Except maybe the way she's rocking her pussy over my rapidly hardening cock.

That's pretty fucking amazing too.

Especially knowing how hard she's worked to get so much strength and range of motion back in her leg.

Anytime Beck gives me shit for sleeping with his sister, I point out how much I've improved her flexibility.

Her phone buzzes again. "Sorry," she murmurs. "Couldn't help myself. I posted a picture of my rings on Twitter."

"So you do like them."

"Maybe a little." Her eyes sparkle while she dips her head to press a kiss to my neck. I slide my hands under her shirt, and —"Dammit, Ellie, I hate your sports bras."

She laughs while she straightens and pulls off both her shirt and the stupidly tight rubber band with straps that require flexibility and acrobatics to pull off.

I don't mind the show, but it looks like wearing it would hurt.

Though I do like the way her breasts just somehow fall right into my waiting palms while she's still wrangling the thing over her head.

So soft. And those gorgeous pink tips that harden immediately under my thumbs are making my cock ache. I lean up to take one in my mouth, and she gasps and grips my shoulders. "Wyatt."

"Mmm," I hum against her nipple, and her breath catches again while she arches into me.

Her phone erupts in a series of buzzes, and she laughs breathlessly. "I should shut that off."

“Ignore it,” I reply, shifting my focus to her other breast while I roll her wet nipple between my thumb and finger.

“Oh, god, Wyatt, what if Tucker gets up again?” she whispers.

“I’ll hear him.”

“Like last time?”

“Ellie. He’s passed out cold.” I blow on her nipple, and it works.

She moans and grabs my face and kisses me hard, then orders me to lose my shirt too.

I’m happily obliging when her phone blows up.

Not like kitchen-fire-level blowing up, but a steady stream of buzzes that just don’t stop.

At all.

She huffs and leans over to grab it. “Stupid pho—oh.”

Her eyes go wide.

Then wider.

Her mouth follows suit.

“Wyatt,” she whispers.

That raging hard ache in my cock disappears, because something’s wrong.

Something’s seriously wrong.

“What? What is it?”

“Beck—” she starts.

My veins freeze over. For all the shit I’ve given him, if something happened to Beck—

“No, no,” she says quickly. “He’s okay. He’s okay. But—the jokes. The pranks. His mouth. He—”

She cuts herself off and holds her phone in front of my face.

I read the first text from Monica.

Another from her mom.

One's come in from Levi, and I realize if I had my phone on me, it would probably be blowing up too, but my phone's upstairs.

And then there's the picture.

The picture of a tweet.

Sent by Beck.

Looks like something he'd say to Ellie, but he most definitely did not send that Tweet to his sister.

"He's so dead," I say, my own eyeballs like saucers.

"His career is," she whispers back.

We make eye contact.

"Surprise engagement party tomorrow night at home," I croak out. "He's coming."

She's off me in a heartbeat, putting her phone to her ear, undoubtedly calling the dumbass. "He's home?" she asks me while I hear his voicemail pick up.

"Flying in overnight."

I'm on my feet now too.

I don't care how much shit he gives me for dating his sister—or how many other pranks he's pulled on me this past year alone—he's my brother.

And he just made the mistake of his life.

"I'll start packing," I say while I throw on my shirt.

She leaves her sports bra on the ground and struggles into her tank top. "I'm calling Mom and Dad."

"Tucker can sleep in the car."

She winces. "But the festival—"

"Ellie."

She studies me a minute, then nods.

Would I rather spend the night making her moan my name?

Fuck, yes.

But family comes first. And if the way Ellie's phone is blowing up all over again is any indication, family needs her right now.

And me.

And every last one of the guys from the neighborhood.

For what Beck just did, he's going to need all the support he can get.

"Ellie?" I say softly while I trail her up the stairs.

"What?"

"You know this isn't because we got engaged, right? We don't actually cause disasters."

She pauses to look at me, and then we both laugh. Except neither one of us actually thinks it's funny.

We're loading up the car before she says any more about it. Tucker's objecting to being strapped into his booster seat in the middle of the night, and Ellie's about to climb in to sit next to him and snuggle him as best she can in the car when she turns to look at me.

"We really are cursed," she says slowly, but then a smile pops out. "But there's no one in the world I'd rather be cursed with."

America's Geekheart Sneak Peek

If you love hot, sexy Hollywood men, Tweets gone terribly wrong, and charmingly adorable heroines looking for where they fit in the world, read on for an uncorrected early excerpt of Beck Ryder's story, America's Geekheart!

Beckett Ryder, aka a man completely oblivious that he's just mistweeted his way to being public enemy number one

Life is pretty fucking perfect.

Weather's a glorious seventy-five degrees and sunny on this brilliant June morning. My new jogging shoes fit like I'm running on a cloud. The green leafy canopy over Reynolds Park is hitting that perfect level of shade, and I've got my tunes dialed up and nowhere to be until my sister's engagement party tonight.

Ten solid hours of doing whatever the hell I want.

I'm grinning to myself as I run the familiar pathway through the city park, so glad to be back in Copper Valley. Love my job, but there is no place in the world like home.

I nod to a woman pushing a jogging stroller going the other way, and she scowls and flips me off.

Odd.

Crazies are normal when I'm in LA, or sometimes in Europe, but here?

My hometown loves me.

I dial down the volume on my tunes and double-check my shirt.

Nope, nothing offensive about a Fireballs T-shirt. They might be the biggest losers in baseball, but they're lovable losers.

I glance lower, and—yep, remembered to put pants on today. Shorts, really. My brand, naturally, but not because they're my brand. More because I picked them to be in my RYDE fashion line because they're really comfortable.

I might've been singing along to Levi's latest hit, but I'm not that bad. Sure, I was the eye candy in the boy band Bro Code back in the day, but I can still carry a tune.

She must've mistaken me for someone else. Or her fingers are stuck that way. Resting bitch face knows no boundaries and can happen to even the most innocent victims. Probably not her fault.

I keep on truckin', and an elderly woman on a bench shakes her cane at me and says something I don't catch while her dog yaps along. I pop out one earbud.

"You're a disgrace to good men everywhere," she crows.

I slow and face her, jogging in place. "Ma'am?"

"Your poor momma must be ashamed."

Ah. The underwear police. Not so unusual. While Levi went on to be a pop sensation when we called it quits as Bro Code, Cash took off for Hollywood, Tripp hung up his fame and settled down, and Davis went into hiding, I took my own route.

My post-boy-band career choices have been known to raise a few eyebrows.

"Yes, ma'am. She's horrified. Y'all have a nice day now." I salute her and head back down the path toward the fountain at the center of the park.

In the years since I modeled my first pair of briefs for Giovanni & Valentino, before I branched out into creating a fashion empire of my own, I've had my share of haters. Goes with the business.

But my momma isn't ashamed of me.

No more than she was during my boy band days.

If anything, she's amused. Resigned sometimes, but amused.

Ellie—my sister—gives me trouble. So do all the guys we grew up with.

That's why I love them.

They keep me grounded.

Hell, half of them needed the grounding themselves.

The path curves, and there she is.

My fountain.

Okay, fine, she's not mine. But she's on the city's crest, and she says home to me.

I love home, but running the Beck Ryder fashion empire—yeah, go ahead and snort, it's funny—keeps me away a lot.

I burst out into the sunshine and make the loop around the curved sidewalk, feet pounding the concrete, mist brushing my face, the five stone dolphins around the fountain joyfully spitting water into the stone mermaids' buckets on the second tier while a circle of seahorses blows water horns.

The early summer breeze rustles the birch and sugar maple leaves shimmering in the sunlight. The air's clear. The sky's my favorite blue. Flowers explode in reds and yellows and purples in the carefully cultivated landscaping that masks the downtown skyscrapers and mutes the noise of the city.

It's my own private welcome home party from nature.

Can't wait to be here more often.

Soon. So soon.

I circle the fountain and head back toward the path that leads to Schuler Tower and my penthouse at the edge of the park. Tomorrow, I have to get back to work—there's always work when you're running an empire and launching a new foundation—but today, my staff has the day off, my phone's still on airplane mode, and the whole Copper Valley metro area is my oyster.

No phone, no work, no responsibilities.

Maybe I'll leave the city behind and head up into the Blue Ridge mountains for a hike. Nap up there in the fresh air. Eat. Eat some more. Get back in time for Ellie and Wyatt's surprise engagement party.

Rumor has it they're serving barbecue.

I haven't had good barbecue in months.

I'm so busy drooling over the thought of real Southern pulled pork that I almost miss the yoga class.

By itself, a yoga class on the lawn by the fountain isn't unusual. But this yoga class seems less into the Namaste and more into hurtling their yoga bricks.

Specifically, at me.

They charge me as a group, a yoga-pants-clad mob racing over the hilly green grass, shouting obscenities and shaking fists. One lady has her mat rolled into a cylinder and is leading the pack Braveheart style.

"Creep!"

"Jerk!"

"You go home and get your own damn apron!"

My pulse amps into sprint territory.

"Hey, hey." I hold my hands up in surrender while I jog backwards, because seriously, what the hell? "Y'all know I love you. What's—"

A shoe hurtles at my face. Another yoga brick clips my shoulder.

"Get him, ladies," the Braveheart lady yelled.

Oh, shit.

They want blood.

I don't have a clue what I did, but these ladies want blood. My blood.

My run morphs into a sprint, but for once, my brain's spinning faster than my legs.

The mother and her stroller and her middle finger. The grandmother and her cane. And now a yoga class.

I'm outnumbered.

Probably outsmarted and outmaneuvered too.

Another yoga brick.

And I'm still too far from safety.

"Shut up and let your underwear do the talking!" A clump of —oh, man, that's disgusting. Flying horse poop. Awesome.

I pump my legs harder. Knees higher. Like I'm gonna beat Usain Bolt. Running. Sprinting. Away from a mob of angry women.

This is new.

As is having a mob of angry women gaining on me.

The ladies usually love me. Or if not, at least they tolerate me with patient smiles.

Maybe a run wasn't the best cure for jetlag.

But how was I supposed to know today's International Beck Ryder Is The Enemy Day?

"I'll show you where you belong," one of the women screeches.

I don't have a clue where she thinks I belong, or why she thinks I belong there, but I know one thing.

I am totally screwed.

Arrogant Devil

R.S. Grey

A full-length STANDALONE romantic comedy from USA TODAY bestselling author R.S. Grey.

Everyone in Cedar Creek, Texas, knows Jack McNight is an arrogant devil. Physically, I get it: he's tan and fit, with coal-black hair that's clearly been scorched by hellfire. Oh, and his personality? It burns just as hot.

When I show up on the doorstep of Blue Stone Ranch, I'm run-down and rockin' my last pair of underwear. I'm hoping for a savior, but instead, I find him.

My opinion of Jack is marred by a dismal first impression, but his opinion of me is tainted even before I arrive. He's heard I'm a spoiled princess there to take advantage of his goodwill. To him, I'm more trouble than I'm worth.

Our button-pushing banter should get under my skin. His arrogance should be a major turn-off. Problem is, devils are known to offer their own form of temptation.

Every one of his steely glares sends a shiver down my spine.

Every steamy encounter leaves me reeling.

Sure, it could be the Texas heat messing with my head, but there's no way I'll survive the summer without silencing him with a kiss and wrestling him out of those Wranglers.

Who knows...going to bed with the devil might just be the salvation I've been looking for all along.

Meredith

I left my husband last night. There's something so nice about the past tense—left. He's still in California. Meanwhile, I'm standing in a gas station in Middle-of-Nowhere, Texas. I have no money, no car. I pawned a gaudy diamond tennis bracelet to purchase a plane ticket to San Antonio, and to its credit, the bracelet also paid for the taxi currently fueling up at the pump outside. However, my cash has run out and my stomach is growling.

I eyeball the shelves lined with an array of sugary junk food. It's the good stuff: half-dozen packs of white powdered donuts that are messier than glitter bombs and stacks of sad, deflated honey buns. It all seems like what aliens would come up with if tasked with recreating human food. In spite of this, my mouth waters just looking at it all. I want to tear open a bag of Doritos and waterfall the chips straight into my mouth. I want to double-fist the ancient, desiccated hot dogs destined to forever spin on greasy rollers—that's how hungry I am.

I didn't plan my departure very well. I didn't plan it at all, in fact. Last night, I was lying on my side of the bed, wide awake. Andrew was snoring loudly beside me, just as confident as ever that the sun would rise in the morning like it always does. An hour earlier, he'd come in late from a work dinner with lipstick smeared on his cheek. His white collar, meanwhile, was pristine.

I had a million reasons for leaving him—enough to fill this entire gas station snack aisle, enough to make any marriage counselor put a big down payment on a vacation home—but last night, I only needed one. I left, and that's all that matters. There's half a country between him and me, and the only thing I have to worry about now is putting my next foot forward... well, that and the fact that I have nowhere to go, no money, no job, and no food. I'm also rapidly running out of sellable accessories, but let's not get bogged down by the details.

I stare at a can of peanuts sitting on the shelf. Yesterday, I could have slapped my black AMEX down on the checkout counter and dragged my arm across the shelf, knocking food into my basket like a contestant on Supermarket Sweep. Now, I can't afford peanuts; Andrew canceled my cards as soon as he realized I left.

I smile, imagining how pissed he must have been when the truth dawned on him. He never thought I'd do it. It was part of his spiel: Who pays the bills? Who buys your clothes? You're nothing without me, Meredith—worthless.

In a purely financial sense, he was right about the whole “worthless” thing. My net worth currently consists of a couple dollars and some loose change. He was wrong about the other part though. I left him, and I did it in the middle of the night with nothing but the clothes on my back. It's the outfit I had laid out for a charity luncheon—an event that must be taking place at this very moment without me. The ensemble is a frilly white blouse, Hermes belt, and designer jeans.

My great escape was a victim of my fleeting courage. I knew if I sat down and planned it all out, I'd lose my nerve. I needed to have no time to back out, no second-guessing. Now, I realize I should have been a bit more practical. I should have packed myself some getaway snacks, water, maybe some sneakers.

Honestly, though, I never thought I would be here. Of all the places I could have run to, Texas seemed to make the most sense because of my sister—well, technically she's my half-sister. I recall the phone conversation I had with her last night while I was at the airport trying to catch a red-eye. I had to dial her number about a dozen times before she finally answered.

“Meredith?” she asked, obviously shocked to see my name appear on her phone screen. We aren't exactly close. She probably has me in her phone as That Half-Sister I Hardly Know, Meredith. To be fair, I have her in my phone as Half-Helen.

“Helen! Hey!”

She didn't answer back right away. There was so much static on her end of the line.

"Are you there? Can you hear me?" I plugged my free ear with a finger and hoped the call would suddenly come through clearer.

"Barely!" she shouted. "What's going on? I have like fifty missed calls from you."

I blanched. "Yeah, well, it's actually kind of a long story, but I'm on my way to Texas."

"Texas?"

She sounded shocked, and that's fair. She's lived in the Lone Star State for six years and I've never visited.

I cut right to the chase since time was another luxury I'd abandoned.

"Yes, and I have a favor to ask... a rather big one actually."

"Speak up, Meredith, I can hardly hear you. You need a favor?"

"Yes, well, that is"—I raised my voice—"I was wondering if I could stay with you for a while?!"

"What?"

"I'm actually already headed your way."

A lighthearted, singsong chuckle on my end did not ease her shock.

"Are you kidding? Brent, hold on, it's Meredith."

I heard a door close and then she dropped a bomb.

"Well, I hope you haven't left yet. I'm in Paris."

"You're in Paris?! Paris Paris?"

For the record, my sister is not a jetsetter. I hoped she meant Paris, Texas, not the croissant-filled country half a world away.

"Yes, Paris Paris. Brent and I are traveling for the next three months while our house gets renovated."

"You've got to be kidding."

I really almost broke down then. My throat was tightening. Tears were locked and loaded. People were starting to look at me and wonder if TSA had made a mistake letting me through security.

My flight was already boarding as my sister continued, “We’ve been wanting to redo the kitchen and bathrooms for a while...”

What the hell does that have to do with Paris?

“...so we thought, why not make a big trip out of it while our house is unlivable?”

Unlivable. I guess there’s more than one way to demolish a home, a life.

“Why didn’t you tell me?”

“Let’s see, I told the bank, the contractors, the permit office—oh darnit! Now that you mention it, I did forget to tell the half-sister I haven’t spoken to since when...Christmas?”

Her tone implied that was my fault, and it was—partly.

“Sorry, I’ve been MIA.”

“It’s fine. Listen, why don’t we try to schedule something for the holidays like we always say we will? This time we’ll do it. I’ll fix up the guest room for you and Andrew—”

I rubbed my eyes, hoping I could push the tears back to where they belonged. There was so much to catch her up on.

“No, Helen. It’s a long story, but I need to come now. Can I stay in the house while you guys are gone?”

“Right.” Of course. She’d just told me that. “What about jobs? Do you know of anyone hiring? I could update my resume...I think I have it saved on my old university email somewhere.”

At that point Helen began to crack up, then she repeated my request to Brent, and together, their chorus of laughter pounded on my heart like it was a punching bag.

Oh ha-ha-ha, your life is falling apart before your very eyes. Stop, stop—you're killing me!

“Is this a prank? If so, it’s a very expensive, overseas-phone-call prank. Did Andrew put you up to this?”

“Last call for passengers for flight 365, service to San Antonio. Final boarding at gate 12.”

She must have heard the announcement, because her next words were delivered in a much more serious tone. “Oh my god, you’re really at the airport, aren’t you?”

I was flying down the terminal, knocking down any and all children and elderly people in my path, trying to get to my gate before they closed the doors without me. They even said my name over the loudspeaker. I always wondered what kind of dummy has to have their name announced like that. Me. I’m the dummy.

“Yes. Helen, I’m coming to Texas and I need your help.” I was out of breath from running as I pleaded with her. “Please. I can’t explain, but I just need to cash in whatever love you might have for me.”

She sighed, exasperated. She was always exasperated with me about one thing or another, which was one of the reasons I hadn’t bothered visiting in the past.

“Fine. Call me when you land.”

Turns out I didn’t need to call her. She apparently guessed the gist of my situation while I was sitting in a metal tube 30,000 feet in the air and came to her own conclusions. By the time I landed, I had a dozen text messages from her, each one berating me for my impulsiveness and apparent irrationality.

Helen: Is this all a game, or are you actually leaving Andrew? I’m not going to start calling in favors for you if you’re just going to quit and fly back to California in a week.

Seems cold, right? Well, here’s the thing: Helen and I don’t exactly see eye to eye. We never have. We’re ten years apart in age, and our father left her mother for mine. In her eyes, I had the glorious, perfect childhood that was taken from her...and okay, sure, those first few years were pretty good. I got to go on family vacations and every year I had one big Christmas instead of two small ones, but then just like he'd done before, our dad got bored and moved on to the next woman. We should have bonded over our soap opera-worthy father figure, but she graduated and moved out the second she had the chance. Ever since, we've both basically been pretending the other sister doesn't exist.

When I made it outside the airport in Texas, I tried to call her. I dialed...scooted forward in the taxi line...dialed again. I wanted to explain the situation as quickly as possible, and I couldn't do that over text. It was a lot to explain, and well, my fingers were still shaking from what I'd done. Also, the sordid truth is best explained sans emojis.

When she didn't answer, I was forced to text her and keep it brief.

Meredith: I left Andrew for good. I need a job and a place to stay. If you can help, that would be wonderful. If you can't, that would be less wonderful.

Helen: Fine. I'll ask Jack if he needs a temp. I'll send you instructions for how to get to Blue Stone Ranch.

Meredith: You are wonderful.

Helen: Don't make me regret this.

So anyway, that's why I'm here, spending what little money I have on a road trip across Central Texas.

Blue Stone Ranch is where my sister has worked for the last six years. I can't begin to imagine what she does as the executive assistant to the owner. Shine his spurs? Shear his sheep? Bale his hay? It's all a little out of my realm, but I'll do it all and more—gladly.

My stomach growls again so loudly that I know the cashier manning the gas station counter can hear it. Thankfully, she seems too distracted with problems of her own.

I peek out the front window just as the taxi driver finishes up at the pump. No one knows the truth about my life except him. He's heard it all. In the few hours since he picked me up from the airport, he's acted as my chauffeur and silent therapist.

Even better, there's no way he'll be repeating any of the details I dumped on him because I'm pretty sure he's had headphones in the entire time. All morning, he's responded with resigned grunts and sighs—the universal language of annoyance. I'm pretty sure he's tempted to get back into the taxi and leave me to fend for myself in the Texas badlands.

I need to get a move on.

Driven by a primal urge, I yank the can of peanuts off the shelf and carry them to the counter.

This feeling in the pit of my stomach is new, and I'm pretty sure it's not hunger-related. This is like nothing I've ever done before. I've never stood on my own two feet—I've never had to. I married Andrew right out of college. He was seven years older, already well on his way up the ladder at a big production company. I moved out of my college apartment straight into his multimillion-dollar house in Beverly Hills.

It's funny how much I used to fear what is now happening to me. I assumed it was a fate worse than death to end up alone, poor, and directionless. If Andrew taught me anything, it's that I was wrong.

I plunk the nuts on the checkout counter and the attendant meets my eye. She offers a weak smile, and I can see the strain of life etched in the crow's feet around her eyes.

“How are you this morning?” I ask with a small, empathetic smile.

For a second, her mouth starts to form a generic answer, but she must see something she recognizes in my expression because she laughs quietly and shakes her head.

“Honestly? I've been better.”

I nod. “Same here.”

“Just this?”

She's pointing to the can of peanuts. I look down and the light catches brightly on my diamond wedding ring. It's my last tie to the life I'm trying to leave behind, the last vestige of a man who for five years covered me with shiny things while trying his damnedest to dull my own sparkle. I could sell it and use the money as a cushion—Lord knows I need it—but I won't. I don't want any more of his money. Besides, soon, I'll have my own. I basically just got hired at Blue Stone Ranch. I can see it now: me in full denim overalls, bandana tied around my neck, wheat stalk between my teeth. I will be the best employee that ranch has ever seen, just as soon as I get there.

Without a shadow of hesitation, I slide the heavy jewel off my finger and drop it on the chipped linoleum counter with a clack.

“Get a good price for that,” I say, shaking the can of nuts. “I know I did.”

Jack

There are pigs everywhere: in the garden, the barn, down the gravel drive. I even found one in the house, a chunky little piglet rooting around in my kitchen, canvassing for crumbs. I snatched him up and walked out onto my porch to find half my ranch hands running low to the ground with arms outstretched, trying to catch as many pigs as they could before I noticed.

Pigs are squealing, ranch hands are tripping and cursing to high heaven, and the head gardener is over near the parsnips looking like an outmatched bouncer at a 21-and-up bar. It looks like a ridiculous rodeo sport that should involve elementary school-aged children, not grown-ass men.

“Max!” I shout, catching the attention of one of the younger guys as he runs in front of my porch. He stops pursuing a pig, whips off his baseball cap, and wipes sweat from his brow. “Weren’t you on hog duty today?”

His eyes go wide in fear. “I swear to God I closed the gate after the morning feed!”

“Might wanna take back that oath because it sure doesn’t look like you did.”

He frowns and looks away, swallowing slowly. His voice cracks with fear as he answers, “Damn sure I did, but I s’pose —”

I step forward and drop the piglet in his hands. “You have ten minutes to fix this. If these pigs aren’t put up by then, I’m docking your pay.”

“Yes sir.” He tips his head in a nod and then he’s off again, running full speed with the piglet in hand.

On another day, I’d find this scene amusing. Today, I’ve reached my wit’s end. It’s Monday and I’ve nearly lost my mind. My executive assistant, Helen, is gallivanting halfway across the world. My housekeeper quit last week to move closer to her daughter, and now my ranch hands are recreating Three Stooges skits on the clock. I have too much on my plate and I feel overwhelmed. I don't like it. I've run Blue Stone Ranch for a decade and I hate to think I've gone soft in the last few years and relied too much on Helen. She warned me I wouldn't be able to function with her in Paris, and now I regret giving her time off. Is it too much to ask that she work every damn day from now until she croaks? What's so great about France anyway? That place made Van Gogh so depressed he cut his own ear off.

I stomp up to my office on the second floor and slam the door. My grandmother is downstairs, standing at the living room window, thoroughly enjoying the pig debacle taking place outside. The old bird takes too much pleasure in my problems.

I take a seat at my desk and heave a deep breath. My ball cap gets tossed onto the desk and I drag a hand through my hair, no doubt making it stand every which way. I need a haircut. Normally, Helen would've scheduled something. I sigh and put the cap on backward, saving that problem for another day.

There are 32 emails waiting for my reply. I don't answer a single one of them. Instead, I turn my attention to the blinking red light on my work phone. I have no doubt I have enough voicemails to occupy my entire morning. Once again, I curse Helen for leaving me to fend for myself.

Blue Stone Ranch used to be a 1000-acre cattle ranch. In the late 1960s, during a bad drought, my grandfather sold off most of the cattle and started a restaurant, Blue Stone Farm. With its farm-to-table fare and world-class barbecue, it was an overnight success. My father expanded that endeavor with a winery, and since then, the company has grown tenfold. Now, families travel from all across the south to experience everything Blue Stone Ranch has to offer. We have a small luxury bed & breakfast, a vineyard, a restaurant, and a wedding venue. Some might call it being diversified; others might say it's a good way to get stretched too thin.

It's been ten years since I took the helm, and even with managers running each arm of the business, I still feel like I'm in over my head most days.

I start scrolling through voicemails, listening to a few seconds of each before I skip to the next one. When I get to one Helen left late last night, I try not to get my hopes up. Please say France sucks and you're coming back to work.

"Hey Jack, call me when you get this. It's urgent."

I call her back immediately and she answers after the second ring.

"Missed me too much? Understandable. So when's your flight home?" I ask in lieu of a greeting.

She sighs, annoyed. "Stop that. I'm not coming home."

"Aren't you sick of traveling yet?"

"We've only been here a week."

"Paris can't be that entertaining."

"Brent and I are really enjoying it."

"Seen the Mona Lisa yet? Starry Night? Stuff's all on Google, hi-res and everything."

"Jack—"

"Right, well, did you hear that Mary left two days after you did? Yeah, moved back to Houston to be closer to her daughter. I've lost my assistant and my housekeeper in one fell swoop, so I don't really have time to chat about how much you're enjoying your vacation. I have enough on my plate as is."

"Well, that's why I'm calling—I have a solution for that. I found you a temp."

"I told you I don't need one."

"And I think you do." She trudges on before I can argue. "My sister will be there later today and she's going to fill in for me while I'm gone."

"Sister? I didn't know you had a sister."

I lean back in my chair, suddenly interested. I imagine Helen 2.0: an older, no-nonsense brunette with a tight bun. Picture your favorite elementary school teacher, the hard-ass who managed to wrangle a group of disobedient nine-year-olds and teach them long division—that's Helen.

“Yeah, well, I don't talk to her much, which is probably why you didn't know she existed. She's ten years younger and we didn't grow up together. In fact, I hardly know her. Still, she says she needs a job, and it's perfect timing since you sound like you're pulling your hair out without me running the show.”

I can hardly believe my luck. I didn't think I'd survive three months without Helen, and here she is, fixing my problems from across the pond.

“Perfect. Send her my way. If she's anything like you, she'll save my ass.”

Helen laughs. “Bad news: she and I couldn't be more different if we tried.”

“Well if she has even half your work ethic, she'll still be a pretty damn good employee.”

There's a pregnant silence that gives birth to a 10lb-4oz baby silence. Helen should be singing her sister's praises, but she isn't, and I'm suspicious.

“Helen, what aren't you telling me?”

“I don't want to taint your image of her before she even arrives.”

“If you want me to hire her, you'd better start talking.”

“Well...I guess I just don't want you to expect her to be like me. Meredith is...” She sighs. “Meredith is one of those lucky people who life comes a little easier for. She was spoiled rotten growing up. We have different moms, and she looks just like hers: petite, beautiful, you know the type. Our father and—hell, half the world always gave her more attention.”

“Is this leading somewhere?”

I can practically hear her roll her eyes.

“Anyway, she moved to California for college, married some rich movie producer right after graduation who dotes on her nonstop. All I’m saying is she’s used to a certain kind of life. Don’t expect too much...grit.”

“Now I’m confused. Why the hell does she need a job working for me?”

“Apparently she’s up and left her husband.”

“The doting, rich movie producer? Makes sense.”

“Exactly. There’s no way she would have left him willingly. If you ask me, I bet Meredith got herself into some kind of trouble. Maybe she has a spending problem or a boxed wine habit and he threatened to cut her off. Rich people always find some way to fill up their time with vices. I wouldn’t be surprised. Like I said, she was spoiled when we were younger. This is what happens when you’ve never wanted for anything.”

As she drones on, I swear another ten emails pile up in my inbox. I have too much to do to be sitting on the phone listening to a story about some woman I have no plan to employ.

I sit up and sandwich the phone between my shoulder and ear so I can start replying to the first email. “Well, you’ve given quite the glowing recommendation for this suspected overspending alcoholic. Good thing she’s someone else’s problem.”

“Jack, I already promised her I’d get her a position with you.”

“Why the hell would you do that?”

“She’s family. If I were there, I’d help her.”

“Let’s compromise: you get on a flight home, and I’ll consider it. Deal?”

“Jack.”

She sounds exasperated, but then so am I.

“I gotta go. My assistant left me high and dry and I have emails to answer.”

“She’s my sister.”

“And?”

“And I’m calling in a favor. I’ve worked for you for six years and have never once called in a favor.”

“You’re telling me you’re going to waste that on some spoiled brat who’s bound to go crawling back to California when she gets her first splinter?”

“Isn’t that what you want? The sooner she leaves, the sooner you get your peace and quiet back.”

She makes a good point.

“You owe me.”

“I’ll log in to your email remotely and answer those emails you have stacked up. How’s that?”

“Let’s see if the princess shows up first. Something tells me she’ll take one look at the place and suddenly decide her valley girl life doesn’t look quite so bad anymore.”

Meredith

“I can’t go on,” the taxi driver says, pulling over to the side of the road and putting his car in park.

“Boy, do I know what you mean,” I agree ruefully.

“No, I mean, you gotta get out.”

“Oh, actually, I don’t think we’re there yet. We still have a while.”

I lean forward and point through the front windshield as if to prove my point. There’s nothing but trees and dirt road until the sky meets the horizon.

“Lady, this is it. Odometer says I’m officially losing money on you. I run a business, not a church shuttle.”

I officially regret my bold, symbolic gesture with the diamond ring.

“How about you give me your address and I’ll send more money after my first paycheck—”

“Yeah right, I’ve heard that one about a million times.”

I’m going to have to get creative.

“If only there was something I could do for you...” I say, making my eyebrows dance suggestively. “Non-sexually, of course. I could clip those hard-to-reach toenails, or—or, how about plucking back some of that unibrow you’ve got going on —”

“GET OUT,” he insists, and I know it’s hopeless.

The crabby old man kicks me to the curb—or rather, the edge of the dirt road. His tires stir up dust and he turns back for the main road. A sign back there claimed Blue Stone Ranch was only a few miles in this direction. A few miles...shit.

For the first time all morning, I'm grateful I don't have much with me, just my purse. Inside, hilariously, I have what used to be my life's essentials: a dead cell phone, a makeup bag for touchups, a bottle of perfume, my wallet, breath mints, a tub of La Mer moisturizer, and the wrapper of a protein bar I failed to ration properly.

No tennis shoes. No GPS tracking system. Hell, a compass would be much appreciated at this point.

As it is, I'm on my own, for real this time. I even left the last of my precious peanuts in the seat pocket of the taxi.

It's fine. I'll be fine. Everything is fine.

I hoist my purse higher on my shoulder and set off down the road. The soles of my loafers have such little padding that I feel every pebble. I'd walk in the grass beside the road, but it's thick and overgrown, and I fear snakes more than I fear pebbles digging into the soles of my feet. I have nothing but time as I trudge along in the dirt. I try to convince myself I only have a little bit longer, but truthfully, I have no way to gauge how far I've gone. I left the fancy watch that tracks my steps back in California.

I distract myself by trying to see the positive details of my current situation: I am alive and well, I've taken back control of my life, and I am on my way to building something new. I am at the start of a grand adventure. Sure, there will be bumps along the way, but anything is better than the direction I was headed with Andrew.

I think I hear the rumble of a car behind me. I whip around, half convinced I'm hallucinating from dehydration (should've opted for low sodium peanuts), and spot an old truck rumbling down the road. It's coming straight for me, and two things run through my mind at once. First: Hallelujah! My salvation has arrived! Second: In what part of Texas did that chainsaw massacre take place?

Honestly, I'm just happy to see another human being, even if he turns out to be a cannibal with power tools. The truck barrels closer and it's too late to escape detection, so I settle for a cheerful wave and one of my big, enchanting smiles. The gesture should say, Hi there! Look at me, I'm too pleasant to murder!

The truck pulls to a stop beside me and two older, tanned men with beat-up cowboy hats take up the entire bench seat. The one closer to me rolls down the window and props his elbow on the sill. I scan the front seat for killing implements but instead spot a tub of chewing tobacco and two matching Big Gulps.

“Lost, darlin’?”

DARLIN! I swoon and forget I’m supposed to be fearing for my life.

“As a matter of fact, I am.” I smile and explain confidently, “I’m looking for Blue Stone Ranch.”

The man near me frowns and tips his head, confused. “You mean Blue Stone Farm?”

I’m pretty sure Helen said Blue Stone Ranch in her email.

“Umm, now I’m not sure. Is there a difference?”

“Blue Stone Farm is the fancy restaurant a few miles that way.” He points back in the direction I’ve been walking and my heart sinks. No. NO. I am not turning back. “Blue Stone Ranch is...well, a ranch.”

“Where would I find Jack McNight?”

He nods. “Jack’ll be at the ranch.”

“Okay then that’s where I’m going.”

They exchange a glance, and then the one closer to me nods toward the bed of the truck. “We’re going that way too. It ain’t the smoothest ride, but you’re welcome to hop in there if ya want.”

The driver thumps his friend on the head. “Karl, don’t be an idiot—you get in the back and let the nice lady sit up here. Didn’t your mama teach you jack shit?”

I leap into action before Karl can move. “No! No. It’s all right. I insist on riding in the back. It’ll remind me of hayrides when I was a kid. I’m very nostalgic.”

My survival instincts have kicked in again: at least if I'm sitting back there, I can toss myself out of the truck if I get the feeling they've decided to kidnap me.

It takes me a few tries before I'm able to hoist myself into the bed of the truck using one of the back tires. I am a picture of grace and elegance as I take a seat near the tailgate, situate my purse on my lap, and then smack the bed twice to signal that I'm ready. The truck shifts into drive and away we go.

I spend the next ten minutes in hell as we trudge along the neglected country road. It's a bumpy ride, to say the least. I spit dirt out of my mouth and squeeze my eyes closed to keep dust out of them. Pebbles ping off the tires and somehow fling themselves at my head. I'm getting assaulted on all fronts, and that doesn't even include what the wind is doing to my hair. It takes me too long to realize it's much more pleasant to sit with my back against the cab of the truck rather than the tailgate. As we pull up to a tall, arched wrought iron gate that boldly announces that we've arrived at Blue Stone Ranch, I am convinced I look as if I've just stepped off the front line of a war. I think I even have some blood on my forehead from a particularly beefy bug.

My current physical condition aside, I'm shocked by the sight before me. I've never set foot on a ranch before, but I had concocted a pretty dismal picture in my head, preparing for the worst so I wouldn't be disappointed. Instead, it seems I've stumbled upon what can only be described as an adorable movie set. The main road we're on dead-ends into a circular gravel drive, smack-dab in the center of it all. On one side of the circle, there's a two-story white farmhouse with a metal roof and an inviting porch swing swaying in the wind. There are potted plants and flowers soaking up the sun on the rim of the porch. Beyond that, cows amble in a pasture beneath the shade of massive oak trees. I scan past a large chicken coop and a field with a few glistening horses, and beside that, a massive red barn divides the animals from the largest garden I've ever seen.

There are people at work everywhere—scratch that, not people, men. There isn't a single female in sight, which is probably why I garner quite a few sideways stares as I ride up in the back of the truck like I'm the grand marshal of the saddest one-car parade in history.

The truck pulls up and parks beside the other ranch vehicles. I hop down from the bed and try my best to restore my battered appearance, dabbing tentatively at the blood on my forehead, patting my hair down, and then heaving a sigh of defeat. At this point, it is what it is, and it's gonna be what it's gonna be.

"He'll probably be up in the house," Karl says, pointing in the direction of the farmhouse I was just admiring. "Jack."

I tip my head in thanks and offer a limp wave before I set off to meet my new boss. All eyes are on me as I walk the few yards between the truck and the front porch. I stick out like a sore thumb in this setting, but instead of giving in to the sudden flood of nerves, I try to recall any details Helen might have mentioned about her job over the years.

Let's see, I know she's an executive assistant, and in that role she...assists. Damn. I know nothing. Has she ever said anything about her boss? I can't remember. I mean, she must enjoy her job if she's been here for almost six years...or maybe she's stayed so long because it's her only option? It's probably hard to find work in such a rural area—and I mean RURAL. The journey from San Antonio to Cedar Creek felt like I was going through some kind of time warp. With each passing mile, the countryside became less and less populated, the roads transitioned from concrete to asphalt to dirt, and I'm not sure they even get cell service out here. That's what I'm thinking about when I knock on the front door of the farmhouse and it's whipped open a second later.

A tall, thin woman stands on the threshold wearing jeans and a pearl snap shirt. Her white-gray hair is cropped short in a pixie style and her steel eyes seem to cut right through me. She's not wearing a stitch of makeup. Still, she's beautiful, regal almost, with a few wrinkles rimming the corners of her eyes.

I open my mouth to introduce myself, but she beats me to the punch.

“Whatever you’re sellin’, we either don’t want it or already got it.”

Then she steps back and slams the door in my face.

I’m so shocked that it takes me a minute to gather my wits before I knock again. This time I hear her sigh on the other side of the door before she pulls it open.

“Oh, and we’ve all heard the story and found the Lord, and we don’t need any more, thank you.”

Another slam.

I don’t knock again because I can see the woman watching to see if I’ll leave.

“Don’t you people ever listen? Do I need to go get my shotgun or are you gonna leave this porch without me having to chase you off it?”

My eyes are wide as saucers. Is she really going to shoot me if I don’t get off her porch? What kind of place is Texas?

I put my hands up like she’s a police officer and I’m under arrest, then I proceed with caution.

“I’m not selling anything. Please don’t shoot me.”

The door swings open again. She frowns and gives me a once-over before meeting my gaze again.

“What do you want then?”

“A job.”

She finds that pretty hilarious, laughing so hard she has to reach out for the doorframe to steady herself. She slaps her knee with the other hand, looks up at me, and then folds back over in laughter.

“You came all the way out here lookin’ for a job? Oh man, that’s funny,” she says, drying her eyes. “Okay, what’ll it be, missy? Carpenter? Welder?”

“I—”

“Who put you up to this? Dotty? That old trickster. I’m gonna get her back so good, she won’t even see it coming—”

“I don’t know who Dotty is. I’m Helen’s sister, Meredith. She was supposed to call ahead and mention that I was on my way?”

With that announcement, her laughter finally dies. She inspects me with new eyes.

“You don’t look like Helen.”

“We have different moms.”

Her eyes thin in speculation. “Hmm. Well your daddy must’ve had broad tastes.”

I smile, unsure whether or not to take that as a joke.

“Right, well, if it’s a job you need, you’ll have to go talk to Jack. He’s over by the barn doin’ an all-hands.”

“An all-hands?” I ask, turning to see where she’s pointing.

There’s a group of men circled up outside the barn, their attention fixed on a tall figure who seems to be giving orders. From this distance, I can’t make out his features.

“Ah, got it.” I turn back to her. “Maybe I can wait until he’s finished.”

I have nowhere to be.

She shakes her head. “Normally, I’d agree, but he’s got a lot on his plate today what with your sister gone. I doubt you’ll be able to catch him again.”

Perfect. Just great. I was hoping my day would continue down this path. Why would I get to meet with Jack one on one and plead my case when instead, I can slowly limp toward the all-hands meeting, grinding my teeth together as my blisters start to get blisters?

In another life, my knees give out and I face-plant in the dirt, too damn weak and tired to get up. No one helps me. I perish. My Gucci loafers decompose.

But, in this life, I hobble closer to the group and one by one, every head in the circle turns in my direction. Jack’s booming voice carries over the crowd.

I have no clue what he's talking about, but I like the sound of his voice. It's rough, almost gritty, and strong enough to command the attention of a dozen ranch hands—well, right up until now, when all eyes are on me.

“Looks like we have company,” someone says, and I finally work up the courage to peel my gaze from the ground. It's like I just walked onto the stage of a cowboy-themed Chippendales show. I'm surrounded by a dozen young, strong guys wearing jeans and sweating through their work shirts. I scan from one cute face to another, taking in the amused grins until I finally make it to their fearless leader and stop short.

My gut clenches as if my ovaries both lean in toward my uterus to say, Hello! We're here and we like what we see! My heart stops and then speeds up, confused about how to proceed. My eyes scan up and down him four times before I finally regain enough sense to break the cycle.

Don't get me wrong, this reaction is not about me being love-struck. Seeing as how I just left a pretty bad relationship, oh, I don't know...14 hours ago, I'm immune to the chiseled jaw thing he has going on. Really, I'm just surprised. Just like with the ranch, Jack is nothing like what I was expecting. He's young—mid-thirties, maybe—with a tall frame and wide shoulders. You know that calm confident look every NFL quarterback carries around, that gleam in their eyes that challenges you to try to screw with them? He's got it. On top of that, he has a wide-set jaw, strong cheekbones, and dark brows.

He's wearing a baseball cap backward, and the ends of his dark brown hair wing out from beneath it. These are all things I don't want to notice, I just do. The fact that his black t-shirt stretches across his chest when he props his hands on his hips is a fact, not an opinion, and his steely gaze leveled on me? Yeah, that's also kind of hard to ignore, especially now that everything has gone silent.

What a strange turn of events to find out that my future boss is a very attractive man. Good for him. I don't care. I'm too focused on the fact that his chiseled features are locked in an annoyed scowl. Everyone else seemed amused by my interruption of the all-hands meeting, but not him. It's probably hard enough keeping control of these guys in normal circumstances, and I've just waltzed in and stolen their attention.

"Can I help you?" he asks with a hard tone. What he really means to say is, Go away, just like my taxi therapist and the old woman from the house.

I straighten my shoulders and dredge up every ounce of confidence I have left in me. It's not much, and my voice barely carries over the group.

"What was that?" he asks, impatient.

"Speak up!" someone shouts.

I clear my throat and try again. "I'm here for a job."

There's another round of laughter. These people seriously need a comedy club, or at least a few Adam Sandler movies on DVD. They find the most mundane things hilarious.

"Hey Jack, she could be your first manicured ranch hand."

The guys really crack up at that.

Jack, to his credit, doesn't laugh.

He shakes his head and steps forward. "You must be the princess."

"What?"

"I heard your story. I was hoping you wouldn't show."

My mouth drops open, but before I can come up with a fiery reply, he wraps his hand around my bicep and drags me away from the group. There are catcalls and profane comments behind us. I scowl at the guys over my shoulder, but it only fuels the fire.

"What about the all-hands, Jack? Watch where you put yours!"

"She can help me out in the fields! I'll train her quick!"

“This must be that fine southern hospitality you always hear about,” I hiss, trying to yank my arm out of his hold.

His sharp eyes cut to me as he continues leading me toward the house. “You’ll have to forgive our poor country folk manners,” he replies in an affected drawl filled with sarcasm. “We aren’t used to entertaining royalty.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

He whips open the screen door and pushes me inside the house.

Without a doubt, it’s the worst introduction I’ve ever had.

Jack

“You’re a little rough around the edges, aren’t you?” she says, no hint of amusement laced in her words.

I look up from my desk to see her studying me with an angry scowl. I’ve really pissed her off. Good. The sooner she starts to hate it here, the sooner she’ll leave.

I gesture to the chair in front of my desk.

“Have a seat.”

“I’d rather stand.”

“Suit yourself.”

She locks her arms across her chest, and we participate in what feels like the world’s longest staring contest. Smoke plumes from her ears. If she had a six-shooter, it’d be aimed at my heart.

I tip my head, studying her. “You’re really Helen’s sister?”

“We have the same eyes.”

No kidding—they’re light blue, rarest color I’ve ever seen—but the similarities start and stop there. I’ve never thought of Helen as attractive. She’s squared away safely in my mind as my matronly executive assistant; she doesn’t exist to attract or un-attract me. She’s my employee, and a damn good one at that. Meredith, though...she’s different.

“Helen said you need a job.”

Meredith nods. “Correct. I can start today.”

I chuckle at that. “Seems like you and I haven’t gotten off to a great start, and sometimes your gut knows something before the brain catches up. Maybe you oughta look for employment elsewhere.”

With that, something in her expression breaks. She's still fuming, but her shoulders sag. Her attention darts past my shoulders, out the window. Her lip quivers. I'm not very good at reading women, but I'm damn near sure she's about to cry. I thought I'd be happier getting to this point.

"You ever work on a ranch before?"

"I think you can probably guess the answer to that," she snaps, blue eyes slicing back to me.

I resist the urge to smile at her fire. "You can put the claws away. We're just talking."

She sighs and steps forward, finally sagging down into the seat I offered her. Her purse drops to the floor at her feet as she relaxes back against the cushion, and I take advantage of the opportunity to study her. Her hair is the color of dark coffee, almost black, probably fake. Her nails are trimmed and manicured. Her features—though currently smudged with dirt and what looks to be a few drops of blood—are feminine and beautiful. I have no doubt she was a heartbreaker back in California. Her husband is probably missing her right about now.

Once she's situated, she looks back up at me, waiting.

"So, no ranch experience. Have you ever had a job?"

She swallows and tips her chin up. It's clear that what she lacks in experience, she makes up for in confidence. I doubt she's ever let anyone walk over her.

"I've volunteered at a hospital for the last few years."

"I'm talking about a real job, with a paycheck and a boss—accountability."

Her lips purse and shakes her head. "My parents always wanted me to focus on school."

Parents?

"How old are you?"

"28." She guesses where my questions are leading. "After college...well, certain circumstances meant I didn't work, but I assure you I will be a very good employee. I'm timely and dedicated."

"Can you use QuickBooks?"

"I'm a quick learner!" she jokes. "Heh."

"What about Outlook?"

"I always maintain a positive outlook."

Jesus Christ.

"Your sister tells me you're married to some millionaire. Why do you even need a job?"

My eyes narrow as I study her, looking for motive in that pretty face. I catch the subtle shift in the air at the mention of her husband.

"I was married," she bites out with a locked jaw. "We're separated."

"As of?"

"Last night," she announces confidently.

I finally lose the battle with myself and laugh. It's all so ridiculous. I whip the hat off my head, smooth my hand over my hair, and then drop it back into place. She tracks my movements with careful attention.

"Don't they make you wait 24 hours to report a missing person? Seems like you should give it 48 for ending a marriage. You might change your mind."

"I won't."

"Excuse my French, but I don't have time for this shit."

Even now, problems are piling up outside the door of this office.

Anyone else would stand up and leave. I've been known to bring grown ass men to their knees, but she doesn't seem to care. In fact, she leans forward, props her hands on my desk, and locks her gaze with mine.

"I need this job."

“I disagree.” My niceness is gone. My patience is all used up. “Look, you’ve made your dramatic gesture, now I think you should run back home to California. No doubt you’ve taught your husband a lesson. I’m sure he’ll buy you whatever pretty thing he’s been holding out on.” I stand and start dialing my ranch manager’s number so I can return the call he left earlier.

She reaches forward, picks up the phone from its holder, and slams it back down.

Damn. She’s spoiled and crazy.

“I know Helen’s gone, and you need somebody. Give me the job.”

“You’ve never worked a day in your life. By the time I train you, Helen will be back.”

“We’re not talking rocket science—how hard could it be? I’ll stay out of your way.”

I level a steady gaze down her small frame. “Somehow, I doubt that.”

“I’m not leaving this office until you give me a job—any job.”

Just then, a light bulb flips on that illuminates the way out of this mess. It takes all my energy to keep my face neutral. She can’t know it’s a trap or she’ll see right through my intentions. Meredith wants a job, I want her to get the hell off my property, and it seems we can kill two birds with one stone.

“Any job? That works for me. I need a housekeeper. Mine quit last week.”

She arches a delicate brow. “Couldn’t stand her boss?”

I grind my teeth. Isn’t she supposed to be groveling? Ingratiating herself as best she can? Instead, it feels like she’s calling the shots in my damn office. “She moved to be closer to her daughter. That’s the only job I have for you. Take it or leave it.”

She stands up, dragging her hands from my desk. “So I’d be your maid?”

“You’d also cook meals, do laundry, wash the dog—that sort of thing. Toilets need cleaning at least once a day—you saw the guys that’ll be using ’em, and tonight is chili night.”

I’m laying it on thick at this point. No way she’s staying.

She glances away for a moment. “I don’t—that is, I’ve never...”

I return my attention to my desk, writing her off. I’ve never had to fight a grin so hard in my life. I figured it wouldn’t be hard to scare her away, but this was a little too easy. One mention of scrubbing toilets and her knees are quaking. She’s a second from bolting. Once she’s gone, I’ll finally have a minute to catch up on work. I’ll give my manager a call and shoot off an email to Helen, demanding she return early in exchange for putting me through the trouble of dealing with this brat.

It occurs to me that Meredith hasn’t moved. Oh, right. She’s stranded out here.

“Or”—I glance up at her from beneath my brows, speaking offhandedly—“I’ll get one of the hands to give you a ride back into town.”

She’s looking at me like I’ve grown a second head. “What are you talking about? I’m not leaving. I’m taking the job—on one condition.”

Oh good grief.

Apparently, her rich husband really has cut her off because Meredith requests room and board. No doubt she was planning on staying with her sister, but Helen’s house is currently under construction. Her only option is to stay here, but I’ll be damned if I have her in the house with me. She’s been here fifteen minutes and I already have a raging tension headache.

Adjacent to my house, there's a small shack tucked in the tree line of the property. Yes, I used the right word—it's a shack. I've lent it out to ranch hands in the past, resourceful guys who don't mind spending a month or two on a crappy twin bed so they can save up for rent. The slats in the floorboards have some gaps and there are a few cobwebs dangling in the corners, but it has a makeshift shower and a sink, more than Meredith probably deserves.

Just like with everything else, I expect her to take one look at the place and run screaming right back to California, but she steps into the small space and turns in a slow circle. I watch her carefully, waiting for a lone tear to roll down her porcelain cheek. I don't like watching women cry, but something tells she's very much in need of a dose of humility.

“Does that shower work?” she asks, pointing to the corner.

I smirk. “Only the finest 68-degree Texas well water.”

“And I'm assuming there's no A/C?”

Even though it's shaded by trees, it feels like a hundred degrees in here.

“There's a breeze at night if you open the windows.”

She nods and takes her lower lip between her teeth. She's thinking, probably contemplating how far she's willing to go to stick it to that husband of hers. Surely if she let him know about these living conditions, he'd give her enough cash to rent a room at the nice hotel down on First Street.

Her pale blue gaze shifts from the dingy bed to the bare floor and then finally, she faces me. The expression I see is one part resilience, one part defiance. It's fuel and flame.

She heaves a sigh and drops her purse at her feet, effectively setting up shop.

“Thank you. I'll take it.”

Meredith

I don't know which problem to address first—I'm drowning in them. Jack left me standing alone in the middle of my new apartment. I'm referring to it as an apartment and not a dilapidated lean-to because I believe in the power of delusion. If I look at this day and this quaint country cottage as an adventure, then it becomes fun and exciting (!) instead of bleak and depressing.

The place is tiny, about the size of my freshman dorm room... except my dorm was outfitted with Pottery Barn decor and a spunky roommate named Janine. This apartment is outfitted with permanently airborne dust and the unmistakable smell of mildew. My only companion is a tiny spider staring down at me from his web. I now know the true meaning of the word inhospitable is a place that might put you in the hospital. There's a rusty rake leaning against one wall, and a merry band of loose nails scattered about on the threadbare floor.

I feel sense and reason trying to creep back into my brain's control room, but I shut them out in favor of blind optimism. Sure, the structure should probably be condemned, but it's nothing I can't spruce up with a little imagination and a lot of elbow grease.

I decide to start small and turn my attention to the twin bed resting against one of the walls. With a nice place to fall asleep tonight, my entire perspective on life might brighten. Look, I tell myself, it already has a blanket and a pillow. Jeez, is this a shack or the Ritz? I sure can't tell!

I pick up the blanket and the pillow twitches. I furrow my brow and cock my head to the side, because my entire life thus far has led me to believe that inanimate pillows should not be capable of independent movement. Feeling as if I'm on the brink of a major scientific breakthrough, I slowly reach out and tug on the corner of the pillowcase until I see what's underneath it.

FUR. BEADY EYES. LONG, HAIRLESS TAILS.

I jump four feet into the air and shriek as a small field mouse followed by the largest rat I've ever seen both scurry out from underneath the pillow and through a jagged crack at the base of the wall.

BE OPTIMISTIC, BE OPTIMISTIC, I chant as my heart rate slowly returns to a survivable level.

I suppose it's sorta beautiful, I think. A mouse and a rat, driven by illicit passion and forbidden romance, risked it all to build a life together in this shack—ahem, apartment. If they can do it, so can I.

I'm smiling in a deranged reverie, thinking sweetly about rodent Romeo and Juliet, when I notice the impressive amount of droppings on the floor.

Just like that, my sunny disposition is doused by despair and an overwhelming desire to give up. Except, there is no giving up. With Helen gone, I have nowhere to go. My mom lives in a retirement community in Boca Raton. No one under the age of 60 is allowed to reside there, ostensibly because limber hips and full-frequency hearing would ignite jealousy amongst the osteoporotic masses. Besides, if I called her, she'd just try to convince me to reconcile with Andrew. Same goes for my dad. They're blinded by his wealth and reputation, and I haven't tried hard to convince them of his darker side. Truthfully, we're not very close, and they have a habit of hearing and believing whatever is most convenient for them.

With my parents and Helen off the table, I'm all out of options. Even more sad, I didn't really have friends back in California. When you slide right into a life of comfort and luxury when most of your college friends are still crushed under the debt of student loans, you quickly find yourself alienated. Sure, I had women I went to lunch with and met for yoga a few times a week, but they were Andrew's friends more than mine, wives of his colleagues, and they—like my parents—firmly believe the sun shines out of his ass.

I'm truly on my own.

Everything in my possession sits in my purse on the floor of this dwelling.

I have nine wrinkled dollars.

I have a new boss who already thinks the worst of me.

I have a job that will put my face near men's toilets every day.

I have a sad little apartment—okay, NO, a sad little shanty shack with mice and spiders and a blanket with an odious yellow stain. At first I was going to overlook it, but it's like trying to overlook the damn sun.

Before I realize it, I'm marching back across the yard, toward the farmhouse. I'm sure Jack is already long gone, off taming wild mustangs or cutting cattle rustlers off at the pass, but I will sit outside his office and wait for him to return. I will demand that he see reason. Surely he's playfully hazing me and doesn't actually expect me to stay in that shack.

I yank open the back door of the house and immediately go on guard, tiptoeing with my shoulders up near my ears. He could be around any corner, sitting in any of the rooms I pass on my way upstairs, but the house is quiet and empty. My stealth is wasted.

On my second journey through, I discover that the farmhouse is extremely nice, new construction. There are hardwood floors, a pleasant pale gray color on the walls, and a lot of family photos and knickknacks. Somehow, it doesn't feel cluttered. It's warm and inviting—or at least it would be if there wasn't a soulless monster lurking somewhere inside.

I hear his voice behind his office door and am grateful I won't have to march all over the property hunting him down.

I shrug, roll out my neck, and prepare myself. Quickly, I run through my argument so I have all my points in order. I'll tell him the shack is an employee health hazard and point out that his house is huge—there have got to be at least six bedrooms. I passed a game room, living room, and breakfast nook, and I will happily sleep on the ground in any one of them. I'm not picky.

I know I have a winning defense, but I still can't work up the courage to knock on his door. My heart is beating so fast, no rhythm, just quick pulses. I've turned into a hummingbird. Is this what desperation feels like? It's wild, like a drug.

I try to remember why I'm here, why I left Andrew in the first place. For the last five years, I was the perfect wife. I studied the news and stayed abreast of current events. I was polite and witty and funny, and when necessary, I was demure and thoughtful. I ate well-portioned meals and worked out every day, lathered myself in night creams and face masks and consequently have the skin and the ass of an eighteen-year-old, and in the end, it wasn't enough. Nothing was enough.

My mental pep talk works—I'm out for blood. I pound on his office door with the side of my fist then let myself in. Poor Jack. He doesn't know what hit him. If he'd caught me last week, I would have been gentle and meek. I would have used a sweet tone, an "on-the-phone" voice when I spoke with him, just like Andrew preferred. Now, he gets the unfiltered version, the angry, wild hellion I've caged in for too long. I wouldn't be surprised to find streaks of black war paint under my eyes.

"By all means, barge in whenever you please."

His words drip with sarcasm. It's clear he's angry about the interruption as he glares at me from behind his desk. That look and his annoyed tone shift my perspective, and I remember I don't feel bad he's getting the unfiltered version. No, he started this mess by being rude to me: calling me a princess, dragging me away from the all-hands meeting, and then tossing me into that glorified lean-to that gives other respectable shacks a bad name. He thinks I'm a spoiled brat—no doubt the result of Helen's handiwork—and instead of giving me the benefit of the doubt, he's done nothing but doubt my benefits. He's been nothing but brusque and unwelcoming, so no, NO POOR JACK.

He's still wearing that backward baseball hat, and he looks like the cool jock from high school all grown up. I try not to be intimidated. I give him what I can only hope is a serious, no-nonsense glare. My hands go to my hips. My elbows bow out. It's a power pose, it's Wonder Woman, and I'm nailing it.

"I'd like to propose an alternate living arrangement." His brown eyes try to sear through me. Still, I continue. "I passed a bunch of decent rooms on my way up here. There's a bedroom down the hall—"

"None of the rooms in this house are available to you. I'm not running a bed and breakfast."

Obviously. If he were, it would be called Bad Manners Manor, and the one-star Yelp reviews would read, Surly owner scares would-be guests away.

"Don't worry, I'm sure you'll be able to rent a better place after your first paycheck—if you make it that long."

"Fine. When exactly is payday?"

He leans back in his chair and rubs the scruff along his jaw. "Payroll went out last Friday, so you'll get your first paycheck two weeks from now, just like everyone else."

Two weeks? I won't last that long. I have one pair of underwear.

"I could really use an advance."

I say this very calmly, like I've seen in movies, and I think he will respond in turn. He doesn't.

"That's too bad."

"Signing bonus?"

He really laughs at that, cracks up like I'm the stupidest person he's ever encountered. His laughter makes me feel a little sick, and my hands form little fists by my sides. If we were closer, I think I'd swing and try to give him a black eye, just to see how it'd feel. He's at least twice my size, but I'm scrappy. He'd never see it coming.

"Why do you need the money? A new purse?"

The accusation wraps around my heart like talons and it pops like a balloon, deflating any courage I had left. God, he thinks so little of me. He thinks I'd subject myself to this humiliation for something as frivolous as a new purse?

I should tell him the truth, that I want the money so I can go into town and buy some essentials: a new pillow and a clean blanket. I need a pair of tennis shoes because my loafers have rubbed my feet raw. I have no clothes, nothing to change into. I am utterly destitute, and completely at his mercy. I came to Texas hoping to find some comfort from my sister and instead I found him—the rudest, most inconsiderate man west of the Mississippi.

I open my mouth, prepared to pour everything out, to make him feel terrible for the things he's said to me, but I quickly realize I can't. As soon as I speak, I'll sob. I'm one of those people who inexplicably cries when angry. It's annoying. Any time I want to shout at someone, it comes out as a teary mess. Anger and sadness comingle in my brain, no hope of harnessing one without the other. I won't give him the satisfaction of seeing me cry; therefore, I have no choice.

Without another word, I turn on my heel and walk out of his office, slamming the door behind me. It's a strange thing to do considering we were in the middle of a conversation. I've just given him more reason to think I'm insane, but at least I still have my pride. Do people with a single pair of underwear have pride?

I limp away on my blistered feet, repeating a short mantra over and over in my head: Don't cry, don't cry, don't cry.

Amazingly, my brain listens. I don't shed a single tear as I make my way downstairs, through the kitchen, and into the laundry room that leads to the back door. I'm so laser-focused on making it out that I miss the bags piled up beside the doorframe until I trip over one of them. I've apparently met my quota of embarrassing moments for the day, because the universe saves me from face-planting completely. I catch myself and check over my shoulder to make sure there was no audience for my little stumble—the coast is clear. I turn back for the door, prepared to whip it open and make my escape, but then I look down.

The trash bags aren't filled with garbage—they're filled with clothes, clothes that are undoubtedly waiting to be loaded up and taken to Goodwill for donation. I know this because there's a little sticky note on one of them that says, DONATION! TAKE WHAT YOU WANT!

I have half a mind to fall to my knees and weep. Instead, I turn one ear to the stairs, confirm that Jack hasn't followed me down, and then get to work rooting through the bags. I justify the fact that I'm stealing because the clothes are about to be donated to the less fortunate, and guess what? I'm currently the least fortunate I've ever been. These clothes are mine.

I find a few pair of worn but clean black socks folded into pairs. Maybe a few weeks ago, I would have balked at the idea of wearing a stranger's old socks. Today, right now, they are more valuable than gold. I even slip a pair on right then so they'll act as a buffer between my loafers and my blistered feet. I look like a mall walker headed to Nifty After Fifty.

Once I'm satisfied I have enough socks, I rummage through a collection of folded t-shirts and skim a few off the top. I unfold one to discover it's an XL and will undoubtedly drown me, but it doesn't matter; I'll manage. I dump the shirts on the ground beside me and keep rifling through the contents of the bags right up until a voice speaks behind me and I jump out of my skin.

"As I understand it, the point of having a housekeeper is so they'll clean up messes, not make new ones."

I whip around, surprised to find the older woman from before, the one who answered the door when I first arrived on the ranch. She's standing in the doorway of the laundry room with her arms crossed over her chest.

"You're right. I swear I'll put everything back."

I start shoving clothes in bags, but she shakes her head, holds up a finger, and then disappears back into the kitchen. She's gone for a moment before she reappears with a new black trash bag in hand. She whips it open then bends low beside me, starting to shovel clothes inside.

“Is that enough? You only have a few t-shirts here,” she points out.

“Oh yes, it should be just fine. I can wash them.”

“And you found some of the socks I put in there, that’s good. What size shoe are you?”

I’m dumbfounded by this turn of events, but I have enough sense to reply quickly, “Seven and a half.”

“Right, well, I’m a nine, so they’ll be a little big, but I put a pair of tennis shoes in that bag over there.”

“You didn’t have to do that.”

“I damn well know that, now shove over. You’re sitting on one of the shirts.”

I lean over so she can tug the t-shirt out from under me and then she stuffs it in the bag with all the others.

“Whose clothes are these?”

She scowls at me. “Silence is a virtue. Get virtuous.”

If they’re Jack’s—and I suspect they are—will I toss them aside? No. In fact, he’ll have to chop off my feet if he wants these socks back.

I’m surprised she’s taken the time to collect the clothes for me, and I have enough good sense to accept her charity. Unless...

“Does he know you took this stuff out of his closet?”

Her mouth flattens in a thin line. “They say there’s no such thing as a stupid question, but does that mean you have to try so hard to think of one? It’s damn annoying.”

I can’t tell whether she loves me or hates me, so I play it safe and just keep my lips zipped after that, watching as she continues going through the bags, taking things I wouldn’t have had the courage to grab before. There’s fresh white linen and towels. She gives me everything. My trash bag is bulging.

“I know this isn’t enough. I don’t have any shorts for you—you’re too damn skinny to wear mine—but those jeans you’re wearing should work until we can make it into town.”

“I don’t know what to say.”

I’m surprised by how overwhelmed I feel.

“No. Stop. If you cry right now, I’m taking all this to the burn pile. If there’s one thing I hate, it’s blubbering. Now listen, my grandson is a tough cookie, an arrogant devil through and through. I tried to talk him into letting you stay in the house, but he’s got his mind made up, something about teaching you a lesson. If you ask me, there’s more likely a lesson in there for him, but this is his house and I won’t disrespect him by sneaking you in here.”

“Your grandson?” I ask, cutting in.

“Was that another question?” She pauses her work and glances over to me. From this proximity, there’s no pretense between us. I can see every shade of blue in her hard eyes, every wrinkle etched in her tan skin. I have no doubt she can see the absolute despair reflected back at her. She can probably also smell the peanuts on my breath. “Oh, hell. All right. We haven’t been properly introduced.” Her hand darts out for mine. “Edith McKnight, the devil’s grandma.”

I take her hand and shake it, surprised by how strong her grip is.

“Meredith Wilchester—er, Avery. Meredith Avery,” I say, catching myself and dusting off my maiden name, the one I’ll be reverting back to from this day forward.

“Pleased to meet you, Meredith. I wish it were on better terms, but we’ll make the best of this situation. Now here, take this. It’s too heavy for me or I’d help you.”

She hands me the bag and pushes to her feet. She brushes her hands on the back of her jeans then turns to walk away, just like that, as if she didn’t just turn my entire day around.

“This doesn’t make sense,” I call after her. “Why are you helping me?”

Without bothering to turn around, she rambles off a string of countryisms. “My grandson is a good man, but he often thinks the sun comes up just to hear him crow. He could strut sittin’ down. I mean, I love him, but sometimes it's like hugging a rose bush."

"I'm sorry, what?"

"I'm helpin' you because I know he can't yet, but when you get to be my age, you learn that a wounded bird eventually needs a peaceful nest."

It's like she's speaking a foreign language.

Jack

I've got big plans for today: I'm going to keep my temper simmering near a low boil, I'm going to avoid the princess, I'm not going to let my ranch hands pull any shit like they did yesterday with the pigs, and I will have my inbox empty by the end of the workday. This is the plan—at least, it was. My alarm clock is still due to go off in five minutes, but I'm already up on the edge of my bed in my boxer briefs, listening to Christine talk my ear off. Alfred is snoring at my feet. I think dogs sometimes like to rub it in.

“You promised you'd come to San Antonio later this week.”

I blink sleep out of my eyes and chance a glance at the clock beside my bed: 5:10 AM—too damn early for a fight.

“And I explained that it's just not possible. Helen left last week and—”

“You're kidding me. Jack, do you know the last time you made the effort to come here? To show me you care even the tiniest bit?”

I rest my elbows on my knees, squeeze my eyes closed, and pinch the bridge of my nose. I really could've used those last five minutes of sleep. “I'm sure I could come up with a good example if you hadn't called at the crack of dawn. I haven't even had my coffee.”

That response doesn't go over well.

“You are the most emotionally vacant man I've ever met. We've been together two years—TWO YEARS—and I get the feeling you wouldn't care if I broke up with you right here and now.”

Has it really been that long?

“Chrissy, c'mon—”

“No. Don’t bother.” She pauses, inhales a deep breath. When she speaks again, her voice is softer, sweet. “I’m just...I’m upset. I miss you, that’s all. We hardly see each other.”

“You know I’d be there with you if I could.”

“Would you?”

Just then, my alarm clock starts blaring loudly. BEEP BEEP BEEP. My eyes pop open and I reach over to slam my hand down to turn it off. Alfred hops up and starts wagging his tail, flaunting the energy from his extra sleep.

“Chrissy, I gotta—”

“Yeah, I know, you gotta go. Going’s what you do best.”

Her words are meant to sting, but they don’t.

“Will I see you later this week?” I ask, trying to end the phone call on a good note.

“I don’t know. I’ll think about it.”

We both know she’ll cave and make the drive out here. That’s how our relationship works. For two years, she’s lived in San Antonio and I’ve lived here. We see each other once or twice a month, when it’s convenient. It’s not nearly enough for her, but it’s all the time I have to give at the moment. With Helen gone, I’m not even sure I can swing that.

After we hang up, I get going, speeding through a shower before I tug on a worn pair of Wranglers and reach for one of my favorite Blue Stone Ranch t-shirts, except my hand comes back empty. There aren’t any shirts hanging where they should be—I guess that’s what happens when Mary isn’t here to do my laundry. I settle for a pearl snap button-down then reach for my trusty ball cap. Until I make it into town for a haircut, it’ll have to do.

Downstairs, I let Alfred out the back door. Edith is already by the coffee maker, filling up a mug.

“Hope you made it extra strong today.”

She hands it off to me with a trademark sneer.

I take a big sip then tip the mug toward her in thanks. “It’s perfect.”

“I heard you upstairs on the phone. Little early for Christine to be callin’, isn’t it? Some of us would have appreciated sleeping in a little bit.”

“You haven’t slept past 5:00 in thirty years.”

“Not for lack of tryin’, and I’d still like the option.”

She pours some coffee into a mug for herself and cuts it with cream before proceeding to answer most of my questions with more questions.

“Christine was chewin’ my hide.”

“What’s new?”

“Maybe I should put in more of an effort with her.”

“Do you think she’s worth it?”

“I can’t remember the last time I drove out to see her. Must have been a couple months back.”

“You could ask her to move out here.”

“You think I should?”

“Do you love her?”

“I don’t know. She told me this morning we’ve been together for two years—do people usually love each other after two years?”

“Damn.”

She levels me with a thoughtful gaze. “I could have told you two years ago she wasn’t for you.”

I smirk. “You’re biased. You two never got along well.”

“Yeah? Well, whose fault is that? I get along with everyone.”

I quirk a brow, pointing out the obvious. “Half the town is too scared to love you. The other half is too scared not to love you.”

She chuckles and steps toward the window near the sink. “No, that’s you half the town’s scared of. I’m just standin’ next to you. Oh, look who’s ready for her first day of work.”

I follow her gaze out the window and find Meredith stepping out of the shack. Color me shocked. I didn’t figure her for an early bird, and I feel deprived—I thought I’d get the pleasure of performing a cowbell wake-up call.

She turns toward the horizon and shades her eyes with one hand, taking in the sunrise. I know exactly how beautiful it is from that angle—vivid yellow and orange. The view is made even better by the fact that there are no skyscrapers or high-rises obstructing it. After spending the night in that dreary shack, it’s probably a welcome sight. I’m surprised she stuck around.

I’m still watching her when her gaze snaps to the back yard. Her eyes widen in fear as she lets out a shriek. Her hands go up in defense. She takes a hesitant step back, then another, until her back hits the door.

Shit. Must be coyotes.

I move quickly, yanking the back door open and shouting for Edith to get the shotgun. There are coyotes and mountain lions in this part of the state, and while it’s uncommon for them to stalk too deep onto the property, it’s not unheard of.

“Don’t run!” I shout to Meredith as I step out into the back yard.

Edith isn’t far behind me with the shotgun. She hands it off and I scan the area, trying to spy any animals that don’t belong. When the coast looks clear, I check the tree line, narrowing my eyes and listening for the sound of snapping twigs or shuffling paws.

“Where are they?” I snap.

“Right there!”

I turn to where she's pointing and spot my golden retriever standing a few yards away from her.

"You mean Alfred?"

He trots closer to her and she unleashes a barrage of Hollywood-style karate kicks and chops at the air between them. "No, no—don't come any closer!"

Alfred doesn't listen.

"No!" she demands. "I said NO! Sit!"

Alfred sits.

Edith laughs, yanks the shotgun out of my hold, and tromps back inside, mumbling something under her breath.

"It's just a dog," I point out.

"Feral? Untamed?!"

Alfred hops back up and starts to stroll toward her again, tail wagging. He gets right to her and starts lapping at her legs in between flails.

"Nope—golden, as in retriever."

She squats and her hands cover her face. "Please don't eat me!"

I try to make myself feel bad for how amusing I find this situation. I really ought to do something, but Alfred is the most harmless animal in the world. He's beloved by everyone... except, I guess, Meredith.

"Are you afraid of dogs?"

"No!" she declares emphatically while trying to wiggle away from Alfred's licks.

"You sure seem like you are."

"I'm afraid of strange shapeless forms charging toward me in the dark!" she explains before turning and pointing her finger at Alfred. "And you—can't you take a hint?! I do not consent to this!"

I emit a short, high whistle and Alfred jerks to attention then trots toward me. Meredith coolly drops her hands and presses her hair back into its high ponytail. She's trying to play it off like she didn't just beg for her life, but when our gazes lock, I can tell she's pissed.

"Did you order that attack? Is this more of your hazing?"

I try not to find her amusing. "I think you've spent too much time in that shack. Alfred was just happy to see you."

"Well, he just—I just—wasn't quite ready for that level of intimacy, but I forgive you, Alfred."

I glance down to where Alfred is sitting politely at my feet. He is the picture of docile innocence, unlike the brunette Barbie standing a few yards away from me.

"My life just flashed before my eyes."

"I bet that was a riveting little highlight reel."

At that, her eyes narrow into two slits. It seems I've really pissed her off this time. Her arms cross over her chest. Her chin juts out. Her brows knit together. I should be shaking in my boots, but it feels like I'm staring at an angry kitten.

She takes a few steps closer to me and props her hands on her hips. That's when I finally notice what she's wearing: the same tight jeans as yesterday, but she's traded in the white blouse for a t-shirt. It's tied off in a knot at her midriff and the sleeves are rolled up as best as possible. It's way too big for her, and well, it should be considering it's mine.

"Where the hell did you get that shirt?"

Her eyes go wide and her cheeks flush, but she tries to cover the embarrassed reaction as best as possible.

"Edith gave it to me," she says confidently.

"She had no right to do that."

"It was in a bag of clothes meant for charity."

Well that explains why all my t-shirts were missing this morning.

"Don't you have enough fancy designer clothes to wear?"

"Not while I clean your toilet."

It makes no sense. Her tone isn't any softer than it was yesterday. I wonder if this is how she always acts—proud and pissy, even when she clearly has no right or reason to back it up. She's the one who slept in a spider-infested shack, and yet she's still walking around like she's the Queen of England.

“I want my clothes back.”

She grits her teeth and reaches for the t-shirt as if to pull it over her head right here and now.

“You really want me to take the shirt off my back?”

I'm quiet. Her hands drop and there's a tiny smirk at the corner of her lips. She's pleased with herself for winning this round. Little does she know that if we were alone, I would have let her strip down as far as she wanted to go, but my ranch hands are starting to arrive for work and a few of them are watching our exchange from over by the barn. I'd have to replace the whole staff, because they'd never let me hear the end of it. If I'm just patient, she'll break, and the problem will solve itself. She won't be here for much longer.

Although, I'm less sure of that today than I was yesterday. Helen convinced me to hire Meredith with the assumption that she wouldn't last very long, but here we are, day two, and I'm not getting the impression that Meredith is all that eager to head back to California.

In fact, she's up early and dressed (in my clothes), seemingly ready to get to work. I decide to test the boundaries of her resolve.

“Follow me.”

Meredith

You know those California tourism commercials? The ones where they show celebrities sunbathing or doing yoga or teeing off or parasailing or shopping on Rodeo Drive? That was my life—well, minus the parasailing. I don't have many rules in life, but a nonnegotiable one is to never entrust my safety to a high schooler tying knots in a rope for minimum wage. I know, it's a very specific rule.

Everything else in the commercial, though, was eerily similar. I had a maid, a gardener, and a house manager. I drove a pearl white Range Rover and carried the last name of a man who mattered. I was invited to glamorous parties and exclusive red carpet events. I schmoozed with movie stars (I would never name names, but let's just say Jennifer Janiston actually does have incredible skin in person) and they hung on my every word, assuming if they cozied up to me, Andrew would want to work with them on his next project.

To the world, I had it all.

That's how it works when you build a life from the outside in—it ends up hollow.

Strangely enough, Andrew and I were happy once, riiiiight in the very beginning. We were so happy, in fact, I was blind to the subtle changes taking place between us. When we first met, Andrew was a fledgling associate producer at a production company. He made okay money, worked semi-normal hours, and acted the part of the doting husband. We were that couple with a standing date night every Wednesday. Mexican food this week, babe? How about Italian, babe? He brought me flowers once a week. Yellow roses, my favorite! He was older, handsome, successful. Enough people, including my parents and Helen, told me he was the best thing that had ever happened to me, and I believed them.

The problems began once Andrew started the corporate climb. The more impressive his job title became, the more stress he carried on his shoulders. The execs were tough on him. All day he'd absorb their poison like a sponge, and at night, he'd wring it all out on me.

I still remember the first time he snapped. I'd just returned from a yoga class and was in the kitchen making us dinner when he walked in the door. My sweaty appearance set off something in him.

"You sit around all day and you can't even look presentable when I come home?"

I stood frozen in place, absolutely shocked that he'd have the audacity to say something so hurtful. It wasn't like him to act that way and he apologized right after, said he was out of line, it was the stress talking, but a few weeks later, it happened again. This time it was because I didn't feel up to going out to a Hollywood party with him.

"Thousands of women would give anything to be invited, to be with me. You don't know what you have anymore."

When I called him out for being unreasonable, he went for blood.

"You might be a pretty face, but in this town, there are a million women who look just like you. You're nothing without me—remember that."

After he spewed that venom, he still went to the party. I stayed home and replayed his words until I started believing them. Obviously now, I can see those are the words of a deeply insecure and troubled human being, but over time, I feared he was right. I know that's sick, but Andrew was my husband, my supposed soul mate, the best thing that had ever happened to me. We'd been together for a while, and I trusted him implicitly. If he was upset with me, my first instinct was to figure out what I'd done wrong.

So, I tried to be better. From then on, I always made sure I was dressed and made up when he got home from work. I never turned down an invitation to attend a party with him and while we were together, I made sure to be a sweet, doting wife. In return, our marriage stayed the course. Andrew continued to bring home flowers (Yellow roses, my favorite!) even though I suspected he'd delegated the task of retrieving them to his secretary. We continued going on a date every Wednesday night, but more often than not I shared the time with his phone, which was never on silent.

Andrew kept climbing higher at his company, closer and closer to the American dream. His stress filled the empty space beneath our thinly constructed veneer, until there were too many cracks to control. It became impossible for me to differentiate between normal marital blowups and insidious emotional abuse.

“Jesus, what the fuck is wrong with you!?” he yelled at me one night after he'd lost his erection in the middle of sex. It was an impossible situation to navigate. If I consoled and reassured him, he would lash out defensively. So, I said nothing at all, and he seized the silence like a weapon. “I can get it up just fine—guess you just don't turn me on anymore.”

In case you're wondering, I'm a fucking excellent lover, I'd just reached the point where I couldn't stand his touch, and he must've felt it. Of course, now I can look back and spot the abuse and manipulation like a vandalized copy of an I Spy book. Oh yup, there it is—circled right in front of you. But, when I was in it, I didn't realize I was in it, living it—a complacent participant. The incidents were so spaced out that during the peaceful periods in between, I'd convince myself he'd changed, that he'd learned to cope better with his stress and wouldn't say another hurtful thing to me. Even worse than that, I started to expect the abuse. I'd grown calluses. When he said I was pathetic, dumb, and worthless, I believed him because he coupled each insult with a dose of gaslighting. “Who else would want to be with you? If you left me, no one else would have you. You're a boring wife and a boring fuck. Be glad I'm with you.”

Be glad I'm with you.

Be glad I'm with you.

He was holding my head under water, and I didn't drown, didn't break. I grew gills.

Four years into our marriage, it looked like Andrew was perfect. Everyone agreed, and I was glad.

I hadn't spoken a word about his behavior to anyone around me, and that was an intentional choice on both of our parts. After the first few arguments, he'd hold me in bed and rub my back and tell me our personal life was ours. "We're stars, babe, and stars burn hot. People won't understand." Of course, I wholeheartedly agreed. In the beginning, I still believed the best of him. I didn't want to betray his trust and spew our dirty laundry to the world, especially since I was so sure each bad time was the last. Somewhere in the middle though, denial that it would continue dissolved into shame and embarrassment that it had and would.

I turned inward, pushing my family and everyone else away even more, and Andrew capitalized on that. He kept in touch with our friends when I didn't. He put on a warm, friendly facade when we were out at parties. He was such a clever puppeteer, especially when you consider the fact that you can't file a police report for words like you can for punches, and Andrew knew that. He never once hit me.

I did finally work up the courage to talk about it with Rebecca. She was the closest thing I had to a friend back in Los Angeles. We'd get lunch a few times a month and meet up for yoga here and there.

I broached the subject in a whisper, after a scripted answer about being annoyed with his adorable quirks.

"Actually, I don't think I'm happy...with Andrew."

She looked up from her salad, confused. "What do you mean? Is he working a lot?"

"Yes, but it's not about that," I said, talking in a stream-of-consciousness confession I was piecing together in real time. "I feel like I've told myself I'm happy so many times I've totally forgotten what the word means."

She waved her hand as if to say, Nonsense. "That's just life. God, Jeff has been in the office more than ever. I swear he's screwing his receptionist."

She laughed and continued eating her salad like, chomp, chomp, chomp, my husband is cheating on me, can you pass the salt?

I focused on my untouched pasta. "I'm thinking about leaving Andrew. I'm really considering it, actually."

"Because he's working a lot?"

"No." I was annoyed we weren't on the same page. "I've been thinking about this a lot, trying to objectively say whether or not I'm happy." I shook my head, trying to make my point clear. "I don't think it's something you can measure. It's just—when I wake up in the morning, my first thought is to run, to get away." I leaned closer and lowered my voice. "He's not who everyone thinks he is."

She rolled her eyes, sat back in her chair, and dabbed her mouth with her napkin. "Listen, Andrew might not be the best husband in the world, but your marriage seems pretty perfect to me. Didn't he just buy you that bracelet last week? The last thing Jeff bought me was an air freshener for my car."

I looked down at the diamonds shimmering on my wrist. It was true, he'd bought the bracelet for me out of the blue, but we both knew it was an apology for the hurtful things he'd said. The night before that lunch, I hadn't been wearing it, and he'd told me I was ungrateful. I'd learned my lesson: it would never leave my wrist so long as he was around.

Rebecca took my silence as an admission of guilt. "Listen, if you're trying to get some kind of settlement from him after the divorce, you'd better be careful. I have a friend who went down that path, and she ended up with nothing. Now her husband is married to some woman half her age and she's waiting tables in Santa Monica."

It was pointless. I was getting nowhere. She didn't want to hear the truth any more than I wanted to speak it. I knew then that if I was ever going to leave, I'd have to do it on my own, so I did. That diamond bracelet is sitting in some pawn shop in Beverly Hills and here I am, the new housekeeper for Blue Stone Ranch.

It feels pretty good, though technically, I haven't started yet. I'm still working out where to begin. Jack spent all of two minutes pointing me in the direction of the cleaning closet, all the while reminding me of my duties.

"Clean the house, do the laundry, make sure the fridge and pantry are stocked. Cook lunch for Edith and me, sweep, vacuum, that sort of thing."

"Sounds good."

My go-getter attitude seemed to poke at him. "Right, and of course, I'll need you to feed and bathe your new furry friend, too."

I swear his eyes held an evil gleam.

I wasn't kidding earlier when I said my life flashed before my eyes as Alfred ran for me. Dogs just aren't my thing, not since one latched onto my butt when I was a kid. I still have a tiny scar on my right cheek.

Of all my duties, I'm most excited about cooking, but Jack mentioned he and Edith were planning on eating leftovers from last night for lunch. So, that leaves cleaning and dog duties. Cleaning it is! No problem. Awesome. I root through the closet then make my way through the house, collecting any supplies I think I'll need to complete my tasks. I'm going to start with the bathrooms, mostly so I can prove Jack wrong.

I saw how gleeful he looked at the concept of me on all fours, scrubbing toilets. He thinks I'm going to cave and leave, or beg for another job, something a little more glamorous. Little does he know, I'm done with glamour. It's not what it's cracked up to be.

Once I'm properly outfitted, I get to work in his bathroom. It's not as dirty as I anticipated, probably because his housekeeper didn't quit all that long ago. I'm disappointed he isn't a total slob, but then, maybe it's a good thing considering I'm the one who now has to clean up after him.

I can only imagine what my “friends” from my old life would say if they saw me now, scrubbing a toilet seat with enthusiasm. It’s really not so bad. I hum an upbeat tune, spritz a little more cleaner, flush. A droplet from the spray gets in my eye and I don’t even break character. I am Meredith Avery, maid extraordinaire.

I’m still bent over his toilet when Jack walks in. I didn’t expect to see him again so soon, especially considering how eager he was to be rid of me earlier.

I pause my scrubbing and sit back on my heels. From my angle on the floor, he seems even more large than usual, looming there like a demon and blocking the light from the bathroom window.

He takes in the sight of me with my rubber gloves up to my elbows and a mask stretched across the lower half of my face. His mouth twitches like he’s fighting a smile.

“A little overkill, don’t you think?”

I tip my head to the side and stay silent, hoping he’ll take the hint and leave.

He doesn’t.

“Have you ever cleaned a toilet before?”

I sigh and yank the mask down. “Well, I’ve used toilets before—how hard could it be to do the opposite?”

He points out my first failure of the day. “Pretty sure the sponges are for the kitchen sink.”

Right.

“Well now they’re for the toilet.”

Truthfully, I thought that was for the shower. I’m glad I don’t say so.

“I was under the impression that you were a real busy guy. Do you plan on micromanaging me the whole day?”

He opens his mouth, thinks better of whatever he was about to say, and then turns to leave. Ha. Victory. I listen to him walk toward his office and once I'm sure he's really gone, I reach for the toilet scrubber. It's a lot easier to use than the sponge. I'd thank him for the tip, but alas, I would rather stick this entire toilet sponge in my mouth.

Jack and I have definitely started out on the wrong foot. Though rare, I have given and received bad first impressions before. This takes the cake, and it's unsettling. I'm not used to having problems with people. I pride myself on being easygoing and gregarious. In fact, back in California, I'm sure all my acquaintances would corroborate my genuine social proficiency. My whole life wasn't just an act to please Andrew. I'm nice, dammit!

But for some reason, around Jack, I play defense. I get angry and snappy. He rubs me the wrong way, gets under my skin. It's his arrogance, his utter lack of sympathy for somebody clearly down on their luck. I can't stand him, which is a problem considering he's my new boss.

If he hadn't assumed the worst of me right off the bat, we might've even become friends, but the word didn't take long to form on his lips: princess. If he ever calls me that again I'll grab that thick head of hair and give him a swirly in this toilet. That stupid baseball cap would clog the pipes and he'd have to clean it up himself.

I finish up in his bathroom and move on to the next one, all the while thinking about the conundrum I've found myself in. It's interesting to think I might've just swapped cards, a Drew for a Jack. One is arguably just as arrogant as the other. Not only that, they're both good-looking and confident too, but the similarities end there. Andrew is smooth edges and refinement. He's sly and cunning. In two days, I've already seen that Jack is rough around the edges, crass, and opinionated. Yesterday, he dragged me away from that meeting in front of all his ranch hands. Andrew would have never done that; he would have bottled his anger until we were behind closed doors.

Most curiously, I almost never had the courage to fight back or speak up with Andrew. He sapped my confidence down to the point that by the end, I was little more than a Stepford wife, subservient in every respect. Yet, with Jack, I can't help but speak my mind. My voice is back and ten times louder than I remember.

Jack

Edith didn't save me any coffee this morning. Not only that, she poured the excess down the sink while I watched. Oh, were you not finished? She's upset with me, thinks I'm being too hard on Meredith, but she doesn't know the whole truth. Meredith isn't here as some destitute damsel seeking sanctuary; she's here to stall until her husband begs her to come home, a sheep in sheep's clothing. Helen confirmed as much when we spoke last night. I called her, surprised Meredith had lasted her whole first day.

"You know she hasn't even bothered to call home?" Helen said. "I bet Andrew is worried sick."

"Maybe she really is planning on leaving him."

"No way. Meredith is anything but independent—spoiled by parents, doted on by boyfriends, and then completely provided for by Andrew. Remember when you were a kid and you'd get mad, run away, then be back home in time for supper? My guess is whatever this little tiff is about will be forgotten by Friday, and she'll be in your rearview mirror."

The phone call left a bad taste in my mouth. What kind of petulant woman just up and leaves her husband like that? He's probably really worried about her while she's off playing hide-and-seek a few states over. It doesn't make sense. Then again, Helen hasn't exactly painted Meredith in the best light, and I trust Helen's judgment. She's been a good employee for years while I've only known Meredith for 48 hours.

All day yesterday I kept waiting for her to fold, to feed into the impression Helen gave me, but she didn't. She cleaned the whole day and only took a quick break for lunch—I know this because Edith said she felt bad seeing her eat out on the porch by herself. A few times throughout the day, I heard things crash to the ground followed by a loud curse, but the house was clean, nothing was broken (that I could see), and better yet, she didn't bother me once.

I think over my conversation with Helen while I make a new pot of coffee. I wonder how well Helen really knows Meredith. If she never once mentioned that she had a sister, they can't be all that close.

The back door opens and I turn to find the subject of my thoughts scurrying into the adjacent laundry room and yanking the door closed behind her. She presses her back to the door and her hand to her chest. Her eyes are closed. Her breathing is erratic. It looks like she was just running for her life.

"Was Alfred out there?"

Her eyes pop open and her light blue gaze locks with mine as her cheeks turn a rosy shade of red. She clearly thought she was alone.

"I found that if I throw a rock at the barn, I can distract him long enough to sprint from the shack to the house."

"Whatever works." I chuckle, turning back to the coffee maker so she can compose herself without me watching. "But the more you try to avoid him, the harder he's going to try to win you over. He's smart, and he likes a challenge."

"Can't you just train him to avoid me?"

It sounds like she really thinks that's an option.

I glance back at her out of the corner of my eyes. "I don't really keep an org chart with all my employees' ranks, but it's safe to say that Alfred is your superior. Besides, I doubt you'll be here long enough to bother."

Her brows furrow and her gaze drops to the floor. If Edith were watching, she'd jab me in the ribs with her elbow.

I sigh. "Are you actually scared of him? He's a giant teddy bear."

"No. Of course not," she says haughtily, pushing off the door and lifting her chin as she steps into the kitchen. "I just...don't reciprocate his enthusiasm."

“You sure about that?”

“Positive.”

Her pride will be her downfall. If she'd just admit she was scared, I'd make an effort to keep Alfred away from her. Since she swears she's not, I won't bother.

I flip the switch on the coffee machine and it starts percolating right away. The smell is better than sex.

“When the coffee's done, bring a mug up to my office, will you?”

She quirks a brow. “Is that part of my job description? Waiting on you hand and foot?”

“It's a cup of coffee, not a seven-course meal.”

“Okay...” She hesitates, her gaze turning toward the coffee pot like it's her salvation. “Am I allowed to get some for myself?”

The question, delivered in a gentle tone, catches me so off guard that I turn to look at her, really look at her. Obviously, I'm aware she's beautiful—that's the minimum working requirement for trophy wives—but even with her dark hair twisted up in a bun and a fresh face, she's the sweetest thing I've ever seen. I ignore the thought and focus on the fact that today she's wearing another one of my Blue Stone t-shirts. It's tied just like the one yesterday so it doesn't completely drown her. She's wearing her same pair of jeans, but they're stained now, and there's a hole just above the left knee. I don't think she'd be wearing them again if she had any other clothes. The thought is unsettling.

“Stop sizing me up like that,” she accuses suddenly.

My gaze jerks up to her face. “Are you kidding me? I wasn't sizing you up.”

She props her hands on her hips. “Oh yeah? What were you doing then?”

Her ice blue eyes dare me to tell the truth.

“I was feeling sorry for you.”

I should've known my reply wouldn't go over well. Her hands ball into tiny little fists. Her lips tug into a thin, angry line.

"Why? I don't want the coffee that badly."

I wave my hand, gesturing to her appearance. "No, because you're obviously a very unstable person."

"What?"

"You pack up and leave your life behind, and you don't even bring a change of clothes. You're either crazy, or you didn't think you'd be gone this long," I point out with a flat, disinterested tone.

"Oh, braaaaavo, Dr. Phil," she shoots back, temper flaring. "Excellent psychoanalysis. Don't you have your own business to mind? Like, literally?"

Jesus Christ. This woman is going to be the death of me.

I tug a hand through my hair and make a move to step around her. "Just bring the coffee when it's done."

"Fine," she snaps.

"And go to the grocery store. We're out of damn food."

I stomp up the stairs.

"Sure thing, boss!" she shouts after me.

"And cook something for lunch!"

"With pleasure!"

"I'll know if you spit in it!"

At that, I slam my office door closed.

I'm fuming and pissed, more so with myself than with her. I had every intention of keeping my cool, but she pushed me, just like she has since she first arrived. I've never in my life talked to a woman the way I talk to her. I should march right back downstairs and fire her on the spot.

I stay seated, seething.

A few minutes later, there's a soft knock and then Meredith opens my office door. My blood spikes with adrenaline as if we're about to pick up right where we left off. My hands grip the edges of my desk. Her gaze hits mine, and I'm surprised to see that it's softer than it was down in the kitchen. Her lips are trained into a small, absent smile.

In her hand is a steaming cup of coffee—the coffee I'd completely forgotten about.

I watch her as she carries it carefully toward my desk, where I'm currently on the phone with the general manager over at Blue Stone Farm. He's talking my ear off about a few improvements he wants to make at the restaurant. I motion for Meredith to set the coffee down by the phone, and she listens. Then she reaches over and gently sticks a note onto my computer monitor.

In girly, scrolling script she wrote: I didn't mean to snap at you. You're right, I am a little crazy.

That's it. No apology, just a joke.

Still, it's something. Without waiting for a reply, she turns, and I watch her saunter out of the room, dragging my gaze from the strands of dark hair that have fallen from her bun to the curve of her ass in the only pair of jeans she owns. My stomach tightens and my heart pounds. A heat creeps up my neck.

When she's gone, I stare at her note, trying to refocus my attention on the phone call. In reality, I'm only half listening, too damn focused on the princess.

Meredith

Jack has shown his face once all morning, and it was so he could come down to make another pot of coffee. When I heard him walking down the stairs, I made sure to look extra busy. I was already vacuuming, but I vacuumed harder, heaving the thing back and forth as fast as I could. I looked like I was racing against an imaginary clock. He completely ignored me.

When he walked back by with his new cup of coffee, I'd moved on to the hallway. He had to walk right by me to get to the stairs and I held my breath, quietly praying he would trip on the vacuum cord. His spilled coffee would be my mess to clean, but I'd do it with a half-hidden grin.

Sadly, he stepped purposefully over the cord without acknowledging me then trotted right back up the stairs.

His quiet indifference is a silent weapon I can't fend off. I'm jumpy and on edge, listening for every little sound and jerking my attention to the stairs each time I think I hear him walking down them.

He hasn't made another appearance, but that hasn't stopped him from hanging around in my thoughts. I can't get the image of him from this morning out of my head. When I walked into his office, he was sitting behind his desk, phone pressed to his ear, gaze straight on me. His hatred plumed off him like smoke. He had a sharp stare and cool confidence, and I took one good look at him then nearly spilled his coffee all over the floor.

It's bad enough that I don't like his personality, but his appearance isn't exactly helping matters. I really want to find him unattractive, but I don't. He might be rougher around the edges than the men back in California, but with his chiseled jaw and piercing gaze, it's impossible to call him anything less than handsome. I try to tell myself his hair needs a trim and he's too sun-kissed. He could use a shave—his face would feel all scratchy. Wait, what? Pull it together Meredith. There will be no feeling his face.

I'm not a fool. If his personality weren't so unyielding, I have no doubt there'd be a different woman warming his sheets every night. Even so, I bet he isn't lacking for female attention. I shiver at the thought of having to wash sweaty sheets or empty condoms from his trashcan.

Ugh! Okay, enough, brain. You've had your fun.

I snip that line of thinking and decide it's time for me to get out of this house. I think Jack's proximity is tainting my thoughts. Some fresh air will do me some good.

It's time for a grocery store run.

I jot down a list of everything I want to make for meals then survey the pantry and fridge. Edith and Jack have enough barbecue sauce and baked beans to last them well into an apocalypse. Veggies and fruits are nowhere to be found, unless you count the dusty jars of pickled okra labeled Edith - July 2002. Yum. That will change once I make it back with the groceries. I grab the envelope with the grocery money from the counter then find Edith out on the porch throwing the ball for Alfred. Fortunately, the activity seems to be holding his attention so well that he doesn't care to acknowledge me. Still, I aim to make my time near him as brief as possible.

"Hey Edith, is there a car I can borrow to drive to the grocery store?"

She turns and holds up her hand to shield the sun from her eyes. "Yeah, go ask one of the hands, they'll set you up with a truck."

I turn toward the barn and spot a half-dozen ranch hands at work. There are varying shades of cowboy hats and an ample amount of denim. I can smell the testosterone from way over here.

"Umm...is there one in particular I should aim for?" Perhaps the weakest one in the herd?

"Don't think it'll matter really. I'm sure they'll all be dying to help you as soon as you make your way over there."

She's right, of course. After I skirt around the house as stealthily as possible to avoid Alfred's interest, I don't even make it halfway to the barn before the first cowboy catches up with me. He falls in line right beside me and holds out his hand. "Hey there, name's Chris."

He doesn't look a day over eighteen, especially with the sunshine glinting off his blond hair. With a goofy lopsided grin and sunburned cheeks, he seems relatively harmless.

"Nice to meet you, Chris. I'm Meredith."

"I saw you at the meeting the other day. I've gotta say, I'm surprised to see you around after that. You workin' up in the house now?"

"Started on Monday."

We continue heading toward the row of vehicles beside the barn.

"What do you think so far?"

I squint one eye to study him. I don't know how loyal Chris is to Jack, but something about his gentle manner makes me want to give him an honest answer.

"Let's just say I've had an interesting start."

"That bad, huh?" He chuckles and shakes his head. "He gets better, I promise. When I first started working here, I couldn't even look him in the eye."

"Really?"

"He sure can be a mean son of a gun."

I'm still deciding if I actually heard him correctly—what exactly is a son of a gun?—when another ranch hand joins us.

"Chris! Why are you bothering this nice lady?"

"David, Meredith," Chris says. "Meredith, David."

We shake hands and David flanks me on the other side as we keep walking. Suddenly I'm surrounded by boots and twangs on all sides. David looks a little older than Chris, tall and lanky with a beard so long and thick my chin gets itchy just looking at it. I notice then that they're both wearing matching work shirts with BLUE STONE RANCH monogrammed just beneath the left lapel. I wonder if Jack would have offered me the same uniform if I hadn't already stolen his t-shirts.

"Meredith was just saying how Jack's been a real asshole to her," Chris informs David matter-of-factly.

Jesus! Keep your voice down. The guy probably has the place mic'd up or something. Just to be sure, I loudly and clearly enunciate, "I have not!"

David bumps his shoulder with mine. "It's okay. You'll get used to it—everyone does. He's a good boss, just can be a real mean sonuvab—"

"Gun?" I finish for him.

He winks. "Sure."

"Where you stayin'?" David asks. "Downtown? Not much to rent around here unless you can afford the motel down off 173."

"No, I'm staying on the ranch."

They exchange a confused glance, and then Chris asks, "Here? You mean he has you up in the house with him and Edith?"

"No no no. He's letting me stay there." I turn and point toward my shack-sweet-shack nestled in the tree line behind the farmhouse. The distance has not softened its appearance. The last of the ancient window shutters—barely hanging on by one rusty hinge—finally breaks and falls to the ground as if on cue.

"Lettin' you?" echoes David, laughing as he keels over. "You're kidding! Where ya really staying?"

It takes a bit more convincing on my part before they actually believe me. Apparently even they wouldn't deign to sleep there, and it makes me hate Jack even more than before. He made it sound like I should have been grateful with the provided accommodations.

"That ain't right," David says, shaking his head. "Does it even have a kitchen?"

Yesterday, for dinner, I ate a peanut butter and jelly sandwich while hovering over the sink. I would have sat on the bed, but the mice and spiders were embroiled in a vicious turf war.

“Last time I went in there, I saw holes in the floorboards.”

I nod. “Yeah, those are still there.”

One of them is so big my foot nearly fell through.

“Miss Meredith,” Chris says solemnly, taking his hat off and holding it over his heart. A look of deep concern is etched across his baby face. “As good Christian men, we can’t let you keep livin’ like that.”

My brows arch. “Do either of you have a better solution?”

He thinks hard about it. “Well, David here’s getting married soon, so he can’t have you movin’ in with him, and well, I still live with my parents or I’d invite you to stay with us. My mom got pretty mad the last time I brought a stray woman home.”

He says it like I’m a flea-infested mutt he found on the side of the road. Please Mom, can we keep her? She’s housetrained and everything! I don’t take any offense. Other than Edith, Chris and David are the two nicest people I’ve met so far in Texas.

“Well guys, I appreciate your concern, but I won’t be staying in that shack long. I’m saving up so I can move somewhere else.” We finally make it to the row of mud-splattered farm vehicles ranging from ATVs to trucks. “Now, can either of you get me the keys for one of these? I need to run down to the grocery store.”

David tips his cowboy hat. “You stay right here.”

While he’s gone, Chris gives me detailed directions for how to get to the grocery store. “Take the third left after the Lutheran church, and then the next right after First Baptist, and, now, if you see St. Mary’s, you’ve gone too far.” By the time I hop up behind the wheel of an old Ford truck, I think I’ll just let Jesus take the wheel.

Chris shuts the door for me and puts his hat back on his shaking head. “Godspeed Miss Meredith. We’ll figure something out for ya.”

I turn to the dashboard to see what I’m working with and try not to show my concern. The truck is from an era when designers figured getting impaled by a steel steering column was as good a safety feature as any. The seatbelt, which is draped loosely over my lap, has a few knots tying the pieces together.

“Are there any other trucks available? Maybe an automatic? It’s been a while since I’ve driven a manual.”

David frowns. “That’s all we’ve got. I’d give you a quick refresher, but Chris and I really gotta get back to work.”

Right, of course. I’ll have to make do. I will not march back into the house and announce to Jack that I’ve had yet another failure. He probably keeps a list of them stowed in his top desk drawer. It’s laminated, and he pulls it out from time to time just to make himself smile. Sometime soon, he’ll splurge and have it framed.

To my credit, I manage to peel out onto the main road before I stall for the first time. The truck is old—it belongs beside a horse and buggy—and its lower gears are proving ornery. With every grind of the transmission, it’s like the vehicle is saying, Please just kill me.

I restart the truck and continue down the winding country road, trying to glance down at the directions from Chris while also remaining in my designated lane. I’m chugging along at 15 mph, because third gear seems to be the most cooperative. It’s slow going, but I try to enjoy the ride. I roll the window down, and the summer breeze carries the scent of honeysuckle and jasmine. Every now and then a car comes up behind me and I wave them past. They offer fun little greetings as they swerve around me: “Lady! The speed limit’s 40!” and “GET OFF THE ROAD!” I smile and wave, because I’m taking a summer cruise, and summer cruises are meant to be slow. Unfortunately, there’s a hill up ahead and I’ll need to speed up or move to a lower gear if I have any hope of actually cresting it.

I take a deep breath, let off the gas, push in the clutch, and try shifting into second gear. Wait, is second gear up or down? Before I know it, the hill has slowed me to a complete stop in the middle of the road. I plop my head down on the steering wheel before I register the feeling of backward motion.

“No, no, no!” I shout, stomping on the brake pedal.

A truck blasts its horn behind me so loudly I jump out of my skin.

“Go around!” I shout out the window and they listen, whipping past me at a million miles per hour.

After that, I’m left alone again, just me and the hill. I restart the truck yet again, make several attempts at forward progress, but the backward rolling freaks me out every time, causing me to stall out. Finally, I reach the bottom of the hill—actual rock bottom.

I’m no longer just grumbling under my breath; I’m shouting curse words at the top of my lungs (for every nearby church to hear) as I stare at the insurmountable hill. I’m smack-dab in the middle of a children’s fable, The Little Meredith That Could, except I’m pretty sure I can’t.

I catch another truck coming up the road in my rearview mirror and prep myself for another blaring horn, but it never comes. The driver pulls up behind me, flips on the hazards, and then opens the door. I’m prepared to see a farmer or another ranch hand, not a handsome golden-haired man dressed in a suit. I think he’s a figment of my overactive imagination, but I’m so desperate, I’ll take any help I can get, even in the form of a hallucination. I blink. He’s still there. His tie is a dark blue, and I focus on it in my rearview mirror as he rounds the back of the truck and comes up to the driver’s side window.

“Are you having car trouble, ma’am?”

He leans on the windowsill. I should warn him that the rust will probably rub off on his suit, but I’m too focused on ma'am. If that's not the cutest thing in the world, I don't know what is.

I smile gently. "Not exactly. More like driver trouble. It's, uhh...well, it's been a while since I've driven stick."

I nod toward the hill and he finally gets it. "Keep stallin'?"

"Unfortunately."

Here is where he could either say, Well, good luck, and head back to his truck or offer to help me out of my bind. Instead, he takes a minute to survey me. I imagine what he's seeing: wild ponytail, oversized t-shirt, ripped jeans. If he sniffs, he'll catch the scent of my perfume of choice lately: eau de Lemon Pledge.

"You're not from around here."

No question, all statement.

I quirk a brow. "How could you tell?"

He chuckles and shakes his head. "Question is, what are you doing driving one of Blue Stone's trucks?"

Of course. I'm sure there's a massive logo somewhere that I overlooked—or maybe this truck is so old, it's legendary.

"I'm their newest employee."

I'm all smiles, proud of my new job. Job. Jobjobjob. It stills sounds funny in my head.

His light brown eyes widen. "You're kidding. Don't tell me they have you working at the new vineyard."

"No." I didn't even realize there was a vineyard.

"Are you at the restaurant then?"

"The ranch," I answer simply.

"Ranch hand, huh?" he teases.

"Something like that."

"Since when?"

"Three days ago."

He nods. “What do you think of the guy who runs the place?”

“Jack? Is he a friend of yours?”

He laughs and shakes his head. “Not exactly. He and I went to high school together. Never could quite get along.”

An enemy of my enemy? This just got interesting.

“We’ve had a rocky start,” I admit sheepishly.

A gleam of interest sparks in his light brown gaze. “I can’t imagine why. You seem sweet enough to me.”

I KNOW, RIGHT! Finally someone gets it.

“I don’t think I’m the problem...”

His handsome smile stretches wider. “No, I doubt you are.”

We are definitely flirting and he is definitely good-looking, a welcome sight in the middle of an eligible-men desert. I know it seems crazy, thinking about men like this so soon after leaving my husband, but it’s been so long since I’ve flirted and not just appeased. It feels good, like scratching a leg that’s been buried under a plaster cast for months.

This guy’s clothes are nice. His face is nicer. He’s cleanly shaven. His hair is trimmed short and he has one of those classic, pearly smiles. I bet he gets along with most everyone, unlike a certain dark-haired, darker-eyed devil waiting for me back at the ranch. I know he didn’t give me the keys to this clunker, but he’s still to blame for my current predicament. I don’t have any proof, but I have a gut feeling he’s somehow the reason I got the flu before my seventh grade trip to Disney and couldn’t go.

“I’ll make you a deal: you scoot over on this seat, and I’ll get you over this hill. Where are you headed?”

I start to slide across the bench seat, and he pulls open the door to take my place behind the wheel. “The grocery store.” I hold up my piece of paper. “According to my incredibly detailed directions, I’m nearly there.”

“Yeah.” He nods before he starts the truck and maneuvers it like a pro. “You should be good. The store’s just around the bend up ahead, and don't worry, there aren't any more hills after this one. I'd drive you the rest of the way myself, but I have to be in court in fifteen minutes."

"Court, huh? Are you the law breaker or the law upholder?"

He laughs. "You'll be happy to know I have a clean record, ma'am. Good thing considering you just let me hop into this truck with you."

My eyes widen. How stupid could I be?

"Oh god. I did, didn't I?!" I drop my face in my palm. "You could've been a—a highwayman or something!"

"Aren't too many of those still around this century." He smiles. "I just wouldn't recommend doing it again in the future. Cedar Creek is pretty safe, but you never know when a few bad apples might be passing through."

It's kind of fun that small towns have a rosy euphemism for everything. In big cities they're hardened criminals. Here, they're just spoiled fruit.

"I'll remember that for next time," I promise.

"Maybe I could give you my number and you can call me if you ever find yourself in a bind again, roadside or otherwise."

I swear he's blushing a little bit.

If I were in the market for love, he'd be the perfect candidate: handsome but sweet, gentle and kind. He's a golden retriever, anxious to please in hopes of a treat.

I think it's best that I don't lead him on though, so I offer the truth: "I don't keep a cell phone on me."

"You're kidding."

I pat my jean pockets for proof. "Nope. I'm not Amish or anything, it's just—well, it's complicated."

I keep it back at the ranch on my bedside table. I hardly check it, and I would get rid of it completely but I'm scared Helen or my parents will need to reach me. Most of the time I just keep it turned off.

He puts the truck in park. “So I guess that means I’ll have to settle for the ol’ fashioned way: maybe I’ll see you around sometime.”

I smile and shrug. “I’m sure I’ll stall out again soon, or maybe I’ll commit a crime and need a lawyer to defend me?”

He brushes his hand across his chin, brows furrowed. “Won’t work. I’m a prosecutor.”

“Wow, so you really are a hero. Slaying dragons and rescuing damsels—all you need is a suit of armor.” He can’t meet my eyes, as if he’s embarrassed by the attention. I smile and reach over to extend my hand. “I’m Meredith, by the way.”

He smiles as his warm palm meets mine. “Tucker.”

After that, we part ways. Tucker dashes off to court, and I’m left chugging along the last mile or two to the grocery store with a dopey smile on my face. I take my time perusing the aisles, pleasantly surprised by the turn my day has taken. Jack might have started it off with a bang, but thanks to Chris, David, and Tucker, I’m starting to think people in Texas are just as friendly as rumor has it. I check off every item on my grocery list and manage to stay under budget. Food is so much cheaper here than in California, and I even find a section of the store full of organic, local produce from a few of the surrounding farms.

By the time I make it back to the ranch—after only stalling once on the way home, thank you very much—I carry all the groceries in and get to work making lunch. It’s already 12:45 PM and Jack and Edith are hungry. Edith won’t leave the kitchen. She’s taken up residence on one of the bar stools and is watching me work.

“What’s that?” she asks.

“Garlic-infused olive oil.”

“And that?”

“Panko.”

“Pank-what?”

“PANK-OH. Breadcrumbs to you. I like it on salmon.”

“Jack isn’t a big fan of fish.”

I purse my lips. “You don’t say.”

“Yeah, we’re more a meat-and-potatoes kind of family.”

Just then, Jack’s booming voice carries down from the top floor. “Is Meredith back from the store yet? I just got a call from Marty, said he saw a brunette stalled out on the side of the road in one of our trucks.”

“Yes I’m back!” I shout back, annoyed with this Marty person for being such a narc. “And I don’t know what you’re talking about! I got to the store and back just fine, no thanks to that rust bucket your ranch hands lent me!”

“That truck runs just fine when I drive it!”

“Yeah, the engine’s probably running from you like everyone else around here!”

Edith throws her hands in the air. “That’s enough shouting! Jack either come down here and talk to Meredith like a normal human being or get back to work. Lunch won’t be ready for another thirty minutes!”

“Forty,” I whisper.

“Forty minutes!” she corrects.

Jack’s footsteps clomp back into his office, and Edith and I exchange a conspiratorial smile.

Forty minutes later on the dot, Jack and his grandmother sit down for a lunch of summer kale salad, cauliflower rice, and baked salmon.

I stand at the end of the table, twisting a towel in my hand and waiting for them to take their first bites. They both stare at the food like it’s some kind of alien sustenance.

“I think you’ll like the cauliflower. It’s rich and garlicky.”

“Is this the first course?” he asks, peering up at me from beneath his dark brows.

“Jack, don’t be so rude,” Edith scolds. “Meredith, sit down and eat with us.”

“Oh, I’ve been eating this whole time—y’know, checking the seasoning levels.”

“Eat s’more then,” she demands. “You’re too skinny.”

I laugh. “Where I come from, that’s a compliment.”

Truthfully, I could eat. I’m starving, but I’m aware of the fact that Jack hasn’t asked me to join them. In fact, his body language sends the exact opposite message. If we were in elementary school, he’d drop his backpack on the empty seat beside him and proclaim loudly, Seat’s taken.

I take the hint and leave them to it. “If you’ll excuse me, I need to finish organizing the groceries.”

“Thank you for lunch,” Edith says. “It looks very...exotic.”

I shake my head as I walk back into the kitchen.

There’s silence for a few minutes as forks and knives meet plates. I start to organize the groceries in the pantry, but my ears are trained on the dining room, listening for feedback.

“The salmon’s really good,” Edith says.

Jack grunts.

“I notice you’ve nearly cleared your plate there,” she points out.

“A man’s gotta eat.”

“Uh-huh. You’ve about licked it clean—I’m sure Meredith would give you seconds if you asked.”

I can’t hear any conversation after that, and then a few minutes later, Jack walks into the kitchen with both of their plates. There’s not a speck of food left on either.

I hold out my hands to take them from him, but he steps around me.

My brows jump to my hairline, but I keep my lips zipped.

He opens the dishwasher and bends down to load their plates and silverware. I don’t stare at his butt in his worn Wranglers, and I definitely don't snap my gaze away before he stands and turns to face me. He drops his hands onto the counter and leans forward. I busy myself by folding a towel and hanging it over the side of the sink. I pick at a speck of dirt on the counter. I open a cabinet, look inside, and then close it again. It's clear he wants me to stop what I'm doing and give him my attention, but I can't do it. Everything inside of me wants to fight him tooth and nail, even for something as simple as this.

"So the truck gave you some trouble?"

His tone is the same one my parents used when they knew I'd done something wrong but they wanted me to fess up to it myself. Meredith, do you know what could've happened to the entire sleeve of Oreos?

No clue, I'd mumble through pursed lips, cheeks bursting at the seams, teeth looking like an active coal mine.

"Nope. No trouble at all."

"That's strange, because Marty—a trusted friend—asked me if I'd had any trucks stolen by a raven-haired woman."

I suppose Marty, with his level of observational detail, must be the sketch artist at the local police department. I have no choice but to adjust my current strategy of denial.

"Ohhh, he must've seen me when I pulled over to admire the wildflowers."

"What kind?"

"Sunflowers."

"I haven't seen any yet this year."

"They were massive, big as your head." I spot the obvious flaw in my plan and sidestep it masterfully. "Somebody was out mowing though, so they're probably all gone now."

"Y'know, it's an old truck. It could have given anyone a hard time."

He's playing good cop, trying to bait me into an easy confession. I turn and give him a blank, innocent stare.

He tips his head to the side.

I mimic him.

He puts his hands on his hips, and so do I.

He narrows his eyes, and I mirror the gesture.

Finally, he cracks. When he's gone, I'll pump my fist in the air in victory.

"Next time come get the keys for my truck."

His truck?

"Is it from the Stone Age or the Bronze Age?"

He heaves a heavy sigh like he's lost all his patience with me—that, or he's trying not to laugh.

"It's brand new."

"And you'd trust me with it?"

"Do I have a reason not to?"

His gaze is so warm, and yet so cold all at once. Meeting it makes me feel like a tiny fist is punching me repeatedly in the gut. I'm surprised I still sound normal as I ask, "What'd you think of lunch?"

He shrugs, glancing down at the shirt I have knotted off at my waist, yet another of his hand-me-downs. His eyes narrow almost imperceptibly before his gaze finds mine again. "I don't usually like salmon."

There's a compliment in there somewhere, but I'd have to use a pickaxe to find it.

"Right, well, I saved the skin. It's good for dogs."

His brows rise as if he's impressed. "Going to give it to Alfred?"

"Give it, drop it out back through the cracked door—tomato-tomahto."

He shakes his head and pushes off the counter. "We really gotta work on that fear of yours."

"Total avoidance is working out pretty well," I quip. "I'll just continue that forever."

“Forever, huh? Strong words for someone on their second day.”

I try not to smile. “That’s how long I plan to stay—either that or until we’re so sick of each other that you fire me.”

“That’s how you think this is gonna end?”

Now we’re both fighting smiles. “I won’t be quitting, if that’s what you’re getting at.”

He rubs the back of his neck as he turns for the back door. “We’ll see.”

It’s a cheeky little sendoff, and just like with everything else concerning Jack, it digs under my skin. We’ll see, I mouth snarkily to his back like a snotty grade-schooler, all the while watching him walk away. He reaches for his baseball cap on the hook by the door, slips it on over his chestnut brown hair, and then he’s gone.

Later that evening, after I’m done working for the day, I find an envelope tucked halfway underneath the door of the shack. Inside, there’s a small advance: $500 in cash.

Jack’s jagged handwriting adorns the front of the envelope:

Stop wearing my clothes.

Jack

With summer in full swing, we're right in the middle of our busy season for Blue Stone, and the restaurant is more popular than ever. This morning I went over there to meet with the head chef and the GM, and I approved a new seating layout so we can fit a few more tables out on the back porch.

Our vineyard and winery have been expanding for the last few years as well. I've been working on opening up a distribution channel between us and a few regional grocery store chains, but we're still working out the terms. The dry weather last year hit us hard, and we weren't sure we'd be able to keep up with supply. Funny enough, the shortage sparked more interest than usual, and what wine we were able to stock sold out as soon as it hit shelves. I've hired a few more growers to ensure that this season fares better than the last.

The manager for our wedding venue assures me we have more events booked than ever, says brides are having to inquire a year in advance to secure their desired dates, and even then, most of the highly coveted weekends are already double-booked with a wedding in the morning and another in the evening.

The fact is, with everything going on with the various Blue Stone businesses, I rarely find time to step out from behind my desk. It's a shame considering how much I enjoy working outside, so I take advantage of every opportunity I can get—like right now, I'm in the middle of an all-hands meeting, checking in with the guys about the progress on a few projects around the ranch.

Too bad not a single one of them is listening to me. A few yards away, Meredith is stealing the show.

She's out on the front porch with Alfred, attempting to conquer her fear by treating him to some of the salmon skin from yesterday's lunch.

“Sit!”

Alfred sits for two seconds, gets overwhelmed with self-pride for obeying, and then leaps excitedly at her outstretched hand.

“I said sit! Sit!”

The problem is she’s holding the treat way over her head to keep it out of his reach, but he thinks she’s giving him a challenge: Oh! You want me to jump higher?!

“Very bad!” she admonishes, wagging her finger as if he’s fluent in sign language. “I’ll feed it to you as soon as you can hold a sit for more than a blink!”

He jumps up again and she squeals and flings the salmon skin away like it’s a hot potato. Alfred makes it disappear in two seconds.

It’s pitiful. None of us can look away.

“Where’d you find her, anyway?” Garrett, my ranch manager, asks. “They got mail-order California brides now?”

“She’s his new housekeeper,” Chris, my youngest ranch hand, interjects. “She just started a few days ago.”

He’s wearing a proud smile I find confusing.

Garrett wags his thumb toward her. “Why’s she wearing your shirt?”

Yes, why is she wearing my shirt? I groan thinking of the note I left on her doorstep yesterday afternoon. Apparently she decided to disregard it. Even worse, it looks like she’s actually cut the sleeves off of this one. Now I don’t even want it back.

“So is she a Russian bride or is she single?” someone else asks, inciting a round of snickers.

All heads spin to me as if they’ve been waiting for the answer to that question all day. A few of them rub their necks from whiplash.

I answer swiftly, tacking on my most gruff tone, the one that makes them pee their pants. “She is nobody’s goddamn business. Show her some respect and get back to work.”

I catch Chris smiling, seemingly happy with me for sticking up for her. What the hell is wrong with him?

I get my answer when he and David catch up to me as I'm walking back toward the farmhouse.

"Hey boss, is there any lumber we could use to fix up that shack you've tucked Miss Meredith away in? I figure we could patch up the floor pretty quick, shouldn't take longer than a day or two."

"First of all, why are you calling her Miss Meredith like she's your mommy's friend? Second, what are you talking about?"

They exchange a glance like, here we go again, and then David speaks up. "Which part are you confused about? The lumber or the—"

"Who said anything about fixing up the shack?"

Chris' eyes go wide. "Haven't you been inside there lately? There are gaps in the floorboards this far apart." He stretches his arms out as wide as they'll go. It's an exaggeration...I think. "A snake could crawl in sideways."

David nods. "Not to mention, it's about to get hot as hell. Once we fix the floors, we could drop in a window unit from the hardware store. They're pretty cheap these days—"

I hold up my hand so they'll both shut their yaps. "Why do you two care? You don't even know her."

Chris frowns, clearly offended. "We met her yesterday."

"Oh yeah? Now y'all are buddies?"

He shrugs. "I gave her directions to the grocery store."

"And now she has y'all running around working for her?"

He stops walking and props his hands on his hips. David follows suit. "Oh no, she didn't ask—just seems like the right thing to do. You know she made us muffins this morning, brought 'em out to all the guys, still warm from the oven, just like Gammy used to make."

What is going on? When did all my ranch hands go soft? And why didn't I get any of these muffins?

“So what do you think?” Chris asks, his eyes comically large and brimming with hope.

“We’ll do it on our own time if that’s the problem,” David adds.

“I’ll think about it.”

They beam, and I leave them there like two little love-struck schoolboys.

Meredith is sitting on the porch steps, soaking up the sun and watching me approach. When I get within earshot, she holds up her hands. “Before you accuse me of slacking on the job, I’m taking my fifteen-minute break. I asked around and all the guys said we’re allowed two a day.”

I tip my head down to hide my amusement. “I wasn’t going to say anything.”

“Oh sure.”

I reach the stairs and crouch down to pet Alfred, who’s lounging on the grass there. “I’m surprised you’re sitting so close to him.”

I peer up at her and squint to keep the sun out of my eyes.

“How’s that working out for you?”

She shrugs and scoots a smidge away from him, trying to play it off like she was just readjusting her seat. “It’s not so bad now that his attention is on you.”

I make a point to scratch his belly so he’ll roll onto his back. His tongue lolls out of the side of his mouth and his hind leg starts to kick the air.

“Well now you’re just showing off,” she says in a clipped tone.

“I promise you, he’s a lover, not a fighter.”

“That’s odd.”

“Why?”

“Well, they say pets are a reflection of their owners, but I guess there must be some exceptions.”

I turn to see her lean back on the stairs, coy smile hinting that she was teasing, not trying to land a punch. I should push to stand and get back to work, but I’m stuck focusing on the sprinkling of freckles across the brim her nose. Were they there when she first showed up?

“The guys said you brought them muffins this morning.”

She tips her head to the side and her smile fades. “If I say I did, will I get in trouble?”

“Of course not. Why would you think that?”

“I don’t know, you sounded kind of annoyed just then.”

I frown. “I think that’s just my default tone.”

She laughs at that—a rich, warm laugh that stops me in my tracks. My gaze hitches on the deep dimple dotting the left side of her smile. When she notices me staring, she clears her throat and motions back to the house.

“I saved one for you, though it wasn’t easy—Edith already sniffed out the two I hid behind the breadbox.” I don’t think she can tell how shocked I am by the gesture because she continues nonchalantly. “I could bring it up to your office with some coffee.”

“I thought you were resisting the notion of waiting on me hand and foot?”

She looks away, eyes narrowing. “If you don’t want it, just say so.”

That hurt expression twists my insides, and my first instinct is to fall to my knees and beg for that damn muffin, but I catch myself. What the hell am I doing, standing here and chatting? I shouldn’t be warming up to Meredith. I shouldn’t be letting my guard down with her at all. She’s a heartbreaker. She’s spoiled and flighty. If Helen is to be believed, she left her husband to teach him some kind of bratty lesson. I’d be wise to keep my distance, even if that means hurting her feelings to do it.

I push to stand. “Yeah, I had a big breakfast. You can give it to Edith.”

* * *

Later at lunch, Meredith sets down another one of her healthy meals. This time there’s baked chicken, asparagus, and some kind of tiny grain that looks like it should be sprinkled into a fish tank.

“Couscous,” she announces softly.

I feel my mouth turn down with disdain and have to fight against it.

Still, she senses my reluctance. “It’s wheat, country boy. Give it a try. I promise you’ll like it.”

Edith pats the empty place setting beside her. “Take a seat and eat with us.”

If she wasn’t my grandmother, I’d kick her shin under the table. What is it with her and Meredith? Edith never tried this hard to be friendly with our old housekeeper.

I aim daggers at her, but she’s too busy making googly eyes at Meredith to notice, so I have no choice but to speak up. “Mary never used to eat lunch with us.”

Meredith bristles at the comment and spins on her heel to head back into the kitchen.

There. Problem solved.

Edith sends me a scathing look from across the table. When I was younger, that look would have made me recoil in fear. I’m surprised it hasn’t completely lost its effect.

I shrug and scoop a pile of couscous onto my spoon. Here goes nothing. “It’s better this way. I’m still pretty sure she’ll be gone in a week anyway. There’s no sense in getting friendly with her.”

She rolls her eyes. “Believe me, you’re in no danger of that.”

I straighten my shoulders, fish food forgotten. “You think I’m being too hard on her?”

“Well she’s scared shitless of Alfred, yet I still think she prefers his company to yours.”

I grind my teeth, and for the rest of the meal, we don’t bother with conversation. There’s no use. She’s angry with me for the way I’m treating Meredith, and I’m angry with her for not seeing my side. If she’d heard the way Helen spoke about her sister, she wouldn’t be so welcoming either.

I’m focused pretty hard on stewing, but not so much that I don’t notice how good Meredith’s food is. I’ve never willingly eaten asparagus, but she roasted it so well I’m a little disappointed when my plate’s clean.

I scoot my chair back from the table and carry our dishes into the kitchen. Meredith is in there cleaning, and she makes a point to completely ignore my presence. Not only that, she turns and angles herself away from me. Her shoulders are hunched over and her head is tilted down as she scrubs hard, cleaning the stove.

All right. Okay. I’ve had enough. This is what it must feel like to be the mean, responsible parent. It sucks. Why do I have to be the bad guy? So what? I didn’t want her eating with us and getting cozy, but I can’t stand her moping like this. Not to mention, the sooner she and I are back on semi-decent terms, the sooner Edith will come around as well.

“Food was good. Two for two.”

She hums and keeps her back to me.

“I’d never tried kooz-kooz before.”

She makes a little bored noise, unimpressed, and then I’m left with nothing else to say.

My temper starts to boil up inside of me, though not at her—at myself. I hate this. I hate that I can't decide how I should handle her. One minute I want her out of my house. The next, I want to play nice and get on her good side. I can't help but wonder what that would be like: fresh baked muffins with my morning coffee, sweet smiles, the returned love and affection of my grandmother. I could get used to that real quick.

And that right there is the problem.

Meredith

“I feel compelled to defend my grandson.”

I shake my head. “There’s no need, really.”

Edith comes around me and turns off the faucet for the kitchen sink. I’m elbow-deep in suds, but apparently this conversation is more important than the dishes from lunch. I reach for a towel and dry my hands before turning toward her.

She’s eyeing me with unveiled curiosity. “He thinks you’re using us as a stepping stone.”

“Oh yeah?” I cross my arms. “Who’s to say he’s not right?”

She nods, running with it. “Who indeed?” After a brief silence, she plunks me in the forehead with her pointer finger. “You are, dummy! So are you or are you not headin’ back to California as soon as that rich husband of yours figures out where you ran off to?”

My jaw ticks with anger.

“Whatever you think you know about me, go ahead and believe it. It’s all true.”

I’m so sick of everyone shoving their nose in my business. If this were a normal job with normal hours, she wouldn’t be asking about my personal life, but this hasn’t been a normal setup from the beginning. She and Jack know Helen, and therefore they feel like they know me. They don’t. It’s like looking out a single window and thinking you know what the whole world looks like. Whatever snippets I told Helen about my life back in California were only half-truths. My life back there wasn’t complete hell, but it wasn’t all rainbows and cotton candy either.

“Maybe I do come from a cushy life, but there’s a lot more to it. All you need to know is that I’m not going back. End of story. Now if you’re done, I need to get back to these dishes.”

“Was it ever good? Your marriage?”

Her question is so jarring that a sharp memory hits me like a bird smacking into a clean window. The last time Andrew and I were intimate, I was lying face down on our bed with him on top of me, letting it happen, trying to think of anything other than how revolting it was to have him touch me. I turned and my gaze caught on the framed picture on my nightstand: us, on our wedding day...me, smiling up at Andrew like he was my shining prince.

“Yes, we were happy once.”

“Well, marriage is hard. You gotta work at it to keep the love alive.”

I think back to all my desperate attempts to change him. In the end, I only succeeded in changing myself.

I pretend like her advice is blowing my mind. “Wow, really? Guess I just didn’t try hard enough. Any more sage advice? Maybe I should have spiced it up in the bedroom to keep him interested? Maybe I should have been a little more attentive? More doting? Funny? Aloof? Mysterious? Please tell me how I could have saved a marriage you know nothing about.”

My explosion misses her completely. She hums with confirmation then turns for the back door. “Yep, that’s what I thought.”

I frown. “What?”

She keeps on walking. “Nothing. You can go back to your dishes now.”

“Edith!”

The back door slams behind her, and I throw up my hands in defeat. Jesus, what is with this family?

It's early evening and I've quarantined myself in the shack. It's just me and the local wildlife I've yet to evict. I have a hardback cracked open on my lap, a brand-new thriller I found Edith reading yesterday. Apparently we share the same literary tastes—we sat in the game room chatting about books for a good thirty minutes. When I heard Jack's office door open, I leapt to my feet. I didn't want him to catch me slacking on the job; I won't gift him any ammunition against me. Other than our little blowups, I want to be the best employee he's ever had. I want my likeness framed above a small plaque that reads: Employee of the Year! That way he won't have any grounds to fire me.

He didn't see me lounging there with his grandmother, and she insisted it didn't matter anyway. Still, I didn't want to abuse his trust, so I got back to work, and Edith must have finished the rest of the novel because it was waiting for me on my doorstep earlier.

It's great so far, lots of murder and blood—everything a girl needs—but I'm having trouble focusing on it because it's so damn hot in here. The sun is on its way down for the day, but the air is still humid and stifling. I took an ice-cold shower after work then put on one of Jack's t-shirts, and instead of knotting it, I'm wearing it like a dress while my jeans hang up to dry. I finally got around to washing them, but this weekend I have plans to go into town and spend a little bit of my advance on some shorts. I can hardly wait.

I push the window open and stick my face out, hoping for some cool wind, but instead, I'm greeted with stale, warm air. A bead of sweat rolls slowly down my forehead. This is ridiculous. Texas is a sauna. In California, it's probably a breezy 70 degrees. At this moment, a woman is out with her boyfriend and begging him for his jacket. He's annoyed she didn't bring one of her own. I didn't realize it'd be so cold! Boyfriends in Texas must not have this problem.

Without another thought, I rip my book off my bed and fling the shack's door open. I'm aware that Jack's t-shirt cuts off pretty high on my thighs, but I don't care. The idea of shoving my legs into wet jeans makes me want to dry heave. Besides, no one's going to see me in this ensemble anyway. The guys are already gone for the day since ranch work starts early and ends early, and I'm pretty sure I saw Jack's truck drive off an hour or two ago, so there's no reason to suffocate myself in the hot tub I call home.

If there was a pool on the property, I'd jump into it head first. I'd stay there, floating on my back until the sun burns out. As it is, I'm aiming for a hammock nestled under two oak trees behind the house. I spotted it my first day on the ranch, but I haven't seen anyone use it. It might be a little dirty, but I don't mind. My hope is that if I really get it swinging, I'll generate a little air flow to cool me down. If not, I'm marching into Jack's house and Tetrising my entire body into the freezer. I'll happily perish beside the frozen peas—just the thought sends a shiver of pleasure down my spine.

I relish in the feel of the soft grass beneath my bare feet as I make my way across the yard. I decide this is already infinitely better than the shack, right up until I hear a low whistle that says, Hey there, pretty lady.

My attention snaps to the left, toward the barn, and I freeze mid-step.

A group of ranch hands are circled around the front of the ancient truck I drove to the grocery store the other day, apparently working on it. Two of them are already staring in my direction—Chris and another boy about his age that I haven't met yet. Chris' eyes go wide and then he quickly averts his gaze as if I'm tiptoeing around outside in lingerie instead of a loose t-shirt. The other ranch hand doesn't look away, and I'd bet money the whistle came from him. He's focused on my bare legs like they're two juicy cheeseburgers and he's starving. The third ranch hand—the one with his head tucked under the hood of the truck—finally steps back and pauses his work. With a start, I realize it's Jack. He wipes the grease from his hands with a rag and mutters something I can't hear. Neither of the guys respond. He looks up to find them distracted then follows the gaze of the second man right...to...me. When he finds me standing in the middle of the lawn, my knees nearly buckle.

I do the only thing I can think of: hold up my book as if to say, Hello kind fellow, nothing to see here, just doing a bit of light reading.

He scowls, and just like that, the look is completed. It's the perfect cowboy fantasy I never knew I had: he's over there working on a farm truck with grease-stained hands, the beginnings of a five o'clock shadow on his chiseled jaw, his dark hair winging out from beneath his backward baseball hat. His t-shirt is stretched tight over his chest and his dark jeans are so worn in, I bet they're perfectly molded to his thighs. His dark eyes warn me away. In fact, they do more than that. They're a visual growl, rumbling in the waning light, but I can't seem to take heed because in that moment, he's the hottest man I've ever seen, and that's a problem.

A major problem.

He catches the ranch hand still focused on me and smacks him in the back of the head, knocking his cowboy hat off. The boy scurries to pick it up and make his apologies, and I use the opportunity to turn tail back toward the shack as fast as possible. My legs move so quick, I break the sound barrier and a random window four miles away shatters as a result.

Once I'm there, I throw the door closed behind me and start pacing. I get it; it doesn't look good. He already thinks so little of me—hell, he probably thinks I'm some kind of west coast nudist, forcing my liberalism on these good Christian people.

There's a heavy knock on the door a second later, and I curse and squeeze my eyes closed.

"Meredith," Jack says, pounding again. "Open up."

"No!" I shout back. "I'm busy."

"I just saw for a fact that you are not busy."

"I'm busy not dealing with this right now!"

"Bullshit. We need to talk."

"Fine!" I groan. "Okay!"

I reach for the jeans, which are still hanging up to dry, and try to yank them on. I get them up to my knees, but they won't go any higher; they're too wet and tight. DID I HAVE TO LEAVE MY HUSBAND IN A PAIR OF SKINNY JEANS!? I hop around, yanking as hard as I can. I'm Ross Geller trying to stuff his sweaty gams into those leather pants, but it's no use. The jeans won't budge, and Jack is growing more impatient outside.

"Meredith!"

"Just hold on a minute!"

I lie back on my bed and tug with all my might, and finally the denim starts to work with me. YES YES YES. I zip and button them, leap off the bed, and fling the door open with an angry huff.

Jack breezes right past me and stomps into the shack so heavily that the fragile walls quake. It'll be a fitting end, both of us suffocating under the rubble. Just as we're gasping for our last breaths, I'll offer to make peace, and very quietly, he'll whisper back, Go to hell.

"Yes please," I mock rudely. "Invite yourself in and make yourself at home."

He turns to face me.

"What the hell was that?" he asks, flinging his arm toward the yard.

I scowl. "That was an accident. I thought I was alone."

"Alone!?" He shakes his head like I'm a certifiable idiot then takes two deliberate steps closer to me. I'm made aware of how small I am by comparison. I have to tip my head back to meet his brown eyes. I'm a child standing at the feet of a giant. "Let me make something perfectly clear: this is a working ranch. You'll never be alone on this property. Also, you're a young female employee—correction: the young female employee. It's hard enough trying to keep the guys in line, and then you go out there dressed like that!"

I fist my hands in my damp hair, resisting the urge to scream as I shout up to him. "I get it, okay?! I'm not an idiot. It was an honest mistake and it won't happen again." I walk to the door, yank it open, and motion for him to get out. "Now if you're done yelling at me, I'd like to try to salvage the rest of my evening."

He doesn't budge, and his angry scowl only deepens. His gaze is on his t-shirt. "I thought I told you to stop wearing my clothes."

"I plan on it, as soon as I get some of my own."

"When's that gonna be?"

"This weekend."

For a few seconds, neither one of us speaks. In fact, we don't even breathe. We stand there, staring each other down. His hands are on his hips. There's a deep line etched between his dark eyebrows, and that line says, You're more trouble than you're worth.

I'm staring up, memorizing every tan contour, when he suddenly breaks. He puffs out a heavy sigh and pinches the front of his shirt so he can tug on it and get a little air down his collar.

"Shit, it's hot in here."

"See?!"

I want to wrap my hands around his neck and shake him like a doll, but it would only annoy me more when he wouldn't budge. Maybe if I throw my whole weight into it like I'm trying to break down a door...

"That's why you weren't wearing any clothes?"

I purse my lips, unimpressed with his hyperbole. "I was wearing clothes."

"Not enough."

I roll my eyes and resist the urge to plunk him on the forehead. "I feel like we're going in circles."

He shakes his head and slowly spins, taking in the shack with fresh eyes. I wonder what he thinks of it now that I've been here for a few days. My clothes are hanging on a line near the window. My cream-colored lacy bra flutters beside his t-shirts and I blush, resisting the urge to yank it down. If he notices it, he doesn't say anything. His gaze sweeps over to the twin bed and then down to the floor.

It's no Taj Mahal, but all things considered, it's a hell of a lot cleaner than it was when I found it. I have plans to purchase a few necessities, like a lamp and a rug, this weekend—that is, if my budget extends that far. I'm hoarding most of my advance, so unless the going rate for a rug is a few dollars and a winning smile, chances are I'll be going without.

"I'm getting you an A/C unit this weekend," he declares suddenly.

My face is a mask of indifference. I refuse to give him the satisfaction of seeing my excitement before he breaks and admits he's kidding.

He doesn't notice my resolve, too busy staring down at the floor. "And I'll have Chris and Daniel come in here and repair these floorboards. Could have them do it Monday while you're working so they aren't in your hair."

I nod very, very slowly. My mouth is hanging open so wide at this point that I'm bound to catch a fly.

"After that, we'll see about fixing the walls."

At that, he turns for the open door, apparently finished with me for the time being.

Wait...

"Was that all a joke?!" I burst out after him. "Honestly, if this is another one of your weird mind games, I don't want any part of it!"

He doesn't even bother acknowledging me, just keeps on walking, which I think means he was serious.

I can hardly believe it.

Soon, I will have cold, air-conditioned air blasting my face like I'm some kind of queen. I think I could cry. On second thought, it's still too hot to cry—I have to stay as hydrated as possible until I get that A/C unit.

Friday flies by and before I know it, it's close to quitting time. I'm about to experience my very first weekend of freedom here in Cedar Creek. I'm so excited, I don't even get annoyed when Jack tells me he has a girl coming into town for a visit. Christine. He gives me zero details about her. In fact, I'm pretty sure he only brought her up so he could make sure I put extra towels in the master bathroom. I'm disappointed in his lack of gossip. Are they dating? Friends? Lovers? More? Luckily, Edith has no qualms about filling me in. We sit at the kitchen table during my break, sipping coffee and talking while Jack is out with the ranch hands doing all manner of manly things, I'm sure. (Earlier in the morning, I saw him carrying a rope—an actual ROPE! I always thought those were more for show. Anyway, at the sight of it, my recently kindled cowboy fantasies may or may not have ramped up tenfold.)

I get the following information about Christine from Edith: she's a "city girl" like me, though she used to live in Cedar Creek and went to the same high school as Jack. They didn't date back then—I asked. Also of note, Jack was valedictorian of his graduating class. I didn't ask about this, Edith just offers the tidbit up like any proud grandmother would. She also offers up the fact that he had a dozen girls chasing after him on any given day. Also, he was the starting pitcher for varsity baseball. She'd probably keep on rambling about him all day, but I pull her back to the topic at hand.

"But are they dating now?"

"Right, yeah...well," she continues, "Christine lives out in San Antonio and has some fancy fashion job."

This piques my interest, but when I ask for details, Edith drops the ball.

“I don’t know what she does,” she replies, waving away my question like it bores her. “Looks at clothes, dresses mannequins—something like that.”

She goes on to say that Christine used to be sort of sweet, but in the last few years, she’s changed. Edith’s direct quote is that Christine’s “got her nose so high in the air, she’d drown in a rainstorm.” I’d ask her what that means, but she leans in close and whispers, “I think she’s overcompensating for growing up in the trailer park across town with her mama.”

My stomach twists and suddenly, I feel bad for contributing to gossip about this woman I don’t even know. “Edith!”

I shake my head. “She might be ‘high falutin’, as you called her, but if she makes Jack happy—”

“She doesn’t.”

“Well if she’s good for him—”

“She isn’t.”

“Sheesh, remind me never to get on your bad side.”

“Where do you think Jack gets his?”

She stands up and carries both of our coffee cups over to the sink even though I was only half finished with mine.

“I’m not trying to be mean,” Edith says, clearly hurt.

“I know. It’s just...I know how it feels to be the subject of... rumors.”

She turns then and smiles warmly, her blue eyes twinkling. “See that? You try not to see the bad in people. You’re already nicer than she is. Prettier too.”

I throw my hands up and get back to work, though I can’t help but think about Christine. It’s not my business what (or who) Jack does in his spare time, and I definitely don’t care about the type of women he invites to sleep over. Who cares if she’s stuck up or hoity toity? You know what I care about? Whether or not she cleans up after herself. That’s all. I hope she puts the used towels in the dirty clothes hamper and loads her dishes in the dishwasher when she's done with them. She can be as mean as she wants as long as she doesn't make my job harder come Monday morning.

Still, I am a little bit curious about her. Call it boredom, but I've been imagining what she'll be like all day, and I nearly jump for joy when I hear a car pull up out on the gravel drive.

"Christine's here!" Edith calls from the living room.

I'm moving clothes from the washer to the dryer when the front door opens and she strolls in. I'm so anxious to see her that I stuff everything in as quick as I can and dash into the kitchen just as Jack greets her in the front hall. They hug instead of kiss, which I find interesting. Christine seems distant, offering Edith a polite nod, but nothing more. They obviously have bad blood.

She's beautiful—though, I obviously expected nothing less. Her light blonde hair is cropped short near her chin. She's wearing a white dress and sandals that tie up around her ankles. Dainty gold necklaces are layered around her neck, and I'm immediately envious of how put-together she looks. It's been easy to forget about comparing myself to other women when the only one I've seen for a week is more than twice my age.

I'm still staring at her outfit when she rolls her suitcase into the room, bringing a trail of mud along with it. Dammit. I just mopped that floor this morning. The farther into the house she goes, the messier it gets.

"Oh, oh! Hold on, looks like you have something on your wheels."

I rush forward with a rag I grabbed from the kitchen counter and make quick work of the mud. When I finish, I push off my knees to stand and smile. There, no more mud streaking my wood floors.

All three of them are staring at me like I'm crazy.

"Meredith, aren't you off the clock?" Edith quips.

I point back to the kitchen. "I was just finishing up some laundry, didn't want to leave it in the washer all weekend."

“Laundry?” Christine frowns, glancing from me to Jack and then back again. “I’m sorry, I don’t believe we’ve met.”

She’s looking at me like I don’t belong. It’s the exact same look I give the fauna in the shack, but it doesn’t faze them. If anything, they’ve invited even more of their friends. Come on! Tell Jerry and the other spiders we’re throwing a barbecue later! Yup, havin’ flies again!

“Meredith is helping out around the house for a little while,” Jack explains simply.

Christine isn’t satisfied, so I smile and hold out my clean hand. “I’m the new housekeeper. Pleased to meet you.”

In a flash, her expression softens. Apparently, my job as Jack’s housekeeper immediately whisks away whatever jealousy might have been building inside her. It’s as if I held up a sign that read, Don’t worry, you’re better than me—on the inside and out.

Still, she can’t help but size me up. Her gaze scans over me quickly, clearly assessing as she goes. I wish I’d put on a little more makeup this morning. She’s decked out like a blogger at fashion week. Meanwhile, I look like I’ve been hauled out of the ocean after a year alone on a deserted island. I should be the least threatening female she’s ever met. Still, when she scans down to my jeans, her eyes go wide with wonder. “Are those the new distressed skinnies from J Brand?”

I glance down. “Oh, umm...I don’t—”

She walks around me so she can see the back pockets. “They are!” She jerks back around to face me, gripping my shoulders in her hands, shaking me gently. My brain rattles in my head. “Where did you get these?! They’ve been on backorder on every website I search.”

I laugh, slightly embarrassed, slightly aware of the emphasis she put on the “you” of that question. “I got them back in California, actually.” Truthfully, they were just one of a dozen designer pairs hanging in my closet. I didn’t think much of them and now I feel slightly guilty that I wore them all week while scrubbing toilets. She’s so impressed, I think she’d rip them off me if she could. “I’d let you have them, but they’re kind of all I have at the moment.”

She laughs and finally releases me. I breathe a sigh of relief.

“I know what you mean,” she says while flipping her hair. “When you find the perfect pair of jeans, it feels like you can’t wear anything else.”

Edith opens her mouth to inform her she misunderstood, to tell her these are actually the only pair of pants I own, but I beat her to it.

“Preach it, sister.”

She beams and I smile back.

“California, huh?” she asks. “What are you doing in this hellhole?”

Jack scowls behind her, but I do my best to ignore him.

Her manicured brows arch with interest. “Well, I’m dying to hear it.”

Jack

Christine won't stop talking about Meredith. We left the ranch thirty minutes ago and we're supposed to be on a date, talking about us and our future. Instead, she's going on and on about my new housekeeper. Don't get me wrong, I love most any excuse to avoid talking about our relationship, just not this one.

"Is it weird that I have a girl crush on her?"

Not that weird considering every ranch hand on my property has an actual crush on her.

"She's really pretty," she continues, a little too airily.

"Hadn't noticed."

I swing my truck into the first available parking spot outside of Hill Top Vineyards and kill the engine.

She laughs as she unbuckles her seatbelt. "Thank you for that, but it's not necessary. I'm not accusing you of wanting her, so there's no sense in pretending you're blind."

I know a trap when I see one.

"She's my employee, and Helen's sister," I point out, hoping that will force her to drop the issue.

It does. We walk in silence up to the tasting room at the top of the hill. Hill Top Vineyards—aptly named for its location—has been around for a few years. They're a leader in Central Texas vino, and I've been meaning to drive out and experience the place myself for a while.

"It's annoying, really. That whole fresh face, no makeup thing only works for like five percent of women."

So I guess we're back to talking about Meredith. I want to groan.

"I always say you don't need that crap," I tell her.

She laughs and pats my shoulder. “That’s sweet of you to say, but you’ve never actually seen me without a full face of makeup.”

I narrow my eyes, racking my brain. Surely... “How’s that possible? We’ve been together for two years.”

She shrugs. “That’s what happens when you see someone once a month. We might have been together for a while, but in some ways it still feels like we just started dating.”

I know what she means. There have been door-to-door salesmen I feel like I know better than I know Christine. It’s an unsettling thought, but I shake it off and usher her inside the winery.

Since it’s a Friday evening, the place is packed, but I planned ahead. We have reservations for a tour and tasting, and we arrive just in time to go with the next group.

My dad started the vineyard at Blue Stone Ranch nearly 20 years ago, and even though I have someone else heading the day-to-day operations, I try to stay as educated on the industry as possible. It’s not like I’ll glean any trade secrets from a public tour at Hill Top (unless I’m lucky), but that’s not my aim. I like tasting the wine, talking to the employees, checking out the atmosphere. It’s important to see how we stack up against our competition.

I’m enthralled through the entire tour. Most people are there to get shitfaced while feeling superior to poorer people with Bud Light. The level of pretense and false interest is high, but by the time we’re out in the vineyard, we’ve lost half the group. Meanwhile, I’m glued to the tour guide’s side as if there’s a written exam at the end. The guy hates me, wasting my time with fluff. “And did you know one vine produces roughly ten bottles of wine?” No one cares.

I chime in. “Are you guys administering the fertilizer after the vine has blossomed or closer to when the grapes are about a quarter inch?”

He doesn’t know the answer and we move along to the outdoor receiving area where the growers deposit the freshly harvested grapes. From there, we head inside to see the fermentation vessels: the huge, stainless steel tanks that house the pulp while it turns into wine. They have a larger facility than we do (I ask the tour guide the exact square footage, but he doesn't know), and I'm especially impressed by their aging rooms. We age our red wine in oak barrels as well, but from the looks of it, they produce nearly twice as much volume as we do. After that, I grab Christine and skip the part of the tour that leads through the bottling room—we just paid a branding company an arm and a leg to design our packaging. Besides, I'm getting hungry.

Finally, I've found a weakness: their food is shit. I know it's common to have light fare like fruit and nuts in tasting rooms, but at Blue Stone, we make sure there are better, more filling options available. After all, these people eventually need to drive home.

While we're sampling various white wines, the owner—a man about my age, named Vince Davies—comes to find me. He claps me on the shoulder and I turn to greet him.

“My tour guide says you were harassing him,” he teases.

“Just getting my money's worth.”

“You know I would have taken you around the place myself if I'd known you were coming.”

I wave away his offer. “How am I supposed to steal all your secrets with you shadowing me?”

His eyes sweep over to Christine and I introduce them.

Vince smiles. “Ah, now I see the real reason why you didn't want me around.”

I laugh good-naturedly then go back to shoveling birdseed into my mouth. I'm starving.

“Oh stop,” Christine says with a subtle blush. She's obviously impressed with Vince, and I'm actually glad she's so eager to talk to him for a while because I'm happier taking a back seat in social settings like this.

“You have a beautiful winery,” she says with a flirtatious smile. “I think we’ll head out and watch the sunset in a little while.”

“To be honest, the view is probably 90% of why people come out here,” Vince admits. “The wine is just the cherry on top.”

“It really is breathtaking!” Christine continues, reaching out to touch his arm.

That’s one of the things Hill Top has over us: location. From their large back patio, guests can look out over a deep valley where all the grapes are grown. The view extends for miles, and it’s the reason their sunset tastings sell out months ahead of time.

Vince motions to the patio. “I actually keep one of the best tables in the house reserved out there. I’d be happy to offer it up to you guys for the night.”

It’s tempting, but I don’t think I’ll last through the sunset. My plan was to take the tour, speed through the tasting, and then find a place to eat with Christine on the way back to the ranch, preferably somewhere with a drive-through.

“I appreciate the offer, but—”

“Yes! Please, that would be great.” Christine cuts me off. “But you must join us!”

Vince chuckles and glances over to see what I want to do. I swallow a sigh. “Sure, yeah. Sounds great.”

For the next hour, the three of us sit outside while the Texas sun paints the sky pink and orange as it disappears behind the horizon. Christine does most of the talking. Vince tries to keep up, and I mostly stay quiet, sipping my wine, ignoring the loud grumbles coming from my stomach, and trying to figure out why I’m not having a better time.

It’s not the people I’m with. Vince is a great guy—we’d be better friends if I had the time for it—and Christine is always good company. They aren’t the problem. No, I feel uneasy, like I’m sitting here missing out on something.

Yeah, something like a double cheeseburger with bacon.

As soon as Vince excuses himself to get back to work, I sigh with relief and start to stand.

“Christine, you about ready to go?”

She jerks her gaze to me, and I get stabbed by a million tiny daggers. Oof. She’s pissed.

“We haven’t even been here an hour!”

“I’m starving.”

“Then eat some nuts.” She shoves the nearly empty bowl toward me. “Jesus, do you even know how to relax? You’ve been sitting over there jiggling your leg under the table for the last hour.”

I frown. “I can relax.”

“Prove it.”

“I will—at home. I’m hungry and ready to go.”

She bites back a response, grabs for her purse, and storms off ahead of me. I have no clue what I’ve done to piss her off, and truthfully, I can’t muster the energy to care. I’m working on an empty stomach here. I just hope she’s not so mad that she’ll object to stopping for fast food on the way home.

Tense silence fills the truck as we start the drive. She’s sitting over on the passenger side as far away from me as she can get, arms crossed and attention laser-focused out the window. I ask her if she likes this radio station, but she doesn’t respond. I ask her if she’s hungry, and she shifts more of her back to me. If we weren’t currently flying down the highway, I think she’d open the door and fling herself out.

Okay then.

Silence it is.

We drive another thirty minutes like that, and while I don’t mind the quiet, I have enough sense not to pull into any of the restaurants we pass. The only thing worse than being inattentive to her needs would be attending to mine—and I don’t really want a milkshake dumped over my head.

When we finally make it back to the farmhouse, I park my truck and turn to her, prepared to say whatever it is she needs me to say so we can continue on with our night.

“Listen, I know I haven’t been the perfect boyfriend.”

“Boyfriend?!” she snaps, throwing her hands in the air and finally turning in my direction. “We’re hardly acquaintances at this point, Jack!”

“You don’t mean that.”

Her eyes turn into angry slits, and I realize she’s way more worked up than I thought she was. On a scale of one to ten, she’s a twenty-five, and I’m hovering somewhere near a two.

“It doesn’t matter what I mean. You’ve been checked out of this relationship from the very beginning, and I’ve been too in love with you to do anything about it!”

My stomach tightens at the L word.

Her face crumbles. “Do you know what it feels like to want someone who can’t even make time for you?”

Shit. Now I feel bad. “I’m sorry. I’ll make it up to you.”

“Yeah?” she prods. “How are you going to do that? Say you love me? Move to San Antonio? Buy me a ring?”

Sure... those are some really good options, but I know I won’t do any of them. I’m sitting here with a woman I’ve been involved with for two years. She’s crying and shouting and there’s still 40% of me that’s focused on getting some dinner. What the hell is wrong with me? She’s called me emotionless before, and maybe it’s true. Maybe I’m made of stone. Maybe when I lost my parents when I was younger, something inside me shriveled up and died.

My silence is louder than any response she’s waiting to hear.

She huffs out an angry sigh and turns to stare out the front windshield.

“I drove three hours in Friday after-work traffic to see you, and you dragged me to a winery.” I open my mouth to defend my actions, but she doesn’t give me the chance. “You realize the last four times I've come up here, we've done the exact same thing? You aren't taking me on dates—you're dragging me around wine country on research trips."

That's not entirely true.

"What about a few months back when we went out to Fredericksburg? I took you to that little bed and breakfast."

"Conveniently connected to a vineyard."

Is that what that was?

"To make matters worse," she continues, "I sat there tonight, openly flirting with Vince, trying to work up some fire in you, and in the end, I got nothin'. Nada. Squat."

I shrug. That was a waste of her time. "I'm not the jealous type."

She laughs acerbically and shakes her head. "Of course you aren't. To get jealous, you have to actually value something. You have to be scared of someone else having what you want. You're not scared of losing me."

"C'mon, that's not true. I know I'd be a damn fool if I let you go."

"Be that as it may," she says, her gaze falling to her lap, "you know you're doing it anyway. You're just too comfortable to break things off with me for good."

"You're a catch, Christine."

She pinches her eyes closed. "You say that like you're a robot."

Do I sound cold? I don't mean to. I don't know how else to be, how else to sound. I don't know what to say or how to act. I'm walking a tightrope here. I don't want to lie to her and feed her more bullshit just to keep her, but I also don't want her to leave this truck thinking less of herself. Objectively, she is a catch. I am a fool if I let her go.

"You're a great guy, Jack, but it's time for me to move on."

"So you're breaking up with me? Just like that?"

She turns and offers me a wistful smile. There are tears in her eyes, and I reach out to take her hand and squeeze it once before she pulls it away.

“Tell Edith bye for me.”

“You don’t want to tell her yourself?”

She shakes her head and pushes open her door to hop out of the truck. “Nah. She never did like me. Honestly, I’d rather just head home.”

“Why don’t you stay the night? I don’t want you driving in the dark. You can stay in a guest room or have my bed if you prefer it. I can sleep on the couch.”

She declines and we hop out so I can walk her to her car.

She buries her face in her hands. “God, this is the weirdest breakup ever. We’re supposed to be shouting at one another.”

I frown. “I’ve never shouted at you.”

“I know.” She drops her hands and levels a steady gaze at me. “That’s exactly why we’re breaking up.”

No amount of urging can get Christine to stay the night, but she promises to text me when she gets home to let me know she got there safely. I watch her drive off, turn for the house, and promptly decide to get back in my truck. I don’t want to go in there and face Edith. Besides, there are practical considerations at play: I’m still very hungry.

I drive to the closest Whataburger, order my favorite combo, sit in the parking lot, and eat by myself. The food tastes so good, it makes up for the fact that Christine’s words have made a mess of my psyche.

I’ve never shouted at you.

I know. That's exactly why we're breaking up.

I'm clever enough to read between the lines. Christine didn't want me abusing her, she wanted me to give a shit. It was a running theme in all of our arguments, and ultimately it was the reason she broke up with me earlier tonight. Love, jealousy, fear, anger—those are all emotions she would have gladly dealt with from me, yet for some reason I just couldn't give them to her. For two years, I was gentle and levelheaded, logical and distant. It's the way I've always preferred it. A wiser man would take the problem to a therapist, but maybe I'm not ready to admit I need help.

Besides, I do have emotions.

I've experienced anger. Jesus, I've shouted at Meredith so much this week my throat should be sore.

I've experienced love. It's the feeling I get every morning when Alfred props his head up on my pillow and licks my cheek until I wake up.

I've even experienced fear and loss, and maybe I'm not so eager to relive that pain any time soon.

So, I process my breakup with Christine over a double cheeseburger and fries, and by the time I drive out of the parking lot, I've already come to terms with it, just like that.

Damn, I am heartless.

Maybe Christine really is better off without me.

Meredith

I'm not spying, per se, when I hear Jack and Christine get back from their date. I just have the windows open because I'm still living without A/C (so far I've lost four pounds in water weight, and I've only had several hallucinations!). I hear them pull up on the gravel drive because there are no other noises in the country. None. I mean, there are cicadas and the occasional moo from a cow, an oink from a pig, but all in all, I'm shocked at how quiet it is out here in the evenings. I'm not quite used to it, and that's why I get so excited when Jack and Christine pull up the gravel drive. It's not that I think they will ask me to hang out with them. I mean, Jack definitely won't want to, but Christine seemed really nice and she liked my jeans, and OH MY GOD I AM GETTING SO BORED IN THIS SHACK I'LL DISCUSS AMNESTY WITH THE SPIDERS IF THEY'LL JUST BE MY FRIENDS!

The first few nights here were great, like an LA detox. I was satisfied letting the last few loose threads of my old life fall away in the balmy air, but now I need some companionship. I'd bother Edith, but she's out with friends. She has more of those than I do even though she's 104. Meanwhile, I'm here, alone, pretending to do yoga—which, by the way, is extremely difficult to do considering I have no yoga mat. Not only are there a few gaps in the floorboards, there are splinters too. It's hard enough convincing myself to work out on a Friday night without having to worry about being impaled by a jagged piece of timber.

So, yes, I'm very eager to run out and become a third wheel on their date, but then I remind myself that they probably want their alone time. Christine drove in to visit him, and more than likely they're going to head up to Jack's room and have wild, haven't-seen-you-in-weeks sex. Oh god, what if I can hear them? I don't even have a TV or radio I can blast to drown it out. I'll have to sing hymns to myself. Oh please no.

I'm still in the middle of yoga, wondering if it's worth risking another drive in the clunker-mobile just to escape the imminent sounds of sweaty copulation, when I catch their voices and realize something is off. They aren't laughing and teasing. They just sound...sad.

For the record, I want to be a good person. I want to close the windows and let them argue privately, but it's hot, and I'm bored, and as long as I angle myself against the side of the window just so and keep most of my face hidden, they should never even realize I'm here. I feel like a child with one eye open, watching TV during naptime.

I spot Christine as she steps out of his truck and shakes her head.

"God, this is the weirdest breakup ever," she says. "We're supposed to be shouting at one another."

Say whaa?

And then Jack says, "I've never shouted at you."

My mouth drops open. Is that a joke? How is that possible?! I've been here a week and he's shouted at me so much I'm not even sure he can speak at a socially acceptable volume.

She dabs at her eyes, wiping away tears, and Jack pulls her into a hug.

Oh wow, this is sad. I lean forward. Poor, poor Christine. I wish I had binoculars.

It's such an awkward exchange, and still, I can't look away. Mostly, I'm amazed at how gentle he's being with her. He's rubbing her hair! It's like the moment you bump into your teacher at the grocery store—all of a sudden, he seems like a normal guy.

After a little more back and forth I can't really hear—I think it's boring logistics about the breakup—they hug again and then he opens her door for her. I have never in my life witnessed such maturity, such restraint! They're smiling, for crying out loud! Christine is laughing, and Jack makes her promise she'll text him when she gets home safe! This must be one of those "truly mutual" breakups I've only heard about in books. I wouldn't know how that feels. I left my husband in the middle of the night and didn't even have the sense to pack two pair of underwear. Compared to them, I'm a petulant child running from her problems.

Christine drives off after that and then Jack stands outside of his farmhouse, momentarily frozen. I have no clue what he's thinking. I have no clue if he initiated the split or if he was just dumped out of the blue. All I know is that in this moment, my heart goes out to him. I stand by the window watching him for a few seconds, waiting to see what he'll do. Then, without thinking of the consequences, I decide I'm going to go make sure he's okay. I was just talking to myself about how I needed to make some friends, and consolation is what friends do best!

I change into my jeans and the white blouse I haven't worn since first arriving on the farm. I check my reflection in the mirror over the sink and am pleasantly surprised by what I find. My tan skin is even and slightly flushed from yoga, my hair is up in a high ponytail, and a few wisps soften the look. I check my teeth: straight, white, and mostly free of the food I had for dinner. I could probably use some mascara or something, but there's no way I'm dolling myself up just to go check on Jack.

I turn, heart racing. I have no clue what I'll say when I see him. Do I act oblivious about his breakup? Or do I cut to the chase, admit I heard it all, and offer my condolences? It's not like it really matters what I decide to say—chances are, I won't even have time to get any words out before he storms off and slams the door in my face.

I wipe my sweaty palms on my jeans then head outside, surprised by the little pep in my step. The world always seems so much more pleasant after spending time in the shack. I'm excited to see Jack, and maybe he'll actually be friendly for once. I glance to the spot where he was frozen a few minutes ago, but he isn't there anymore. Then I hear gravel pinging off metal and jerk my gaze in the direction of the main road. He's in his truck, heading back down the gravel drive. His red tail lights fade in the distance, and then he's gone.

Shit.

I wonder if he's going after her. Maybe. At the very least, he's leaving here. He probably has other places to be on a Friday night, a local drinking hole or something. I am back to square one, alone and bored, and worse, I am now fully dressed. Thank God I didn't fuss with my hair or do my makeup.

I laugh it off and look around, cheeks burning. It's one thing to know I almost put myself out there, quite another to do it in front of anyone else. My gaze snags on a cow standing near the pasture fence, staring at me, probably embarrassed to be near me.

"No worries! I didn't really want to talk to him anyway!" I shout over to it. "False alarm."

It doesn't move, just keeps slowly munching on some grass, judging me.

"Oh, because your Friday night is so much better. Pfff. Yeah, okay," I taunt.

The cow turns then and walks away, as if it, too, cannot wait to get away from me.

"Good talk!"

Okay, now I'm just shouting into the void. No one, not even the cow, is listening.

Get a grip, Meredith!

I march right back into the shack and lock the door. Good. This is better—a night of no distractions. I have a ton to do. I need to roll up my pretend yoga mat and fold that t-shirt over there. Really, it'll take me all night to decide if I like the twin bed where it is or if maybe I want to switch it up. I could put the bed against that wall, or that wall, or that wall. The possibilities are endless. Phew. Honestly, I'm booked. If that cow could see me now.

Thank God I made plans with Edith for Saturday morning. We're going into town to shop at a thrift store, and then she's going to take me to her favorite lunch spot. I'm so excited, I'm ready and waiting for her out in front of the farmhouse fifteen minutes before we're due to leave. I spent all morning getting ready as if we were going to the Oscars. I showered and gave myself a blowout with the Cold War-era blow dryer Edith lent me (I needed a break from the ponytails) then I applied a little bit of makeup from the bag I had stashed in my purse for on-the-go touchups.

I put my jeans and white blouse back on since no one saw me in the outfit last night (cow not included), and then I slip on the loafers I've been avoiding for the last week. Thankfully, my blisters have morphed into calluses. In the end, I look nearly like I used to back in California: poised and polished. Who cares that I'm wearing the only outfit I actually own, or that I put it on in a dingy shack? By the time I get back from the thrift store, I'll have a few more options for clothing, and hopefully a few things to soften this place up.

I have all of my cash on me, safely stashed in my wallet. I don't plan on spending all $500, instead capping today's purchases at $75. A week ago, I wouldn't have blinked at spending that amount. Now, it makes my stomach ache. It's nearly one-fifth of my entire savings. Too bad I really don't have a choice. I need some more clothes, and while Edith's sneakers have worked so far, I need a pair that actually fit.

The rest of the cash is going straight to the bank. I'm opening up my own account today—one Andrew has no claim to. $425 might not be much, but it's better than nothing, and more importantly, it's all mine.

The farmhouse's screen door swings open and I glance up with a smile, expecting to see Edith. Jack strolls out instead. He has a steaming mug of coffee in one hand and a to-go cup in the other. I'm surprised to see he's still wearing his pajamas: loose gray sweats and a white cotton t-shirt. Usually by this time, he's already been working for a few hours, and this weekend version of my boss is an intriguing sight. His hair is slightly ruffled. His expression is soft, almost as if the effects of sleep haven't totally worn off yet. He almost looks sweet, but I know better.

He stands there, squinting to keep the morning sun from blinding him while he surveys me.

I check for signs of a broken heart: puffy eyes, downcast gaze, slumped posture.

I see chiseled features, broad shoulders, and a face that looks well rested and tan. He looks like he's never slept better.

"Edith told me to get you coffee," he says by way of greeting.

Oh. I was planning on getting some in town, but now that I think about it, that's not really an option. A $5 cup of joe is now a luxury, not a necessity.

I meet him halfway and reach for the to-go cup.

"That was nice of you," I say, holding it up in thanks. Even if it was Edith's idea, it was still a nice gesture.

He shrugs and brushes me off. "Probably put too much creamer in."

The coffee is the exact shade of light brown that I prefer.

"Looks good. I can't even tell you spit in it," I tease.

"Your hair looks different."

I jerk my gaze back up to find him staring down at me with a confused expression. His head is tipped to the side, and from this angle, the morning light is sparkling in his eyes so they look more golden than brown. I've seen that exact shade once before, on a lion at the San Diego zoo. He had his face pressed right up to the viewing glass and I forced myself not to look away. Looking at Jack from this perspective feels eerily similar.

“Did you cut it?” he asks.

I resist a smile. “No, I’m just wearing it down for a change. I finally had time to style it this morning.”

“Oh.” He nods and averts his gaze, turning toward the pasture and sipping his coffee. It’s probably the closest thing to a compliment I’ll ever get from Jack. “Been meaning to get mine cut.”

“I think it’d look good a little shorter.”

He takes another sip of coffee, and I catch myself staring at his profile...not just staring at it, totally transfixed. It’s the strong jawline and the scruff—he’s a type of handsome I’m not quite used to. Andrew was good-looking in a pretty way. Jack’s sort of handsome makes my stomach twist tight and my hands get a little clammy. He notices me staring out of the corner of his eye and I jerk my gaze away quickly, narrowing my attention on a meadow in the distance. Yup, flowers—thought that was what those were.

Edith—bless her heart (as she’s taught me to say)—chooses that moment to join us outside. She pushes open the screen door with Alfred hot on her heels. The golden retriever gets one look at me and bounds down the stairs for a greeting. Oh god, I’m about to be trampled to death. Goodbye, cruel world. I brace myself, holding the to-go cup out in front of me to keep hot coffee from spilling all over my white blouse, and then I pinch my eyes closed, thinking it’s best not to look death straight in the eye.

Jack must foresee the incident a moment before it happens, because he emits a loud, sharp whistle. I peek just as Alfred’s attention jerks to him and in a flash, he sits and stays, happy to obey his owner.

“Good boy,” Jack says, patting his head.

Damn. “I really need to learn how to do that whistle.”

“Jack, please tell me you’re going to get a haircut today,” Edith interrupts with a disdainful shake of her head. “You look like a damn hipster.”

Hipster? Edith is full of surprises.

“Plannin’ on it,” he says as she waves me over to her truck.

“Let’s go,” Edith says briskly. “If we don’t get there early, the thrift store’ll be overtaken with old biddies, and we still need to stop by the bank on the way.”

Edith seems to be oblivious to the fact that she is technically a biddy herself, but I sure as hell don’t point that fact out to her. I just keep my lips zipped and dutifully hop into the passenger side of her truck. Jack waves us off from the porch before he pats his thigh to summon Alfred and they both turn back for the house.

We stop at the bank and somehow turn a task that should take 20 minutes into an hour-long affair. Edith knows everyone. Every employee inside the branch stops to chat with her, which inevitably leads to an introduction with me, “Helen’s little sister”. As a newcomer in a small town, they want to know it all: where I’m from, why I’m here, blood type, SAT score. I get it, and while I’m careful to sidestep their personal questions, I’m still happy to chat. I’ve had very little in the way of human interaction for the last few days, so I will happily accept the company of Lisa, the rambling teller, and Dotty, the elderly manager, with their bouffant hair and southern accents and nosy niceties. By the time we leave, I feel like I’ve made a whole group of new friends. This must be what it feels like to have a girl squad.

When we arrive at the thrift store, I expect the same kind of greeting, but other than the short white-haired man with the coke-bottle glasses behind the counter, we have the place to ourselves, and boy, do I clean up. I was expecting California prices, but these tags have me feeling like I can walk out and buy a Coke for a nickel.

“EDITH! THESE SHORTS ARE FIVE DOLLARS!”

She yanks them down from where I’m hoisting them over my head, looks at the fabric, and shakes her head. “We can talk him down to three.”

Am I dreaming? How is everything so cheap?!

I find a few fitted t-shirts I can wear while working and snag two pairs of denim shorts. I even toss in some pajama shorts and two sundresses, one of which is a little fancy. I have zero places to wear a dress like that, but it's too pretty to leave on the rack. After that, I stumble into a section of the store filled with bras and unopened packages of underwear, and I'm shaking with excitement. Sure, they're Fruit of the Loom tighty-whities, but the entire pack costs $3.50, and if I buy them, I won't have to wash the same freaking pair over and over again.

I basically acquire an entire wardrobe for $18.25, and then we head to the back corner where home goods and knickknacks are piled up, one on top of another.

I crack my knuckles, accepting the challenge. By this point, I am a scary good negotiator.

"Hey Robert! Robbie! There's a little stain on the corner of this rug. I'll take it off your hands for $5!"

Between you and me, the stain is minimal and nothing I can't scrub out once I get home.

"How bad is it?" he hollers back, too lazy to get up from behind the counter.

"I think it's blood! It's probably evidence from some horrible crime—"

"Fine! I'll give ya half off."

I turn to Edith, eyes wide. "Edith," I hiss. "That's six bucks!"

I add the blue Moroccan-style rug to my growing pile of purchases, along with a little antique lamp and a worn wooden stool I want to use as a bedside table. It looks artfully distressed, which makes me laugh. I know people back in Beverly Hills who pay interior designers thousands of dollars for furniture like the stuff I'm finding in this hole-in-the-wall shop.

When I happen upon an antique mirror that looks straight out of an Anthropologie catalogue, I bring out the big guns. It was originally marked at $25, and I wear Robert down to $10 ("Think of it as a new-in-town discount!"). Edith throws me a conspiratorial thumbs-up, and I decide to call it a day. I feel like I'm basically robbing the place at this point. Besides, the cute picture frames (4 for $1) we pass on the way to the register aren't necessary. Edith tries to convince me to get them, but I tell her we have enough stuff as is. In reality, I'm just too embarrassed to tell her I have no one I'd want to fill them with. My parents? Hard pass. A ripped-down-the-middle photo from my wedding? Yeah, I'm good. I seriously consider just keeping the generic stock photo of a family enjoying a beach day. It's tempting, but too sad even for me. Plus, the kid's eyes follow me wherever I move—no thanks.

We load up my purchases in the truck and then I hop in, ready for lunch.

“What are you doing?” Edith asks, standing out on the sidewalk with her hands on her hips.

I pause in buckling my seatbelt. “Aren't we going to eat now?”

We better be. All that deal-making really worked up my appetite.

“Yeah”—she points across the street—“the diner's right over there.”

I chuckle and hop out of the truck. Small towns, man. It's crazy. Every place we've gone to this morning has been located in the town square—a sight I haven't really admired until now. It's another adorable movie set, just like the ranch. There's no other way to describe how old-world and quaint everything is. The buildings are historic and stately, but they're filled with antique shops and clothing stores, a bakery, a coffee shop, a dentist, and a handful of boutiques that are probably more hobbies than businesses. I spot an independent bookstore and make a mental note to stop there after lunch. We pass a bustling restaurant, but Edith shakes her head.

“Love that bistro—best chicken salad in town—but I'm in the mood for something greasy.”

We continue around the square toward the diner, passing a gourmet cookware store and a wine tasting room. People are everywhere, strolling through the shops and enjoying the late-morning weather before the blazing sun hits full force. Quite a few of them are gathered in the center of the square, where a well-manicured park surrounds a gleaming limestone courthouse. There are kites in the air and adorable children running around giggling. Parents are smiling. In one corner of the park, beneath a shady oak tree, an ice cream vendor sells chocolate-dipped cones as fast as he can make them. It's all so cute, it feels slightly like the start of a thriller. Any minute now, we'll all look up to the sky as a meteor or UFO spells our doom, or a horde of zombies will rush in and start gnawing through cowboy boots.

"Is there a festival going on this weekend or something?"

Edith shakes her head. "There's a barbecue cook-off in a few weeks. Don't think there's anything special going on today though."

"So the town square's always this packed on a Saturday?"

She follows my gaze, not as impressed as I am. "People drive down from around the hills looking for a weekend getaway. It's the way it's always been—country folk make a big to-do out of going into the city, while city slickers look for an escape out here."

She says slickers like it's a bad word, and I can't help but smile.

"Blue Stone has a hotel of its own, right?"

She nods. "It's nestled beside the vineyard, booked up a year in advance these days thanks to all the weddings."

There's a short wait at the diner, and as we're seated in a booth by the window, I'm still thinking about the scene I saw outside and considering whether or not I could ever live in Cedar Creek permanently. There's no mall or movie theater within 50 miles. I haven't seen a yoga studio, and Edith confirms there isn't one. If I stayed here, I'd probably miss the amenities of living in a place like Los Angeles, but I still can't help but think that people here might have figured something out. Small town life looks pretty great.

With that thought, I glance up at the adorable blonde teenager waiting to take my order.

Edith and I both order All-American Scrambles then pass off our menus.

I sit back against the cushioned booth and meet Edith's studying gaze.

"So, you survived your first week," she comments.

I smile. "Sure did."

"Any scars?"

"From Jack?" I laugh. "No. He's nothing I can't handle."

"He wasn't always like this."

"Like what?" I feign innocence.

She scowls and pours some creamer in her coffee. "Don't bother sparing my feelings. We both know my grandson is stubborn as a mule and kicks like one too. Won't listen to a damn thing I tell him these days—"

"What changed?"

She looks up at me, confused. "Huh?"

"You said he didn't used to be like this."

"Ah." She nods thoughtfully and sips her coffee before replying. "You probably ought to be hearing this from Jack, but he'll never tell you, so I'll just have to do it. When he was a junior in college, his parents passed away in a car accident out on I-38. He was only 20, and I know that might not seem all that young to you, but we were a close-knit family and he didn't have any brothers or sisters. Still a kid, really. He should have been worrying about tests and goofing off with his friends. Instead, he had to cope with their passing while struggling with the newfound responsibility he wasn't quite ready for: running Blue Stone. I tried to do my best to soften the blow, but the fact is, the day they died, the ranch and everything that went with it became his responsibility to bear."

"How'd he handle it?"

Her focus is on her coffee as she continues, as if she can't look me in the eye while she divulges details about Jack's life. "He buckled down in school, graduated a year early. He was damn near ready to drop out and move home, but I made him finish. I knew he'd regret it otherwise."

"Was he in over his head when he got here?"

She moves her gaze out the window as if recalling that time. "You know, as crazy as it sounds, that boy hit the ground running and never looked back. It had never been the plan for him to enter the family business so young, but he'd worked with his dad enough over the summers to know how the business worked. Not to mention, his grandpa and dad never went to college, so he was actually more prepared to take up the reins than he realized."

I'm impressed. Even at twenty-eight, I don't think I'd be able to do what he's done.

"It's come at a cost though," she continues, guilt laced in her tone. "He's not that same lighthearted kid he used to be. I think that part of him died with his parents on the highway that day."

I cast my eyes down to the table. "I'm sure. There's no way that kind of loss doesn't change a person."

"It's not all bad, but I don't think he gives himself enough time off from work. It's like he's constantly trying to make his parents proud, but they'll never get another chance to say so, to tell him he's allowed to take a break. Plus, living on the ranch offers no separation from work and life."

"It's just all work."

She nods, agreeing. "It doesn't help that ever since the accident, he pushes people away—friends, acquaintances, relatives. Arm's length isn't good enough for Jack. He wants a couple feet between him and everyone else, and he gets it... except for me, of course. It takes more than a little shoving around to shake me."

"What about Alfred?"

She smiles, recalling the memory. “I brought Alfred home a couple years back without Jack’s consent. Boy was he pissed, and he didn’t give in easy, either. For weeks, the dog followed him around the house, just a little orphan fluff-ball who knew nothing but love.” She holds her hands out to cradle her palms, showing me how small he was back then. “Jack wanted nothing to do with him in the beginning, and he succeeded in keeping his distance there for a while.”

I laugh, thinking of the way the two are now. “Clearly you won in the end.”

She beams proudly. “That’s because I know Jack. I know deep down, he still wants love and affection. He just won’t open himself up to that vulnerability. It’s logical in his mind: he’ll never have to deal with another loss like that if he doesn’t let anyone get too close.”

I lean forward, more interested in the topic than I should be. “How’d you convince him to give Alfred a chance?”

She slaps her knee, laughing. “Convince him?! Haven’t you been listening? There is no convincing Jack. I used dirty tricks. I pushed Alfred into Jack’s room every night. That puppy would sleep on the foot of his bed and lick his face to wake him up every morning. Jack took to locking his door after a while, so I had to get creative. I trained Alfred and made sure he was the best dog anyone could ever ask for. I made sure Jack was around him as much as possible. I even complained about an ache in my shoulder so Jack would have to step in and throw the tennis ball for him a couple times a week.” She winks. “I’m just a frail old lady, y’know.”

“I’m surprised you haven’t done the same thing with a woman.”

Her eyes alight with mischief, but I don’t get the chance to dig deeper. Just then, a deep male voice interrupts our conversation.

“Meredith? Is that you?”

I jerk my attention toward the speaker, stunned by the man I see standing there.

Jack

“And do you know who surprised us at lunch?”

“Oh, I’m sure you’ll tell me.”

Edith is unmoved by my obvious indifference.

“Tucker Carroway!”

“Makes sense, considering he works in the courthouse across the street. He probably eats there all the time. Will you hand me that wrench? No, not that one. To your left—that one.”

Edith slaps the tool impatiently into my open palm then continues. “Yes, obviously he eats there all the time—that’s not the weird part! The weird part is that he already knew Meredith! Did you know they were friends?”

Huh. I grip the wrench a little tighter.

“Had no clue.”

While that’s an interesting piece of information, I’m hoping this conversation will end soon. Edith found me as soon as she and Meredith returned from town. I’ve been out in the barn most of the morning, working on an old tractor, trying to see if I can get it to run again. It’s probably futile, but some part of me thinks the rusty beast still has a little life left in it. It belonged to my dad, and he took pretty good care of things when he could.

“Apparently the other day, when Meredith drove that old Chevy to the grocery store, Tucker helped her when it stalled on the side of the road. How sweet is that?”

I focus my attention on the tractor, trying to figure out why the carburetor’s flooding. The needle and seat could be dirty. There could be too much fuel pressure, and I’d just need to test the fuel pump—

“Jack.”

“Yeah, sure. Nice of him.”

“Anyway, Tucker didn’t just come over to say hello and dash off. He asked Meredith out on a date right in front of me.”

“What?”

I jerk up so fast, I knock over my workbench and tools go scattering to the ground. Edith smirks, having hit her mark. Now that I’ve given her a reaction, there’s no stopping her. She starts circling around me, sizing me up. If she had a pocketknife, she’d be flipping it open and closed menacingly.

“Oh, what with my old age, it’s been so long since I’ve seen romance like that.”

“What’d she say?”

“She tried to politely decline, but I wouldn’t let her. The attraction was obvious, so I invited him to sit down and stay for a cup of coffee. They talked the whole time—I couldn’t even get a word in edgewise. He’s such a nice man, and easy on the eyes too.”

“You are aware she’s married,” I point out caustically.

Edith rolls her eyes. “Something in her eyes tells me she’s been checked out of that relationship for a long time. Now that they’re separated, what is she supposed to do, shrivel up into an old maid at 28?”

“It’s only been a week!”

Her eyes go wide. “Boy, what’s got your panties in a twist?”

I bend down and start yanking tools off the ground. “It just says a lot about her sense of loyalty if she’s willing to jump ship like that. I’m not sure that trait makes for the best employee either.”

Edith’s brows arch with interest and her tone takes a sharp left turn. “Well she seems like a fine housekeeper so far, so you needn’t worry about that, and you’ve made yourself very clear about thinking she’s the scum of the earth. We’ll see what Tucker thinks.”

I furrow my brows and murmur, “She’s not the scum of the earth.”

I jerk up, having realized my mistake, and find Edith grinning like the cat that caught the canary.

I point an accusing finger straight at her. “I see what you’re doing.”

She ignores me and goes right back to telling me about lunch. “Anyway, Tucker couldn’t stay long—had to run back to the courthouse, I’m sure to a very important case—but long story short, he’s going to take her to David’s wedding!”

“David, my hand David?”

She beams. “One and the same.”

“Bullshit. She better’ve turned him down,” I say before explaining why I care. “I don’t want everyone pissed at me when she disappears back to California.”

Edith bats away my anger like it’s a wiffle ball, too accustomed to it by now. “She tried to, but I agreed for her, told her most of the town would be there and seeing as how she already has so many friends here, it’d be weird if she didn’t go.”

“You aren’t making any sense. Meredith has lived here for a week—ONE week. There’s no way she has that many friends.”

* * *

I’m wrong, of course. Meredith has more friends than I do, and this becomes painfully obvious when I’m in town on Sunday morning. I’m down at the hardware store bright and early, checking out their selection of window air conditioners for the shack, when Chris and David show up unannounced.

“Hey boss!”

Apparently, they also had plans to come down here and get a window unit for Meredith. Isn't that thoughtful of them? The pair hardly has two nickels to rub together between them, but they were about to fork over two hundred bucks so Meredith could have a little cool air blowing on her face.

“We were maybe gonna ask you to reimburse us,” David explains with a proud smile.

And if I said no?

Something tells me they would have just put it on the credit card and hoped the Lord would provide.

What the hell did she put in those muffins?

I expect them to leave once they see I'm going to take care of it, but instead, they hang around and offer up unsolicited advice about which model I should buy—they seem to think she deserves the most expensive unit the store has to offer. Once we're done with that, they bring up the wood floors again. I've already made up my mind to repair them, but they lay it on thick with prepared monologues about how quick they'd fix it up, and “how little trouble it'd be, really.” I agree, but I'm going to help them, because while they're decent ranch hands, I'd bet money they're shitty carpenters. We spend a few minutes grabbing those supplies, and then I think better of it. While I'm doing the floors, I might as well fix a few other things around the place.

By the time we check out, I've racked up over a thousand dollars in construction supplies for Miss California, though David and Chris are quick to point out that the shack is on my property, so really I'm fixing it up for myself. “You're really making money on this whole thing.” Right.

We're headed out of the hardware store to go load everything in my truck when I spot Dotty bee-lining down the sidewalk toward me. She's the manager of the First National Bank, and she's been there since I was a little kid.

“Jack! Yoo-hoo! Hold on there for a second.”

I motion for the guys to keep on loading the supplies then turn to greet her. “What can I do for you, Dotty?”

“Brought you a Dum Dum!”

I like Dotty—she helped me open my first bank account—but apparently, she’s another one of Meredith’s new friends.

“Oh, also, I was just hoping you could pass these along to Meredith for me?”

She’s holding out a Tupperware full of cookies, homemade from the looks of it.

“She came in yesterday to open an account, and she tried one of these,” Dotty explains, patting the lid. “I had them out for the patrons—open more accounts with cookies than with sales pitches, y’know. Anyway, she said they were the best cookies she’d ever had and she asked me for the recipe.”

“So you decided to bake her a batch?” I ask, amused.

She bats my arm playfully. “Well, I just felt so bad for forgetting to give her the recipe. She really was such a dear and went on and on about how good they were. Plus, we got a new teller down at the bank, young girl—Patrick Smith’s daughter? Anyway, it was her first day and Meredith was real patient with her. Mr. Rogers had come in just before and was so snippy, so her nerves were jumbled. He nearly made her cry —”

“I’ll make sure Meredith gets the cookies,” I say, cutting her off so I don’t get trapped here talking to her for God knows how long.

“Oh, okay, I’ll let you get to it. Just remember that the recipe card is right there on top. Make sure she gets that.”

I nod. “Will do.”

“It’s real nice seeing you. Oh! And my business card is there too in case she has any questions about the baking...or banking!”

“Got it.”

“We’ll make sure she gets the cookies, Miss Dotty!” Chris calls from behind me.

“Thanks boys. I’m sure y’all have a big day ahead of you,” she says, waving and backing away. Then she thinks better of it and steps toward me, holding her hand up like she’s just thought of one more thing. “You know what? Just have her call me. It’ll be easier to walk her through the steps. My handwriting probably isn’t all that good.”

I tip my head, tell her approximately twenty times I’ll have Meredith call her, and then make a break for it. In Texas, people have a knack for turning a simple goodbye into an all-day affair.

When I make it back to the ranch, I pull my truck up right over near the shack so unloading won’t take so long. David and Chris offered to come back and help, but I turned them down. I’m not planning on doing any work today other than installing the air conditioner, and that’ll take me five minutes to set up on my own. I pop the tailgate and start unloading building supplies. Normally, I’d store everything in the barn, but the weather should hold and it’ll be more convenient to have everything at my fingertips when we get started tomorrow.

I expect Meredith to step outside to check on all the commotion, but I’m nearly finished unloading before the door opens.

I peer over at her from beneath the brim of my hat, jarred by her appearance. She’s still in her pajamas—one of my t-shirts with sleeping shorts creeping out from underneath. I open my mouth to demand—yet again—that she return my ill-gotten clothes, but then I glance up at her face. Normally, she’s glowing, one of those women with tan skin and a healthy complexion, like she just got back from a tropical vacation. This morning, however, her cheeks are splotchy and her eyes are a little red and puffy. She sniffs and crosses her arms over her chest.

“What are you doing out here?” she asks, her tone somewhere between annoyed and angry.

“Did I interrupt a call?” She’s clutching her cell phone in her right hand. It’s the first time I’ve seen her with the thing since she moved in. “I didn’t even know you had one of those.”

Even Edith carries hers around all day. She claims it's so she can call me when she falls and breaks a hip, but we both know she's addicted to Candy Crush. She's the highest scorer among all her friends, and she can't let the title slide. Also, she's already had two hip replacements. At this point, if she falls, she's liable to break whatever it is she lands on.

Meredith glances down as if just remembering the phone was in her hand. "Oh, no. It was Helen. She—" She pauses and shakes her head. "Anyway, no. You didn't interrupt."

I wonder if she's upset because she had a bad phone call with Helen or if maybe she's starting to have regrets about leaving her old life. Helen said it would only take a week or two before she realized her mistake and fled back home.

Either way, it's not really my business.

I nod toward the stack of supplies. "I'm just unloading a few things. Got you—the shack—an A/C unit this morning." Her gaze follows to where I'm pointing. "It's the best one they had."

"You can take it out of my paycheck," she says quickly, her words clipped and hard.

I bristle at the response. It's not exactly the thank you I was looking for. In fact, it sounds like she's angry with me for helping her out.

"No. I said I'd get you one, so here it is."

"I hope you didn't go through any trouble. That thing looks heavy."

"I can lift a box on my own."

I don't know why we're doing this—why she and I mix like oil and water, why she's not cheery and upbeat with me like she is with everyone else, why we flare up over stupid shit. We aren't fighting, but we aren't exactly playing nice either.

"What's all that other stuff for?" she asks, pointing to the supplies stacked up neatly beside the shack. "Please don't say you're adding on to the farmhouse—that place doesn't need any more floors to mop."

A second ago, I'd been excited to tell her my plans for the place. Now, I don't think I'd be able to stand her reaction. Hell, a part of me wants to load everything back into my truck and drive it right back to the store.

"It's just building supplies," I say after clearing my throat, eager to change the subject. "Mind if I install this A/C now? I have other things I need to get to today."

She nods and steps aside to usher me through the door. I pause on the threshold, shocked to see what it looks like inside. Sure, the shack is still in need of some renovations—there are still gaps in the floorboards and the walls really need new drywall and paint—but she's done her best to make it a home. There's a blue rug on the ground that covers most of the floor, and a wooden stool stands beside the twin bed with a delicate antique lamp on top of it. A paperback I saw Edith reading the other day sits face down beside it.

"Did you buy all this with the advance I gave you?"

"Yes," she answers hesitantly.

I frown, confused.

"Why waste your money?"

What I mean to say is, What's the point in sprucing up a place you have no plans of living in for much longer? but my words come out twisted and meaner than I intended.

"I found some very good deals, thank you very much." Then she brushes past, knocking her shoulder into me accidentally (or probably on purpose). She grabs for her sneakers and heads back for the door at an angry pace. "Now if you're going to get started, I'll go take a walk."

I turn to stop her, to smooth over the situation, but the right words fail me. I'm not surprised; that seems to be a running theme with Meredith. Every time I think I'm making headway with her, I end up putting my foot in my mouth one way or another. Part of it has to do with my prejudices, but I see no way around them. Meredith isn't here for good. One morning I'll wake up and find her gone just like her husband did, and I see no reason to soften my heart or give her the benefit of the doubt. She might have convinced everyone else in this town to love her, but not me.

Meredith

There is no way around it: I am truly on my own. My sister has officially taken up forces with the dark side (A.K.A. Andrew) and there's no talking her out of it. I don't have the strength to keep trying. Not only does it feel like a dagger in my heart every time she sides with him over me, it feels like I'm fighting a losing battle.

Apparently, over the last week, Helen and Brent have been brainstorming ways to get me back to California. That's why Helen called me this morning. I was expecting her to ask me how I was doing, possibly inquire about my mental health, but the conversation felt like a politician stumping on a pro-Andrew platform.

"Have you tried calling him and working this out?"

I heaved an annoyed sigh. "I've been busy working. Besides, this isn't a workable issue. It's over." Unless Andrew's had a lobotomy in the last few days.

"Has he reached out to you?" she asked, sounding like she already knew the answer.

"Some. We're playing phone tag. I'm not avoiding him on purpose."

It's true. He's left two voicemails, both of which were eerily sedated and thoughtful. He went on about how much he misses me and implored me to come home to California so we could work things out. I listened to them in the hopes that he'd break and speak to me over the phone the way he did in private—then I could play the messages for Helen and say, See? This is the monster you want to send me back to.

I should've known he would never be that stupid.

A few minutes later, our conversation took a turn for the worse.

“I stuck my neck out for you, Meredith. You need to start being honest with me.”

My eyes narrowed in confusion. “What are you talking about?”

“You didn’t tell me you’ve done this before. Andrew gave me his side of things earlier this week. He told me last year you disappeared out of the blue just like this.”

WHAT?!

“No. I went to stay in a hotel for a few days to clear my head.”

It was a Best Western down the street. There were roaches in the bathroom, and the man staying next door definitely resembled a MOST WANTED poster I’d seen on the news—that’s how badly I didn’t want to go home.

“According to him, you left then had a change of heart and went crawling back.”

Her tone sounded so accusatory, I had to grit my teeth to keep from screaming.

“Well, he’s lying. He knew I went to get some space. He and I had just had a bad fight and I needed time away from him to think.”

“That’s not the way he made it sound.”

“Then he’s lying!” My arms were flailing at that point. “Jesus, Helen, I’m your sister—why is it so hard for you to just take my word on something?”

“Because whether you like it or not, Andrew is your husband and my brother-in-law, and I’m having a little bit of trouble assuming the worst of him when you’re the one who randomly boarded a plane in the middle of the night!”

“So instead you’ll assume the worst about me?”

She sighed, clearly exhausted by the entire thing. “That’s not what I’m doing. I’m trying to be the voice of reason in all this. Listen, obviously if Andrew is the monster you say he is, I don’t want you to be with him, but you can see how this seems from my side, right? You’ve been with a man for years and up until recently, I've heard nothing but good things. On Facebook, your life looks amazing—it's hard to believe it could have all been a lie.”

“Well it was,” I insisted, angry with myself for how close I was to tears.

We both took a few clearing breaths. I was half convinced we'd turned some kind of corner, but then she just had to keep going.

“Meredith, I need you to calm down and assess the situation with a level head. The easiest way forward is reconciliation. Divorces are messy and expensive and you—”

“You think I care about that? You think I'll stay married to someone like him because I'm scared of what it will cost to leave him?”

The phone call didn't last much longer after that. I was crying and hiccupping and feeling stupid for losing control of my emotions. I could tell my sister wasn't sure how to handle me, not to mention I knew anything I said would be used against me if she decided to call Andrew again. In my head, I cursed her for her disloyalty before I realized she was being loyal, just to a version of me that doesn't exist anymore.

I had just finished the phone call and was vigorously wiping tears and snot from my face when I heard Jack unloading stuff outside the shack. He caught me at the wrong time, and per usual, he took a bad situation and made it even worse.

Why waste your money? he'd asked dismissively when he saw the new decorations inside the shack.

You know what, buddy?! Maybe it's because living in this dingy shack is making me miserable! Maybe it's because I've had to pry four splinters from my foot in the last week! Maybe it's TO SPITE YOU FOR INTENTIONALLY MAKING ME SUFFER SO I'D WANT TO LEAVE!

Obviously I didn't shout any of those things at him. I stormed off, and now I'm out walking his property in my pajamas and sneakers. I have no idea where I'm going or how far his land extends. How close are we to Mexico? I've been angrily stomping my way in one direction for a few minutes and there's still no end in sight. I didn't have time to put on a bra or socks or deodorant, and all my blubbering on the phone and that angry getaway have really worked up a sweat.

I should definitely just turn around and head back, but I know he'll still be there, installing that window unit. I felt so guilty when I saw it, thanks in part to my phone call with Helen. Before launching into her lecture about my marriage, she inquired about Jack.

"So, he gave you a job?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Where are you staying?"

"On the premises." I was hesitant to admit I'm living in the run-down shack.

"Yeah? What about rent and food?"

"It's included."

Her tone turned cold then. "You better not be taking advantage of him, Meredith. It sounds like he's going out of his way to help you, a complete stranger, and if you're just going to run right back to Andrew in a few weeks—"

"I'm not!"

She wasn't convinced.

"This is a mess. I asked him to give you a job, not to roll out the red carpet. I'll need to figure out some way to pay him back. Maybe I should cut our trip short. We'd still have to pay for the hotels but—"

"No, Helen, don't do that. It's not like I'm just mooching off him. I've been working hard—"

She cut me off, annoyed. "Listen, this is my livelihood, Meredith. I don't expect you to understand, but Brent and I depend on my income a lot, especially with this trip and renovation." I could hear the stress in her voice. "Please don't do anything to screw up my relationship with Jack while I'm gone. Keep your head down, work, and try to make yourself as useful as possible.”

I realize now that I’ve done the exact opposite. I’ve been nothing but a hassle for Jack since my arrival. He spent his entire morning buying building supplies to fix up the shack for me, and I know I never asked him to do it, but I still feel responsible. There was a lot of stuff in the bed of his truck and I have no idea what it cost him, much less how long it will take him to do the repairs. I want to be more help than hassle, and I cringe thinking of how Helen would react if she saw him unloading supplies like that. She would be livid.

I have no clue what to do...demand he take it all back? Decline the repairs? I don’t want to be rude, but I also don’t want to use up all the goodwill Helen has built up for herself.

If I had money, I’d consider trying to find another place to live; at least then I’d only be depending on him for a job. I could leave the ranch at quitting time like the rest of the employees and be out of his hair. Unfortunately, with the paltry amount of money in my new checking account, that just isn’t an option right now, and probably won’t be for a while.

I have no choice but to march right back to the shack and stop him before he gets started. I’ll convince him I don’t need any repairs. With the rug there, I almost forget there are gaps in the floor, and plenty of people lived in Texas before the advent of air conditioning. It’s kind of nice living in a sauna, and the spiders don’t bother me in bed because enough sweat pools around me to form a moat.

I knock on the open door when I make it back, as if I’m encroaching on his space instead of mine. He’s over at the window near my bed, using a power drill to anchor the air conditioner. His baseball hat is gone and I see now what I didn’t notice before: he got a haircut. The dark strands are trimmed short, sharpening his features. He’s the grown-up man version of a boy who was already intimidating to begin with. My stomach squeezes tight as I fight back the words that are spilling into my thoughts: kissing, touching, wanting, yearning.

“Not a very long walk,” he notes, oblivious to the fact that my mouth is open and there is drool dribbling onto the floor at my feet.

I’ve forgotten my agenda, my name, the year. The president? What’s a president?

He stops what he’s doing and turns to look at me. The profile—which was already killing me—changes to the full-frontal view, and I’m hit with the realization that I was married to Andrew for five years and never once felt weak in the knees like I do now, but that can’t be right. Maybe I’m just exhausted from my walk—all four minutes of it.

“Meredith?”

“You got a haircut.” I sound like English is my second language.

“Yeah.”

“You look different.” I’m a three-year-old, stringing beginner words together to form my first sentence.

His brow arches and he shakes his head. “What’s up with you?”

I force my attention to something else and my gaze lands on the air conditioner. Box thing make cold? Very brr-brr-freezy-freezy?

Oh, right.

I have a purpose for rushing back here, and it’s not to swoon.

“I don’t want you to do any repairs in the shack,” I declare confidently. “I do appreciate the thought.”

“Thanks boss,” he retorts sarcastically, “but last time I checked, I don’t need your permission to work on my own property.”

Then he turns and gets back to work.

I pinch my eyes closed for a second. It’s so hard to be nice to a dick. “No, I just mean...you’re not doing them on my account, right?”

There's no pause before he replies, "Right."

I step forward, trying to angle myself so I can see his expression. Spoiler: it's not happy.

"So you'd be willing to go on record that you've been wanting to fix the place up for a while?"

"Uhh...sure?"

I exhale.

"Okay, because it's just that I don't need you to do anything on my account. I won't be living here that long."

"You're leaving?"

"No, I just mean after payday I should be able to get my own place, get out of your hair."

I can't help but notice that, in the confusion over my departure, he looked disappointed rather than jubilant, but he regains his composure in an instant.

He goes back to installing the air conditioner, and I'm left standing there aimlessly. I turn on my heel and then pivot back. I have nowhere to go. I need deodorant and a bra, but I'd die before I put a bra on in front of him.

I try to make myself useful by picking up a wrench off the ground (at least I think that's what it is). "Err...do you want my help or—"

"Yeah, can you not touch anything?"

I drop it quickly then declare I'm going to take another walk, though it's the last thing I want to do. I'm still sweaty from the first one.

This time, while I stroll around his property, I think about my conversation with Edith at the diner. She really let it spill about Jack. It's like she opened up his case file, pushed it toward me, and said, Here, catch up. All those secrets, all those emotions were foisted on me, and now I don't know what to do with them. Up until yesterday, I saw Jack as two-dimensional. He was an angry, hotheaded cowboy. His main tasks in life included barking orders and wearing tight denim.

Given the choice, he wanted me off his property and out of his life. He'd made that abundantly clear, and I was okay with that, but then Edith had to change things. She had to take a man I generally disliked and stuff him full of explanatory emotions.

Up until then, I could almost believe Jack had spontaneously sprouted up from the underworld one day just the way he is: jeans, hair, smoldering gaze. Edith disproved that theory. She turned him into a scared twenty-year-old kid, grieving the loss of his parents and learning to carry the weight of his newfound responsibility with the ranch. Of course he's angry! Of course he's stressed and short-tempered! No one's a happy-go-lucky person after going through an experience like that.

I hate this. I hate Edith for telling me his secrets. We could have gone right on bumping heads and throwing jabs, but it's not fun anymore. I can't look at him the same way. I can't go back into that shack without apologies spilling out of me. I'm sorry. I'm so, so sorry you had to live through that. Then I'd probably try to offer him a hug, and I know how that would go: he'd shoot his hand out, smack me on the forehead, and stiff-arm me so I'd be left swinging my arms in vain.

Therein lies the problem: just because I know why Jack is the way he is doesn't mean he's going to stop being that way. He still wants me off his property and out of his life. He still finds me to be a general nuisance, and I'm pretty sure he still thinks I'm a spoiled brat from California who's never worked a day in her life. Well, guess what, buddy boy? I've worked FIVE DAYS NOW! So ha!

All this...this knowledge about Jack paired with Helen's warnings about not taking advantage of him has left me feeling like things have to change between us.

I'm just not sure how.

Meredith

I start the week with one clear goal: to be the most productive, useful employee Jack has ever had, like if Mary Poppins and Monica Geller had a love child. On Monday, I wake up at the crack of dawn, toss my thin sheet aside, and get to work. I clear everything out of the shack so Jack can have easy access to the floors for his repairs. Then, I make sure to stay out of his way by cleaning, cleaning, cleaning. By the end of the day, the farmhouse is gleaming, and I'm confident Jack could lick any surface and come away with the lemony taste of Palmolive on his tongue. Yum!

My efforts are thwarted when I see that Jack has half a dozen ranch hands working on the shack all day. By the evening, they've not only fixed the floors, they also repaired the drywall and moved all my stuff back inside, plus there's a new pendant light hanging in the center of the ceiling. It doesn't even look like a shack anymore, more like one of those adorable tiny houses from HGTV.

With the A/C on, it is—dare I say—chilly inside. I lie awake that night with TWO soft blankets tucked around my body, worried sick about Jack having gone to all this trouble.

Helen's words keep reverberating in my mind, leaving bruises.

You better not be taking advantage of him, Meredith.

Keep your head down, work, and try to make yourself as useful as possible.

My only choice is to redouble my efforts on Tuesday. Jack sends a few guys in to retiling the shower in the shack-turned-tiny-house, so I decide to draft a list of menu options for him. I've seen the way he scowls when I put down a plate of salmon or try to pass off baked asparagus as a carb. No more! If he wants burgers with mac and cheese by the boatload, by golly he's going to get it! The list I compile includes everything I'm comfortable making (or attempting to make) for his lunches, that way he can cross off anything that doesn't sound appetizing.

Later that morning, when I'm sure he's not too busy, I tap, tap, tap on the door of his office and let myself in after he gives me the go-ahead.

"Good morning!" I chirp like a songbird.

"What do you need?" he asks gruffly, skeptical of my cheer.

I pass him the menu across his desk.

"What's this?" he asks, not even looking up at me.

"I thought I'd get your taste preferences so I can avoid making anything you don't want to eat for lunch. I've separated things out in categories for you. There are protein options and side dishes—"

He shakes his head and pushes the menu back to me, gaze already falling back to his work. "Just keep doing whatever you're doing. I don't have time for this."

My upper lip wants to curl with annoyance, but I don't let it.

"Are you sure? You could just—"

"I'm sure."

Alrighty then. I take the menu and march right on out of there, determined to find some other way to be useful.

I'm loading clothes into the washer when Edith finds me.

"I've been looking for you everywhere!"

I smile and keep tossing clothes in. "I've been in here, loading and unloading. Tell me, how do two people produce so much laundry? It's like you both change your underwear forty-five times a day."

She ignores my question and holds up two yoga mats still in their original wrapping. My eyes go wide with wonder.

"Where'd you get those?"

"In town, yesterday."

My fingers reach out as if to say, Gimme, gimme, gimme. My eyes glisten. My fingers twitch anxiously. I want one of the mats so badly. I need it. Even with the prospect of new floors, yoga on a thrift store rug is getting kind of old.

Too bad my conscience prods me to remember my mission for the week: Be useful! Happy! Helpful! Especially do not accept any more help from Jack or his well-meaning, impossible-not-to-love grandmother.

I drop my hand and turn away.

“I hope they’re both for you.”

“Don’t be ridiculous. The blue one is yours. My new year’s resolution is to start doing yoga, and you’re going to help me.”

“I’ve learned that if I don’t start resolving until midway through the year, it’s much easier to make it to the finish line.”

I smile at her genius. “Right, well, you’ll have to find someone else to help you. I need to keep cleaning.”

“No, you need to come help me yoga. Can yoga be used as a verb? Anyway, it’s nice out and you need a break from this laundry room.”

“I don’t think Jack would agree with that.” I close the door on the washer and the machine rumbles to life.

“I just asked him, and he did.”

“Oh yeah?”

“Well, his exact words were, ‘I don’t care. Leave me alone,’ but coming from Jack, that’s all the approval we’re ever going to get, and all the approval I need. Now c’mon. I’ve been meaning to get in touch with my child’s pose.”

“That’s really more for resting.”

“Good. Best to start slow.”

I’m helpless to resist her, not only because I’d love a break from laundry, but because doing yoga outside under a shady oak tree sounds too good to pass up. I convince myself accepting the mat isn't going against my mission for the week because technically helping Edith with her yoga practice will make her stronger and healthier. Jack wants his grandmother healthy, ergo I must become her yoga Yoda.

Once I reassure myself my logic is sound, I run to change into the yoga pants I got at the thrift store then meet her outside. I've been practicing yoga for years, but I've never led anyone else through a practice. I'm a little clunky, not sure how to best explain certain poses for a beginner, but Edith is a good sport. We start slow, and by the time we roll up our mats, she's proven I shouldn't have underestimated her. I wasn't even really going easy on her; all in all, it was a pretty decent workout.

"Same time tomorrow?" she asks, standing up with her mat.

I grin. "Sounds good."

I feel amazing as we head back to the house—better than I have in a long time. Not only did I get a little break from cleaning, it was actually really fun to practice yoga with Edith. I liked guiding her and coming up with poses, and I already have ideas for what I want to do tomorrow.

Later, Edith tries to get me to eat lunch with them, as she's done every day, but I insist that I need to keep working. The rest of the afternoon passes quickly as I continue scrubbing, and shining, and folding, and generally staying out of Jack's way. I figure my best chance of keeping under his radar is to steer clear of him altogether.

It works remarkably well. We don't fight at all. In fact, it's been so many days since we fought (two, for those of you counting at home) that he's probably already warming up to me. Bonus: I'm so preoccupied with Jack and my work ethic, I hardly have time to remember my own crumbling life. Thumbs-up.

On Wednesday, I turn into Betty Crocker in the kitchen. I don an apron, use a rolling pin, and have half a pound of flour caked in my hair by the time I finish trying out the recipe Dotty sent home with Jack. A few dozen cranberry oatmeal cookies litter the counter. I put extra white chocolate chunks in them, and the result is nothing short of a culinary masterpiece. After a quick thank-you call to Dotty—that lasts 45 minutes—I fill up little take-home bags with cookies and deliver them to all the ranch hands. They thank me so profusely. “Meredith, you’re the best!” “Thanks Meredith!” “Aw Meredith, can’t you stay and chat?”

Though they’re remarkably good for my ego (much better than Jack is), I don’t let the hands coax me into staying. I don’t want to be a distraction. Instead, I tell them to enjoy then scurry back inside so I can take a plate filled with the very best cookies and an ice-cold glass of milk up to Jack’s office. The glass numbs my hand as I walk up the stairs, and the cookies are the perfect mix between crunchy and gooey and straight out of the oven. They could force an entire squadron of bake-sale moms into early retirement.

The door to his office is open, and he glares at me from behind his desk as I stroll in and out again without so much as word, just a pleasant smile and a wave. He scowls like he’s confused by this version of me. Meredith Avery: non-nuisance. That Employee of the Year award has my name written all over it.

I grin to myself as I walk back downstairs. Obviously, I would have liked to stay and watch him roll on the ground, weeping at the glory of my baking abilities, but that’s not part of my plan. Instead, I just have to imagine it.

I think I’m kicking butt, proving Helen wrong, and staying focused. Later on, I’m in the kitchen making a marinade for tomorrow’s lunch when Jack shouts my name through the house. Uh oh. That doesn’t sound like cookie ecstasy. When I find him, he’s in his closet, one hand on his hip, the other gesturing to his racks of clothes. He’s wearing his Angry Jack face, his shoulders blocking out part of the overhead light. I wonder if he could squash me beneath his shoe or if it just feels that way when he’s worked up.

“What the hell is all this?”

His voice makes me jump.

“What is what?”

He points to the clothes, reminding me of the task I undertook earlier while the cookies were baking.

“Oh, right. I organized your clothes by color and category.”

“Why?”

I sweep my hand across the impeccably organized garments. “It was all a jumbled mess before—I’m surprised you could figure out where anything was.”

I don’t find it necessary to mention the fact that I did a fabulous job. His jeans are in descending shades of blue. His shirts are grouped together so that his black t-shirts (of which there are many) are all in their own section. His work shirts are separated from his nice long-sleeve shirts. The suits I was surprised to find are hanging together near the back. I also don’t mention the fact that I imagined him wearing those suits and had to prop my hand on the closet wall and pause my organizing for a solid five minutes while I let the fantasy play out in my mind. It was jarring, to say the least.

“Looks good, doesn’t it?”

“I don’t like change.”

“Okay-okay-okay,” I say, immediately deferent. “I’ll put everything back. Just...in the meantime, don’t look in your underwear drawer. No reason.”

* * *

After I finish work for the day, the guys are still wrapping up some tile work in the shack, so I’m left with no place to go. I could stay in the farmhouse, but Jack still seems annoyed about his closet and I don’t want to impose on him. I already did yoga with Edith, so I don’t really need the exercise, but I decide I’ll take another stroll around the property anyway. When I was chatting with Chris earlier, he mentioned that there was a nice creek due west of the house. He said it was a quarter mile or so to get there, but there's a trail to follow and it's worth the trek.

I set out in that direction and am a few minutes into my walk when I get the feeling that I'm being tailed.

I turn and see Alfred trotting behind me at a distance. He tucks himself half behind a bush. If he could, he'd be wearing a pair of those disguise glasses with the comically large nose and mustache. I continue walking and so does he. I stop and he stops and sits, tongue wagging, eyes shining with stupid love.

"Go back home, Alfred!" I shout, assuming my words will hit their mark.

He doesn't budge. His tail swings back and forth in the grass.

"Go on!" I wave my arms menacingly. "Get!"

I've become Frankie Muniz in My Dog Skip. Alfred is supposed to walk off dejectedly and the audience is supposed to cry, but Alfred, who promptly listens to every command Jack utters, seems to turn a deaf ear to me.

I sigh and tell him to stay—adding in a dramatic STOP hand motion—and then I continue my walk. He does stay for a little while, but then he hops right back up.

It's not like I'm that scared of him anymore. In the last few days, I've even gotten used to having him around. He's always in the farmhouse, sleeping on his bed or under the kitchen table, and I feed him and replenish his water bowl. Earlier, he came to lie down near my feet while I was baking, and I didn't even notice until I nearly stepped on him.

Still, there's a difference between tolerance and active friendship. I'd prefer the former; Alfred clearly disagrees.

He gets closer to me and trots along at my side. I glance down at him with pursed lips, and he nudges my palm with his nose, like he's saying, See? I'm nice. Please love me.

He is pretty cute with his floppy ears and golden coat. Dammit.

I sigh and give in to him. We walk together for a few more minutes in silence before I ask him how he likes the weather.

He ignores me. Then, because why the hell not, I start to tell him about my day, and then that somehow morphs into me explaining to him why it hurts my feelings that I don't have a better relationship with Helen. I divulge the fact that even when we were younger, we didn't get along that well. He's the perfect listener, doesn't interrupt me even once, and before I know it, we crest over the top of a hill and I spot the creek.

Except, it's not a creek—it's a river! Or at least it looks like one to me: wide, crystal clear, and rimmed with cypress trees, wildflowers, and ferns. The path I'm on dead-ends in a little clearing on the bank of the creek. It looks like a perfect, pebbly beach entrance.

Alfred and I step closer. Even though the creek flows pretty quick, I figure it's not going so fast that it'd sweep me away to the Gulf of Mexico.

I can't gauge how deep it gets in the center, which means it probably goes well over my head. To my left, there's an overgrown oak tree with a rope swing hanging down. The knot at the top cuts into the tree's limb, and it's probably been up there for a while.

Even though it's early evening, the sun is still blazing overhead. The temperature has to be in the high 90s, and our walk built up a nice layer of sweat on my skin. Swimming sounds heavenly.

I turn to Alfred and dab sweat from my forehead with the back of my hand. "What do you think? Should we swim?"

Alfred leaps into the water before I even have time to remove my shoes, splashing and pouncing and lapping it up like he's having the time of his life.

"Looks like we've finally found some common ground," I say, kicking off my sneakers and stuffing my socks inside. "You go on ahead and make sure to scare off any snakes."

I chance a quick glance behind us to confirm we're alone then strip off my t-shirt and shorts—not that it even matters if a ranch hand sees us since my underwear and bra provide more coverage than most of the bikinis I used to own.

“How is it?” I ask after I stow my things on dry land and make my way to the creek’s edge. The water’s so nice and clear, I’ll be able to see my feet on the algae-covered pebbles. “Refreshing?”

My toes hit the water and I let out a wild “AH!”

It’s FREEZING.

Alfred turns and looks at me, head tilted.

“How is it so cold!?” I cry. “Is this runoff from a freaking glacier?”

He ignores me and goes back to leaping around in the water. Right. I take another few steps, hissing and huffing and puffing as I get acclimated to the temperature. I know I’m being a wimp, and I’ll never make it all the way in at this rate. There’s only one way to swim in cold water, and that’s by plunging under in one quick go. So, I inhale, hold my nose, and dive.

Cold water blasts me from all sides like I just dropped myself into an ice bucket. It’s so cold it burns, but then just like that, my body is used to it. I break the surface and whip my hair out of my face.

“Woo!”

Alfred barks and doggy-paddles toward me.

We swim farther from the edge, but I’m still a few yards away from where the current looks the strongest in the center of the creek. Where I am, there’s nothing to worry about.

Alfred swims toward me with a stick then drops it on the water’s surface, nudging it forward with his nose. I take the hint and toss it toward shore, and he darts after it, fetching it back to me in record time. We repeat the cycle for a while. My arm starts to ache, but I push through the pain because he looks so damn happy. Eventually, out of desperation, I toss the stick into the current and say, “No more!” then flop back to float on my back. My arms and legs stretch out around me as I tilt my chin to the sky and close my eyes. He circles me like a shark.

“What do you think of your master?” I ask lazily.

He barks.

“I know, handsome, but that personality—rough around the edges, to say the least.”

He licks my hand.

“Oh, you think he has a softer side too? Maybe. Edith seems to think there’s still some love left in him, but I’m not so sure. I wonder if he ate those cookies or if he just tossed them out the window as soon as I left the room.” He doesn’t say anything and I feel like a jerk. “Oh I’m sorry, Alfred! I just realized I didn’t give you any. How rude of me to bring it up.”

He forgives me because he’s a dog and he doesn’t speak English. Also, I think he’s my best friend.

We keep swimming and I lose track of time. My fingers turn into prunes. I’m starting to feel the temperature of the water again and I’m pretty sure my lips are purple by this point, but I can’t get out yet. All this alone time has given me the chance to reflect on how far I’ve come, how much I’ve accomplished since that cab driver kicked me out in the middle of nowhere. Additionally, I’m inspired by my progress with Alfred, how far I’ve been able to get out of my comfort zone. With that in mind, I have a mission before we head back to the house: test out that rope swing.

“Alfred, if I die, you can have all the money in my checking account.”

Jack

Meredith has done a complete about-face in recent days. Ever since Sunday morning, when she told me—with splotchy cheeks and puffy eyes—to not bother fixing up the shack, she’s been hardly recognizable. It’s like she’s walking on eggshells around me, and if possible, I find it more annoying than when she was giving me hell. I don’t have a problem with being nice; I have a problem with people being fake nice. I can tell she’s keeping herself restrained. When I snapped at her for color-coordinating my closet, I could see the shackled passion behind her eyes. I think she wanted to tell me to eat shit, but she just smiled and cowed.

Something isn’t right.

Edith swears she hasn’t noticed the change, but then again, I can’t really trust Edith when it comes to Meredith. She’s been on her side from the beginning.

This morning, she told me to go easier on her.

“She’s a nice girl,” she said in Meredith’s defense. “One who, for reasons beyond my comprehension, puts up with you.”

“Yeah, well it seems everyone’s seen Meredith’s ‘nice girl’ side but me.”

“A mean dog doesn’t ever see a cat purring. You make her hackles go up. You’ve been nothing short of cruel since she first arrived.”

Maybe that’s why Meredith has changed her attitude around me. Maybe she agrees with Edith about how I’ve been acting and she’s sick of me losing my temper with her.

Who cares? I remind myself I don’t have time to worry about Meredith or her opinion of me.

After I wrap up work for the day, I go looking for Alfred. It’s been a few days since I’ve played fetch with him. Normally he hangs around me all day, but he's been noticeably absent lately.

I don't find him around the farmhouse, and when I ask Edith, she says the last time she saw him he was heading down to the creek.

Odd.

He's never wandered down that far without me. Our property is huge, but he prefers to stick close to the house, which is convenient for me because then I don't have to chase him down at the end of the day.

I set off down the trail, appreciating the solitude. I haven't gone down this way in a while. When I was a kid, I lived at the creek in the summer. My friends and I would fill our inner tubes and hike over to the top of the property so we could catch the current and float all the way back down. For my twelfth birthday, my dad installed a rope swing on one of the oak trees and I spent months doing fool-ass backflips to impress the Carrie Suthers. My efforts weren't in vain—she let me kiss her at the end of summer, right on the edge of the bank.

I'm smiling, thinking about that summer, when I stumble upon a pile of clothes stowed on the path just up ahead. I don't hear any voices, but Alfred's definitely down here swimming with someone, and from the look of the jean shorts, it's Meredith.

I continue down the path, hear a small splash, and spot Alfred swimming in a circle in the creek, barking and whining with worry. There's no Meredith in sight, but then a few seconds later, she breaks the surface of the water with a wild laugh.

"There!" she declares proudly, wiping her dark hair away from her face. "Did you time me like I asked you to? I counted to 35 Mississippi, which is like four minutes in dog time!"

Alfred barks right in her face, obviously glad to see she wasn't drowning like he thought she was, and she doesn't even flinch like I expect her to.

"Okay, well then," she continues, "you'll just have to take my word that I just set a world record."

When I take a step toward the creek, a stick crunches underneath my shoe. Alfred's ears perk up as he turns, spots me, and a second later, he's bounding out of the water to say hello.

Of course, he stops a foot in front of me and shakes like crazy, covering me with water. I hold out my hands, but it's no use.

"All right, all right! You got me!" I crouch down and pet him while he pants. He's breathing hard and his barrel chest is heaving, which means they've probably been swimming for a while.

"Okay, you've had your look! You can go now!"

I jerk my head up and find Meredith retreating to the deep area, leaving only her head visible above the surface.

I frown. "What?"

"I don't have a bathing suit on!"

Jesus Christ, she's naked?! Fuck. My gut clenches at the idea and in a flash, I push to stand and prop my hands on my hips. "You'd better not be skinny dipping in my damn creek!"

Of all the idiotic things she could be doing. Any ranch hand could easily wander down here and find her like this. I thought we discussed this the other day—her respecting the fact that this is a working ranch with dozens of young, hormonal dolts wandering around.

"I'm not skinny dipping! I have my underwear on, you perv!"

"Then there shouldn't be a problem, and for the record, I came down here to find Alfred, not spy on you."

She stands and her shoulders become visible above the surface. They're tan and freckled from the sun.

"He followed me down here, uninvited—clearly takes after his master."

I glance down at my dog, who looks mighty proud of himself. "Yeah, well, he loves this place, and I haven't taken him in a while."

"Why?"

“You know why.” I sigh. “I’ve been busy.”

I glance over to see her bottom lip sticking out just a bit, her eyes downcast on the water. It almost looks like she feels sorry for me and I’m about to tell her not to bother, but then her eyes brighten and she smiles, snapping her attention up to me. I can see an idea forming in that pretty little head of hers.

“Actually, I’m glad you’re here! Does that rope swing still work?”

She’s pointing over to the old oak tree.

“What do you mean?”

“Is it safe? Like if I try to swing off will it break and send me to my death?”

I wipe away a smirk. “It’s sturdy. It’s been up there for years and it’s held much heavier than you.”

She thinks about that for a second before replying, “Oh, you’ve used it before? So it’s held, what, like 400 pounds?”

My eyebrow quirks like she just issued a dare. “Ha ha. You’re looking at the reigning backflip champion of Cedar Creek.”

“Well, perfect. The truth is, I’ve been working up the courage to use it for the last thirty minutes, but I don’t want to go first.”

I look around as if trying to find another willing participant. “I don’t see how you have any other option.”

Her eyes meet mine as she smiles, and the air leaves my lungs like someone just drove a dagger straight into my chest. In that moment, there’s no denying that she’s gorgeous—not just pretty or sweet, but the most tempting heartbreaker I’ve ever seen. Her dark hair is wet and hanging in a tangled sheet around her face. Her eyelashes are long and thick, boldly framing expressive blue eyes. Her lips are dark red, and her small nose has the same dusting of freckles her shoulders have. She’s the girl next door all grown up, and she’s swimming in my creek in nothing but her underwear.

“I want a tutorial from the supposed champ.”

“I don’t have my bathing suit on.”

My voice is flat and emotionless. I’m trying hard to step back in time to a few minutes ago, to when I hadn’t allowed those thoughts about her to take root in my mind. Acknowledging my attraction to her is a dangerous game I don’t want to play.

“That’s a pitiful excuse,” she says, completely oblivious to what she’s doing to me right now. “I got in without a bathing suit. Also, I wash enough of your underwear to know you don’t go commando, so either shimmy out of those Wranglers and show me how it’s done or prepare to lose the crown.”

I can’t resist giving in to the subtle temptation to flirt with her.

“Y’know, you’re trying pretty hard to get me to strip. In fact, the last time a woman told me to take my jeans off and ‘show her how it’s done’, she wasn’t talking about a rope swing.”

Her face goes beet red. “That’s not what I meant and you know it!”

I grin and turn back to make sure we’re alone. If it’s just her and me, I can pretend like this isn’t a terrible idea. I can give in to the here and now and worry about the rest later.

“Wait!” she shouts. I pause. “If you do stay and swim, you can’t get weird on me. Just pretend I’m wearing a tastefully conservative bikini instead of my undies.”

I roll my eyes and start to work my t-shirt off over my head. “Meredith, don’t kid yourself. I’m not like those hands back there—I don’t lose control of myself at the first sight of bare skin.”

“You’ve never seen my skin,” she taunts.

“What the hell does that mean?”

“I don’t know. It sounded cool in my head. Now just promise me.”

I sigh as I kick off my boots and work the zipper of my jeans. “I promise that I, a grown man and not a horny teenage boy, won’t think twice about seeing you in your—how did you put it? Tastefully conservative underwear. Besides, I have the benefit of knowing you’re a married woman.”

I meant to say the last part as a reminder to myself more than her—I'm practically panting at the idea that she'll walk toward the shore and I'll get a glimpse of her wet bra clinging to her curves—but the mention of her past and her husband back in California dampens the light in her eyes in one fell swoop. It's like I just cut the music and flipped on the lights—party's over.

She turns to look up the creek, and I berate myself for once again putting my foot in my mouth. We were having a surprisingly good time, and I bet it could continue if I swallow my pride a little bit.

“Forget I said that, okay? Here, look, I'm in my underwear now too, so we're even.”

She turns back and I catch the subtle way her eyes widen when she sees me standing on the shore in my boxers. She does the quickest scan from head to toe I've ever seen and then her gaze flips to the sky. She looks like she's praying.

“I thought it was implied that the whole ‘not getting weird’ thing goes both ways.”

“No, no, I'm fine.” Her voice is high and squeaky, but she recovers fast. “Wait, so you really know how to do a backflip?”

She sounds thoroughly impressed, and I can't help but think, Move over, Carrie Suthers. Looks like my rope swing skills are still paying dividends.

It takes her a few tries to toss the rope up to me on the shore, but then I grab hold of it and climb up to the highest part of the bank.

“Shall I count down?” she asks.

Alfred barks from a few yards down, anxious about what I'm about to do. He's seen me swing plenty of times, but it still makes him nervous.

“Sure.”

“Twenty-five, twenty-four, twenty-three—”

“Meredith.”

“Okay, threetwoone GO!”

I jump off the ledge and arc out over the water. When the rope extends to the farthest point, right over the deepest part of the creek, I let go and allow muscle memory to take over. Warm wind rushes around me as I flip then plunge into the icy water with a splash. I kick up to the surface and shake off the feeling of tiny needles stabbing into my skin. I always forget just how intensely cold it is in the spring-fed creek. The water bubbles straight up from an underground aquifer, so it’s never warm, not even in the heat of summer.

Meredith claps as I break the surface. “Bravo! I totally thought you were bluffing.”

“It wasn’t bad for my first of the season. I’ll get more air next time.”

“More air!? You were practically flying there for a second. How’d you do that?”

“You’re just trying to talk your way out of your turn.”

She feigns shock. “What? Me? No! I just want to hear all about how you learned to do a backflip. Tell me in excruciating detail. Don’t leave anything out.”

“Meredith.”

She throws up her hands and they splash back into the water. “All right! Okay. I’m going...”

With a sigh, she starts swimming for the shore while I hold the end of the rope. For the record, I don’t try to leer at her as she walks out of the water. I have every intention of keeping my promise about not letting things get weird, but then the water starts to slip away inch by inch and I’m a man at a complete loss. The sun shines on the water in just the right way to create a shimmering reflection, and the effect is two Merediths, different but the same. One is an illusion, the other all too real.

Holy hell.

Her tan, toned back gives way to a small waist and long legs. Her bra is lacy and pale cream, sexier than I was expecting. Her underwear are full-coverage cotton panties, yet somehow I find them cute as hell, especially while they're clinging to her ass.

I knew she had a good body, but not a killer body—not a body that makes me abundantly grateful that the water concealing the lower half of my body is ice cold.

Get a fuckin' grip, I scold myself.

Once she's on the shore, she wraps her arms around her chest, as if she's embarrassed, and then makes a mad dash to the rope swing.

"Don't look, don't look, don't look." She turns to me and probably sees that my brain has lost all control of motor function. "I said don't look!"

I slap my hand over my eyes comically. "There? Better?"

"Yes. For the record, these aren't thrift store tighty-whities. They're designer tighty-whities."

"Really? I'm pretty sure they're the same ones Edith wears. Cute that you guys match."

"Why do you know so much about your grandma's unmentionables?"

"Haven't you heard the rumors about us in the Deep South?"

"Wow, is that a genuine joke from Jack McNight? Color me shocked. Now just throw me the rope, will you?"

I drop the hand covering my eyes so I know where to aim. She's forced to uncross her arms so she can catch it, and I really fucking wish she was wearing a different bra, something that matched her underwear, because the tiny lacy thing covering her chest is sopping wet and I doubt she realizes just how translucent it is. I'm pretty sure I can see the tips of her breasts, and for some reason, I miss the mark on my first few throws.

"Jeez, you suck at this."

I don't even respond because I know my voice would come out hoarse and crackly, like a twelve-year-old in his first week of puberty. I've never seen a sexier sight. A naked woman is one thing, but a woman barely concealed, covering just enough to make you wonder if you're seeing something or if your eyes are just playing tricks on you? It is without comparison.

I try my damndest to keep my attention on her face.

I toss the rope and she misses it.

I think this is what they refer to as cruel and unusual punishment.

“Okay! Just like that. I swear I’ll catch it now.”

If she doesn’t, I’m going to drown myself as penance for my sins. I promised her I wouldn’t let it get weird, and I’m a goddamn liar.

I toss the rope one last time and she catches it at the last second. “Woo! Okay, now move back so I won’t hit you.”

I do as she says, though I know there’s not a chance in hell she’ll make it out this far.

“Either hold your bent elbows close or let your arms extend out fully, because once you get to the bottom of the arc it’s going to feel like you weigh twice as much.”

“Yeah, yeah. I’m sure it’s not that hard.”

She jumps and barely clears the edge of the bank before inertia wins out and yanks her into the water. It was less of a rope swing and more of a rope drop.

“Oh my god! I barely even made it off the ledge.” She laughs once she surfaces, burying her face in her hands. “You made it look so easy!”

“About average for your first try.”

It was below average.

“Oh please, I basically just flopped into the water like a dead fish.”

I laugh. “Next time leave your arms fully extended like I told you and make sure to bend your knees. Want to try again?”

“I don’t know.” She bites her bottom lip, thinking it over.
“That was pretty embarrassing.”

“No one saw it but me,” I reassure her.

“And Alfred.” She points over to where he’s lounging on the bank, basking in the sun, half asleep.

“Something tells me he didn’t care. Here, c’mon. Now that you know what to expect, it should go a lot better.”

She swims over and climbs back out onto the bank. Her underwear have crept up and I can see the edges of her tan butt cheeks. I’ve seen bikinis more revealing than what she’s wearing, but it’s still such a turn-on. I shift my gaze up to the oak tree and focus in on a nest. Yes, look at that—ahhh, the beauty of nature.

“Ready!” she declares.

This time she does what I tell her and actually manages to swing out toward me before she lets go of the rope and drops into the water like a pro.

She’s so proud of herself when she surfaces. I swim toward her and see she’s beaming then realize my mistake after its too late. I shouldn’t have gotten this close. Her eyelashes sparkle as small beads of water catch the light, highlighting the bluest pair of eyes I’ve ever seen, a blue so vibrant it looks electric, like the sky right before a thunderstorm.

The water laps up around her shoulders, and it’s tricking my brain into thinking she’s not wearing anything at all. She’s a siren. She stands, and the water barely conceals her breasts. I want to skim my hand down her delicate neck and smooth shoulders and tug down one of those delicate straps.

Then I blink and realize my wants and desires have turned into actions. My brain is the last thing to catch up. My fingertips are already on Meredith’s shoulder, dipping beneath her bra strap. Everything I imagined doing, I am doing. Her skin is wet silk. A gentle tug and she’s standing right in front of me. Her hips brush against mine in the water.

She’s holding her breath, lips parted as she stares up at me.

“You’re trembling.”

“The water’s cold,” she explains, wetting her bottom lip. “Wh- What are you doing?”

Her tone is perfect innocence.

“Isn’t it obvious?”

I’m about to kiss the hell out of her.

Her hands hit my chest and I blink my eyes closed, inhaling the feel of her palms on my bare skin.

Then she whispers my name, trying to snap us out of this moment, but I won’t let her.

“I really should get back,” she says, voice wobbly.

I snap my attention back to her face and see an expression that punches me in the gut: fear.

Before I can tell her to stay, she turns and starts swimming for the bank. “Thanks for the lesson. I’ll see you back at the house.”

I’m already swimming after her. “I can walk back with you.”

“No! No, you stay and keep swimming. I need to go home and shower. My fingers are shriveled and it’s getting late. I haven’t eaten dinner, and I should clean up a little bit.”

She’s firing off excuse after excuse as they come to mind, one after another—“Big day of cleaning tomorrow, I’m tired, I really need to call my parents”— then she’s out of the water and covering herself as she runs to gather up her clothes. She’s sopping wet yet she still tugs her shirt and shorts on rapid fire. I make it to the shore as she’s slipping her shoes on, but I don’t rush after her. I know when someone’s trying to get rid of me. She’s being smart, putting distance between us. I’m sure she saw the way I was looking at her, but it doesn’t come close to what I was thinking, the seduction I was planning in my mind. She should run away. She should scurry right on back to the shack, or better yet, all the way back to California, because the thoughts flitting through my head were filthy. Had she been a little closer and I a little more naive, I would have tugged her close and wrapped her legs around my waist. I’d have angled her face up to mine and pressed a string of kisses to her lips, her chin, her throat. That bra would have been peeled off and those panties would have followed. Nothing good would have come from it. Everything good would have come from it.

I might've had my first kiss underneath that oak tree, but I'd have taken a lot more than that from Meredith.

Meredith

The next day, I don't bring up what happened in the creek, and neither does Jack. As far as I know, we both would rather forget the entire sequence of events, so that's what we do. Sure, I was nearly naked, and sure, I watched him strip down to his boxers and had to pretend my heart wasn't falling out of my butt. There are good bodies, and then there is Jack's body. You know the sort of muscles that come from mutant protein shakes and sporadic bouts of CrossFit? Yeah, Jack isn't like that. He has long, lean muscle that comes from years of daily hard labor. In fact, he has the type of tall, muscular frame that would make any woman feel small and delicate in his arms, like—ahem—me, for instance, just a random example.

Standing there, watching him strip, my gaze pinballed from one detail to the next: his broad shoulders, his toned forearms, his Adonis V. HE HAD THE V, HALLELUJAH—except, from what I saw with my own eyes, his should really be called the Adonis Y for reasons I'll leave up to your imagination. All I know is that I was turned on and fidgety. I wanted to fan my face and shout Lawd have mercy with a serious southern twang.

And that was before he completed the effortless backflip into the water. I'm ashamed to admit how impressive that was. Sure, I was mostly focused on his biceps as he was swinging (eat your heart out, Tarzan), but it was pretty cool that he could just pull his legs up with his abs (heavy breathing) and spin backward into the water, especially considering I barely made it off the shore at all.

I regretted swimming with him even as we were swimming. I knew it would set us down a path that would lead to all sorts of question marks, and awkward encounters, and conversations where we avoid eye contact, and that was before I stripped off my sopping clothes back home. Now that...that was the real pièce de résistance. I stood in front of my mirror to see myself the way Jack had seen me, and I realized with a blush so strong it nearly set my face ablaze that he could totally see my entire boobs—not just a shadowy peek or a sultry suggestion, but LIKE THE ENTIRE NIPPLE AREA AND THEN SOME.

My emotions overwhelmed me so much that I had to sit down and resist the urge to dry heave. Embarrassment gave way to denial (He probably didn't notice! I bet the sun was too bright.), denial gave way to anger (How dare he not inform me that I was flashing him?!), and anger eventually gave way to acceptance. My boobs are not bad boobs. In fact, they're pretty great. In Europe, women wouldn't even blink at traipsing around like I was. In conclusion: I am a cool, relaxed femme Française with no qualms about hanging out in nipple-ville with my boss.

That logic works surprisingly well, especially since I pair my newfound European attitude with a total avoidance of Jack. We're talking zero face time for two whole days. I keep myself excessively occupied with the usual busy work around his house. I scrub toilets, tubs, showers, walls, nooks, crannies. I launder like it's my God-given talent to make clothes shockingly clean and wrinkle-free. If I hear him coming, I find a reason to tidy the inside of the coat closet. During lunch, I leave his and Edith's hot food waiting for them on the table and head back to the shack to eat on my own while pacing feverishly near the window, just in case I need to leap out at the sound of footsteps approaching.

I anticipate that the weekend will present a new set of problems. I won't have work to occupy me for eight to nine hours like I do during the week, but heaven smiles down on me because Jack is busier than ever down at the winery and restaurant. He's hardly ever around. Edith and I go into town for dinner on Friday and then Saturday night we watch a movie in our pajamas. Jack comes home in the middle of it and I freeze, popcorn kernel halfway to my gaping mouth, hyperaware that I've made myself comfortable on his couch. My feet are on his ottoman. My body is nestled under his throw blanket. If he had a fancy massage chair, I'm sure I would be using that too. Sure, Edith invited me, but it's technically still his house and I'm supposed to be keeping my distance and generally causing less trouble than I make. He strolls in, looking tired from a long day of work, tosses his keys in the bowl near the door, and then glances up. Edith asks if he wants to join us, and she even picks up the end of the blanket I'm hurriedly trying to shove off my legs.

"It's a romance, but you'll like it. I promise!"

He shakes his head, avoids eye contact with me, and heads for the stairs.

I don't see him the rest of the night.

Sunday afternoon, Edith informs me that she's invited a few of her friends over for yoga. There's Dotty and Lisa from the bank, a few women from Edith's book club, and Daniel's fiancée, Leanna. She's the closest to me in age and she has a bright, bubbly personality and curly blonde hair. She chats my ear off about her wedding next week and I sheepishly admit that I've been invited to go with Tucker Carroway. I expect her to be annoyed that a random stranger will be in attendance, but she throws her arms around me and tells me she and Daniel will be excited to have me there.

"And I'm so glad Tucker invited you! He's so cute and he's been single for way too long."

Everyone agrees that Tucker's a great guy. Charitable! Generous! Easy on the eyes!

"So very kind too," Leanna continues. "Last year, my grandmother needed someone to look over her outdated will and Tucker volunteered to do it for free. Isn't that sweet? She tried to pay him but he turned her down."

I feel awkward with so much attention focused on my date with him considering it's not a date at all. I didn't even agree to it—Edith did. I try my best to turn the attention back to Leanna and Daniel's wedding and after we spend a good hour chatting about floral arrangements and last-minute freakouts, we finally get started on yoga. There are a dozen of us altogether, and I set up class out in the yard where the ground is level and there's a nice breeze and tons of shade. I'm nervous to lead so many women at once, but everyone is so complimentary and easygoing that I relax and we end up having a good time. After that class, we decide we'll make a weekly thing of it. Sunday afternoons, we'll meet for yoga, and if we happen to throw in some food and gossip afterward, well at least we got a good workout in beforehand.

I start my third week of work hoping for a few more days of avoidance from Jack, but I don't get my wish. On Monday, I'm in the kitchen cleaning up after lunch when he walks up and pauses near the counter beside me. Then, he says the most shocking thing anyone has ever said to me.

"I'd like you to eat dinner tonight with Edith and me."

I don't look his way. If I did, he'd know how much his invitation means to me.

I suppress my voice to a normal octave. "Thank you, but it's okay. I was just going to eat on my own."

Like usual.

"I insist."

"It's okay. Tell Edith you offered, but I turned you down."

She's the one who wants me at dinner, not him, I'm sure.

"C'mon, you're wounding my ego here."

I smirk. "Edith thinks your ego can stand to take a good beating."

I finally chance a quick glance toward him and find that his dark eyes are studying me thoughtfully. Today, he looks irresistible in a red work shirt, and I have no idea what is going on in his mind, but he doesn't seem to be playing a trick.

In fact, he pushes off the counter with his hip and declares with a final, end-of-discussion tone, “I’m going to grill some steak and vegetables. It’ll be pretty damn good, and I’d hate for you to miss out.”

I arch a challenging brow. “You’d ‘hate for me to miss out’? Who are you and what have you done with the real Jack?”

He goes right on ignoring my taunts. “It’ll be ready at 7:30 sharp. If you want to make yourself useful, you can set the table.”

And just like that, I’m a dinner guest.

It’s quite a coincidence, because today, I’m also starting a new beauty routine that definitely has absolutely nothing to do with Jack inviting me to dinner. I wrap up my workday and rinse off in my newly tiled bathroom, taking extra effort with my conditioner. Then, I blow my hair out until the dark strands are silky smooth. I apply makeup because you know what they say: it’s important to look your best on Monday nights after work for no particular reason.

I peruse the two sundresses I bought at the thrift store and tug on the less fancy of the two. It’s white and the material is soft, hanging loose around my legs. The spaghetti straps are perfect for a summer evening in Texas.

True to his word, Jack is manning the grill when I stroll from the shack (which no longer even closely resembles a shack) to the farmhouse. He takes me in from head to toe and I think I catch the shadow of a smile on his lips before he turns back to the grill. My new nightly not-for-Jack beauty routine was clearly worth the effort.

Inside, I tell Edith I’m going to pull down the good china, the stuff they never use, because tonight is a special occasion. She laughs and says she always figured it wouldn’t get used again until her funeral wake. When Jack heads in with the steaks and vegetables, Edith is sitting at the table and I’m arranging the plates and cutlery. Everything is set except for my water glass in the kitchen. I run back in to grab it and don’t watch where I’m going because I know the route by now with my eyes closed...aaand I trip right over a sleeping Alfred and go crashing to the ground along with the fancy heirloom. The good crystal glass shatters into a thousand good crystal shards, but my attention lies elsewhere. The incident throws me so quickly and so vividly into a memory of Andrew that I lose my breath. It feels like déjà vu, but worse.

Nearly a year ago, Andrew was sitting at our dining table while I brought in dinner. He'd had a bad day at work and started in on me as soon as he walked in the door. He was starving and annoyed dinner wasn't ready, and I was so worked up that on my way into the dining room, I accidentally dropped one of the serving platters gifted to us at our wedding. Food went everywhere. Ceramic shards cut into my hand. All the first instincts you'd expect a picture-perfect husband to have—Are you okay honey? Don't worry, I never liked that ugly dish anyway, honey—were nowhere to be found. Instead, he shot to his feet and berated me for bleeding on the rug, for ruining dinner, for not appreciating nice things.

“Meredith, leave it.”

I remember the exact tone of his voice when he told me to clean it up, like I was an animal—no, worse.

“Meredith!”

Jack's voice rattles me back to the present and I realize with a start that I'm down on my knees, picking up individual glass shards and depositing them in my open palm.

“Oh my god, I'm so sorry,” I mumble as I start to cry. I'm so embarrassed. “I can't believe I broke this. I shouldn't have pulled these glasses out in the first place.”

“It's nothing.” He's tugging on my arm, trying to get me to stand.

I know he's just saying that to make me feel better. Andrew would be screaming his head off right now. I could tell the glasses were really nice when I got them out, and I'll have to figure out a way to replace it.

“Meredith! Stop.”

His voice is gentle but direct as he bends down to hook his hands underneath my arms and lift me to my feet. He deposits me away from the mess just as another glass shatters at the head of the table. I jerk my attention toward Edith to see her hand still outstretched, having just finished tossing hers down as well.

“Grandma, what the hell?” Jack asks incredulously.

She shrugs, trying to be nonchalant, but I can see the emotion in her eyes, the empathy she feels for me in that moment. “What? There’s nothing special about those dusty old glasses. I’m glad to be rid of them, honestly. This yoga kick has been making me more mindful, less occupied with material possessions.”

We both stare at her, stunned silent. To Jack, she may as well be speaking Greek.

“Don’t believe me?”

She shrugs, casually reaching out and nudging Jack’s glass to the edge of the table.

He lurches forward and grabs it before it falls. “Jesus woman! I get it. Now can you throw the rest in the trash instead of flinging them around the whole damn ranch?”

I whip around and find the dustpan in the kitchen so I can get to work cleaning up the mess. Jack steals it out from under me and tells me to go sit down. His voice isn’t exactly harsh, but it still leaves no room for argument. I take a seat beside Edith and she tugs at my hand to take a look at it. There’s a small cut, but nothing that really needs attention. I close my palm quickly, wanting to hide the traces of my clumsiness. I’m embarrassed that I not only broke a glass but also had a weird flashback like that right in front of them. It’s not like I was in a war; I shouldn’t have PTSD.

“You didn’t have to do that,” I say, unable to meet her eyes.

“At my age, I don’t have to do anything,” she declares with her usual matter-of-fact tone. “I wanted to do that. Hell, I’ve been wanting to do that for years. Now, Jack, will you finish up and sit down so we can get back to dinner? This steak smells amazing and Alfred here is about to leap up and eat ’em if we don’t beat him to it.”

I try to get up to make new glasses of water for us, but she keeps me seated right beside her, insisting Jack can do it. He serves dinner as well, making sure to ask which of the steaks I want and heaping up a mountain of homegrown vegetables on my plate. I expect him to sit across from me, on the other side of Edith, but he takes the seat right beside me, so I'm sandwiched in between them. We don't talk about the glass at all, even though I know they're probably both wondering why I had the bizarre reaction that I did. Edith carries the conversation for the pair of us, but even so, I hardly listen.

By the time dinner is over, I've only eaten a quarter of the food on my plate and I'm ready to dart back to the shack and bury my face in my pillow. I want a few minutes of peace and quiet to process what the hell just happened and try to figure out how to stop it from ever happening again.

I finish loading the dishes in the dishwasher—a task neither of them could talk me out of—and then Jack finds me in the kitchen with some Neosporin and Band-Aids.

“Can I see your hands?” he asks, but it sounds more like a demand than a question.

I wave him off. “It's nothing. I don't think I need any of that.”

“I don't believe you,” he says, his voice gruff and full of all the annoyance he harbors for me.

I hang the dish towel and offer up my best version of a reassuring smile. “I appreciate your concern.”

He ignores me, steps forward, and takes my hands in his, turning them palm up. I want to yank them away, but I don't want to look like a petulant child. Besides, I've caused enough drama for one night.

He holds my hands like they're delicate little birds, and the gentle touch cracks my chest wide open. There's something about a man capable of such strength choosing tenderness instead. I can't remember the last time Andrew touched me like this—I'm not sure he ever did.

“You're right, it doesn't look too bad,” he says, sounding relieved.

I nod and try to pretend my throat isn't growing tighter.

I turn my head away and blink back tears.

Finally, he releases my hands, and I take the ointment and bandages from him with a quick nod of thanks. Then I'm out the back door as quick as my feet will take me.

The next day, Edith and I meet outside for our yoga session.

"I got something in the mail for you this morning," she says as we roll out our mats.

"Oh yeah? What was it?"

"Flowers from your ex-husband. Yellow roses."

Wonderful. I guess he got the ranch's address from Helen.

"You want me to trash them?" she asks.

"Yes please—or better yet, isn't there a burn pile out back?"

"I brought the note that came with them in case you want to read it." She's holding out a tiny white envelope. I take it and rip it open. Now that my eyes are open to his insidiousness, the words are almost comedic. The same artfully contrived remorse that might've fooled me before rings utterly hollow now.

"Want me to trash that too?" she asks with a pragmatic tone.

I hand it off to her. "Please."

I love Edith. I love her because she takes that envelope and doesn't bring up the flowers again. I love her because she understands exactly what I need before I even work up the courage to ask. I love her because she never asks me to open up to her and never demands my secrets. Still, she offers hers. While we're out there under the oak tree that day, Edith confides in me that before she met Jack's grandfather, she was in a rotten relationship, one she didn't think she'd ever make it out of.

"He had a real mean streak," she says, staring off in the distance. "He'd get drunk and hit me every now and then, and I'd let him because it's not always clear what love is, what love allows. I was lucky though—it didn't last long. My family moved south and I never saw him again. Didn't bother following me, though a part of me thought he might."

"I'm a little worried about that," I say, more to myself than her.

"The bastard following you?"

I don't answer.

"Well," she says, "you know what? It's one thing to follow, and another thing entirely to get. We have a little saying down here in Texas—a taunt, from a battle where a small group fended off a powerful army."

I look at her questioningly.

"It goes like this, dear: Come and take it."

Jack

I know Meredith and Edith do yoga every day at 10:00 AM because productivity stalls around the ranch. On Wednesday, I head outside and find half my ranch hands congregating near the fence beside the oak tree. A few of them have the decency to act like they're working—Max has a hammer in his hand (though not a single nail)—but most of them are just openly gawking.

“This is now the most solid and secure section of fence we have on this whole damn ranch.” My voice booms and they scatter like cockroaches. “You think we can get to work on the east pasture now?”

There are muffled apologies and half-hearted excuses, but most of them are smart enough to get to work without another word.

Chris doesn't scatter. He comes right up to me and hands me some wildflowers wrapped in parchment paper.

“Can you deliver these to Meredith for me?”

“Why in the hell would I do that?”

He frowns like I'm a blubbering idiot. “Because you just said I need to get back to work.”

He misunderstands me.

I look down at the colorful flowers. “No, I mean why are you trying to deliver these to Meredith?”

He smiles extra wide, really proud of himself. “Oh, yeah. Well, she sent me home with those cookies last week, and I wanted to return the favor. These are from my mama's garden.”

I yank them out of his hand and motion for him to get back to work, mumbling under my breath.

I don't deliver the flowers to Meredith. I carry them up to my office and set them down on my desk. I stare at them so long they should catch fire, but they don't. They stay wrapped up, a pretty gift for the pretty woman everyone on this damn ranch seems to be in love with, and I study them right up until a phone call distracts me.

I answer with a clipped greeting.

"Jack! This is Tucker—Tucker Carroway. How are you?"

"I'm fine, busy." I push the flowers out of my line of sight.

"What can I do for you, Tucker?"

"Oh I'm good too, thanks for asking." His sarcasm annoys me, and I'm reminded why we didn't get along in high school. "I'm calling for Meredith. She's supposed to be my date for Dan and Leanna's wedding this weekend and I just wanted to confirm pickup time with her."

"So call her cell phone. I can't have you two blocking the ranch's main line."

"I would, but she never gave me her number."

I lose the fight against a smug smile.

"Sorry to hear that, man. I hope you figure it out."

"McNight, why do I get the feeling you're intentionally being obstinate?"

I hang up.

The phone rings, I pick it up off the base just long enough for him to get the silent message, and I hang it up again.

In the late afternoon, I stroll into the kitchen, though not because I need anything. I'm still full from lunch, and I'm not thirsty since Meredith brought me some lemonade an hour ago. It was a nice gesture, but her gentle smile successfully distracted me for the half hour after that. Now, I'm down here again. I have enough to occupy me upstairs, but I still tug open the fridge and stand in front of it like I'm looking for something. I even shuffle around some yogurt cups for good measure.

"Was lunch too light? I can make you something else if you want to top it off?"

Meredith is by the sink doing dishes. I'm not looking at her, but I still know exactly what she looks like today. She's wearing cutoff denim shorts and a white t-shirt, her dark hair piled high up on her head in a messy bun. She has more freckles across the bridge of her nose today than she did last week, and I wonder if it's because of her outdoor yoga sessions with Edith.

I can even tell she's smiling because of the way she asked the question. I think she knows I'm in here for no good reason.

I close the fridge door at the same time she moves to take the trash out.

It's filled to the brim, and she has a hard time lifting it out.

"Here, let me get that."

I try to nudge her out of the way and take the bag from her.

"No, no, I can do it. It's my job—I'm a professional."

She groans as she lifts with all her might, but the bag only makes it halfway out of the bin before she's forced to drop it again.

"Meredith."

"You pay me to do this. You do realize that, right?"

I level her with a stubborn gaze, and she aims one right back at me.

"It's my own fault for letting it get too full," she points out.

I take her shoulders in my hands and gently shift her a foot to the right so I can empty the trash.

“Fine,” she hollers after me as I head out back. “I guess this counts as my first break.”

I pull the lid open on the outdoor trashcan, and just as I’m about to toss the bag on top of the pile, something catches my attention: a bouquet of expensive-looking flowers scattered as if they were dumped straight out of the vase and an envelope ripped down the middle sitting on top. I drop the trash bag on the ground and grab the two halves of the note.

It’s a private message, one definitely not meant for my eyes, but I read it anyway.

Meredith, my love, please come home. I can't think of any way to convince you of how sorry I am. I've racked my brain for ways to convince you you're making a mistake, and I know these flowers and this note won't be enough. You're the love of my life, my wife, my everything. Please don't walk away now and throw away the vows we made to each other five years ago. I knew the moment I saw you that you were mine.

Come home. Please.

I love you,

Andrew

They’re the words of a heartbroken man, words that cut through my chest as painfully as if I was the one who wrote them. I knew Meredith left her husband when she came to Texas. I knew she had a whole life back in California, but reading this puts it all in perspective. She’s still married to a man who loves her and expects her back. She didn’t leave a loveless marriage; she left a heartbroken husband who’s still foolishly pining for her. I bet he went half insane when he woke up and found her gone that day three weeks ago. No warning, no discussion—she just vanished and left him to pick up the pieces. I wonder how many times a day he calls her. I wonder what her reasons were for leaving him. I wonder if what Helen said was true, that her husband doted on her and gave her the world, that she is spoiled and bored and left to teach him a lesson.

Honestly, though, I'm not sure her reasons matter. Regardless of why she left, I'm still a fool. I've been letting my guard down around her, allowing her into my life inch by inch. I'm acutely aware of her when she walks into a room, and I try to catch every one of her smiles as if they're meant just for me. I'm smitten, and I have been for longer than I care to admit.

Worse, I'm not the only person under her spell. I'm standing in line clutching a number. The ranch hands, Tucker, her husband—everyone wants Meredith, and I'd bet Meredith wants no one. She's a heartbreaker, a self-centered woman who wants nothing more than to be wanted.

I think of how she cried when she broke that glass at dinner the other night, how she looked so delicate and fragile in that moment that my heart softened for her.

Was it all a crock of shit? All for show?

I pick the trash bag up off the ground and toss it inside.

If so, it's about time Meredith took her act back to where it belongs.

Meredith

I can't believe how quickly I've settled in here. It's been nearly three weeks since I first arrived, and I'm already building a life for myself. I commute places in a pickup truck. I use the word y'all un-ironically. Just yesterday, I accidentally drank water with my lunch instead of sweet tea and I gagged.

I like it in Cedar Creek way more than I thought I would. The work is hard, and I don't exactly love what I'm doing, but it does come with perks: I love cooking lunch for Edith and Jack, and they actually seem to be enjoying my healthier dishes. Jack even requested my salmon this week. I really enjoy doing yoga with Edith, and yesterday, she told me she was pretty close to touching her foot to her face.

"I haven't been able to do that in years!"

However, my absolute favorite perk is Jack. Talking to him, annoying him, staring at him when he's not paying attention—there's really no end to my obsession at this point. He and I aren't friends exactly, but I still enjoy our exchanges. I'm aware of where he is in the house at all times, as if he's wearing a tracking device. Still, I try not to disturb him too much. I mean, bringing him lemonade or a snack isn't necessarily disturbing him, and it affords me a quick glimpse of him working, a little snapshot to hold me over while I'm in laundry hell.

Yesterday morning, he was out helping the guys clear a section of the garden. I have no clue what they were doing—tilling? Harvesting? I really don't care, and it doesn't matter because whatever it was, it meant Jack was out there in plain view wearing jeans, a dark blue work shirt, and his baseball hat. I stood at the kitchen window, repeatedly drying a single plate as I watched him get his hands dirty.

I was biting my bottom lip.

Clutching the towel.

And then he lifted the bottom of his work shirt to wipe at some sweat on his face and Edith walked in on me, bent over the sink, eyes pinched closed as I recited what I knew of the Lord's Prayer, which was pretty much just the first few lines. I lose track after the part about bread.

"Are you having a heart attack or something?"

"Menstrual cramps," I lied.

"Go lie down and rest. I'll finish drying those."

Here's a little secret: I let her dry the last of those dishes so I could go take a break in the shack, and I did lie down, but I didn't rest.

I didn't rest THREE TIMES.

I know. It's probably a sin to not rest so soon after saying the Lord's Prayer, but sometimes you just have to not rest right when the mood takes you.

I should feel guilty about fantasizing about my boss, but a part of me is so relieved that I'm even interested in fantasizing about anyone at this point. Andrew and I hadn't slept together for months near the end, and before that, sex wasn't something I took pleasure in. He was like a soul-sucking, libido-killing leech.

Now...nowwww that's all I'm interested in.

It's like I have an unquenchable thirst and no matter how many times I don't rest, it never seems to sate me. I think I've got it under control and then Jack will say something in his gruff tone that's meant to get under my skin, but really it just feels like a whole lot of foreplay at this point. Getting under his skin has somehow gotten tied up in my horniness neurons, so now, it's not just fun working him up...it's fun. I know—bad, bad Meredith. Whatever. I have problems, and I have every intention of sorting them out, just as soon as I see where this obsession with Jack could lead.

It's Thursday, and I haven't seen him all day. He left the ranch earlier and didn't return until after lunch. I was down in the living room, straightening up when he walked in the front door and breezed right past me. No smile, no wave, not even a grumpy comment.

Huh.

Later, I knock on his door and ask him if I can get him anything, perhaps a snack or something to drink. He shouts back that he's on the phone, and he sounds pissed that I'm interrupting him. I feel bad, not to mention slightly embarrassed that he sounded so put-off. Like I said, we aren't friends, but it feels like we've been heading in that direction. Okay, maybe not friends in the traditional sense, but we've at least been dialing down the hatred to a sustainable level.

Him dismissing me is a tiny step in the wrong direction, but I shrug it off. Maybe he's had a hard day. Maybe he's got a burr in his saddle. (See? I really do belong in the country.)

I wait for Jack to make an appearance after his phone call ends, but he doesn't. That burr must be wedged deep.

In the early evening, I brew a pot of decaf coffee and Edith joins me at the table with some shortbread cookies. We're ruining our appetites for dinner, but neither one of us mothers the other. We talk about how excited we are for the wedding on Saturday and what sort of snacks we should make for yoga on Sunday afternoon. After I've got her really talking, I work up the courage to ask her if she's noticed anything weird with Jack.

"Oh, and no big deal at all...just while I have you here...I was wondering if maybe, by chance...never mind—oh, do you want more coffee? Here, let me get it for you."

She swats my hand away when I try to take her mug.

"Spit it out, woman!"

"Have you noticed anything weird about Jack lately?"

"I get less information out of him than a month-old lemon. All I know is he ate dinner out last night and he's been gone all day." She shifts her gaze up to me. "Is he giving you trouble again? I can knock some more sense into him—"

“No! No, it’s fine.” I smile covertly down at my coffee.
“We’ve sort of come to an understanding, an equilibrium.”

“Equi-what? Y’all are getting along now?”

His tone from earlier leaps to mind. “I don’t think you’d say that exactly. It’s like when a baby tiger and a baby pig grow up together to be buddies in adulthood, but you just know deep down that it might all blow up the next time the tiger skips a meal.”

“Huh...okay. But he’s not upsetting you anymore?”

“No.” A flush warms my body. “He’s not upsetting me.”

After we finish, I clear the table and start prepping lunch for tomorrow. I’m technically off the clock, but I don’t want to go back to the shack just yet. A part of me is still hoping Jack will come down, act like his usual arrogant self, and put me out of my misery. Just one little teasing comment from him and I can go on home and keep myself occupied for the rest of the evening.

The sound of a truck pulling up out on the gravel drive takes my attention from the cutting board. That’s another thing different about the country—gravel is the universal doorbell. Alfred barks like crazy at the sound. It could be one of the ranch hands, but they all left an hour or two ago so I doubt that’s who it is. I wipe my hands with a kitchen towel and go investigate. There’s an ominous feeling in my gut, like something bad is about to happen, but when I step out onto the porch, I’m surprised and relieved to find Tucker hopping out of his truck.

It’s weird, but a part of me was worried it’d be Andrew.

I shake away the fear and trot down the steps to greet him. He’s in full lawyer mode, wearing slacks and a white dress shirt. His tie is a little loose, as if he tugged on it the moment he left the courthouse. His blond hair is short and neatly styled.

“Tucker, the knight in shining armor himself! Here to see Jack?”

He furrows his brow. “Of course not. I came to see you.”

Me? I'm not sure why I'm surprised he's here for me, but I am. I know we're supposed to go to the wedding together, but a part of me half expected him to forget the invitation. It's not like we've talked since he first mentioned it. That's my fault; I didn't give him my cell phone number, but it was a strategic move on my part. I didn't want him to get the wrong idea. I'm not currently dating. Hell, I'm not even divorced. I have a whack job ex sending me flowers, and I'm currently loopy over a dark-haired devil who seems to be avoiding me.

Before I get splattered, I quickly step off the tracks of that train of thought and accept a quick hug from Tucker.

"Oh? Well it's good to see you," I tell him, motioning back to the house. "I just brewed a pot of decaf, there's a little left if you want some?"

The screen door creaks open behind me. Speak of the devil. Jack steps out onto the porch, and I swallow down my nerves. He's the complete antithesis of Tucker: dark and foreboding, a menace to society. His short dark hair is slightly mussed, and he's wearing a black t-shirt and jeans. His expression is so steely and aggressive against Tucker's honey-sweet smile, and it's like an old western standoff—the desperado in black against the righteous lawman.

"Tucker. Good to see you." His tone says the exact opposite.

"Such enthusiasm! You do know it's my job to tell when people are lying, right?"

He ignores Tucker's jab. "What can I do for you?"

"Nothing. There seemed to be something wrong with your phone system, so I thought I'd come out here myself to have a conversation with Meredith, if that's all right with you."

"Of course," he answers, but he doesn't leave, and he doesn't take his eyes off Tucker. He shoves his hands into his jean pockets and leans against the porch beam at the top of the stairs.

When I turn back, I can tell Tucker's trying hard to keep his temper from flaring.

“Tucker?” I ask, trying to regain his attention and diffuse the situation. I’m seconds away from snapping my fingers or flailing my arms.

Hey, remember me? The girl you’re apparently here for?!

He finally turns to me and his expression softens. “I tried to call you this week, but Jack didn’t seem to want to pass along the message.”

“My secretary is in Europe,” Jack calls from the porch, his tone a touch defensive.

“And I guess you didn’t have a pen and paper handy?” Tucker shoots back quickly.

“I don’t have time to pass notes.”

Oh, come on. This is ridiculous.

I step toward Tucker, trying to block his view of Jack. “It’s fine. I’m here now. What were you going to tell me?”

“I just wanted to confirm that you still want to go to Dan and Leanna’s wedding with me.”

“Oh, right.”

He must sense my hesitation because he continues. “I know we don’t know each other well, but I think it could be fun.”

Jack is standing behind us, listening to this exchange. I nibble on my bottom lip. Yeesh. This is awkward. I’m sure Edith is upstairs peeping through the blinds. Alfred is smart enough to keep his distance, and most of the farm animals have probably run to the barn to bury themselves in hay.

“Unless you agreed to go with someone else instead?” he asks, gaze shifting pointedly to Jack.

His meaning is obvious. I don’t need eyes on the back of my head to know Jack is currently scowling at the idea of accompanying me to an event. Just the mental image is preposterous. Me in a fancy dress, him in a suit...our hands linked...his warm breath on my neck as he leans in close to pay me a compliment instead of an insult.

“No!” I’m quick to reply, pricking the fantasy with a pin. “I don’t have another date, but...”

A part of me wants to turn Tucker down and be done with all this, but the fact is, I was actually really looking forward to attending the wedding. It’s been a while since I’ve gone to an event like that and not been terrified of upsetting Andrew, and I was going to get dolled up and wear the fancier of my two thrift store dresses. Everyone I’ve met so far in Cedar Creek is going to be in attendance, and then there’s obviously the most important part: wedding cake. Maybe I’ll volunteer to help dole it out and they’ll let me go home with some leftovers. Oh no, I couldn’t possibly...But we insist!...No, I actually can’t—my purse is already completely full of cake.

“Good.” He grins, relieved that I’ve agreed to go with him. He really is cute, like a little blond cherub all grown up.

“I can meet you there. Edith and Jack are both going so I can catch a ride with them.” I’m trying to wrap things up because I’m aware of dark eyes beaming lasers into the back of my head. Sniff sniff—is that the smell of burning hair?

Tucker doesn’t like that idea; I can see it in the way his jaw shifts and his eyes narrow just for a split second as he decides to force the issue. “I’d prefer to pick you up. I’ll swing by here at 5:00.”

“Well I’m so glad this all worked out,” Jack says sarcastically, effectively ending the conversation. “It was great to see you, Tucker. G’bye now.”

What he means is, Get the hell off my property. If he had a shotgun, he’d pump it.

Tucker chuckles and shakes his head, trying to assure me that Jack doesn’t ruffle his feathers. He does move to leave, but not before he bends to kiss my cheek and whispers in my ear, “Looking forward to Saturday.”

It’s a slightly dirty tactic on his part. I wonder if he ever gives the judge a little peck in the courtroom. Your honor—mwah—I rest my case.

I stand there as he drives off and when I turn back, Jack is gone. He's back up in his office with the door closed.

That no good, rotten...

I march right in.

“What was that?!”

“I'll have to call you back,” he says before hanging up his phone.

“Why were you so rude down there? You're Mister Busy Busy Bee all day, but apparently you had time to moderate my conversation with Tucker? You stood over us like the Grim Reaper.”

He watches me stomp around and shout with a steady, narrowed gaze. “Done?”

“Not even close.”

“Tucker and I don't get along.”

Ya think!?

“Yes, obviously I understand that now. Why didn't you just tell me that instead of acting like that down there?” I force a deep breath and attempt a calmer tone. “If you don't want me to go with him to the wedding, I won't. I'm not trying to cause trouble.”

“I don't want you to go with him.”

I'm surprised he's being honest about that.

“In fact,” he continues. “I don't think you should go at all.”

I realize then that we're both trying hard to stay calm, but it's a losing battle. He and I burn hot, and this conversation isn't going to end well. Still, I press on.

“Are you upset with me?” I ask, slightly embarrassed that my voice sounds so wobbly.

Throughout all our antics, I've never seen him act like this. I have a feeling he's mad about more than Tucker's visit.

He leans back in his chair and assesses me coldly.

“No, I’m not upset with you. I’d just like to know how long you plan on doing this.”

“Doing what?”

“Playing this game. Staying here and acting like you belong.”

Something twists in my stomach, a feeling as painful as a sucker punch. I don’t like his tone, and I don’t like where this conversation is headed. I’d turn and leave, save myself from the sharp edge of his temper, but he continues before I can move.

“What gave you that impression?” My voice is shrouded in confusion. “Haven’t I been a good employee? I work nonstop. I do everything you and Edith ask of me—”

“Look at it from my point of view. Some rich housewife from fucking California shows up on my doorstep with blood on her face, asking for a job. The only intel I have on her is that she’s a spoiled girl with a history of dramatic, short-lived gestures. The only reason you’re here is as a favor to your sister—a favor I’ve regretted ever since I granted it.”

“Why’s that? Haven’t I done everything you’ve asked me to? Scrubbed your floors? Put up with your shit?”

“You’re a distraction.”

“For whom?”

I know he’s referring to his ranch hands, but I have a sneaking suspicion that he might be included in there too. I won’t let him skate by that easily. If he wants to hurt me, he’d better do it with the truth.

He sidesteps the question. “I think it’s time for you to go home, don’t you? I saw those flowers in the trash. I read that note.”

I step toward his desk, shifting my pain to anger. “That’s none of your business. If you want me gone, look me in the eye and tell me I’m not good at my job. I don’t think you have one legitimate reason for hating me, just a bunch of secondhand bullshit from other people.”

My hands fist by my sides and my upper lip curls. His brown eyes are shooting daggers as we stare across his desk at one another.

“It just doesn’t make sense. What game are you playing? You’re not from here. You have no real family, and the family you do have wasn’t thrilled to hear you’d shown up. No real friends. There’s no reason for you to be here anymore.”

“Sounds like you’ve figured it all out. You know exactly who I am, Jack.” I add in a condescending round of applause.

“Flirting with the ranch hands, accepting dates with Tucker—does your husband know you’ve already moved on? I bet not.” He pauses for just a beat. “Yeah, I have a pretty good idea of who you are, Meredith. You have a husband back home worrying himself sick over you, and I don’t even think you care. I think you like the attention, and I think you like playing games with men you have no intention of loving.”

It’s one thing to stand here and have my faults and failures thrown at me, and quite another to stand here and let him fling baseless accusations at me. He’s decided to play judge, jury, and executioner. He thinks I’m a bored sociopath with a doting husband waiting for me back in California and a trail of idolizers in my wake. To hear him actually say it makes me so angry that my fingernails dig into my skin as I fist my palms even tighter. There’s fire burning up inside of me so powerful, I’m not sure I’ll ever be able to douse it. It’s anger like I’ve never felt. If I were a juvenile superhero, this would be the moment I lose control of my power and blow up a city. But, here in reality, the only things I lose control of are the tears gathering in the corners of my eyes.

Ever since I married Andrew, I’ve been misjudged and misunderstood by the people around me: my parents, Helen, my so-called friends in California. I’ve dealt with their assumptions and mistruths, and I’ve accepted their loyalty to Andrew over me in stride. Sure, it’s painful, but I’ve tolerated it because I knew the real truth.

But, to hear Jack so taken in by Andrew's manipulation from over a thousand miles away is unbearable. It's the knockout punch. There's nothing left because now I fully realize that whatever evil is inside Andrew, he's poisoned me with it. No matter where I go, I'll carry it around with me forever, ruining my hopes for a new beginning.

If I weren't so furious, I think my trembling knees would buckle. My heart is beating so wildly it scares me. I feel numb and tingly and so full of helplessness that I want to scream until my throat is sore and my voice is gone.

I realize then that Jack is looking at me with new eyes, not quite as full of rage as they were a few minutes ago. It's obvious my reaction is scaring him—I'm glad. I hope he sees how deeply his words have wounded me.

“So the story of Meredith is open and shut. Why don't we move on to you, Jack?” I dig deep to conjure up a wicked, half-crazed smile. “I used to think the rough appearance you wear was all for show. I thought deep down, you weren't really the demon people think you are. I was wrong, just like you're wrong about me. You're the meanest asshole I've ever met, which is saying something because I was married to a monster, but you? You might have him beat.” I laugh acerbically. “I even find it all a little hilarious—I escape from hell just to run right into the arms of the devil.”

Meredith

Jack's not at the farmhouse on Friday, and I don't care to ask Edith where he went—back to the underworld, most likely. I still do my job; I scrub that asshole's kitchen and I hang up his clothes and I make his lunch and I don't burn the place down. If anything, that would probably make him more comfortable, sitting amongst the flames and charred embers.

I think of all the ways I could sabotage his life, from the extreme (poisoning his mouthwash) to the mundane (brewing decaf in the morning so he gets caffeine withdrawal). I replay our argument in his office and insert different responses. A part of me wishes I'd just given him a classic fuck off—simple and straight to the point. Maybe the next time I see him, I'll say it.

I know I won't though. I will be the picture of docile civility. I'll greet him with a smile and a pleasant hello. I'll continue being on my best behavior because I won't do anything he could use as an excuse to fire me. No, that jerk is stuck with me until I decide I've had enough, until I find some way to move on. I have one paycheck in the bank, plus my measly advance. Even if I wanted to (which I don't!), I don't think I could even afford to get back to California at this point.

Asking either of my parents to bail me out is still an option, but I just can't bring myself to do it. As far as they know, I'm still happily married to Andrew, living the sunny beach life. I won't tell them otherwise until I have some kind of plan for the future. The only thing worse than dealing with Jack would be facing them in my current state. I can just imagine the look of disappointment on my mom's face. She thought I hit the jackpot when I met Andrew and married young. Before I even walked down the aisle, she admitted how relieved she was that I'd never have to worry about money.

Oh well. I learned my lesson. I survived Andrew, and now I know better than to depend on a man ever again. I'm going to pave the way for my future on my own. I just need to, y'know, narrow down what that future will actually entail.

Saturday morning, I wake up early to start getting ready for the wedding. I eat dry cereal while standing at the window of the shack, trying to spot Jack inside the farmhouse. I check the upstairs office window, kitchen window, bedroom window, repeat. He's nowhere to be found. After that bout of titillating reconnaissance, I do some light yoga to calm my nerves. I don't know why I have butterflies in my stomach and a weird feeling in my chest—well, other than the fact that I'll likely have to face Jack at the wedding, but whatever. I can handle him. I have a plan, remember? Polite indifference. Sometimes, a smile says eff you even louder than words can.

I shower and take extra time with my hair so by the time I'm done, it's smooth and wavy. I apply my makeup carefully and slip into my dress. It's dark blue with a triangle neckline and spaghetti straps. The top fits me like a glove, and the skirt flows just a little when I move. I wish I had a nice pair of shoes to wear with it, but I did manage to snag some nude heels at the thrift store. They're pretty worn down, but hey, they were three dollars, so if they last the night, I'll call it a win.

Edith comes to check on me a few minutes before Tucker is due to arrive.

“Well don't you clean up nice. Sure you don't want to cover up though? Maybe grab a cardigan? I have a wool coat you could button up over that thing.”

“Edith, this dress isn't even that revealing.”

“Yeah, well, I've seen the way Tucker looks at you.”

“You’re the one who insisted on this date—you practically signed on the dotted line for me!”

She shakes her head at that, annoyed with me as if I’m missing something.

“Yes, right. Whatever. Are you sure you don’t want to ride with me and Jack? These country roads can be treacherous.”

“Oh, I’m sure.”

“It sprinkled earlier, so the roads are slick. Tucker probably doesn’t know how to maneuver as well as Jack does.”

“I don’t care. There’s no way I’m getting in a truck with Jack.”

“Listen, I don’t blame you. After you told me what you two fought about, I don’t really want to be in a truck with him either. We can leave him here, go by ourselves?”

Tucker pulls up and honks his horn before she can convince me to change my mind.

She sees me off, not bothering to wave to Tucker. I don’t know why she suddenly hates him considering how hard she pushed me into being his plus one.

Jack doesn’t show his face.

As we drive toward the church, Tucker and I have painful first date conversation that makes my pits sweat.

Did you have a good rest of your week?

Weather’s been nice hasn’t it?

What kind of music do you like?

I’m itchy from how much it seems like a cross-examination.

He compliments me on my dress and tells me he’s been excited to pick me up all day. He looks handsome in a dark blue suit. Everything we talk about is light and pleasant. I should be enjoying myself. Instead, I nearly barrel roll out of the truck after he swings into a parking space.

The church is a block over from the town square. There are cars lining the street, and Tucker tells me most of the restaurants and shops around Cedar Creek are closed for the night because so many people will be at the wedding. He's not kidding. When we walk into the church, it's overflowing. There's no bride's side and groom's side of the aisle; seating is simply first come, first served. There's a good chance I'll end up scooted onto Tucker's lap during the ceremony.

It seems most everyone knows each other, and Tucker is extra popular. For every one step we take, two friends come up to greet him. He introduces me to everyone and just about all of them proclaim that they're huggers. I see a few women from yoga, and they're all excited to see me here on Tucker's arm. I get a few conspicuous thumbs up and one rather loud, Giddit, girl! It seems the whole town sees him as their golden boy.

"C'mon," he says after we've finished making the rounds. "My friends saved us some seats up toward the altar."

Of course it takes another ten minutes to fight through the crowd of people congregating in the aisle, but we eventually break through to the other side.

A short guy in a gray suit waves us down, and Tucker tells me that's his best friend, Jacob.

"Tucker's told me a lot about you," he says, shaking my hand enthusiastically.

My smile falters for a moment, and fortunately Tucker saves me from having to reply.

"Nothing much, I swear—just said I had a smokin' hot date to the wedding."

Aw!

Nice compliment considering my entire outfit cost me less than a cocktail back in California.

I let him step past to sit beside Jacob then I take the aisle seat and turn to scan the crowd, looking for the one person I haven't seen yet. He left after me, but the ceremony is due to start soon.

It's not hard to find him.

Tall, dark, and handsome, Jack sticks out like a sore thumb.

He's sitting in the fourth pew across the aisle all by himself, staring straight ahead, jaw locked tight. He's focusing on the altar like he's deep in thought. All the while, life continues on around him—chatter and laughter among the adults, ringing giggles from the little kids. He's separated from it all, a black cloud sitting in the middle of that church. He doesn't turn to greet anyone, and in turn, everyone gives him a wide berth. They've completely written him off. Even Edith has abandoned him, opting instead to sit with her reading club friends on the other side of the church.

I surreptitiously study him while Tucker talks to his friends. His broad shoulders are clad in a black suit jacket—the one I imagined him wearing the day I organized his closet. His dark hair is tamed and sexy, and his strong jaw is clean-shaven. He could be so popular, so beloved, if only he'd let it happen.

I'm focused as if I'm going to try to paint him from memory later when his eyes cut to me, like he's known I was there all along. A cascade of goose bumps roll down my body and I jerk my attention back to the altar. My heart pounds. My breathing is erratic. Luckily, I can just pretend to be emotional about the holy matrimony about to take place before me.

Jack's loner status doesn't go unnoticed. One of Tucker's friends mentions it.

“Think someone ought to go save the poor guy? I feel kind of bad.”

Tucker sneers. “He does it to himself with that damn attitude.”

They chuckle and agree, and I'm left sitting there biting my tongue. My gut instinct is to defend Jack, but how? By admitting that he's treated me poorly too? By confirming that he's as mean as everyone thinks he is?

“Don't you agree, Meredith?”

No.

His actions might be indefensible, but I won't pile on him with everyone else.

I shake my head. “He's fine.”

“You could run for office with a poker face like that.” Jacob laughs heartily. “You live on that property with him day in and day out. He’s probably chewed your head off more times than you can count.”

“Yeah, well, I’ve given it right back to him.” Now shut up.

Tucker chuckles and wraps his arm around my shoulder, jostling me. “That’s my girl.”

I chance another glance at Jack and if possible, he looks even more annoyed and grumpy than he did a minute ago. His brows are furrowed and his attention is once again on the altar up ahead, unwavering. I want to crack his skull like a clam and read his thoughts. Why are you all alone? Why’d you have to push me away?

The group of friends around me goes right on chatting, but I’m oblivious to their conversation. My attention is on Jack right up until Dotty walks up to his pew and asks if she can sit beside him. His brows arch in surprise and he scoots over, giving her the aisle seat.

“Why are you smiling?” Tucker says, following my gaze.

I blink and think quick, pointing to some floral arrangement a few feet beyond Jack’s pew. “I was just thinking those are some of the prettiest roses I’ve ever seen.”

He laughs and rubs his thumb along my shoulder. “You like roses that much? I’ll be sure to remember that.”

I strain my ears to try to catch a bit of Jack and Dotty’s conversation, but there are far too many people separating us. A few minutes later, I do catch his laugh though—deep and throaty—and my gut clenches tight.

Then the ceremony starts and we all stand to watch Leanna walk down the aisle. For the first time since I arrived, I have no trouble keeping my attention on someone other than Jack. She walks toward Daniel with the biggest smile on her face and happy tears slipping down her cheeks. Her gown is a whole lot of dress. She’s gone for the full princess look, and it’s paying off—she’s breathtaking. Daniel obviously agrees, the look of pure adoration in his eyes spawning more than a few tears in the audience.

It's a heady experience to watch a marriage begin knowing my own is in the process of being dissolved. I think about that as Daniel and Leanna say their vows, staring into each other's eyes and promising to stick together through thick and thin. I made those same vows, and a part of me feels guilty that I'm breaking them. Then I remind myself that Andrew was a different person when we got married, someone I trusted to take care of me and safeguard my heart. He chose to break our contract long before I did.

Maybe I should be cynical about marriage now, but I'm not. Not every man is like Andrew. There are Daniels floating around the world, you just have to keep an eye out for them. Oh yeah, Meredith? And what about the Jacks of the world? What do you do for them?

I glance over to see him fidgeting in his pew. He angles his head toward the back of the church then scans the crowd, hopping from person to person before landing back on me. Our gazes click into place like two puzzle pieces. This time, neither one of us looks away. His dark eyes are all I see.

The pastor speaks as Leanna and Daniel exchange rings: "May these rings be a visible symbol of the love that unites these two young hearts. May they serve as a daily reminder of the promises you made here today."

I know the words aren't meant for us. We aren't the ones standing up on the altar, but I can't look away, and he isn't either.

"Meredith," Tucker whispers. I jerk my gaze back to the altar like he's just caught me red-handed. "Do you need a tissue?"

"Oh, no thank you." I'm not crying. In fact, I'd forgotten about the wedding altogether.

I chance another quick peek and find that Jack is facing forward again.

While the bride and groom snap photos with their family members after the ceremony, most of us walk one block over to the reception. It's in the middle of the town square, in the park surrounding the courthouse. Twinkle lights glow overhead, and all of the tables are covered in red and white gingham tablecloths. For centerpieces, mason jars are filled with sunflowers and white roses. Whiskey barrels serve as cocktail tables, and booze flows in every direction. Tucker goes to get me a glass of wine while I hang back with his friends. They really are nice, and even though they all grew up together, they don't make me feel like an outsider. Jacob even promises he'll teach me how to two-step after finding out I've never done it before. They all latch onto that, completely shocked that I could exist for twenty-eight years without ever having stepped foot in a "honky-tonk".

"Here you are," Tucker says, rejoining the group with a Corona for himself and a glass of white wine for me. "Sauvignon blanc, hope that's okay."

The wine is delicious, so crisp and refreshing. It's been a while since I've tasted wine this good, and I make a mental note to pace myself or I'll be acting a fool out on the dance floor later with Jacob and Tucker.

Once the bride and groom make their appearance, they open two buffet lines and everyone makes quick work of piling their plates with barbecue from Blue Stone's restaurant. I'm carrying my plate back to our group's table when I catch sight of Jack.

What is it about a handsome man sitting alone that makes your heart ache, even if you know the handsome man is sitting alone for a very good reason? He's probably offended half the people in attendance and yet deep down, I know I shouldn't give up on him.

No!

I shake off the feeling.

I'm not about to march over there and save him. He made his bed, and now he can lie in it. I follow Tucker back to the table and start eating. I fork some potato salad into my gullet then nibble on some bread, but I have no appetite and just can't handle the thought of Jack sitting by himself through the entire wedding reception.

God help me.

I turn to Tucker and offer up an easy smile. “I’ll be right back.”

Jack

Edith talked me into coming to this wedding. They aren't really my thing. In fact, given the choice between attending a wedding and getting a root canal, I'd lean back and say, Ahhhh.

Daniel's a good guy though, and he's worked for me for years. I'm glad I'm here now, though I plan on leaving as soon as they cut the cake. I hate weddings; I do not hate cake. Maybe I can talk Edith into snagging me another piece on her way out. Unlike most old-timers who grumble about the lateness of the hour, she'll be here until they shut the place down—except, she won't agree to the cake idea. She's not talking to me right now. She's pissed about my fight with Meredith.

“You think she left that husband for the attention?! How thick is that skull of yours?”

Those were her exact words. Then, she called me an idiot and thumped me on the back of the head before walking right out of the room. Edith can scold with the best of them.

I wonder if I'm really that far off about Meredith. I thought I was the only person in Cedar Creek thinking clearly about this woman, but I suppose it's possible that the opposite is true. Should I not have trusted Helen's judgment of her own sister? The day she showed up, she fit the stereotype I'd been warned about to a T: gorgeous, dolled up, headstrong. She didn't seem like a wounded bird to me. Hell, she pecked at me every chance she got.

I thought I'd finally pinned her down in my office the other day. I voiced every suspicion swirling in my head and then I watched, waiting for the fury, the anger, and the lies. I knew she'd deny it all, and she did, but something felt...off. I've never witnessed hurt like I saw in her eyes. My words weren't just insulting, but deep affronts to her pride. I realized in that moment that my accusations might have been out of line.

I hate to admit a mistake, because I try so hard not to make them, but there's a possibility I'm wrong. Okay, there's more than a possibility. I'm pretty sure she wouldn't have stuck around this long if she were just trying to get a rise out of her husband. I was told she was entitled and spoiled, but other than the advance, she hasn't asked for a single thing. She's worked damn hard and then some. I never told her she had to bake cookies for the ranch hands or organize my closet. She puts in more hours than anyone else besides me, and I thanked her by—how did I put it? Ah yes, I accused her of being a spoiled, heartless flirt. Boy do I have a way with words.

Christine would be howling with laughter if she could see me now, sitting alone at a wedding—well, not totally alone. I've somehow found myself at the kids table. They're supposed to be minding their manners and eating their dinner, but between you and me, the brown-haired boy—the one who reminds me of myself—is acting like a little snot, putting ice down the dress of the girl beside him. I tell him to knock it off and his eyes get wide with fear. It's pretty much the same way everyone has looked at me tonight. I wonder if the kids around Cedar Creek think of my house as the dark, scary, haunted house on the dead-end road. Apparently, I've created quite the reputation for myself.

It's why I'm here by myself.

Meredith isn't alone though. Even now, she has all of Tucker's friends circled around her, eating out of the palm of her hand. She has a way with people. She makes them laugh and puts stars in their eyes. Two days ago, I accused her of using her charms on purpose, but now I'm not sure it isn't just her natural effect on people. Add that to the list of things I need to apologize for.

I push barbecue around on my plate because I can't stomach another bite.

I catch movement out of the corner of my eye. It's Daniel's brother walking over—nice guy I've hung out with once or twice. I smile and pull out a chair for him to sit.

“Oh, actually I was just gonna ask if anyone was using the chair...”

The troublemaking boy laughs. It’s just him and me at the table now. Seems fitting.

“They say you’re mean as the devil.”

“And what do you think?”

He looks at the top of my head, in search of red horns.

“I think it’s true.”

“Well, you’ll find out if you keep messing with that girl who was sitting by you earlier.”

He scowls and stomps off.

“Oh yeah, and also if you don’t eat your vegetables!”

I push away from the table and head for the bar. They’re serving Blue Stone wine tonight. I donated a few cases as a wedding present to Daniel, plus a fat check and a week off from work. Apparently he’s taking Leanna down to Cancun. I might treat myself to a trip there later this year; I could use a few days away from the ranch. Of course, it doesn’t occur to me in this moment that Christine tried for two years to get me to take a vacation and I turned her down every time. The thing is, I didn’t want to go away with her. Now, the feisty brunette who hates my guts? I wouldn’t mind being on a beach with her. Piña coladas, coconut bikini, tan lines...sí señora.

I’m thinking about the prospect when she comes up right beside me at the bar. I haven’t spoken to her in two days and now here she is, within arm’s reach.

I glance down at her and offer a conciliatory smile.

She doesn’t respond.

“You just skipped the line,” I joke, trying to coax some kind of conversation out of her.

She ignores me, orders another sauvignon blanc, and then tells the bartender to put it on my tab.

I smile wider. “It’s an open bar.”

She emits a little annoyed humph then spins on her heel. Before I know what I'm doing, my hand reaches out and I catch her elbow, spinning her back around to me and gently leading her away from the bar.

"Still upset with me?" I ask, leaning down to try to catch her blue eyes. Tonight they're more electric than ever, alive with disdain for me.

"Upset is putting it mildly."

Her voice is biting, but mine's not.

"Fair enough. Still, I saw you watching me during the ceremony."

"We were in a church, so I was waiting to see if you'd spontaneously burst into flame. I didn't want to miss it."

I'm smiling, even though I know I shouldn't be. I just can't help it. She's funny.

"Dance with me."

Her eyes turn into two huge saucers.

"You're kidding."

I've never been kidding less.

My hand releases her elbow and I hold it out palm up, waiting for her to accept it.

"Don't say no."

Not with everyone watching.

She looks at my hand like it's a snake.

"I did just buy you a drink."

"It's an open bar," she points out, throwing my words back at me.

"Yeah, but that's Blue Stone wine."

She sneers at her glass and sets it down on a nearby table.

I have no choice but to take matters into my own hands. She's not going to accept a dance with me—and she shouldn't—so

I'll just have to guide her toward the dance floor while she's too stunned to turn me down.

I pull her into my arms, appreciating the slow song playing over the speakers. Her hands hang like limp noodles at her sides and I tug her closer. We aren't hip to hip, but we're not far off.

"Why do you want to dance with me?" she asks, her voice devoid of any real anger. "After everything you said in your office, I'm surprised you can even stand to look at me."

"You're supposed to put your hands on my shoulders," I say, ignoring her question. "Or if you're feeling fancy, you can clasp them around my neck."

"That might give people the idea that I like you. Where should I put my hands if I want to show that I can't stand you?"

Her dig garners a few suspicious stares and awkward laughs from the couples dancing around us.

"Guess I'm not alone in thinking you're a jerk," she continues, firing shots every chance she gets.

I smile. "Alfred doesn't think I'm a jerk."

She snorts. "You don't deserve Alfred."

Finally, resigned, she moves her hands tentatively up to my shoulders. I use the opportunity to bring us a little closer. She feels good in my arms even though every atom inside of her is trying to pull away from me. A more polite guy would respect that and move away, but I think we've established that I don't have much respect to lose in her eyes.

"What about you?" I ask gently. "Do you hate me?"

She's focused on the edge of the dance floor, her profile facing me. I can still see anger building behind her blue gaze. "I do."

"Then I won't try to talk you out of it."

She nods. "There's no point. You won't convince me you're anything but an arrogant jerk."

"Glad that's settled."

My capitulation only makes her madder. She's fuming for a fight, but I'm ready to humble myself and apologize.

"No. You know what?" Her temper flares. "One second you're hot, the next you're cold. What you said in your office was unforgivable."

"I completely agree."

She jerks her gaze to me, and I hope she can see the regret buried there. For a second I think she does, but then she shakes her head and tries to move away.

"Please don't leave. Everyone's watching us."

Her expression breaks and I know I have her. Her heart's too big to walk away now. She won't embarrass me.

"This isn't fair. I don't want to dance with you, not after what you said."

"I want to apologize."

"I don't accept."

I lower my voice. "Look, Helen painted a picture of you early on that wasn't pretty, and I didn't know any better than to believe her. But, I'm starting to see that she doesn't know you any better than I did three weeks ago."

"I don't want to listen to this."

I tip my head down and whisper against her hair. "Meredith, I'm sorry. I wanted to make sure you weren't the person I thought you were. Once I saw your reaction in my office, I realized I was wrong."

"Oh yeah? Is that why it's taken you two days to apologize?"

"It's not an easy thing for me to do." I smile. "Besides, you can run pretty hot too. I know what it's like to need time to cool down."

She's a ball of fiery anger in my arms. In fact, I'm pretty sure she's thinking about socking me in the jaw.

The song ends and she finally steps away, dabbing at the corner of her eye. Fuck. I made her cry.

“I want to go home.”

“I’ll take you.”

“I’ll ask Tucker.”

“He’s been drinking.”

I saw him have a beer earlier, so technically I’m not lying.

“Then I’ll ask Edith.”

Edith, smart woman that she is, tells Meredith she’s not ready to leave yet.

“Just have Jack drive you,” Edith says, pointing to me.

“I’ll walk.”

Edith shakes her head sternly. “I won’t have my yoga teacher end up being coyote food.”

Meredith pauses, as if really contemplating the choice between a car ride with me and being picked apart by a pack of wild canines. For her, it’s a tough call.

Fortunately, she has enough sense to agree, but Tucker isn’t happy about it. When I walk over with her to say goodbye, his eyes are focused on me accusingly.

“You really want to leave? Don’t you want to stay for the cake and bouquet? I thought girls loved that stuff.”

She offers a weak smile. “Thank you, but I’m tired. I’ve had a long week and it’s finally caught up with me.”

“Are you sure you want to go with him?” His eyes slice to me.

“I could take you.”

“She’s sure.”

The ride home is tense and silent. Meredith is stewing in the passenger seat, arms crossed, gaze out the window. I can’t leave things the way they are. I know she’s still upset with me and I want her to get it out, to shout at me like she wanted to back on the dance floor.

I turn off the main road, down a street that leads to the old quarry. On either side of the dirt road, cornstalks jut toward the sky. There's nothing but night beyond my headlights. We're alone.

I put the truck in park, cut the engine, and turn toward to Meredith.

"I get it, you feel cheated—you want a fight," I say calmly.
"Okay then, let's fight."

Meredith

We're parked on a dirt road in the middle of a cornfield, and I have no clue where we are or how to get back to the ranch from here. I should have been paying attention while we were driving, but I was too busy stewing. It's pitch black outside. If I got out and tried to walk, I'd end up marching blindly into the comically large open mouth of a mountain lion.

"You want a fight. Okay then, let's fight."

That's what he says to me.

I turn to him just as he kills the engine and turns to face me on the bucket seat.

"I don't want to fight."

I don't have the energy. I'm so tired, so defeated. I can't keep putting on a brave face for the world. I've used up all my confidence, burned through all my false bravado. I almost cried on the dance floor, and I'm dangerously close to actually doing so now. Once I start, I don't think I'll be able to stem the flow of tears.

"How about we talk then?"

I shake my head and turn to the cornfield.

"Take me home please."

We sit there for a few more minutes, but then he sighs and restarts the truck, turning back for the main road.

When we pull up to the farmhouse, I jump out before he's even put the truck in park and bee-line straight for the shack. I don't thank him for the ride, and I definitely don't stick around to listen to any more of his apologies. I'm so sick of people, of the back and forth, of the emotional rollercoaster. Maybe I should go live on a private island somewhere, just me and a bunch of wild swimming pigs. That sounds fucking great.

I change out of my dress and kick off my heels. I tug on one of Jack's t-shirts—the one I didn't return with all the others a few days back—and then stare at my bed. It's still early. I'm too wired to go to sleep. I want a stiff drink—a big one, something bigger than a shot but smaller than a swimming pool. I step toward my window and check the farmhouse. Jack's bedroom light is on, but it's dark downstairs. I could probably make it to the liquor cabinet and back without him even knowing.

I know from cleaning it that it's well stocked. I hesitate, really not into the idea of having another confrontation with him, but my need for alcohol wins out. I'm special agent Tom Cruise weaving in and out of red lasers as I tiptoe across the lawn and tug open the back door. Alfred is there, tail wagging, excited by my impromptu visit.

“Shhhh,” I hiss, petting him behind his ear before he starts barking or something. “Go away—can't you sense that I'm fighting with your human? Stop hitting the wall with your tail! You're making too much noise.”

I pause and listen for Jack, hear footsteps upstairs, and know I'm in the clear. I dash toward the liquor cabinet, grab whatever my hand lands on first, and then sprint back outside.

Alfred follows after me, acting as my accomplice, and together, we hightail it back to the shack. Once we're inside, I slam the door closed and press my back against it. Mission: Possible, apparently.

I glance down at my bounty. I managed to nab a bottle of Jack Daniels. Fitting. I pour myself a bit and barf a little in my mouth when I take my first sip.

“It's so bad,” I tell Alfred, trying to keep the rest of it down.

He looks at me with sad, questioning eyes as if to say, Hmm, and I thought you weren't a little bitch.

I nod. “You're right. Here goes nothing.”

I drink my glass in one long swallow then sit down on the floor and pet Alfred.

I continue like this for a while, so long that I lose track of time and space and the number of times I've forced myself to swallow more disgusting brown liquor.

What I do know is alcohol is great and Alfred is soooooo soft. My fingers feel tingly. I forget I have any problems. I know nothing beyond this tiny shack and this adorable golden retriever licking my toes. I'm lying on the rug, spread out like a snow angel.

"I'm considering moving to Mexico," I tell Alfred. "I get that most people only flee to Mexico if they've committed a crime, but what's so wrong with good ol' fashioned fleeing? Do I gotta robbabank or something to JUSTIFY running away from my problems?"

He splays out beside me.

"Of course, you can come with me if you want. I'll just have to reteach you your commands in Spanish so we don't stand out. Okey, hello is hola. Sit is siéntate. Stay is...I dunno, let's go with...estée lauder."

A fist pounds on the shack's door and makes me scream out in fright.

"Relax," Jack says from outside. "It's me. The door was ajar back at the farmhouse, so I'm just making sure Alfred didn't run off. Is he in there with you?"

"Uhh..." I look over at the dog in question. He licks my foot. "No! But I have a very strong feeling he's fine!"

"He was in the house when I got home, but now I can't find him."

Apparently excited to hear his owner's voice, Alfred hops to his feet and pads over to the door, scratching it with his paw.

"Alfred?" Jack asks, apparently hearing said scratching.

I contemplate telling him it's me, etching hatch marks into the wall like a prisoner counting my days.

Alfred whines.

I cover my eyes with my arm. "Ugh, fine. He's in here."

The door opens and owner and dog are reunited once again. Whoop dee doo. I don't have the energy to move off the ground...or open my eyes.

“Meredith?”

“Swat they call me.”

“Are you drunk?”

“What’s with the twenty questions?”

“Did you polish off that entire bottle of Jack?”

Depends on how much was in it when I started—I can’t remember.

“Who’s can say, really, in this day and age?”

“Why are you on the floor?”

“Be-cause it’s comfortable and my twin bed isn’t big enough for me and Alfred.”

He steps into the shack and toes the glass of liquor away from my hand.

I still have my arm thrown over my eyes, but I hear what he’s doing. “Hey, I was going to drink that.”

“I think you’ve had enough.”

“There you go again, with the I thinks. I think this about Meredith, I think that about Meredith. Well guess what? I don’t need Jack to tell me when I’ve had too much...JACK! Pffffff. Now please leave.”

“Not until I’m sure you won’t get sick. I can’t remember how much liquor was left in that bottle.”

“Okay, but can you close that door? You’re letting all the freezy-freezy air out.”

He obliges then I hear him take off his shoes and sit down on my bed. Meanwhile, I’m lying in the shape of a chalk outline from a homicide, legs splayed on the floor.

“I didn’t realize you were a drinker,” he says gently.

“I’m not. I hated every sip. Alfred peer pressured me.”

“Well watch out around him, he’s also a big fan of tattoos.”

“Ha ha, funny man. Now, please be quiet. I was in the middle of wallowing and I’m not finished. You can stay, but you have to stop asking me questions.”

The bed creaks, and maybe he’s getting comfortable where I sleep. Maybe he’s stinking up my blankets with his sexy scent. I’ll have to run the linen through the wash twice tomorrow morning, or I could just leave his scent there...maybe that wouldn’t be so bad. I push the rogue thought aside and try to get back to what I was thinking about before he so rudely interrupted me. Oh, right, Mexico. Mexico...I can’t remember why I was thinking about Mexico. I groan, fling my arm away, and sit up, eyes blinking open as I try to find my balance.

Jack’s sitting on the bed, just as I imagined, except he’s not in his suit anymore. Like me, he changed when we got home. Sweatpants and a t-shirt—how adorable of him.

“Have you been here long enough to confirm I’m not going to get sick?”

The very edge of his sexy mouth tips up like the smirking emoji. “No.”

I glance away. “Right.”

“Why were you drinking?”

“You.”

I sigh and lie back on the rug. My head is spinning.

“Are you okay?”

I hold up both thumbs. “Peachy.”

“Why did I drive you to drink?”

“Because you hurt my feelings on Thursday.”

“I’m sorry for that, Meredith.”

“Yeah, I’ve heard that before. I know the routine. It goes like this: make me fall for you, be mean to me, say you’re sorry, and then repeat. It’s the same thing Andrew used to do.”

“He was mean to you?”

“I don’t want to talk about this.”

“How was he mean to you?”

There’s a long silence as I stare up at the ceiling.

“I don’t want to talk about it.” I enunciate the words like they each make up their own sentence.

“How about we trade off?” he goads. “A secret for a secret?”

“I know all your secrets.”

“Oh yeah?”

“Edith told me about your parents’ accident. She told me how you changed. It’s why I know you’re not as mean as you pretend to be.”

“You told me on Thursday I’m the meanest person you’ve ever met.”

“It might still be the truth, but I just wanted to make you feel bad for hurting me.”

“See? You just went first. That’s a secret.”

That wasn’t so bad, I guess.

“Tell me one of yours.”

With my gaze on the ceiling, it’s like I’m lounging on a therapist’s couch. It almost feels like he’s not really there, like we aren’t really talking at all.

“All right. I actually like your cooking,” he admits.

I smile then wipe it away quickly before he sees it. “That doesn’t count. Everyone likes my cooking. I want a real one.”

“Okay fine. You want to go deep?” He thinks for a second, and then he sighs. “The way I figure, there’s only a handful of people who really give a shit about you in this life. I’m not talking about friends you see at Super Bowl parties. I’m talking about people who would take a bullet for you. There just aren’t that many, for a lot of people.”

“I know what you mean.”

“I used to have three people like that, and the day my parents died, I lost two of them. Now it’s just me and Edith.”

I turn my head so my gaze catches his. He's staring down at me from his perch on the bed. I think he's been watching me this whole time, studying me with indecipherable emotion in his eyes. It's that gaze that makes the truth tumble out of my mouth.

"You want to know something even sadder?" I swallow and look away, back to the safety of the ceiling. "I don't think I have anyone."

"What about your parents? Helen?"

"Sure, on paper, they're my family, but I'm not close with them. I hardly even know them anymore."

When he speaks again, there's remorse in his voice. It's so heavy and sad it breaks my heart.

"In my office, when I said you didn't have any family or friends here—"

"Yeah, that hit the mark."

"I'm sorry."

I wipe away the tear slipping down my cheek and shake my head.

"This game fucking sucks."

"It's my turn."

"Fine. Make it something juicy."

"I was jealous you went to the wedding with Tucker."

That is juicy.

"How jealous?"

When he doesn't answer, I turn to find he's still studying me, except now his gaze is on his t-shirt, my pajama top of choice. I wonder if he's annoyed I didn't give it back with all the others.

I sit up and turn to face him, sitting cross-legged on the rug.

"If it helps, every single woman at the wedding was infatuated with you, except maybe Leanna. You might have been putting out some major fuck off vibes, but had you smiled at any one of them, you would have had her falling in love with you on the spot.”

He tilts his head to the side. “I smiled at you and as I recall, you nearly ditched me on the dance floor.”

“Those were different circumstances.”

“Right.” He frowns, and it might be the alcohol, but I swear he’s looking at me with desire. Yeah, he definitely is—it’s the same look Alfred gives his food bowl.

“My turn?” I say quickly, anxious to break up the tension starting to brew in this tiny shack. “Okay here’s mine: I’m really bummed I didn’t get to eat a piece of wedding cake. I really wanted a corner piece.”

He smiles. “Cute. Now take your turn.”

“That was my turn.”

“I just told you I feel like I’m alone in this world.”

“And I confessed I have an addiction to icing.”

Seems equally as important to me.

“Fine. Okay.” I sweep my hands though the air and turn away, eyes narrowed on my bathroom mirror. He wants honesty? He’s about to get it. “I think you’re handsome—h-o-t.”

“How handsome?”

I scold him with my stare, and he doesn’t even have the decency to hide his arrogance.

Enough. I’ve had enough. I push to stand and yank the door open.

“How about we change this into a game of truth or dare?” I quip. “I dare you to leave this shack right now.”

“That’s a terrible dare.”

“Fine, truth: did you mean all that stuff you said in your office? Do you really think so little of me?”

“Meredith, I was wrong. I was angry, and jealous, and worried that you were too good to be true. I’m sorry.”

I want to delve into every single word he just said, but I'm too drunk. I've already forgotten half of them.

I nod. "Okay, fine. Let's just forget about it."

"How was Andrew mean to you?"

I pinch my eyes closed. I knew he'd bring that back up, knew he wouldn't be able to leave well enough alone. I've learned the hard way that it's better to keep my lips zipped about my marriage. The reasons are stacked one on top of another at this point: I'm embarrassed that I put myself in that situation in the first place. I'm ashamed I stayed as long as I did. I'm hesitant to call it abuse and to open up about the things Andrew used to say, because then I'd actually have to acknowledge that I was a victim. I don't like that word. I don't want to have to wear it like an albatross around my neck. I just want to move on.

Those are all good reasons, but there's still one more: I have tried to open up about Andrew in the past, and it hasn't gone well.

Honestly, why do I care if Jack knows the truth about my marriage? Up until a few days ago, he wielded incorrect assumptions about me and my life as hurtful weapons. Maybe he's realized the error of his ways now, but I'm still annoyed. I want to quote Clark Gable and say, Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn. I don't give a damn what he thinks of me or my choices.

Not anymore.

"Meredith."

"I don't want to talk about it."

"How was he mean to you?"

"I said I don't want to talk about it!"

I think I'm doing a good job of voicing my resistance to this topic, but he isn't so easily swayed.

"I'd like to know what he did to you."

Jesus Christ! He's not going to drop it.

I slam the door closed again and throw my hands up in defeat. “It was the way he spoke to me. It was the things he said to me...the things he called me.”

There, he has his answer.

“Like what?”

“Does it matter?” I move to straighten a towel hanging near the shower. Then I go check on Alfred.

“You don’t have to tell me if you don’t want to, but you should talk to someone about it.”

“I have talked to someone,” I grumble, “and it didn’t go over well.”

“Why didn’t it go well?”

“Because it’s hard to explain! It makes no sense to other people. If I was living with an abusive monster, why didn’t I just leave? He wasn’t holding me captive, wasn’t threatening to kill me if I left. He was such a manipulative asshole, it took me years to realize what he was, what I’d become! It makes no sense. He’s this outgoing, happy person. To the world, Andrew Wilchester is perfect. No one wants to believe he has another side to him—just ask Helen.”

“You told her about the abuse?”

The way he says the word makes my skin crawl. I don’t like that label. I want to lay no claim to it.

“I tried.”

“And she didn’t want to hear it?”

He sounds angry, but I’m careful with my next words. Helen helped me get this job; I don’t want to throw her under the bus.

“She wasn’t trying to hurt me. We aren’t close—that’s my fault. I kept the truth from her for too long, and now it’s too late. To her, it’s all so confusing. She wants me to reconcile with him.”

“That’s what she told me would happen.” His voice is steady and calm. I’m envious of his sobriety. “She said you’d go back to California once you got a dose of reality.”

I laugh, and I’m embarrassed to find it’s not a laugh at all but a broken sob.

It hurts knowing she said those things about me to someone else. It’s one thing to suspect it, another to hear it confirmed. I heave in a deep breath and try to get it together. This is embarrassing. I’m drunk.

“I swear I’m not weak. I didn’t stay because I was scared of being on my own.” I’m pacing now, worked up from all the truth spilling out of me. “It was just really confusing—the cycles he put me through. It was like being on the end of a line. He’d toss me out and reel me back in. Human beings gravitate toward cycles, routines, and that became ours.”

“I’m sorry.”

“My marriage to him is part of the reason I feel so isolated now. I put distance between myself and the people around me because I was afraid people would find out I was living this... lie.”

He’s off the bed now, bending to where I’m sitting on the rug. I don’t remember sitting down, but he’s here now, right in front of me, catching my tears and cradling my head.

“It’s not your fault Helen didn’t believe you.”

“Please don’t be angry at her. She’s not to blame in all this. I should have left earlier—”

His eyes flare with fury. “Stop talking like that. You’re the victim, not Helen, and not Andrew. You left when you could, and that’s all that matters.”

He’s cradling my face and I’m weeping like I’ve never wept in my life. I’m losing water weight by the gallon, shriveling up like a raisin. I will be dehydrated and dead by the end of this sob session.

“I just want to move on.”

“So do it.”

“I thought I was,” I cry, angry now. “But Andrew still followed me here! I’m still married to the man for Christ’s sake! That’s why I have to go to Mexico—MEXICO!” I snap my fingers. “That’s why I was thinking about Mexico earlier!”

“If possible, I think you’re getting more drunk. Here, blow.”

I don’t realize I was creating snot bubbles until he forces a tissue under my nose. That’s...fun. I’ve successfully solidified my role in his life as Crazy Housekeeper To Keep At Arm’s Length. I wonder if I can use my tenuous emotional state to finagle some benefits like health insurance or paid time off. There has to be a bright side to having a mental breakdown in front of your boss.

“I am more dunk.” I try again, losing my fragile grasp on language. “Durrunk.”

“Do you feel sick?”

“Just weepy and sleepy.” I laugh at my rhyme. “If you move your hands away from my cheeks, I think I’ll drop right to the floor face first. I’m so tired.”

“I’m going to put you to bed.”

He hooks his hands under my arms and hoists me off the ground. Cold air blasts my bare legs. I wrap them around his waist to warm them up. God, he’s so warm...so warm and tall and strong. I want him to set me down and pick me up again. It turns me on that he can just pluck me up off the ground like that. It fulfills some vestigial cavewoman need I didn’t even know I had.

He hoists me higher and I’m reminded that I’m still wrapped around him like an anaconda. Damn. This is hot, but it’s not right. When I imagined having sex with him on this twin bed, I was fully sober and on top, riding him like...well, a cowgirl.

“I didn’t think this was how tonight would end,” I whisper against his cheek. “I think you’re really handsome, like so so so bangin’ sexy, don’t get me wrong, but I’m pretty drunk and sleepy.”

I’m pawing at his chest. I’m running my hands along his strong jaw, feeling it for the first time. It’s magnificent. He is magnificent.

“Meredith, I said I’m putting you to bed, not taking you to bed.”

“Oh, I see, Mr. Verb Man, got different verbs for all occasions.”

He sets me down on the bed and tugs my blankets aside so I can slip my legs underneath.

I wait for him to pat my head and tell me to go to sleep like a good little girl.

Instead, he tugs the covers up and sits down beside me.

His brown eyes are pools of sympathy. I wonder if I was imagining the desire I saw in them earlier.

“How ya feelin’, champ?”

He brushes his hand across my forehead, pushing my hair back.

“Like I’d keel over if I wasn’t already lying down.”

“I’ll stay with you until you fall asleep.”

“That reminds me—can Alfred stay with me tonight?”

“He’s already asleep at the foot of your bed.”

“Whew.”

“Go to sleep.”

I close my eyes.

“Jack?”

“Yeah?”

“I really wanted to hate you after the things you said on Thursday, but I couldn’t. When you were at the wedding all by yourself, I felt so bad. I only came up to the bar because I wanted to talk to you, but I didn’t know how. I was so...angry. Maybe I should still be angry, but I’m not.”

“Well if you wake up tomorrow and realize you’re still mad at me, that’s okay. I know this is probably just the alcohol talking.”

“Thanks. Yeah...maybe I’ll be double pissed in the morning.”

“Maybe.”

“Could you tuck the blanket around me now?”

He laughs. “Like you’re a kid?”

“Yes, exactly. It’s been a really long time since someone put me to bed like this.”

He chuckles, and I keep my eyes closed as he leans over and tucks, tucks, tucks around my entire body. I’m in a little cocoon of warmth when he’s finished. I think he’s about to go, but I’m not ready for him to leave.

I keep my eyes closed, but I’m smiling as I ask, “Wait, are we still playing that game? Because I have one more thing I want to know.”

“You’re supposed to be sleeping.”

“I’ll go to sleep as soon as you answer,” I promise.

“Okay, shoot.”

“That day we were swimming, did you see anything you weren’t supposed to? Like underneath my bra?”

I can hear his smile when he asks, “You mean, was your bra completely see-through? Yes.”

“Right. That’s what I thought. If you could go now, I’m going to turn over and suffocate myself with my pillow.”

He laughs, kisses my forehead, and then I must really be drunk because five seconds later, I’m dead to the world, completely conked out.

When I wake up, Jack and Alfred are sleeping, splayed out on the rug together.

They never left.

Meredith

Jack slept on the floor in the shack all night. He was supposed to leave once I went to sleep, but he stayed. He's still there, lying on his side, using one of my blankets as a makeshift pillow. His t-shirt is scrunched up so I can see a little bit of his abs and the top of his boxer briefs. If I had a camera, I'd snap two photos. The first I would send to Calvin Klein so he could be their new model. The second I would put in a maximum-security safety deposit box.

I roll over and poke him with my finger.

“Are you awake?”

He groans and keeps his eyes shut.

Alfred—who's excited to see that I'm up and moving—trots over and licks my hand then turns and starts lapping at Jack's face.

He tries to fend him off, but it's no use. He's not getting back to sleep now that Alfred and I are both awake.

He pushes to sit up and holds the dog at arm's length so he can't get to his face. Then he rubs sleep from his eyes and tugs a hand through his hair. I sit very, very still, as if I'm dressed in camouflage, observing the habits of a wild animal in its habitat. The sight of Jack there on the ground is a little funny and a whole lot sexy. His hair is askew from his blanket-pillow. His chin has a light dusting of black stubble, and his cheek sports a red imprint from sleeping on it. I want to slink off the bed and tackle him, pin him to the ground, and rub my cheek against that stubble.

“Shit, my back hurts,” he groans.

I smile. “Shack-sweet-shack.”

He twists right and left, trying to wring out his spine.

“You were supposed to leave after I fell asleep,” I point out.

At least that’s what I remember, but there are clearly gaps in my memory because the most recent browser tab on my phone shows a search for burro rides in Mexico.

He nods and pushes to stand. “That was the plan, but then I kept worrying you’d drown in your own puke or something. Freaked me out.”

My cheeks turn a nice rosy shade. “It was stupid of me to drink that much.”

He turns to me with one eye winked as if he’s trying to keep the early morning light from blinding him. “Everyone needs to get out of their head once in a while.”

I nod, appreciating that he doesn’t feel the need to scold me for my poor choices.

I push the blankets aside and kick my legs over the side of the bed. “I really should get going, eat breakfast or something. Edith has me teaching yoga to half the town this afternoon, and I think I’m still a little drunk.”

I stand and stretch my hands overhead. My head decides to take the opportunity to remind me that I basically poisoned myself last night and I’m now going to pay the price. I press a hand to my forehead and wince.

“Ahhhh...also, I should probably drink some water.” He laughs and I drop my hand. “What?”

He turns away, but he’s unsuccessful in wiping the smile from his face. “Your shirt’s tucked into your tighty-whities.”

I glance down and sure enough, he’s not kidding.

Well, that’s a great way to start my morning.

“Oh god,” I groan, yanking on the t-shirt until it’s back to hanging on me like a dress.

“It looked kind of stylish,” he assures me.

I go to grab some sleeping shorts, slightly embarrassed that I didn’t put them on to sleep. How many times did I flash him my ass during the night? Oh right—the limit does not exist.

“I’ll make you pancakes if you promise to erase that image from your memory.”

He slips his shoes on and heads for the door. “I like them topped with banana slices.”

“Obviously. I’m not a pancake amateur.”

We walk together to the farmhouse, Alfred darting in between our legs.

Edith is sitting at the kitchen table sipping some coffee when we walk in. She’s reading the Sunday paper and when she hears us enter, she folds down one corner and eyes us over the top of it.

“Mornin’, you two. Jack, I didn’t know you were doing wake-up calls nowadays.”

Jack clears his throat and heads for the coffee pot. I head for the pantry to grab pancake supplies.

“Long night?”

“No,” I say quickly, voice shrill and obvious.

“When did you get back from the wedding, Edith?” Jack asks, changing the subject.

“Oh, not too late. Must have been before you ’cause I saw your room was empty.”

Jack holds a cup of coffee out to me and I greedily accept it, hoping the caffeine will dull my headache. “Thanks.”

“Yeah, I went to bed pretty late,” he admits smoothly.

“What about you, Meredith? Did you go to bed pretty late too?”

“Edith,” Jack warns.

“Just trying to make polite conversation, sheesh.” She shakes out her paper and pretends to get back to reading.

“Do you want any pancakes, Edith?”

“No thank you. I already ate. Unlike you two, I’ve been awake for a few hours.”

Jack sighs and I finally cave. “Edith, we aren’t keeping secrets. There’s nothing to tell. I got drunk like an idiot, and Jack had to make sure I didn’t die in my sleep.”

She seems disappointed. “That’s all?”

“That’s all.”

“Well dammit, that’s boring.” Her chair screeches away from the table then she grabs her coffee and her paper. “And it means I owe Dotty and Deedee twenty bucks a piece.”

Jack and I exchange an amused glance and something sparks between us—a feeling that could easily overwhelm me if I let it. I shift my attention to the pancakes and fill them up with bananas and blueberries. Jack gets me an aspirin and some water and I’m so grateful, I let him pick his pancakes from the first batch. He takes the big ones, which is fine because everyone knows the little ones are tastier, with a better crust-to-fluff ratio. We sit at the table across from one another with Alfred lazing at our feet, hoping to catch an errant crumb.

My attention is pinned on the window in front of me while Jack’s is on the kitchen wall—we’re suddenly playing a game of chicken. We don’t talk for long minutes as we cut into our pancakes, fork bites into our mouth, and chew. Last night, we saw hidden sides of one another, the deep, secret parts you’re supposed to expose after like three years of dating, when you already share a lease, and a couch, and possibly an animal, when you aren’t afraid to make bodily noises in front of each other. We did it all wrong. We cut through the bullshit layers of polite conversation and small talk. I told him the truth about Andrew. We bonded over the debilitating fear of being alone, just a casual Saturday night between attractive, single employer and attractive, “it’s complicated” employee.

How unsettling. I really thought he was the devil. Now, I know it’s a disguise. Beneath all that arrogance and good hair, he’s funny and thoughtful and kind. He slept on my rug because he didn’t want me to aspirate my vomit—not exactly the MO of a fallen angel and leader of the damned.

I know the truth about him now, and it’s impossible to know how I’m supposed to navigate from here. Do I try to wipe my memory completely clean of last night? Do I pretend he was just being polite? Nothing more, nothing less? I don't think it's possible. I'd have to hit myself in the head with a rock or something.

Maybe instead, I could bring it up casually and laugh it off. Ha ha, I have a crippling fear that Andrew has broken me in a way that can't be fixed. LOLOL, FUNNY RIGHT?!

Obviously neither of those choices will work.

I sigh, and then, like fools, we try to talk at the exact same time.

“About last night—”

“I was wondering—”

I laugh and he smiles, waving for me to go first.

“I was just going to say, thanks for last night. You didn't need to be that nice. I think I remember 90% of what happened, but it's that 10% that really scares me. I'm worried I might've flashed you, or joined a Mexican cartel or something.”

“You might've done both, but I hear those guys have a 24-hour try-it-before-you-buy-it policy.”

I drop my head into my hand and pinch my eyes closed. “It was pretty bad, huh?”

“Pretty bad? No. You were honest with me, and I'm glad. Also, yes, you flashed your underwear a few times, but I was raised a gentleman and I didn't look.”

I glance up at him and arch a brow.

The right side of his mouth perks up just a little. “Well, when I could help it.”

“What is it with me?! First the swimming debacle and now this. I swear I'm not usually such a weirdo around my friends.”

“Friends, huh?”

I can feel heat spread across my neck. Funny how friends feels intimate after being enemies.

“I mean, we are, right? Friends?”

“I guess so.”

He doesn't seem all that enthusiastic. GIVE HIM AN OUT BEFORE THINGS GET WEIRD.

“But don't worry, I have a 24-hour try-it-before-you-buy-it policy too.”

“Nice.” He laughs.

“Because maybe you want friends who can hold their alcohol better than I can? Or better yet, friends who don't get snot all over you? Or most of all, friends who don't hysterically cry about their disastrous marriages?”

He smiles and shakes his head. “You don't have to feel weird about last night. I don't.”

“Even though you had to blow my nose?”

“Even then.”

Interesting.

“What were you going to say earlier when I cut you off?” I ask.

He swallows and turns back to his half-eaten plate of pancakes. “Well, I was just wondering if maybe you'd woken up still upset about our fight? Remember, I told you I'd give you an out. You were drunk.”

“Not that drunk.”

He gives me a teasing smile. “Pretty drunk.”

After that, we go back to eating in content silence. I have to hurry and finish so I can clean up and get ready for yoga. People will be arriving soon, and I still need to change. I could really use a shower, but I'll save that for after since I'm about to get sweaty anyway.

I finish my last bite then push to stand.

Jack catches my hand to stop me. “Meredith?”

His voice is barely louder than a whisper.

I swallow and stare down at my hand tucked in his. I bet he can feel my wild pulse—his thumb is pressed right over my artery. I stay focused there as he continues.

“Do you remember what we talked about last night? How you told me you don’t have anyone to care for you? To put your needs above theirs?”

My throat constricts. I was hoping that part of the conversation was an alcohol-induced delusion. If that was real, did I also tell him I think he’s handsome? Did I spell out the word h-o-t?!

“Um...” I stall, waiting to see if a meteor will strike and save me from having to admit I said something so sad and depressing. The earth keeps spinning, so I have no choice but to mumble, “Uh-huh.” I clear my throat and wear a mask of feigned coolness. “I mean, yes.”

He lets go of my hand and I step back.

His brows are furrowed, his voice steadfast and thoughtful when he says, “I know you haven’t known us long, but if you want, Edith and I could be your people—that is, if you decide not to join the cartel.”

My chest cracks right down the middle.

Emotion squeezes my throat and makes it impossible to speak.

He pushes away from the table and carries our plates to the sink. “Think about it.”

He doesn’t need to angle himself that way to wash a dish. He doesn’t need to keep his attention on the sink. He could have pressed me for an answer, but he didn’t. He’s letting me stand here with tears filling my eyes and overwhelming gratitude bubbling up inside of me, and he’s giving me privacy.

I’m pushing out the back door and stumbling out into the back yard before I can even process that I’m moving.

That...that is so not what I was expecting from him this morning.

A pat on the shoulder and a sad, pitying smile—maybe. A one-way ticket away from this ranch—much more likely. Instead, he just looked me in the eye and told me I’m his brand of crazy, that my flaws and failures don't scare him, that he believes me about why I left my marriage.

I'm nearly back to the shack when I turn on my heel and run right back to the kitchen. He's still there, washing dishes when I whip the door open and lean inside.

"Okay! But I want Alfred too!"

In the days following the wedding, Jack and I solidify what can only be described as a friendship. We smile at each other a lot. We joke and tease and I picture him in his underwear. Friend stuff.

Edith and Jack don't have an official adoption ceremony for me, but I'm theirs all the same. I have a standing invitation for dinner every night. Most of the time Jack grills chicken or steak and I whip up a side dish or two. Edith provides two things: sweet tea and local gossip.

If someone were going to make a movie about my life, this chunk of it would be contained in montage-style scenes backed by an upbeat song from a band with banjos. I'd be laughing and cleaning one second then running in gleeful slow motion through the lawn sprinkler with Alfred the next.

It's great.

Everything is great.

There's just one tiny, microscopic problem: I have developed what I can only describe as the world's biggest crush on Jack.

To anyone watching the montage play out, it's painfully obvious. There are quick cut scenes where I watch him and the second he turns my way, I jerk my gaze in another direction so fast my neck breaks. The montage then gets a quick dose of comedic relief as I visit a chiropractor to fix my new neck problem.

But it doesn't end there. I spend extra time doing my hair and makeup in the mornings, as if he will notice that I look prettier than usual as I empty his trashcans. I make his favorite foods and bring him coffee in the afternoon just to have an excuse to see him. It's pathetic. I'm pathetic. All the viewers shift uncomfortably in their seats.

In the early weeks of working at Blue Stone, I was so consumed with the turmoil surrounding us that my attraction for him wasn't at the forefront of my mind. I was discovering the art of survival and learning how to share the shack with woodland critters. I was basically Harry Potter in a parallel universe where he never gets a Hogwarts letter, instead living in the spidery cupboard under the stairs all the way through his late twenties, cursing the mean Muggles he lives with. Now that things have settled down, however, it feels as if someone has tweaked the connection between us like a TV antennae. All the static and background noise are gone—he's coming in loud and clear. That handsome face of his is showing in full HD glory, and there's no going back now.

I like him. I really like him. However, I'm smart enough to sit on my crush, to push and shove and poke it so that maybe, just maybe it'll go away. Why? Because nothing good will come from wanting my boss, the man currently providing me with a safe haven and who also sort of happens to be my only friend (besides you Alfred! You'll always be my numero uno).

To his credit, he is nothing but respectful and kind. I never get the sense that he's harboring feelings for me like I am for him—and believe me, I look for the signs. There are the obvious things men do when they're interested in a woman: spending time with her, laughing at her jokes—but he has to spend time with me because I'm always around, and he's probably laughing at me rather than with me. Beyond that, there are more subtle ways to tell if a guy is interested, like if he finds excuses to touch you (he doesn't) or if you catch him checking you out (I don't) or if he creates situations to get some alone time with you (I wouldn't know—Edith is always around).

My infatuation is screwing with my head. The fact that all day I actively try to push Jack out of my thoughts means at night, my desire comes back stronger and more demanding than ever. Night after night, my sleeping hours are filled with raunchy sex-filled dreams. I wake up with my hands on different body parts (boob, thigh, stomach, halfway down my Fruit of the Looms), or I wake up sweating and so turned on I have no choice but to finish what my incorrigible subconscious has started.

It's a real problem. Night after night of bad sleep means I have less energy to stand up to my crush on him come morning. I'm jittery and self-conscious and worried my true feelings are becoming too obvious to ignore. All these harbored fantasies have to be manifesting somehow. I bet I'm leaching pheromones like a farm animal in heat.

Without a doubt, Jack knows I have a crush on him. There's no way he doesn't know. I'm just not sure what he's going to do about it.

Jack

Meredith has been here for almost seven weeks now, and I'm officially stuck between a rock and hard place. It's a dingy hellhole I like to call the friend zone. I can't act on the feelings I'm developing for her. She opened up to me about her marriage, I'm newly single, she's only been single for a month and a half, and technically, that's not even true considering she's still legally married. I know she's in a fragile place. She's probably glad to be free of her crazy husband and on her own; the last thing she wants is another guy sniffing around. I need to keep my distance and help her get back on her own two feet, at least that's what I tell myself while I stand under the shower stream and wrap my hand around my dick.

What? I'm trying to be a gentleman, not a saint.

I close my eyes and prop my hand against the wall, remembering how hot Meredith looked the other day while she was bathing Alfred in the back yard. She was wetter than he was, her t-shirt clinging to her curves. It was spring break in South Beach. She kept saying things like, "Okay, big guy, you're gonna get it!" and "Stay still, I'm about to finish! I just need to get your face." It was pornographic, and if any of the ranch hands had seen it, I'd have needed to put them down like a rabid dog.

"Jack!" Her voice sounds from the other side of the bathroom door. "You in there?"

I jerk my eyes open, tilt my head back, and stare up at the ceiling. Wow, is my imagination this good?

"Jack?" Meredith calls again, all sweet and naive. Her voice is honey, and my dick hardens even more.

I grit my teeth. "Yup. What's up?"

"I just realized you don't have any clean towels! I bleached them earlier and forgot to put one in here before your shower."

“Just leave one by the door!” Or better yet, turn around and walk about a thousand yards the other way. I don’t need a towel—I’ll just shake myself dry like Alfred.

“You sure?” she asks. “I can close my eyes. No big deal!”

No big deal? NO BIG DEAL? If she comes into this bathroom to bring me a towel, there’s a 100% chance I will fling open this shower door and drag her in here with me. I’ll haul her up against the tiled wall and cover her body with mine and roll my hips against her ass and give her the employee review I so badly want to.

“I just know I hate getting out of the shower without a towel nearby,” she continues.

Oh good, now I’m thinking about her in the shower with me... suds running down her stomach, slipping down between her legs. I think the majority of the blood in my brain has left, headed south for greener pastures.

“Meredith, just leave the towel outside, okay?”

My voice is gruff and she calls me on it.

“Sheesh okay, sor-ry. I didn’t know I was interrupting some private ‘ranch hand’ time.”

“What? I’m just showering, nothing else.”

“Uh-huh. The lady doth protest too much.”

After she leaves, I’m left there, staring down at my hand, frozen. I can’t finish, not because I’m not horny as hell, but because I feel like a disgusting perv lusting after Meredith like that, not to mention she obviously guessed what I was doing. I cut the water and pad out to get the towel she left on the other side of the bathroom door.

She’s incapable of meeting my eyes when I walk down into the kitchen a few minutes later.

“Feeling better?” she asks with a high-pitched, helpless voice.

“From my shower?” I ask, fooling no one.

She clears her throat a half-dozen times. It’s like she’s got a whole pond’s worth of frogs stuck in there.

I try to catch her eye, but she looks everywhere but me—ceiling, wall, cutting board.

I sigh. “I wasn’t masturbating.”

“I know that,” she answers quickly, pale eyes going wide. “Don’t you think I know that? Ha, obviously.”

“But just to be clear, even if I was, it’s perfectly normal,” I point out, walking over to pluck a slice of the apple she’s chopping. Between you and me, I don’t really want the apple. I want to get a closer look at that pink flush on her cheeks.

“Of course it’s normal,” she says defensively. “Everyone does it.”

“Everyone?” I taunt.

“Jack.”

“What?” I tease. “Now we’re even. We both know what the other is doing when they’re in the shower.”

“I don’t do it in the shower,” she mumbles, almost as if she doesn’t realize she’s saying the words out loud.

“Interesting.”

She catches herself and shakes her head, chopping at double speed now. She’s entered some kind of apple-chopping competition with herself.

“This is inappropriate.”

Chop, chop, chop. She’s about to lose a finger.

“You’re the one who tried to come into the bathroom while I was showering.”

“To give you a towel!”

She’s getting hysterical.

I turn to head up to my office. “Uh-huh.”

A piece of apple hits me smack-dab in the back of the head as I walk away. Alfred snatches it up before I can.

* * *

A week later, Meredith convinces me to watch a chick flick with her. Edith is out with her friends, so it's just Meredith, me, and Alfred. He's up on the couch between us, taking up more space than the both of us combined. Meredith is wearing a tank top and pajama shorts. Her legs are hidden under a blanket, and her attention is focused squarely on the TV.

On her lap is a bowl of popcorn she just made for us. I'm watching her bring each kernel to her lips, and I have a pillow strategically placed on my lap.

Alfred is scowling at me like, Really, dude? Can't the girl just eat her popcorn in peace?

Meredith smiles. "I love this part."

I make a noncommittal sound and it sounds a lot like someone just kneed me in the groin, but she doesn't notice. She holds the bowl of popcorn out for me.

"Want some?"

I hold up my hand. "No thanks."

She sets it down on the table and stands. "I gotta go wash my hands. You want a beer?"

"Yeah, that'd be great." And while you're at it, would you mind grabbing a weapon and putting me out of my misery?

She drops an ice-cold bottle of Blue Moon over my shoulder a few minutes later.

"Here, I put an orange slice in there for you."

My favorite.

She saunters around the couch and scoots Alfred to the floor. "Ah," she sighs, stretching out with a content little smile on her face. "Much better."

Her legs are stretched out toward me now, and her toes hit my thighs.

“Whoops,” she says, scooting them back a little.

I reach out and tug them back where they were. It’s nothing—or it should be. I’m touching her ankle, and yet it’s erotic. The pillow’s fabric is straining.

The movie continues, and I sip my beer, all the while trying to reason with myself about why it’d be a good idea to turn and kiss her. Maybe she wants to move on from her ex? Maybe she’s just as sex-deprived as I am? Maybe you’re an opportunistic asshole. Leave her alone.

Characters I’m not invested in are suddenly ripping their clothes off on screen. They’ve been avoiding each other for the whole movie, building toward this sexy scene. They’re really going at it—stumbling into things, bumping against walls, making picture frames crash to the floor.

“Wouldn’t it be funny if sex was actually like that?” Meredith laughs. “Like if you kept having to run to IKEA to replace all your broken lamps and shattered vases because you were so turned on that you lost all spatial awareness?”

I can’t help but smile. “That’s actually happened to me before.”

“You broke a lamp?”

She makes it sound like it’s completely absurd.

“Didn’t shatter the base, just the bulb.”

“You’re kidding.”

I sip my beer, anxious for the next subject.

“How?” she asks, amazed.

“I needed to use the side table for...well...” I clear my throat, aware that there’s no way of continuing without getting graphic. “Leverage, and I accidentally knocked the lamp to the ground. The light bulb shattered, but you’re right, it wasn’t as dramatic as this.”

“Oh.”

She sounds like she’s in a daze. I stare intently at the TV.

“So you were on top of the girl.”

Her voice sounds shaky.

“Woman,” I correct. “Yes.”

“And just how much...leverage...do you usually need?”

This question, asked with her innocent lilt, is made worse by the fact that the characters on screen are going all out, scene after scene of rhythmic gyrations overlaid with moaning and groaning. Time seems to slow to a crawl.

I push to stand, finish off my beer, and deposit the empty bottle on the coffee table.

I know when I’ve reached my limit, and talking about having sex, while listening to people have sex, while Meredith is just sitting there, perfectly...well, perfect, is...fuck.

“Anyway, I’m going for a run,” I announce, tugging on the sneakers I left by the door.

Then I just turn and walk out.

Running is not something I do. I don’t need to; working around the ranch is enough of a workout on its own. Lately, though, I’ve been running a lot—all the time, in fact. I run after I catch sight of a sliver of Meredith’s stomach when she reaches for a glass on the higher shelf in the cabinets. I run after she makes a joke at dinner and brushes my arm gently. I run after she walks into my office with some afternoon coffee and a freshly baked muffin. She sets it down on my desk and winks then just strolls right back out, hips swaying. I run because it’s the only damn thing I can do that helps me blow off steam without feeling like a predator.

Hell, maybe I should just train for an Ironman triathlon at this point. If Meredith continues living here, I could probably win the damn thing.

When I make it back to the farmhouse thirty minutes later, I’m sweaty and breathing hard, but no less worked up than I was before my run. Shit. My coping mechanisms are starting to lose effectiveness. I'll have to get creative, maybe consider a cold bath or—

My thoughts freeze when I pull open the door and find Meredith in my living room, pacing. I figured she'd have gone to sleep by now. The movie probably ended a few minutes after I left.

She whips her attention to me and wrings out her hands.

"You're still here," I say, deciding that's the safest thing that could possibly come out of my mouth at this moment.

She steps toward me, drops her hands, turns, fidgets with her ponytail, and then turns back to me.

"Okay, I've been thinking..."

Her eyes are wide with worry. Her teeth nibble on her bottom lip. I've never seen her look so nervous, not even back when she used to be scared of Alfred.

"About what?" I ask this while standing very still, hand propped up on the doorframe.

"You find me attractive, right? Like as a woman?"

I blink. Blink, blink, blink.

Is this a trick? A trap?

I'm her employer, her confidant.

"Umm...sure?"

She frowns, and a deep crease settles between her eyebrows.

"Women usually hope for a little more enthusiasm."

"Were you?" The fewer words, the better, I think to myself. I'll use one more. "Hoping?"

"Well yeah, because I find you..."—she waves her hand up and down my body and then clears her throat—"very good-looking."

"Uh-huh."

"And we're both available."

“I’m aware.”

“And I think we should kiss.”

Gulp.

“And break lamps.”

Her euphemism makes me smile, but then reality catches up with me.

“Believe me, I want to break thousands of lamps with you, but you just got out of a bad relationship.”

“Right. So did you.”

“I don’t want to take advantage of you.”

“Noble, but unnecessary.”

“Also, you work for me.”

“True, but irrelevant.”

“It could make our relationship really complicated.”

“Indeed, but it’s worth the risk.”

“And...well...”

I’m at the end of the line. I’ve run right out of excuses. She was supposed to agree with one of those and call this whole conversation off. She was supposed to nod and say, Oh, you know what? I hadn’t thought of that. Well see ya! Then we’d shake hands and she’d get the hell out of my house.

Instead she’s staring up at me with those big, hopeful blue eyes and she might as well be saying, Let’s find the biggest, most breakable lamp in Texas.

“Fuck.” I turn and wrench the front door open and step outside.

Don’t. Do. This.

I have to be better than this. I have to set the boundaries and hold to them. She doesn’t know what she’s asking for—she’s under the influence of heartbreak. I drag my hands down my face and clasp them behind my neck. I count to ten. I do some deep breathing. I try to listen to the angel sitting on my shoulder. He should be there somewhere...ah, there he is, getting strangled by the devil from my other shoulder. Welp, there's my answer, folks. I yank the door back open and slam it closed behind me.

Our eyes lock and the fuse burns away, counting down the last few milliseconds before she and I collide. I have one thought before I reach for her: if there have to be consequences, make them all worth it.

Meredith runs straight for me and I meet her halfway. Her body crashes into mine as I lift her up and wrap her legs around my waist. I turn and haul her against the front door then hoist her a little higher. We're a fucking mess, like sex-crazed teenagers, moving too fast, disjointed and wild. I kiss her cheek and the side of her mouth. She threads her hands through my hair and tugs. My lips finally find hers and I am a dying man who's found his salvation. Her hot mouth, her full lips, her kiss—the second our mouths connect, I know there's no going back now that I have her.

I show her how well we fit. Her breath is my breath. Her taste is my taste. I tilt my head and take the kiss even deeper, skimming my tongue over hers. Our hips roll together. She's so eager and receptive, wrapping her legs tighter so that even if I pulled us off the door, she wouldn't fall.

It's not hard to decide what to do with her when I've done nothing but play out scenarios in my head for a week. I lose track of time as we kiss. Days pass as I learn every inch of her impatient mouth. For so long, I keep her right there, careful not to press my luck. I want to rip her clothes off and fill her up, but my wants don't matter.

She's the first one to initiate more. Her hand skims down my neck and chest. She tugs my shirt up and then her hand is covering my bare abs. My stomach squeezes as she skims lower.

Her hands find my jeans.

She pops the button.

I growl into her mouth.

It's not my proudest moment.

Her pajama shorts ride up and her smooth thighs are completely exposed. Her fingers are still skimming back and forth along my jeans. She's turned on, just as alive with the tension exploding between us as I am.

My hand slips down between us. If she can venture south, so can I.

I skim along her taut stomach, the waistband of her shorts, inside her cotton panties. Then I find wet, hot heat.

Later, when someone asks me about the happiest moment of my life, I will think back to this, right now. I'll lie and say something PG-rated, but I'll know the truth.

I guide my middle finger into her and her legs drop to the ground. I need better access, more access. She doesn't move from that door though. Pinned is the way I like her. Between my body and the door, there's no end in sight. I pump in and out of her and sweep my tongue into her mouth. This is what we've been waiting for, I tell her with my touch. This.

My other hand is lonely, and that tank top she's wearing might as well be paper-thin. I can feel her chest quivering against mine. She's shaking, and it could be from nervousness, but I know better—it's adrenaline.

I can feel that she's not wearing a bra. No. Damn. Bra. Had I known that while we were watching the movie, I would have had her pinned to this door an hour ago. Now, I'm pissed I waited so long. I'm anxious and hungry. I don't bother taking her top off, just yank down the front of it until one of her soft breasts fills my palm. She shivers, like that little touch alone could bring her to an orgasm. I smirk against her mouth, memorizing the wordless cues her body shouts back at me. So you're sensitive there? I skim the pad of my thumb over the tip of her breast and she yanks my hair in response.

My other hand is still working wonders inside her wet panties. Poor Meredith, she really doesn't stand a chance.

My palm covers her breast, and I roll my hand up and down. I get the best reaction from her with a feather-soft touch in the beginning, nothing too aggressive, just subtle teasing and torturing. I know from the way she's grinding her hips against me that I'm hitting the mark.

I break our kiss and tip my head down, replacing my hand with my mouth. My tongue teases her breast. Her head falls back against the door and her eyes flutter close. I do it again then wrap my lips around the flushed tip.

She releases a slow exhalation and I think maybe I should take this to the bedroom, but there are a lot of things in life I should do. I'm happy right where I am, coaxing and licking and seducing until her fingers dig into my shoulders, and she's promising me she's about to lose it.

I keep her right against the door even as I move on from her breast and continue farther south. She moans, annoyed with the loss of friction between her thighs, but then I'm on my knees and her eyes widen with wonder.

"Oh no," she says, in shock.

Oh yes.

From what I know of her husband, he probably never put her needs before his. I bet he never knelt like this and tugged these tiny little shorts to the side and stared up in awe. There's only a thin layer of cotton between me and my end goal.

"Jack," she whispers, unsure.

It feels like we're going fast, but there's no slowing down, no going steady. This moment has been weeks in the making. I've written a thesis in my head about the things I'd like to do to her body.

Our eyes lock and I see every unspoken word there, all the uncertainty and worry. I see that this isn't comfortable for her, to have me looking at her like this, but I won't back off unless she tells me to because I don't see regret in her gaze—I see need, hot and raw.

I brush my thumb up and down the center of her panties and she bucks her hips toward me. I try not to gloat. Still, a smirk forms all the same. I pin her hips against the door with my free hand and try again. This time, there's no reprieve from the gentle strokes, the small circles I draw against the wet cotton. Her breathing quickens.

I could let her come just like that, with my fingers and my breath on her, but I want more. She wants more—deserves more.

I tug her pajama shorts and panties down until they fall to the floor and then lift one of her legs so her foot is propped on my shoulder. I have the perfect angle, right between her spread thighs.

“Oh my god. I don’t think...” She’s rambling, words slipping out between sharp inhales.

She tries to move her leg, to squeeze her thighs together and close herself off. I hold her steady and glance up. Her ponytail’s gone now. Her dark hair frames her face, softening her delicate features even more. She swallows and I drag my hand up her thigh slowly. I’m saying, See how good this feels? See how much better it could feel? I reach the groove of her hip and pause; it’s a question. Our eyes lock again, and I ask for her consent out loud. I need to hear it.

“Do you want me to keep going?”

There are no fancy words or pretty promises.

I could tell her things to ease her mind, things like the truth: I’ve never wanted anyone more than I want her.

But words have been used against her in the past, and maybe for her, talk is cheap. I have no way of knowing what that bastard said to her, what abuses he slung at her in moments like this to make her scared of letting me touch her. Even still, I know enough not to promise her things with words when I can use my body instead. I can prove to her that there are better guys in the world, guys who would sink to their knees and worship at her feet.

“Meredith.”

Her name comes out gritty and hard, pleading.

I know she’s uncomfortable. I know she’s thinking too much about the bare facts of what we’re doing, so I decide to overload her brain, to give her a future to focus on so her past is the last thing on her mind.

I tug on her thigh, and she lets her leg fall open. I keep my gaze locked with hers as my hand covers her wetness. I brush up and down softly. It's a pace intended to torture. She rolls her hips and two of my fingers sink into her.

She closes her eyes for a moment then opens them. One word slips from her mouth, followed by another.

"Yes...please."

It's all the urging I need. I rub soft circles while I kiss up the inside of her thigh. We both know where I'm headed, but she still loses her footing when my mouth finally gets there. The leg she's standing on buckles and I wrap my right hand around her thigh, holding her up. My other hand goes around her waist so I can press her hips against my mouth.

Her breathing grows labored as I bury my head between her thighs. My fingers pump in and out, quickening. She fists the top of my hair and arches her back as I suck and kiss and swirl my tongue in soft circles.

Her inhibitions are lost to the Texas wind.

Her focus is on my mouth and the climax building up inside her.

I drag my tongue up the length of her and our eyes lock.

She's a goner.

Her legs are shaking and she's watching me do this to her, watching me as I spread her thighs even wider and tug her down until my tongue sinks into her. My thumb starts rubbing circles against her wetness, and the combination is too intense for her to run from any longer.

Her eyes pinch closed as her thighs quiver. I can feel the waves of pleasure roll through her, feel her clench, and—fuck—it's the sexiest thing watching her come undone like that, tasting her as she falls apart.

I'm relentless, dragging out every drop of that orgasm I can get. She's still shaking from the aftereffects, so sensitive that each drag of my tongue makes her hips buck. Only when I'm sure she's really finished do I smile and sit back on my knees.

She blink, blink, blinks.

"Where am I? Who am I?"

Her leg drops back to the ground, and she's standing there naked from the bottom down, her tank top askew. I'm still completely clothed, and we realize it at the same time. Her hands shoot up to fix her top and I help her step back into her underwear and shorts. Then I stand and smile.

"Wow." Her eyes are glossy and her cheeks are flushed.

I smile and finger the strap of her tank top, righting it on her shoulder.

"Now what?" she asks, voice shaky.

"Now, I go shower."

I'm still sweaty from my run.

"And me?"

She's so damn cute standing there, unsure of herself. I can't fathom how a woman as beautiful as she is still manages to have a self-conscious bone in her body. Then it hits me: of course she's uncertain and reserved.

It was the stuff he said to me...the things he called me.

I remember what she's lived through, what events led her to my doorstep, literally, and I decide we've done enough for tonight.

"Jack?" she asks, tilting her head to the side, studying me.

"Hm?"

"Are we gonna keep going?"

I smile and shake my head. "Not tonight. Not because I don't want to—I do—I just don't see the point in rushing things."

She furrows her brows. "Are you sure?"

"Positive. You want to watch another movie? I just need to rinse off really quick."

She laughs. “You think I’m capable of hanging out with you right now? I feel like I need to go smoke a cigarette, and I’ve never so much as even tried one.”

I laugh. “Do you want to stay the night?”

“Like in your guest room?”

“I was thinking my bed.”

Her eyes widen like that’s a crazy idea.

“I think I want to be in my own bed tonight.”

I take the hint.

“C’mon, why don’t I walk you home?”

Her smile lights up her whole face. “I think I can manage fifty feet.”

“I insist.”

She accepts my outstretched elbow and I lead the way outside.

“This is weird,” she announces.

“Yeah, kind of.”

She slices her gaze up to me. “Just so we’re on the same page, are we going to wake up tomorrow and pretend like this never happened or are we going to be cool about it and just reference it as the one time you went down on me against the front door?”

“Maybe somewhere in between?”

She laughs and tugs open the door to the shack.

We stand there looking at each other for a few long seconds. There’s not a proper send-off for this. A hug, a kiss, a handshake—they all feel wrong. She takes matters into her own hands, tips up on her toes, and plants a kiss right on my cheek before disappearing inside.

I’m left standing there for a few seconds before I shake my head and turn back for the farmhouse.

I don’t remember the last time I had such a hard time falling asleep. I lie awake in bed with a nervous tension in the pit of my stomach I haven't felt since childhood. It reminds me of how I used to feel on Christmas Eve, jittery and excited, anxious for the next day to come. It keeps me awake half the night. It makes me regret not insisting Meredith sleep here with me. I want to know how she's feeling. I want to know if she's currently packing up everything she owns and hitchhiking out of town. I want to know when exactly I let my guard down enough to fall in love.

Meredith

The morning after the whole JACK IS PULLING DOWN MY PANTIES AND I AM GOING TO HAVE AN HONEST-TO-GOD ORGASM AGAINST THIS DOOR episode, I wake up early and life continues—and you’re not going to believe this—normally. I’m surprised by how easy it is to be in the same room as him. When I walk into the farmhouse to make breakfast, Jack greets me with a warm smile and a tip of his head, and I don’t even think for one second how he was face to face with my vagina just hours ago, not even once. It’s called maturity—you’ll find it defined in big books called dictionaries.

I walk to the pantry to retrieve pancake supplies with a confident, shoulders-back stride, and I blink, blink, blink the sleep out of my eyes. There’s more of it than usual this morning because I only managed about half of one minute of deep sleep last night. The rest of the eight hours was spent vigorously tossing and turning while simultaneously playing out every possible outcome for this morning in excruciating detail.

Fortunately, we seem to be living out outcome #145, in which I am still hopelessly infatuated with him and he is still seemingly into me. It’s the best possible scenario—well, other than outcome #509, in which Andrew gets hits by a bus, Jack is in love with me, oh, and I have a new job with 100% fewer toilets to scrub.

I’m not complaining though. This is amazing. Part of me wasn’t sure how he’d react to my presence in the kitchen this morning. Last night was a lot...like, I orgasmed literally before his very eyes. If that’s not intimacy, I don’t know what is. This morning, he could regret his actions. He could ask me to hand in my resignation, turn in my rubber cleaning gloves, and, in true Texas fashion, “get tuh goin”.

Instead, he leans against my shoulder while I pour pancake batter onto a hot skillet.

“How are you this morning?”

I blush so hot he gets a sunburn.

“Oh, yeah. Shit.” I accidentally over-pour and create one colossal pancake that covers the entire skillet. “Yup. I’m good.”

“I’ll take it—you know I like the big ones,” he says before he catches my eye and winks.

WINKS.

And it’s not one of those lecherous man-in-power winks; it’s a teasing quick one. Men who have callused hands and know how to fix a truck radiator should have to have a special license before going around winking at women.

“What are you two whispering about over there?” Edith demands.

I jump a mile in the air. “Edith! Where’d you come from?!”

She’s sipping coffee at the table. “I’ve been here since you walked in.”

I didn’t even see her—that’s how focused in on Jack I am. I walked right past Edith like she was a marble statue.

I laugh and sweat. “Ha ha ha, of course. You’re just looking so thin from all the yoga. Want a pancake?”

She eyes my skillet over the brim of her reading glasses, lips tugged in a thin, disapproving line. “Not if it’s gonna be like that.”

“I’ll make you a better one.”

She’s skeptical of my weirdness. I need to tone it down, but I’m scared she knows what we did in this house last night. I’m scared Alfred has ratted us out. He probably didn’t even need to. Hell, my butt cheeks probably left sweat marks on the door. I make a mental note to check just as soon as I finish with breakfast.

“Jack, what do you have goin’ on today?” Edith asks as he goes over to fill her coffee. He usually doesn’t wait on her like that, but I think he’s trying to throw her off our scent.

“Working for a good part of it. Might take you and Meredith into town later for dinner if y’all are up for it.”

A DATE!

A DATE WITH HIS GRANDMA! That’s basically skipping straight to meeting the family.

“That’d be fine, but it better not be someplace cheap,” Edith says. “If I’m fixing myself up nice, I want a steak.”

He agrees and turns to me, brow arched. “Meredith, you free?”

I stare into his brown eyes for so long I burn his pancake. Then, I carry it out back and toss it in the trash so it doesn’t stink up the kitchen.

“What’s with you today?” Edith asks when I walk back inside. “Do you have the flu? You look pale and red at the same time.”

I don’t even think that question merits a response, but I give her one anyway. “No, Edith, I don’t have the flu, but I’ll go take my temperature just in case. Yes, Jack, dinner would be fine, provided I don’t have the flu—which I don’t. Now will you two stop distracting me so I can actually make some decent pancakes?”

Jack holds up his hands in deference and says he’ll be out back throwing the ball for Alfred. Really, he’s just trying to get away from Edith. He knows if we’re together in a room with her long enough, she’ll catch on to us. She’s like a wily detective, good cop, bad cop, and grandma all wrapped up in one.

You'd think I wouldn't be one for keeping secrets. Secrets, secrets are no fun unless you tell everyone—yada yada. Whoever came up with that catchy little rhyme clearly never engaged in a sexy secret affair, because guess what? Keeping this secret from Edith is fun as shit, like when I take some coffee up to Jack's office later in the afternoon and just as I turn to leave, he catches hold of my elbow and pulls me down on his lap. The door is open. We could get caught. Edith could swat us in the heads with a rolled-up newspaper.

“How are you feeling about last night?”

“Good,” I reply dreamily.

He's staring at my mouth. “No regrets?”

Now I'm staring at his mouth too. “None.”

He wraps his hand around my neck and a little spark trails down my spine. I shiver and he pulls my face toward his. Then we make out like teenagers. We kiss until I'm fluent in the ways of the French. We kiss until my chest is constricting and my panties are wet, and then he releases me and I half hobble, half skip out of the room. I'm panting like one of those sled dogs that just finished lugging a lazy human across the Iditarod finish line. He tells me he's excited to take me to dinner and I tell him, “I too, am, uh, dinner excited.”

My lips are swollen. Edith asks me about it when I make it back to the living room after a quick 38-minute cool-down on the stairs.

I tell her I got stung by a bee.

“On your lips?” she asks, dubious.

“Yeah, it was weird—flew right in the kitchen window.” My voice wobbles. “Now if you'll excuse me, I've been meaning to read...”—I grab the first book within reach on the shelf beside me—“...this book...”—I look down at the cover—“Advanced Husbandry Techniques.”

She tosses her hands in the air and walks away. “Strange choice for light reading. You do know husbandry doesn't mean what you think it does, right? No book is gonna teach you how to land a decent man.”

Later that evening, I doll myself up and hop into the back seat of Jack's truck. Edith and Jack sit up front, and I'd just like to point out that of the two us, I'm a much easier date than Edith is. She insists she's too hot, and then she's too cold. She snaps at Jack to drive faster then tells him he's taking the bends like a madman.

At the steakhouse, she demands to be seated in a booth and makes Jack and me sit on the same side because she "has baby-birthing hips." Jack reminds her that she gave birth nearly fifty years ago and she stares right at him as she orders the most expensive bottle of wine on the menu in retaliation. I have no choice but to drink some of it too. Smirk.

I don't think Edith picked a booth to intentionally make me sit closer to Jack, but if she did, she's a miracle worker. We're basically squashed together. His denim-clad thigh is pressed against mine. The booth isn't tiny, but then, neither is he. I'm stuck between him and the wall, and I'm not sure which one is more unyielding.

We shift and get settled then he stretches his arm along the back of the booth, behind my shoulders. If we were fourteen and at the movies, I'd consider this, like, fifth base. His hand is near my shoulder, which is riiiiight around the corner from my boob. His finger brushes the strap of my dress innocently. I try to focus on my menu, but my eyes are glazed over with visions of what I would be doing if we were alone right now. I want to climb into his lap and eat him for dinner.

"Jesus, don't they have steakhouses back in California?" Edith asks, grabbing my attention. "You look overwhelmed by the five choices."

I laugh like I'm trying it out for the first time.

Jack saves me. "Want to share something?"

"Yes," I say like that's the best idea I've ever heard.

We put our order in with the waitress who's a friend of Edith's. Edith takes it upon herself to invite her to our yoga session tomorrow, which, after a few weeks of Edith spreading the word, now includes more than 30 people on any given weekend. Last week, we had 48. Pretty soon, I'm going to have to find a stadium to host it.

"Oh, and it's a five-dollar donation," Edith adds quickly.

Up until then, I've never charged anyone for the class. I'd never even considered charging for it.

Our waitress doesn't even bat an eyelash at the cost. When she walks away, I lean forward.

"Since when am I charging people?"

Edith sips her wine casually. "Since now. You're a good teacher and five bucks is nothing. I spend that much on a damn cup of coffee down at Starbusk."

"You mean Starbucks," I correct.

"S what I said, Starbusk."

Jack is watching us with an amused smile.

"What do you think?" I ask.

"I think if people are willing to pay for your time, then clearly your time has value."

I sit up straighter. Yes, right. My time is valuable.

"Okay, Edith, I'll have you ask for the donations tomorrow and we'll see how people respond. If everyone runs back to their trucks and peels out, I'll just go back to doing it for free."

Once that's settled, I turn to the basket of warm rolls in the center of the table. I'm slathering whipped butter onto every crusty bit I can find when I hear my name from a few yards away.

I jerk my gaze up and see Tucker making his way toward us. I haven't seen him since the wedding, but we've talked. He called the farmhouse the day after to see if I was doing okay since he wasn't able to take me home. Jack was out working, so I happened to answer the phone first.

I smile. "Hi Tucker, good to see you."

Edith barely greets him. I realize now that she never really wanted us together. She was using him as a pawn.

Jack scoots a tiny bit closer to me. At this rate, my face will end up squashed between the wall and his bicep. My lips will pucker out like a fish.

“How are you guys?” Tucker asks, looking at no one but me.

“We’re fine. Jack is treating us to a dinner date,” Edith answers.

She enunciates the final word extra hard.

Tucker notices Jack’s arm around my shoulder and frowns. “Meredith, I tried calling you the other day, but you know how fickle that Blue Stone phone can be.”

I glance at Jack, and he doesn’t even bother feigning remorse. In fact, his face is a mask of indifference. It’s like he doesn’t even know Tucker is standing there. I want to poke him in the ribs and tell him to play nice.

“Oh, um, yeah.” I glance back up at Tucker. “Sorry about that. What’d you need to tell me?”

He glances away from the table. “Well, we should probably talk about it in private. It’s about your divorce.”

He says the word divorce like it’s nasty and pus-filled.

I frown. “What about it?”

He rocks back on his heels, understanding that anything he needs to say, he’ll have to say in front of Edith and Jack. “I was just going to offer you my legal advice pro bono, if you need it.”

“Not necessary,” Jack cuts in. “We’ve already got it covered.”

“Oh, I didn’t realize.” His gaze cuts to me. “Well, regardless, if you need any help, Meredith, you know where to find me.”

When he walks away, the three of us sit in awkward silence. My roll is still buttered and untouched. It feels weird to stuff my face at a moment like this, though just to be clear, I could still easily put away four to five buttered rolls at this very second.

“Since when do I have my divorce covered?” I ask my roll.

Jack sighs and moves his arm from around my shoulders. “I called my lawyer the other day and asked him about our options.”

“‘Our’ options?”

He clears his throat. “Your options.”

Edith excuses herself to use the bathroom then I look up and see her take a seat at the bar. Let it be known, I’ve never met a person smarter than Edith.

“It’s not that I’m not grateful, I am, I just...” I sigh and drop the roll. No one is sadder about that than me. “It feels wrong to have you help me with this, like I’m just running from one guy to another, looking to you to solve my problems.”

His dark brows crease. “Do you really think that or do you feel like you should think that?”

Oh.

Well...good question.

“I don’t know.”

A not insignificant part of me is worried what other people will think.

“We aren’t talking about a rebound here,” Jack continues. “I’m talking about your future, about you rebuilding your life and accepting help freely given.”

The edge of my mouth curls up. “Is it freely given though?”

He rears back, almost offended by the question. Still, it bears asking. “Of course it’s freely given. When I asked you the other night if you wanted me and Edith to be your people, this was part of the deal. You can walk out of my life tomorrow. Quit working for me. Date Tucker. Go back to your husband, and I’ll still be your person if you need me. That’s how it works.”

Well damn.

I’m tearing up inside a steakhouse while an overwrought country song plays overhead. How cliché.

“I appreciate what you’re saying, I really do, but think about it from my perspective. You’re holding all the cards. You’ve given me a place to live and a place to work”—I drop my voice in case the people in the booth behind us are listening —“not to mention what happened last night. That introduces a whole other slew of complications.”

“So let’s uncomplicate it.”

Oh shit.

“Do you not want to repeat what we did last night?” I ask quietly.

If so, what was all that making out we did this afternoon for?

“I do.”

“Are you firing me?”

“No.”

“Are you kicking me out of the shack? Because now that it’s adorable and trendy, I really like living in it.”

He finds that amusing. “No, you can live in the chic shack as long as you want.”

“Well then how are we uncomplicating things?”

“I think I’m going to hire another housekeeper, maybe one with housekeeping experience.”

“Don’t you like the way I fold your underwear?”

He cracks up at that.

“I’m doing it because it’s a lot of work, and I think if you had some help, you’d have more time to focus on what your next step should be.”

“Next step.”

“Yes, like what Edith was saying about charging people for the yoga class. That’s a good idea.”

Interesting...

“Well if you’re going to phase me out, I’ll need severance, and if we’re going to keep doing that other thing, I’ll need hazard pay.”

He moves his arm back around my shoulder. “I’ll consider it.”

“Also, the new housekeeper can give Alfred his baths. I’m never doing that again.”

He’s wearing a panty-dropping smile as he says, “He likes you.”

“He likes everyone.”

“Tell that to the door-to-door salesman he chased down the road the other day.”

We are flirting. We are openly flirting, and I need to focus.

I straighten up and return my attention to the table. “Right, but what about what you just told Tucker? About having my divorce under control?”

“We can call my guy in the morning. He’ll explain it better than I can, but basically a lot depends on whether or not you come to an uncontested agreement on the terms of the divorce.”

I nod. “I’ve already decided that’s what I want.”

“What about alimony? My lawyer says you could easily get two or three years of spousal support.”

My stomach twists into a knot. “No. I don’t want anything from him.”

“Don’t throw it away just to spite him.”

I turn and look him square in the eye. “Think about what I’ve done for the last eight weeks. Do you think I would have willingly scrubbed toilets if it wasn’t absolutely necessary? Do you think I would have survived in that dingy shack with no A/C if there was any other way forward? I would gladly give up all the money in the world in exchange for not having to deal with him any longer.”

He nods. “Good. That means the divorce will probably be done as soon as possible.”

I glance down at his lips, suddenly overwhelmed by the urge to lay one on him.

“This is the sexiest family law conversation I’ve ever had on a date.”

He smiles. “Want to change the subject?”

“Will you do that thing with your finger again? Where you play with my dress strap?”

“Oh, I didn’t realize I was doing that.”

Our gazes lock, and I think if Edith weren’t making her way back over to us, he’d lean down and kiss me. Maybe it’s better that she is here; this way we have to eat our steaks instead of each other.

“Oh, don’t mind me,” Edith says when she sits down. “I’m just an old lady who can’t hear a damn thing in this loud-ass restaurant.”

Meredith

We make it home late after dinner and Edith announces very loudly to anyone within earshot that she's going to bed.

"And you two better go on too. That's my secret to good health, you know—eight hours every night!"

Jack walks me back to my shack, which is odd considering his bedroom is in the exact opposite direction.

I'm thinking of ways to draw him into the shack for a little nightcap (Ooh, I called my sex lawyer and he's about to serve you with a big subpoena), when he tells me he has to head over to San Antonio for a day trip early in the morning.

He might as well have just told me he's going off to war with the way my body reacts to the information.

"Why?"

What I really want to ask is, Do you have to?

"I have meetings with a grocery distributor there. We've been working on getting Blue Stone wine into their stores. There are a lot of details to hammer out and I need to be there to help my project manager."

"When will you get back?"

"Sometime after dinner."

I should not be depressed by this, but I am.

"Are you going to start Christine-ing me?"

"Never," he says, squeezing my hand. "I'll bring you back a souvenir."

Now we're talking. I perk up immediately.

Then, he throws a cherry on top. "And maybe the day after, you and I can go out on a real date, just the two of us."

“Really? I don’t know...Edith makes a great third wheel, like when she talked about her bunions on the way home? I would have never brought that up on a first date, but I liked the sincerity.”

He laughs at my stupid joke, which means he’s definitely into me.

When we reach the shack, he turns me to face him and hooks his hands around my waist. His fingers barely dip past the hem of my jeans as he squeezes and tugs me toward him.

“So this is good night?”

I tilt my head back to look up at him. His head is framed by stars. Out here, you can see millions of them.

“Or?” I ask, like a shameless flirt.

“Or I could kiss you?”

He’s bending down before he’s even finished the question and the last word is whispered against my lips right before his mouth presses to mine. My insides liquefy. My arms link around his neck, partly because I want to keep him right where he is, and partly because he’s so tall, I sort of have to hoist myself up to reach his lips without straining my neck.

Just like against the front door and in his office, our kisses go straight from zero to sixty. If a scientist stuck an old-fashioned thermometer between us, the mercury would blast straight out of the top.

His hand skims along the side of my breast and my brain says, Yes! Let’s do this, big boy! but he pulls back and presses his forehead to mine.

“It’s just that my meeting is really, really early tomorrow morning, and I have to be on point.”

“That’s okay, we can have sex really quickly.”

He laughs. “I want us to go slow. After everything you’ve been through, I want to be careful.”

“I’m not fragile.” I pinch my forearm to prove my point. “Look, see? That didn’t even hurt.”

He soothes the patch of slightly red skin with his hand. I swoon.

“You could come with me tomorrow?” he continues, obviously noticing how sad I am that he’s leaving.

I smile. “You go. Make all the deals, shake a bunch of hands, sign contracts, kiss babies. I’ll be here, holding down the fort with Edith.”

He closes his eyes, takes a deep breath (like he’s gathering every ounce of resolve inside of him), and then he steps back and releases me.

“So then I’ll see you when I get back?” he asks. “It could be pretty late.”

“I’ll stay up.”

He seems happy about that, stealing one last kiss before he turns back for the farmhouse.

I watch him walk away and a very clear thought flashes in my head like a neon sign. I try to ignore it and it starts glowing even brighter, as if someone flipped a switch to max brightness. I bat the thought away and my brain says, Nice try, then adds exclamation marks. In the end, I have no choice but to acknowledge the intensely blazing thought:

I AM FALLING IN LOVE WITH JACK MCNIGHT!!!!!!!!!!

If you’re curious, one day is made up of 24 hours, which is 1,440 minutes, or 84,000 seconds. 86,000 seconds feels like too long to go without Jack. Sure, technically, I went twenty-eight years without him, but now I’m counting seconds. So far, he’s only been gone for 10,800 of them; I have a lot more seconds to live through before he walks through that front door again. Fortunately, life sees fit to make those seconds as interesting as possible.

While I'm scrubbing the upstairs bathroom, an unfamiliar black SUV pulls up on the gravel drive. It catches my attention for two reasons: it's fancier than any car I've seen at Blue Stone Ranch, and it doesn't park over near the farm trucks. It pulls up right in front of the house. I push to stand and peer out of the bathroom window just in time to see the driver's side door open and a tall, well-dressed man step out.

My husband, Andrew, has finally decided to come to Texas.

I had a feeling this day would come. I knew he would eventually track me down and show his face. Andrew has built up a large ego in recent years, and I imagine me leaving in the middle of the night was quite a blow to it. He's either here to demand I come home or to seek some kind of retribution. Either way, he'll want some kind of apology from me. He loved nothing more than when I groveled at his feet, begging for his forgiveness and love.

I hate the woman he turned me into, and I refuse to revert back to that outdated facsimile of myself—the subordinate housewife, the woman who took his verbal abuse for years without saying a word. I've changed.

He's staring up at the farmhouse with his hands on his hips, a look of disgust contorting his classically handsome face. He spits in the dirt. I move away from the window and whip my rubber gloves off.

I'm surprised; I thought I'd be more nervous than I am. I feel the exact opposite: calm and resolute. I walk out of that bathroom and down the stairs without a moment's hesitation. I feel like if I unbuttoned my shirt, I'd find a spandex superhero uniform.

I might not have invited him to come, but I'm glad he's here. I'm glad, because it dawns on me that he probably still thinks I'm the same old Meredith, ready to tremble at the mere sight of him. For the first time in our marriage, he doesn't know who he's messing with.

When I make it downstairs, I call out for Edith, but I don't get a reply. I guess she must have gone into town. Good. I head for the front door. Andrew's still standing on the gravel drive, apparently waiting for me to make an appearance.

I wonder how different this meeting would be if Jack was here. I doubt he'd let me face Andrew on my own, but that's exactly what I'm doing. I'm facing my demon all by myself.

It feels better than I imagined it would, similar to how it felt to leave him that night.

The screen door slams behind me as I step outside.

"Morning, Andrew," I say with an insincere smile.

His piercing gaze snaps to me and I see rage there like I've never seen before. I bet he's pissed he had to come all the way out here to talk to me. He hates wasting time; busy, important men like him never have enough of it.

"Nice of you to make the trip. For a while, I didn't think you'd bother. How was your flight?" I asked.

My voice is a sugar-dipped cone with whipped cream and a cherry on top.

"Cut the shit, Meredith."

My smile holds steady. "Manners, Andrew. Remember, you're in the south now. But, if you'd like to cut to the chase, I have some bad news: I'm not going back to California with you."

He sneers at the suggestion. "You honestly think I still want you? Look at yourself. Jesus."

He's talking about my work clothes, my t-shirt and jean shorts. My hair, which he only ever saw styled and perfect, is in a high ponytail with an abundance of flyaways. I don't think he's seen my face without a pound of makeup in a few years.

"Well, you traveled an awful long way just to tell me I look like shit, though I do recall you always had a flair for the dramatic. What is it that you came to hear? That you ruined my life?"

He laughs acerbically. “Ruined your life?! Ruin—” He shakes his head and pivots on his foot, turning away and wiping his mouth before he jerks back around and points a finger straight at me. “I gave you more than you fucking deserved. You think you’re the only pretty thing worth something? You’re a dime a fucking dozen.”

His words roll off me like I’m wearing insult-repellant gear. “I’ve heard this all before, Andrew. Nothing left in your little bag of tricks?”

Something in him snaps at that. “What did you just say to me?”

My voice is louder when I continue, “You’ve said that same exact thing a million times.” I wave my hand in continuous circles. “I’m ‘a dime a dozen’. Well gather up your dimes, sweetie, and go collect your dozens, because I’m done giving a shit about what you think of me.”

I think he’s going to lose his mind. I’ve never talked to him like this, but he’s more cunning than that. He collects himself so quickly that for the first time all day, a shiver of fear runs down my spine.

“That’s good.” He smirks. “You’ve got a little backbone now, huh? You think you can leave me and make a new life for yourself? Your sister tells me you’re the housekeeper for the guy who lives here. You like cleaning toilets? Mopping floors? If I’d known you liked to be on your knees that much, I wouldn’t have paid all that money to have a maid.”

It’s strange to me that I ever found him attractive. Looking at him now, his sharp bone structure seems too severe—cruel, even.

“Are you whoring yourself out to him too?”

His words hit too close for comfort, but I force a bored expression.

“You almost sound jealous.”

He snorts and angles his head back to the black SUV. I didn’t see her before, but there’s a pretty blonde perched on the front seat watching our exchange. I wonder if she’s one of the girls he slept with during our marriage or if she's new. Either way, I feel bad for her. Piece of advice for ya: get out while you still can.

Whatever motive inclined him to send those flowers and apologetic note is dead and buried. Her presence is confirmation that Andrew isn't here to drag me back home with him—that, and the manila envelope clutched in his right hand.

“What's in the envelope? More love letters?”

“Divorce papers.” He says it like it's supposed to wound me, so I'm careful not to appear too gleeful. I don't want him knowing how badly I want out of this marriage. “I figured you'd stay here for a few weeks and then come crawling home, but these weeks without you have been nice. I realized how glad I was to be rid of you. You really were a boring fuck there at the end. I'd like to try my hand with someone who's a little more appreciative of the life I give them.”

I assume he means the mail-order blonde in the SUV.

“Did you come all the way here so you could tell me you're glad to be done with me? You could have just mailed the papers.”

“I was curious to see your new life.” He nods toward the farmhouse. “You think this new guy will want you after he finds out what an ungrateful cunt you are?” He must see me wince because he laughs. “Don't tell me you have feelings for him?”

His laughter takes a turn for the sinister, and I want to say something, want to tell him to go to hell, but my words die on my lips.

“Jesus Christ, Meredith. You're pathetic.”

I reach my hand out and speak, but my voice is barely above a whisper. “Give me the papers and leave.”

He holds them against his chest, taunting me. “You should be on your knees thanking me. Do you even realize what I did? I couldn't wait to be rid of you, so I called in a few favors. If you sign these and get them to my lawyer by Monday, he'll be able to expedite the process."

"How long?"

"Four weeks."

In California, it's supposed to take six months.

I wonder what kind of strings he had to pull to get rid of me that quickly, but honestly, I don't care. I'm so excited I want to rip the envelope out of his hands. I won't though. I don't want to get that close to him.

"I need to have a lawyer look over everything."

He smirks. "If you think you'll be able to squeeze another cent out of me, you're wrong. We were only married for five years. My lawyer confirmed that you have no leg to stand on. You left me. It looks bad, don't you think? I'm the dotting husband who's been reaching out to your sister and sending you flowers while you can't even bother to call me back. In fact, everyone we know has been lovingly referring to you as the gold-digging disappearing act. It has a nice ring to it."

Just then, his attention cuts behind me as the screen door slams open. I glance back to see Edith step out onto the front porch with a shotgun resting by her side.

"There a problem out here?"

"Who the fuck are you?" Andrew snaps. "I'm having a conversation with my wife."

Edith narrows her eyes and glances thoughtfully into the distance. "Now, see, that's not how we greet people here in Cedar Creek. Would you like to try that again?"

The door to the SUV opens and the blonde steps out. "Andrew! C'mon, this is stupid. Let's go."

"Get back in the car!" he snaps.

I glance to Edith and shake my head. She doesn't drop the shotgun, though I don't think she plans on using it. With Edith, though, you never really know.

“I’ll have my lawyer look at the papers and then I’ll sign,” I tell Andrew. “After that, you leave me the hell alone.”

He tosses the envelope in the gravel at his feet and dust puffs up around it.

Even in the end, he couldn’t act like a decent human being. It’s a shame. If he’d just walked over and handed the envelope to me nicely, maybe Edith wouldn’t have cocked the shotgun and fired.

A few pellets ping off a trashcan in the distance and Andrew cowers, hands covering his head.

“Are you fucking insane?!”

Edith reloads the shotgun. “Senility is exceedingly common at my age.”

His girlfriend slams the car door and cowers behind the dash.

Andrew jerks up, eyes blazing. “I’m calling the cops!”

Edith pumps the shotgun. “Good. I’ve got the number for the station if you need it. Petey’ll probably answer. You let him know Edith McKnight’s the one ’bout to fill your sorry ass full of birdshot.”

He curses under his breath and runs for the SUV like he’s concerned she’s going to open fire again. I’m not 100% sure she won’t.

He puts the SUV in reverse and hightails it down the gravel drive. I have no doubt he was serious about calling the cops.

“Think you’ll get in trouble?” I ask, slightly worried.

Edith levels me with a bored stare. “Welcome to Texas, darlin’.”

Jack

I'm having lunch in San Antonio with the heads of the grocery chain on Monday afternoon when I get a call from Cedar Creek's sheriff. I excuse myself and walk outside before answering.

"Pete, what's going on?"

"Jack, hey. I don't want to worry you, but I have an Andrew Wilchester down here at the police station wanting to press charges against Edith, spoutin' off about attempted murder."

It takes a second for the name to click, but when it does, I see red.

"Wait, wait—say that again. Andrew Wilchester is there now? In Cedar Creek?"

"Got him right outside in the waiting room. Won't leave until I issue a warrant for Edith's arrest. From the looks of it, he's chewing out one of my deputies at this very moment. Better him than me."

"What's Edith got to do with anything? Did something happen at the farmhouse?"

"Sounds like it, though I haven't been able to get the full story from him. He's real worked up, rambling on and on about how his lawyers are going to take Blue Stone for all it's worth after locking Edith away. I think he really expects me to march down there and put your grandma in handcuffs. Can you imagine? I think she'd have me cuffed before I got within ten feet of her."

He's not making any sense. Why would Edith need handcuffs?

"Pete, start from the beginning. What happened?"

"Andrew showed up wanting to talk to one of your employees—Meredith? Claimed he had some business with her."

Apparently Edith didn't like the look of him, because she may have, well, fired at him with a shotgun."

Of course she did.

"Did anyone get hurt? How's Meredith? And Edith?"

"Everyone's fine, which is why I'm not too worried about this guy causing trouble. I do have an obligation to investigate, so I had Martinez go down to the ranch to take statements. The way this Wilchester guy kept going on, I half figured Edith would blast on him too, but there she was rockin' on the porch, inviting him inside for some sweet tea and homemade cookies. He's still over there, gettin' fat."

"Good. Keep him there, please, until I get back into town."

"Should I be worried about this guy?"

"I don't know, but if Andrew's that worked up, I don't want him going back by the house. I'd rather have you keep an eye on him until he settles down."

"I can't hold him here, but I can stall him."

"I can probably make it to the station in an hour at the most."

"You don't think it's a better idea for you to head back to Blue Stone?"

"I just need five minutes with him."

He lowers his voice. "Now listen, I don't consider Edith to be a threat to public safety, and besides, she was defending her own property, but if you hit him inside the station, we'll have to book you."

"Then tell him to wait outside the station."

"Jack," he warns, but I'm already heading back inside to excuse myself from the rest of lunch.

That drive back to Cedar Creek is a blessing and a curse—a blessing because it gives me time to cool down from my initial rage that Andrew had the audacity to show up on my property unannounced, a curse because that calmness doesn't last long. I have time to rebuild my anger a dozen times over, right up until I whip my truck into a parking spot at the police station beside a fancy black SUV.

When I walk inside, Andrew's still there, pacing in the waiting room like a caged animal. He's shouting about the "damn hillbilly police force wasting his time" and I don't hesitate. I don't think of the consequences. I think of the night Meredith drunkenly opened up to me about the abuse she sustained over the years, the twisted manipulated hold this sick fuck had over her, and I march right up to him and sock him square in the face.

My punch is solid. I wouldn't be surprised if I broke bone.

I'm in a daze as he hits the ground, knocked out cold.

Police officers rush over and put me in handcuffs.

* * *

Pete finds me in the holding cell, my hands between my knees, my gaze on the floor.

"Goddammit, I told you not to touch him," he admonishes with an annoyed tone.

I peer up as he pulls a keychain from his belt buckle and unlocks the door.

"Coulda killed him, you idiot. Then you'd really be up shit creek."

"Is he pressing charges?"

"Obviously—you heard what kinda guy he is. Luckily, most of the witnesses saw it as a little slap. Misdemeanor assault, $500 fine most likely.”

I nod. “I doubt that blonde with him will corroborate that version of the story. She saw what happened.”

“Oh, she left about an hour ago, sick of this guy’s bullshit, most likely. Officers overhead her shouting that she was going back to California without him. As far as I can tell, it’s your word against his.”

He slides the cell door open and I push to stand.

“Best $500 I ever spent.”

“Yeah, well, it’ll also go on your record, so don’t make this vigilante thing a habit.”

“I didn’t plan on hitting him. I just wanted to talk.”

He chuckles under his breath and pats my shoulder. “That punch sure looked like it was worth a thousand words.”

I don’t see Andrew again as I leave the station, and that’s a good thing. That one punch felt pretty good; a second one would probably feel even better.

I had time to cool off in that holding cell, but now I’m more anxious than ever to see Meredith. I want to know why Andrew came to town and what he said to her. I want to know if he threatened her in any way. I won’t allow it. I’ll get a restraining order, a fence, a fucking private army stationed at the front of Blue Stone if that’s what it’ll take for her to never have to see him again.

I’m relieved when I pull up at home and see a black-and-white parked out front. Officer Martinez is inside playing a game of Scrabble with Meredith and Edith. True to Pete’s word, there’s sweet tea and a plate of cookies spread out on the table. Martinez looks damn comfortable sitting there, but as soon as he sees me step inside, he shoots to his feet.

I tip my head in thanks. “Good to see you, Connor.”

“Things, uh, settle down at the station?”

His gaze shifts to my bloody knuckles and I wonder if he got word about the incident.

“Everything’s fine.”

I glance to where Meredith is sitting, eyes wide with worry. Without a word, she stands and rounds the table, walking toward me in a daze. There’s an emotion in her eyes I’ve never seen as she steps right up to me and wraps her arms around my waist. I’m still standing frozen as her forehead hits my chest and she squeezes me tight. A chain reaction happens so suddenly, emotions firing off one after another: anger replaced by relief, worry replaced by love. I bend down and press a kiss to the top of her head as her shoulders shake. I wonder what kind of day she’s had, if she was scared when Andrew showed up like that. I wish I’d been here with her and feel guilty that I wasn’t. I whisper that against her ear and she shakes her head, but there are no words.

Edith and Martinez excuse themselves and I wrap my hand around her neck so I can tilt her head back and look at her face.

“What’s wrong?” I ask, gaze flitting back and forth between her eyes.

I finally realize she’s not crying...she’s laughing.

“You should have seen Edith with the shotgun.”

“Tell me what happened with Andrew. Why was he here?”

She huffs out a little exhale and smiles—smiles!

“He actually came to hand-deliver divorce papers.”

Hope explodes into my chest. “You’re kidding.”

She steps back to retrieve a stack of papers from the coffee table so she can hand them off to me.

“Nope. Apparently, he’s as eager to get rid of me as I am to get rid of him. He said he has a way to expedite the process once I get them signed.”

I start riffling through the papers quickly. I’ll need a little while to read them, and of course I’ll pass them along to my lawyer, but they’re real, honest-to-goodness divorce papers. She’s not kidding.

“Why’d Edith fire the shotgun then?”

A little chuckle escapes as she shakes her head at the memory.

“Oh, he was being an asshole. Edith had had enough and wanted to scare him a little.”

“By trying to kill him?”

She rolls her eyes. “Is that what he said happened? The shot wasn’t even close. She was aiming a couple yards off.”

I smile at Edith’s gumption. “Andrew was trying to get attempted murder charges drawn up. She could have spent the rest of her life in some dingy jail cell all because she couldn’t help herself.”

“Ain’t a jury in the land that would convict me!” Edith shouts from the kitchen. Apparently, she didn’t go too far when she left us alone. “That pansy boy hit the deck like he was in the middle of a war zone. Total wimp if you ask me—that’s why he had to pick on Meredith, made him feel better about himself!”

Meredith and I exchange a smile and then her expression turns thoughtful.

“Wait...” Meredith says, frowning. “How’d you find out about all this? Aren’t you supposed to be in San Antonio?”

“Sheriff called me, let me know what had happened. I rushed here as soon as I heard about it.”

Her eyes narrow on my rumpled clothes then her gaze falls to my bloody knuckles.

“You rushed straight here?” she asks, picking up my hand to inspect it.

Her bottom lip juts out as she examines the damage. It’s nothing.

“I might have made a quick stop at the police station first, but I did bring you the souvenir I promised.”

It’s one of those plastic police badges they pass out to kids on school field trips. It proclaims the wearer to be a Junior Deputy Sheriff. I’m pretty sure it’s legit.

“Welcome to the force.”

Her blue eyes whip up to me. She isn't impressed. “Jack!” she admonishes. “Please tell me you didn't do anything to Andrew.”

“All right,” I say, leaning down and kissing her cheek. “I didn't do anything.”

“Jack!” She groans as I head toward the kitchen. I need to clean my knuckles off.

Edith is in there, sitting at the table, sipping her tea.

Meredith tries to recruit her onto her team. “Your grandson bloodied his knuckles in a fight with Andrew!”

Edith seems barely interested.

“Technically, it wasn't a fight,” I say as I run my hand under cold water. “I punched him once and knocked him out.”

Now that elicits a smile from Edith.

Meredith points her finger at the two of us. “You two! I swear! Violence is not the answer—you can't just go around blasting shotguns and knocking people out.” She's pacing now, getting herself real worked up. “What if he presses charges? What if he gets the cops involved?!”

I remind her that the cops are already involved.

“What if you go to jail?!” Her eyes go extra wide then and her hand shoots to her mouth.

There's no talking her down. I tell her everything will work out the way it's supposed to, but she doesn't believe me until we get a call from the sheriff a few hours later informing us that Andrew is dropping all charges.

I put him on speaker and we all listen. Apparently, my lawyer came up with half a dozen charges to counter with, things like trespassing and disorderly conduct. He even went so far as to accuse Andrew of stalking and informed him that Meredith would be filing for a restraining order. Whether or not these charges would stick in a court doesn't matter. Whatever Andrew expected to find in Texas, I'm sure it didn't include

Edith and me. My suspicions are proved right when he leaves a heated voicemail for Meredith that night, informing her that he thinks they should behave like adults from this point forward.

“Sign the damn papers and let’s get this over with,” he implored, right before the voicemail cut off.

She drops the signed paperwork in the mail first thing Monday morning.

Meredith

In the end, I have to take money from Andrew. When they drew up the divorce papers, he and his lawyer worked out a figure that was deemed more than adequate compensation for our five-year marriage. If you're wondering, it was $500,000. To Andrew, that's pennies. To me, that's half a million dollars. Half a million shirts I don't have to fold. Half a million plates I don't have to wash. Still, I would have turned the money down altogether, but my lawyer made it clear that the quickest way forward would be to agree to their terms and move on. If I wanted to decline the money, I'd have to draft a new set of documents and pay the requisite legal fees. I don't exactly have money to burn at the moment, so...fine, whatever. I'll take it.

I've thought a lot about what I'll do with the money, but it's obvious, really. The second it's deposited in my account, I'll be donating to three different women's shelters around Central Texas, the region I'm happy to call my new home. I know I could use the money to pad my savings account or buy a house or start a business, but it doesn't feel right—not only because I don't want Andrew's dirty money anywhere near me, but also because I don't need that money. Most women in these shelters have no one by their side. I know how that feels. I was there once not long ago, and if my money can help lighten their load even a little, I'm more than happy to send it their way. Also, in case you think I'm doing it for completely selfless reasons, I also get a kick out of the fact that Andrew's money is going to help these women. He'd hate it. He doesn't have a philanthropic bone in this body.

Anyway, the fact that I'm giving his money to those women makes me smile at least twice a day. If I didn't want to leave well enough alone, I'd ask the organizations to each build a new wing: The Andrew Wilchester Shelter for Women Escaping From Andrew Wilchester. Who knows, I still might.

It's not like his rage can hurt me anymore because—cue confetti drop—our divorce was finalized today.

I got a call from my lawyer at 1:35 PM and I sank down to the floor then wept like a little baby. It was totally unexpected. If someone had asked how I would react when I got that call, I would have assumed I'd pop some champagne, blast Beyoncé's "Single Ladies", and dance until I got a cramp in my side. Instead, I crumbled into a heap of tears and snot. It was like when Frodo finally dropped that damn ring into the fire after three long-ass books full of trouble for himself: It's over. It's done.

There was no way to pinpoint the exact source of my tears. It was relief, of course, but there were also conflicting, strange emotions like fear and anger and pity. I cried for the younger version of myself, the naive girl who fell in love with a monster. I cried for the fact that I'd wasted five good years in a manipulative marriage before I finally had the courage to leave. I cried because even though I want to be independent and in control of my future, a part of me is still scared I won't be able to do it. I also cried because I'm scared of the scars. I don't want this to harden my heart. I want to learn from my mistakes without swearing off love altogether. I want to make my own money and pave my own path without assuming that leaning on a partner makes me weak, stupid, or crippled.

Even after my ordeal, I still believe in the power of love, and maybe I owe that to Jack. I wonder if I'd still be so reluctant to shun love if I wasn't currently in love.

An objective observer would say it's too soon. They would purse lips and cross arms, admonishing me for even considering love at a time like this. They would declare that I should be single for exactly one year and one day and not a moment sooner, that I must take time for self-discovery (Have you read Eat, Pray, Love?!) before I even consider opening my heart to another man. If this were the 1850s, they would demand I wear mourning black out in public and shun all social engagements.

I get it. I really do. It would be great if life worked like that. How convenient would it be to meet someone special at the exact right time it was deemed socially acceptable?

The truth is, life introduced me to Jack less than 24 hours after I left Andrew. Insane, I know, and sure, at the time, I didn't see him as a potential love interest. In fact, given the choice between lover and potential murderer, I would have put money on the latter.

But the great thing about my life is that it's my life, not their life. If they think I should let my heart turn to stone, that's okay. They can think that, but I'll be over here, accepting love at face value. It's simple if you don't think too hard. I want to love Jack, fiercely, naively, and just as strongly as if love had never burned me in the past, because the alternative? Turning into a miserable shrew? Yeah, hard pass on that.

Today is a big day, not just because my divorce is finalized, but because I'm going to see Helen. She and Brent returned from Europe earlier in the week and they're hosting a small dinner party to show off the renovations on their house. I've been nervous about it since she first invited me, planning and re-planning my outfit five different times. She and I have talked a bit over the last few weeks, but it's been surface-level bullshit, the stuff I hate. Tonight will be different. I wrote her a long letter, and I mean long. It's 10 pages, front and back. In it, I apologized for my mistakes and outlined exactly what I want for our future. I could vomit just thinking about it. It might seem strange. She's my sister, but we've never really been sisters. I want to give it a try. I'm basically handing her my heart and openly declaring that even though we each have plenty of reasons to be bitter, we deserve more than that. I want us to be close and confide in one another. I want her in my life from here on out.

I told Jack about the letter the other day.

“Are you going to bind it in paperback or hardback?”

I shoved him. “It’s long because I had a lot to say!”

He laughed. Hopefully Helen doesn’t laugh.

I have my work cut out for me. Our relationship is damaged with a capital D. Andrew was a wedge between us, along with distance, deep-seated jealousy, and the ten-year age gap. Now, I’m going to be the glue—sticky, annoying, and resilient. She is going to love me because she has no other choice. That’s the plan.

Edith and I ride together to Helen’s house; Jack had to run over to the restaurant first so he’s meeting us there. I’m quiet in the car, cradling the letter on my lap. Edith asks me if I’m nervous and I reply with a noncommittal grunt. Truthfully, yes, I’m either nervous or my stomach has stopped working. I couldn’t manage food all day, and my hands are shaking. I tell Edith we should keep circling the block as we pull up out front.

“I grew up in the wake of the Depression—I’m not wasting gas,” she says before parking.

Edith isn’t an enabler, and that’s a good thing. She gives me the kick in the ass I need, both in the car and midway up the path when I turn back and tell her I left something at the farmhouse. She grabs ahold of my dress and tugs me all the way to the front door.

When it’s swept open, it’s like I’m seeing my sister for the first time in five years. Her light brown hair is trimmed short, just below her chin. Her simple wrap dress accentuates her curves and her glowing skin. I’m glad to see she looks happy.

I hold up the bouquet we picked up on the way—sunflowers. I remember she used to love them when she was younger, and I tell her so. She smiles.

“They’re still my favorite.”

I’m pleasantly surprised to see Daniel and Leanna along with a few other guests in the living room. Helen introduces me as her baby sister, and maybe it's wishful thinking, but I think I can almost detect pride in her voice. After I wave to the room at large, I follow Helen into the kitchen.

"Can I help with anything?"

She's got her hands full finishing up dinner and I really hope she says yes, because this is so awkward and I have nothing to do with my hands. I can't keep wringing them out. I try crossing my arms, but then I seem tense. I prop one on my hip and try to act natural.

"Sure, can you put those flowers in water? There's a vase in that cabinet over there."

As I trim and arrange them, she tells me about Europe. She says it was the trip of a lifetime, but she and Brent are both happy to be back home.

"We walked a ton, but I still gained ten pounds. It's all those damn croissants! I think I ate six a day. Starting tomorrow, Brent and I are going on a diet."

"I think you look great. You have that post-travel glow. But, if you want, I have a few healthy recipes I've been making for Jack and Edith lately. I can write them down for you."

After we finish talking about her trip, we're silent for a few minutes as she puts me to work mixing up the salad ingredients. We have things to talk about. The letter is burning a hole in my purse and I know she knows about the divorce. I mentioned it the other day in a text.

"Have you heard from Andrew lately?" I ask.

"Didn't I tell you I blocked his number?"

She says it so casually that I don't think I hear her right.

"What?"

She glances over her shoulder. "Yeah. After Jack told me what happened when he came down to Texas, I blocked his ass."

Wow. Um, okay.

Talk about the end of an era.

I'm so shocked, I have nothing to say, so I apologize. "I'm sorry about...well, everything."

She sets down the spoon she was using to stir the pasta. "Please don't apologize, okay? I didn't want to get into this tonight, not with everyone here, but—" She breaks eye contact and glances away, taking a deep breath. "I was so wrong about...a lot actually." I hold stock-still as she continues. "This situation has been hard for me to navigate. I've always wanted the best for you, and I thought that meant staying with Andrew. You have to understand, Meredith"—her voice cracks—"I thought you were happy. I really did."

I'm around the island and pulling her into a hug before she can even finish.

"I know, I know. I'm sorry too. Had I not cut you out of my life, you would have known. You would have believed me." I pull back and try on a big smile. It feels tight and awkward. "Let's get coffee this week, yeah? You and me? I have a letter to give you, but I'll wait and give it to you then. I don't want to make you cry at your dinner party."

She laughs and shakes her head, drying her eyes with the back of her hand. "I swore I wouldn't cry when I saw you, but it just feels so strange to have you here in Cedar Creek. I still can't believe you're actually staying."

"I really like it here."

"I'm glad. I never imagined you and I would live this close to one another again."

After we pull ourselves together, we go back to prepping dinner and don't talk about anything too heavy. She tells me she's excited to go back to work on Monday.

"I know it seems weird, but I actually missed it."

I laugh. "Well Jack definitely missed you too. He's been counting down the days until you get back."

She smiles. "Honestly, I don't know how you do it. I work mainly from home and I go out to the ranch a couple times a week for meetings, but you live there! God, you must be so sick of him by the end of the day."

“Oh, umm...”

Yeah...Helen doesn't know about Jack and me, mostly because we've only been officially dating for a month, and also because I'm scared of what she'll say when she does find out. A part of me fears she'll be quick to judge me.

I even tried to strategize with Jack about this dinner party last night. I was lying with him on the couch while we pretended to watch TV. Really, we were making out with one ear perked for Edith's car. His hands were underneath my bra and mine were working on the zipper of his jeans. We've been like that lately—hot and heavy—and it's driving me crazy. Jack has kept us safely tucked away in the foreplay zone. No sex, because there's apparently no rush. He doesn't want to take advantage of me—OF ME! Is he kidding?! I'm about to march down to the barn to find some rope so I can tie him to my bed and take advantage of him! No amount of convincing on my part will work either. He has it in his head that he needs to work us up to that point slowly, tortuously. I am insistent. I look him square in the eyes and say plainly, “Jack, I want it.” The other day, I wrote it on a sticky note and slapped it on his computer screen: SEX @ TONIGHT. I even drew two anatomically correct stick figures in case he needed a visual. It didn't work.

Anyway, last night, I tried to talk to him about the dinner party in between kisses.

“Should we act like we aren't dating?”

“No.”

“Okay, but Helen doesn't know about us. Should we tone it down a little?”

As it is, our touchy-feely lovey-doveyness brings Edith to the brink of nausea at least once a day. I don't want to make Helen feel that way too.

“You're overthinking things.”

Men, seriously. I'm ‘overthinking things’? Doesn't he realize this is a fragile situation? Doesn't he realize I'm trying to mend my relationship with Helen and we need to handle this with tact or everything could blow up in our face?

That's why when Helen says, "You must be so sick of him by the end of the day," my answer is, "Oh, umm..."

She doesn't even notice my fumbling, but now my nerves are stronger than ever. We can't do this. I can't date Jack. I'll just break it off with him and then I'll never have to tell Helen, and sure I really think I love him, but there are other fish in the sea and lots more cowboys where he came from. Phew, glad that's settled.

"Jack!" someone shouts in the living room, and the subject of all of my fantasies has just arrived. I can hear him greeting guests in the other room with that husky, deep voice, and my heart is a fluttering little mess. My hands are shaking so badly, I have to stop chopping carrots.

Helen smiles. "Oh, Jack's here!"

I keep my mouth zipped shut. The only reaction that won't give us away is a non-reaction.

When I don't move, she quirks a brow. "Aren't you going to go say hi?"

I reply like this: "Oh...hmm...um...yeah...ha!"

She looks at me like I've just suffered a stroke in her kitchen, and then Mr. Sexy Cowboy walks through the doorway and all my well-planned tact flies straight out the window because he's so handsome, my mouth waters.

"There you are," he says with a smile.

Helen glances between us like she's confused. I try for the same expression. Yes, I know, Helen—why is he looking at me like he's seen my panties up close and personal? So strange!

Jack isn't having it. He marches right up to me, bends down, and presses a kiss to my lips. My knees buckle a little. When he's made his point, he pulls back, wraps his hand around my waist, and turns us to face Helen.

"Helen, your sister was worried about telling you that we're dating, but you know I've always preferred to be direct."

Oh.

My.

God.

I drop my face into my hands.

“Wait...what?!” she exclaims.

What a fun way to die—of pure mortification, right in the middle of my sister’s newly remodeled kitchen.

“For how long?”

“Oh, I don’t know...a month?” Jack answers nonchalantly.

She doesn’t exactly sound upset, which gives me enough courage to glance up at her. Her hand is on her mouth and her eyes are welling up with some fluid that looks a lot like tears.

I cringe and rush toward her to grab her shoulders so she’s forced to listen to me. “I swear this is as unexpected to me as it is to you. I hated him when I first moved here!”

Jack nods. “It’s true. I was a real asshole. Also, she wasn’t exactly the ideal hire.”

“But then we sort of became friends?” I look to him for help. “Right? I don’t know.”

“No, it’s been more than that on my end for a while—since the rope swing.”

My mouth drops open. “Even then?”

He shrugs, all confident and unruffled by this obviously awkward conversation.

Wow. Okay.

Then, in the most shocking turn of events, Helen yanks a towel off the counter and rushes over to pop Jack’s bicep.

“Jack McKnight! I asked you to help my little sister get back on her own two feet, not to leg-sweep her into your damn bed!”

She winds up the towel again, but he’s learned his lesson and moves out of the way before she gets him again.

He holds up his hands in defense. “I did help her!”

“You better not be taking advantage of her,” she snaps with a protective tone.

I blush a dark red. “Believe me, he’s not.”

Jack grins at that, which only pisses Helen off more. She’s really going to bat for me, which is definitely a new thing. I like it.

It takes a bit more convincing before Helen will calm down and stop growling at him about dating “her baby sister”, but she does eventually come around. In fact, she tears up she’s so happy for us.

“You two—” she sniffles. “I can’t believe it. If you’d asked me before, I would have said it’d never work, but now that I see you together, it makes perfect sense.” She’s shaking her head. “Jesus! What else are you going to surprise me with?! You two aren’t engaged are you? Oh my god, am I going to be an aunt?!”

I don’t bother telling her it’s actually impossible for me to be pregnant at the moment. Instead, I laugh and shake my head. “I swear this is it. No more surprises.”

After that, the rest of the night is a whirlwind. Jack and I sit beside each other during dinner and though I’d like to crawl over and sit in his lap, I resist and am a very good dinner guest. I keep my hands to myself, even when, as Helen serves dessert and we’re all sipping coffee, Jack leans back and drops his arm on the back of my chair. I want to reach over and touch his thigh, but I don’t trust myself. My libido has a hair-pin trigger at this point. Sure, I’ve had orgasms, and don’t get me wrong, they’ve been W-O-N-D-E-R-F-U-L, but there’s something missing, something I want even more—something I’ve decided I’m finished waiting for.

Meredith

Neither one of us is talking on the drive home. The radio is playing softly in the background, and we'll be back home in fifteen minutes...fifteen minutes of quiet country roads. I look back over my shoulder and see one of his jackets in the back of the truck, probably forgotten from winter.

On our right, there's nothing but cornfields. On the left, rolling hills and oak trees.

"Does this land belong to Blue Stone?"

He nods. "It starts back near the edge of town and stretches this way a couple miles."

Good.

"Pull over up there, where the road cuts into the cornfield."

"Why?"

"I want to see something."

"A cornfield?"

Not exactly.

Despite the skepticism in his tone, he listens and pulls off the road. We dip between the rows of corn.

"Keep going." The road turns to dirt and there's nothing but stalks as far as the eye can see. We're at least a mile from the main road, not another soul in sight.

"This is good," I say, unbuckling my seatbelt and reaching into the back for his jacket.

He puts the truck in park and turns, a question in his eyes, but I don't give it time to surface. I hop out of the truck and round the back so I can lower the tailgate and climb up. Fortunately, it's empty and pretty clean—not that it would stop me if it wasn't.

Jack cuts the engine and steps out, leaving the door open.

He doesn't realize we'll be staying a while.

"Might want to close your door or that overhead light will kill your battery."

"Why don't you tell me what you have planned?"

I shake out his jacket and drop it on the bed of the truck. I set my phone down and Madonna's "Like a Virgin" plays softly from the speakers.

"Oh my god," he says, shaking his head.

"Haven't you figured it out by now?" I ask, stepping to the edge of the truck bed and leaning down to prop my hands on the ledge. I smirk and he steps right up so I can kiss him. His hand wraps around my neck and his fingers twine through my hair, keeping me bent there while he deepens the kiss.

His fingers massage my neck. His tongue skims against mine and my arms start shaking from the weight of holding myself up. I smile and break the kiss, pressing the back of my hand to my lips.

His eyes are alight with mischief, but he's still there on the ground. Maybe I'll need to do a bit more convincing.

I move to the first button on my sundress. There are five up top. Each one will reveal a little more of my pale cream bra—the same bra I wore the day we jumped off the rope swing.

"Y'know, I'm legally a single woman as of today."

His brow arches, but his eyes are on my fingers as I slowly tug each button free.

"That means your excuses have all run out."

He shakes his head and waves for me to get down. "Let me take you back to the farmhouse, to a bed."

"This is a bed—well, a truck bed. Are you worried someone'll see us?"

My taunt brings a little smirk to his lips. He wipes it away and glances down the road, contemplating something. I want to know what he's thinking. I want to know how much more convincing it'll take before he climbs up here.

All five buttons are free and I push the strap of my dress down my shoulder.

He's watching me, mesmerized.

"Meredith," he warns.

"Jack."

His brown eyes implore me to get down, but I shake my head and offer up a sweet smile.

I've never stripped like this for a man, but it's exhilarating. I know he wants me as much as I want him. I know he's scared to hurt me, but I'm not as fragile as he thinks. In fact, I think I've proven pretty resilient these last couple months.

I push the second strap of my dress down, and—oops—the fabric falls to my waist. His eyes skim down, blazing a path across my bare skin. The humor is wiped clean. Now he's looking at me like a man who's a little bit angel and a whole lotta devil.

A summer breeze picks up strands of my hair and wraps me in a gentle warmth. Goose bumps bloom across my skin, and all the while, he stands there, watching me.

I tug the rest of my dress down and kick my shoes off with it. I'm standing there in my underwear, exposed and vulnerable. He could still force me to get down. He could drag me to the farmhouse and tuck me into bed, but I don't think he wants to wait any longer either. I think he's sick of being the responsible one.

With a groan and a tug of his hand through his hair, he turns and whips the truck door closed. The light cuts off and we're left under the stars. I blink, trying to force my eyes to adjust faster, but the loss of that sense heightens all the rest. I'm jumpy and nervous as he rounds the truck and hops on up.

"I hope you know what you're doing," he warns with a husky tone before his hands find my waist and he pulls me to face him.

My bare leg brushes against his denim-clad thigh and he squeezes, holding me tight. His chest crushes mine and I feel so small, so out of my league all of a sudden.

His head dips down and his breath hits my hair. I shiver even before he presses a kiss just below my ear.

“Have you ever had sex in the bed of a truck?” I ask, breathless.

He laughs. “I like to treat women a little better than that.”

“Oh yeah?”

He nuzzles against my ear. “I don’t think you realize how uncomfortable it’s going to be for you.”

I smirk and kiss his cheek. “Not if I’m on top.”

And I will be. Tonight, my fantasy is coming true.

We kiss like that, standing in the bed of his truck until I’m panting and writhing and acting like I’m going to spontaneously combust if he doesn’t fulfill my every want and need ASAP. My hands have done the heavy lifting, unbuttoning his jeans and yanking them off as fast as possible. His shirt is gone too, hanging limply on one of the cornstalks after I tossed it out of the truck bed impatiently.

He tugs me down to sit on his lap as his back rests against the cab of the truck. I straddle him and smile.

This is exactly what I wanted.

My bra is gone as quick as his shirt and then there’s the most blissful few seconds of skin on skin, soft breasts against hard muscle. We both sigh against each other and he winds his fingers in my hair, tilting my chin until my mouth is perfectly positioned for him. I want to keep kissing him until my lips stop working, until they’re so chapped that I can’t even talk, but I want something else even more. I roll my hips against him like the beginning of a lap dance.

There’s a deep groan from the base of his throat and it’s like I just sparked a match. I like that sound. I want to coax that sound out of him again and again.

It's just us in this field with nothing but time. I kiss my way down his chest and then stand.

He stares up at me, and his expression does all the talking, replacing all the hatred Andrew filled my head with. His expression is love, and need, and adoration. His eyes are smoldering as I gently push my underwear down and step out of them.

The moon is nearly full and bright enough that I'm pretty sure he can see every inch of me.

I smirk and point down. "Your turn."

He laughs. "Oh yeah? So I have to put my ass cheeks on cold metal? Interesting how that worked out."

"Oh!" I snap. "That's why I brought the jacket!"

I'd almost forgotten about it.

He stands and I situate the fabric. He tugs off his boxer briefs and my mouth waters. I fist my hands by my sides and do a nice, slow once-over of him. It's a lot to take in, like a whole lot. He chuckles under his breath and reaches for my hand, tugging me down onto him again. This time, though, he spins me around so my back hits his chest. It's a new angle, and now we're both facing out to where the starry sky meets the horizon.

"Lie back against me," he says, easing me toward him until my head rests against his shoulder. He cradles me there with one hand around my waist and the other tugging my thighs apart. My knees splay out like butterfly wings and then he traces soft circles up the inside of my thigh.

Suddenly I feel exposed. Suddenly I feel like we're out in the middle of nowhere and anyone could wander up at any second.

"Are you sure we're alone?"

He chuckles. "It's a little late for that, don't you think?"

Oh god, what have I done?

He kisses my cheek. "Relax."

The second half of that word coincides with his finger sliding inside me. My back arches and can we get this man a slow clap because he really knows what he's doing. He adds a second finger while his thumb skims little circles across my most sensitive area, the spot where all my hopes and dreams live. I wrap my hands around his neck and hold on for dear life. His other hand (the one not currently BLOWING MY MIND) wraps around my chest and palms my breast. Details hit me from every sense: warm, floral summer air, callused hands, hard muscle, smooth wetness. Any residual shyness has flown out the window. I'm splayed out on top of him like I'm on a pool float, basking in the summer sun, but this is better. I'm basking in Jack and I tell him that. He laughs and his chest rumbles and then his fingers start sliding faster.

I was ready for him as soon as we turned off the main road. I was even more ready for him after we started kissing in our underwear. Now—now, I'm a puddle, barely sentient. I'll come any second if he keeps moving his fingers, pumping them into me like that. My hands turn into tiny hooks as he drags his fingers out slowly and brushes soft circles. It's like he's giving me a preview of what's to come. My toes are already curling. I can feel the warning signs—those first delicious sparks—and then I realize I'm speaking. I'm begging him to stop. I know what it feels like to have him bring me to the brink of oblivion like this. It's so good—applause-worthy—but I will not be distracted from my end goal. I AM GOING TO HAVE SEX WITH THIS HOT COWBOY IN THE BED OF A PICKUP TRUCK LIKE IT'S MY CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT.

I tell him this, too, and now we're both laughing, but I'm not distracting him enough, because he's teasing my breast in a way that's making it hard to form complete sentences. I know what he's doing. He likes this position where he's in charge and I'm nothing but a gasping mess of want. He promises me he'll make me come again, but NO. I am done waiting. I push his hand away and spin around, reaching for his crumpled jeans.

“Please tell me you keep a condom in your wallet.”

If not, I'll fashion one out of something—a corn husk, perhaps woven grass.

My aim is to get his wallet from his back pocket, but I'm so impatient, I just end up pawing at his jeans like an animal who lacks opposable thumbs. We're laughing as he yanks them away from me and extracts the condom, tears it open, and rolls it on with such precision, such grace. He could go to the Olympics for condom application. It's obvious he's done this before, and I know I'm in for a treat. I'd rub my hands together like a little evil mastermind but they're currently occupied with his very tempting pectoral muscles.

I sit down on his lap and touch every surface I can get my hands on. Yes, I realize I'm so close to having him inside me. I can feel him beneath me, stiff and demanding, but now maybe I'm not in the same hurry I was a second ago. I have him right where I want him. All that hard, tan muscle is just sitting there waiting for me to touch it. That chest is just the tip of the iceberg. His shoulders are something else. I take hold of them and try to shake him. He doesn't budge. I move my hands down to his biceps and squeeze, trying to see if I can close my fist. I make it halfway around.

"It feels like you're trying to size up what part of me you want to eat first," he says with a lazy smile.

I smile wickedly, and then I bend down and sink my teeth into his shoulder, not hard, but he still reaches around and grips my ass. I yelp and release him. It's tit for tat.

I go back to my exploration. I'm charting unmapped territory, staking claims with tiny Meredith Avery flags. It's important to be thorough. I don't let a single inch escape my notice, not his tight abs or the hair that trails down, down, down. He's tan everywhere, warm everywhere, hard everywhere.

"Not in such a hurry now?" he teases, right before he skims his hands up from my ass and grips my hips. He uses his hold on me to drag me back and forth across his length, and I think one of my eyes starts to twitch. He's taunting me. He's wearing a devilish smirk I try to wipe away with a kiss, but that was a mistake, because now he's still dragging me back and forth and he's kissing me senseless. He slides his tongue into my mouth and this isn't even foreplay anymore, this is the best sex I've ever had and we aren't even doing it yet. A ripple shoots up my spine, and I pat his shoulder like I'm tapping out of a fight.

"No...no more of that."

There are heavy, hot breaths in between each of my words.

This is falling apart. I'm falling apart. I was the one to initiate this little bone-a-rama. I was supposed to be the one rocking his world, but there's no more delaying. We are having sex right now, and if it kills me, then so be it. I lived a good life. Adios.

"I was going to do this sexy thing where I tease you until you're weeping with want," I admit.

"Oh yeah?" he taunts. "Go ahead."

I spin a little circle on his chest. It's the manliest thing I've ever seen, a broad plane with a sprinkling of dark hair.

"Ha ha. Yeah, right. I think I've lost feeling in half my body. My heart is only pumping blood to my nether regions."

"If it helps, I think you're sexy as hell."

My brow perks up. "That does help."

He grinds his very hard, very erect length against me. It's a sure sign that he's as turned on as I am. Maybe my plan didn't backfire as much as I thought it did?

With a burst of courage, I reach down and grip him in my hand. It's, ahem, bigger than I'm accustomed to, but hey, that's what they say about things in Texas.

This is happening. He reaches up to grip my hips in his hands, holding some of my weight for me. It makes it easier to push onto one foot and angle myself over him so that together, we can guide me down until he slides into me the first few inches. I hiss, surprised by the tight fit. I ease off a bit, but the second he's gone, I crave him again.

"Are you okay?" he asks.

It's sweet, the idea that if I wasn't okay, we'd stop. He could crack my pelvis and I would demand he keep going.

"Here," he says, moving my free hand to his shoulder at the same time he lifts some of my weight off him. Now I have a better angle and I can ease down onto him gentler this time, bit by bit so it's not painful. It's earth-shatteringly sexy, being filled up while he stares into my eyes, watching for any sign of pain or hesitation. I clench. He groans. I exhale, relax, and he slides deeper.

I'm not all the way on him, but for now, I'm at my limit. I sink down on my knees and wrap my hands around his neck, kissing him and showing him how insanely hot this is, how perfectly right it feels to be here with him.

He brushes my hair behind my shoulder then wraps his palm around my neck. My pulse jumps against his thumb. "How does it feel?"

I don't answer him. Instead, I lean back and smile. The look I'm going for: moonlit goddess of the fields. The look I'm probably nailing: escaped sex addict, armed and dangerous.

I decide to turn the tables.

"How do you feel?"

He looks at me like I'm simple. "Are you kidding?"

"I can back off—"

With lightning speed, his hands move to my waist and he tugs me off him a little before lifting his hips and filling me again. My reaction is a wonderfully sexy eyes-rolling-into-the-back-of-my-head move.

"Again," I demand like a spoiled toddler. "Moremoremore."

He lifts me up then drags me back down. I arch my back and my loose hair brushes the base of my spine. I'm staring up at the sky when his lips brush against one of my breasts. I'd forgotten all about my breasts. I'd forgotten they even exist, how amazingly sensitive they feel as he brushes his tongue across them. Hooookay there. This cowboy just became a cowman.

He keeps moving me up and down, on and off him, doing the heavy lifting so I'm left with nothing to do but enjoy the sparks of pleasure building inside me. My nails bite into his shoulders. I'm probably leaving crescent moon-shaped divots, but I don't care, because my hips are relaxing and eventually, I slide down all the way onto him and his hip bones meet mine and now this is the point at which my brain can no longer translate simple messages. It exists solely to process his mouth on my breasts and his hand circling between my thighs and his hardness filling me up.

“Jack...Jack.”

I'm trying so hard to delay my orgasm, but it's like trying to prop up a house of cards in a tornado. We press our foreheads together and our lips barely touch. I can feel myself clench around him and my shoulders sag as a jolt of pleasure runs down my spine. Another shock follows right after, and there's no more holding off. I'm tipping, tipping, tipping... I want him to know what he's doing to me, how sufficiently he's shattering me from the inside out. I tell him, whispering single, choppy words against his lips as my orgasm wrecks me. I want to say more. I want to tell him I love him, but I won't because that's cliché and maybe he'll think I only love him when he's doing this to me, as if, for the rest of our lives, we'll have to bone 24/7 to keep the love alive. I'll have a skinny almond milk latte—yes, YES!—and a blueberry scone—right there, harder! But that couldn't be further from the truth. I loved him before this moment. I loved him at the wedding, when he was sitting all alone on that pew. I loved him when he slept on the floor of the shack, scared I might not make it through the night. I loved him when he kissed me right in front of Helen earlier, consequences be damned.

I could tell him that, but instead, I show him. My lips are on his throat and our chests are pressed together so tightly, you couldn't pry us apart if you tried. We're both damp now, sticky and hot. His fingers work their magic and he makes me come again and the second orgasm hits so quickly, I feel like he's cheating. He's memorized where I like to be touched, how I like to be touched. I tell him we're not playing by the same rules and he laughs huskily. It's the richest, happiest sound and I want to hear it again, but I want him to come even more.

I lean back and sink onto my knees so I'm kneeling over him. I like this position, this moment where he looks like he's on the brink of insanity too. I leverage myself so I can move on and off of him. I'm doing the work now and I feel seriously sexy. His head tips back and he watches me with a lazy, arrogant smile. He exhales a shaky breath as I press my hands to his chest and keep going, clenching around him when his hips buck up into me. He's been patient, a hell of a lot more patient than me.

"I want to watch you unravel," I tell him. "I want to see what you look like—"

I don't even get my full sentence out. My words push him over the edge. His hands dig into my waist so hard it's almost painful and his eyes pinch close. I can feel his orgasm surge through him, powerful and all-consuming. He's gripping me like I could slip through his fingers at any moment, like he's scared to let me go. As his shakes start to subside, I kiss his cheek, his chin, his throat. I feel like I just won a competition I didn't realize we were having. Sure, he made me come twice, but I made him come hard, and that should count for something.

He thinks my logic is flawed.

He tells me we could keep going as his hand skims down between us and OKAY, is he honestly trying to kill me? Because I'm like Céline Dion, except my heart can't go on. I'm completely wrung dry. My knees are bruised from the bed of the truck.

"I need to hydrate and towel off. I need to sink into one of those giant ice baths athletes use after a hard workout."

He laughs and starts to uncoil me from my position on his lap. I protest.

"Let's sleep here."

"Not a good idea."

It's a great idea. I'm already half asleep on his chest right now. His shoulder makes a wonderful, albeit slightly stiff pillow.

I position his arm back around me. "Here, just hold still and don't move until I start to snore."

He doesn't listen and instead plops me onto the bed of his truck then tells me to hold up my arms. My dress is put right back on, sans bra and underwear. With the buttons undone, I feel seriously sleazy. One glance up at him proves that he likes the look a lot.

"If you keep looking at me like that, I'll maul you again," I promise.

We somehow make it out of the bed of his truck and back to the farmhouse. We tell each other to be quiet and to stop laughing as we make it up the stairs to his bedroom. We manage a shower together in which he does most of the cleaning and I do most of the slack-jawed, fully satisfied staring.

"Can we have sex in here?" I ask, painting a heart on his chest with my wet finger.

"Tomorrow."

"Okay, it's tomorrow." It is already past midnight.

"As soon as we wake up."

"What is that?" I ask. "Six hours?"

Too long, in my opinion. What's the least amount of sleep humans can subsist on?

"I'll need breakfast first," he points out. "For energy."

"Fiiiine."

He presses a kiss to my cheek and cuts the water. I prove useless as he towels me off and gently pushes me toward his bed. I'm too happy and in love to sleep. Doesn't he feel it? The excitement in the air?

"Hey," I say once we're lying in bed together, face to face.

He smiles and there are adorable little crinkles around his eyes. He looks worn out. I should let him sleep.

“Never mind.”

His gaze drops to my lips, where I’m nibbling away as I consider something.

“What? Tell me,” he insists, dragging his hand beneath the covers to take hold of my hip.

“No. It’s nothing.”

I close my eyes and try to tell myself to go to sleep. One adorable fluffy sheep is counted off before he says my name.

“Zee-zee-zee-zee-zee, sleeping,” I insist.

“Tell me.”

He shakes my body.

“It’s not important.”

His finger hits my eyebrow and he tugs gently so my eyelid opens.

I laugh.

“I was just going to declare my love, but it can wait until morning.”

Then I close my eyes again because I’m too nervous to see what his face looks like right now. If he looks horrified, I will shrivel up and die.

“What a little chicken,” he says, scooting toward me.

I wink one eye open. “Chicken?”

“Yeah. What was that?”

I blink both eyes open now. “What do you mean?”

“‘I was going to declare my love’? That’s like saying ‘I’m sorry you were hurt’ instead of saying ‘I’m sorry.’ It doesn’t count.”

I poke his chest. “Hey! It took a lot of courage to say that much! I don’t hear you declaring your love.”

He chuckles and then plain as day, he says, “I love you.”

Damn. He said it so simply—didn’t even blink.

I’m the one tearing up, eyes misty with swoony emotion.

“Oh, okay. Zee-zee-zee-zee.”

He smiles and leans over to kiss me.

“See? Chicken.”

“I’m not a chicken!” I slap his chest playfully. “Look at what I’ve done in the last few months! I showed up on this ranch all on my own and demanded a job from the most arrogant devil I’ve ever met—that takes courage.”

“But now you can’t tell that same devil you love him?”

I press my face to the crook of his neck and say the words against his skin. He smells delicious, just like the body wash we used to rinse off. Maybe I’ll live here, right in this little, warm pocket between his head and his heart.

His hand brushes down my spine, soothing me as he speaks. “You don’t have to say it. It’s okay. I’ll wait until you’re ready.”

It should be easy to thwart his reverse psychology mumbo-jumbo, but it’s not. He thinks I’m not ready to say it?!

“Are you kidding?” I pick my head up and aim blue daggers at him. “I love you! I was going to say it first! You just leapfrogged me!”

“Let’s check the record.” He holds his finger up like he’s consulting imaginary referees. “Yup, I had the first official ‘I love you’.”

I roll over and climb on top of him to smother him to death.

He cups my butt.

“Hold still,” I groan, hands around his throat. “I’m trying to kill you.”

He laughs and it makes my entire body shake.

“Kiss me,” he says.

“Admit you’re wrong, and I’ll let you live.”

“Kiss me,” he says again. This time his brown eyes meet mine and I realize this is futile. He’s going to win every argument we ever have—there’s no competing with those eyes.

“Kiss me and I’ll let you let me live,” he promises.

My lips are within millimeters of his. “I’m the winner,” I whisper.

He smirks. “Don’t you feel like in some ways, we’re both winners?”

He laughs at his silly joke and I groan. He rolls us over, crushing me with his weight. We lock eyes and the laughter slowly dies. A heavy emotion settles over us and the mood shifts. We aren’t teasing anymore. We’re stripping each other bare and getting to the heart of what matters.

“I wasn’t sure I’d even want to love a man after Andrew,” I admit. “I loved him, he knew it, and he used that love against me.”

His brows furrow. “Are you scared of me taking advantage of you like he did?”

I think about that question for a little while then heave a resigned sigh.

“Does it make me seem foolish if I say no? If I just trust you completely?”

“Love is supposed to make us fools.”

“Oh yeah? What does that make you?”

He smiles and tips his head down to kiss me. “The biggest fool of them all.”

Epilogue

Jack

Today is the grand opening of Meredith's new business: a yoga studio in Cedar Creek town square. That's right, Meredith is bringing the ancient, south Asian practice of yoga to Tiny-town, Texas. She found studio space a year ago when we were walking along the square after dinner. She saw the FOR RENT sign in the window, squashed her face to the glass, and told me her grand vision.

"Front desk there, small studio on that side, and changing rooms in that back corner." She turned back to me, eyes gleaming. "JACK! IT'S FATE! Just this morning, Leanna rolled her yoga mat out onto some of Alfred's poop! We can't keep practicing in the middle of a field!"

She had her work cut out for her. The space used to belong to a clothing boutique, and Meredith had to completely overhaul it to transform it into a studio.

It's been hard work, long days that stretched into long nights. She wanted to be involved in every aspect of the business, partly because she couldn't afford to outsource anything, and partly because she was too stubborn to give up any amount of control to someone else. She's the sole owner, something I know she's proud of. I could have helped her with the initial capital, but she wouldn't budge on that issue. She scrimped, saved, and worked with Dotty on securing a small business loan. I hate that she's wasting money on interest payments, but there was no convincing her otherwise.

Some aspects of the business came easily: instead of charging a monthly fee, each of her yoga classes will be donation-based. That way there's no barrier to entry. "Yoga for the people!" as she likes to say.

Some aspects of the business took a little more thought, especially the name. She kept a journal with hundreds of options. She went back and forth on a few favorites, and then one night, while we were lounging on the couch with Alfred at our feet, she turned to me and asked how Blue Stone Ranch got its name. I couldn't believe I'd never told her. I also couldn't believe how perfect the timing was. She needed to know the story, and after being together for three years, I had a question I needed to ask her.

In the late 1930s, my grandfather immigrated to the United States from England. He was sixteen, on his own, and dirt poor, but he was determined to make something of himself. Work on the railroad brought him to Central Texas. He liked it here, especially after having spent a few winters up north, and the heat never bothered him like the cold did.

One day, while he was working and laying new tracks, he accidentally dug up a blue topaz. They're common in this area, but this one was especially large and the color was unique enough that he knew he'd found something special enough to keep. He tucked it in his pocket and forgot about it until he was playing a game of poker later that night with a few guys from the railroad and a few local ranchers. He'd already used up what collateral he had when one rancher decided to up the ante, but he knew he was holding a winning hand. Then he remembered the stone in his pocket. He bet the blue topaz, won the game, and in the end, he walked away with a little bit of cash and a few acres of that rancher's land. It was hardly worth anything at the time. The soil was rough and infertile, which is why the rancher had bet it in a card game in the first place, but my grandfather saw its potential.

When it was time for his crew to move on to lay the next section of tracks, he quit working for the railroad and stayed in Central Texas. He had that land, but not much else. For two years, he cultivated it, trying to figure out a crop that could handle the clay-filled earth, eventually moving into raising cattle and acquiring more land. It was during those early years that my grandfather met Edith. She lived in the area with her family and he'd had his eye on her for months before he finally worked up the courage to ask her out on a date. Her parents weren't impressed by a poor immigrant farmer and made their opinions known, but after only a few weeks of dating, Edith loved him just as fiercely as he loved her.

Three months after that first date, he still hadn't worked out how to make the land flourish. He had no money to buy her a ring, but he had that blue topaz, so that's what he used to ask Edith for her hand in marriage.

Edith wore that stone on her ring finger every day until she passed it down to me on my one-year anniversary with Meredith. I was ready to marry Meredith then, but I knew she needed more time. So, I gave it to her—two more years. Two more years of us building a life together on the ranch. Two more years of Meredith sinking roots into Cedar Creek. Two more years of that ring burning a hole in my pocket until one night while we lounged on the couch she asked me why Blue Stone Ranch was called Blue Stone Ranch. I told her the story and then I got down on one knee and asked her to marry me.

Two weeks later, she and I got married at the courthouse downtown. She didn't want to spend a year planning an extravagant day when all she wanted was to be my wife as soon as possible, so we agreed to elope. We planned on it being a small affair with Edith, Helen, and Brent acting as witnesses, but when we arrived, we were shocked to find that it was standing room only in the courtroom. Every ranch hand and employee from Blue Stone had crammed into the small space. Leanna and a few of the other women from Meredith's weekly yoga group had decorated the room with flowers. Meredith didn't walk down the aisle toward me; we walked hand in hand through a crowd of our closest family and friends toward the waiting judge. Meredith stood across from me in an altered version of Edith's wedding gown and we said I do in the shortest ceremony known to man. Everyone whooped and hollered and demanded a second kiss after the first. I dipped her low and she squealed with excitement.

Afterward, we celebrated in the park outside. Our friends have never fessed up as to who did what, but there were mismatched tables and chairs, flowers and decorations, and more alcohol and food than necessary. Every restaurant in the town had donated something so in the end we didn't have one meal, we had half a dozen: barbecue, hamburgers, pasta, sandwiches, and salad. We had three different wedding cakes from three different bakeries and Meredith enjoyed smashing a bit of every single one in my face while our guests applauded a little too loudly.

Edith tells me Meredith has softened my image, says because she believed I was good and decent, everyone else started coming around to the idea too. Maybe it's true; I don't know. We've been married seven months and my ranch hands are still pretty scared of me.

"Can you believe this crowd?" Edith asks as I loop my truck onto Main Street and the Blue Stone Yoga sign comes into view.

"I don't think I'll be able to find parking."

"Check around back, see if there's a spot behind the studio."

I end up having to block Meredith in, but it shouldn't matter. She won't be leaving the yoga studio any time soon anyway. It's packed when we walk in. Everyone we know is here, even the guys who've never attempted yoga a day in their life. Sheriff Pete, Chris, Daniel—they're all here to support Meredith. She's turned the grand opening into an all-day event. There're yoga classes in the back studio, free smoothies and snacks circulate around the lobby, and a bounce-house is set up outside for the kids and kids at heart. Edith bee-lines straight for it.

"Tell Meredith I'll be inside later!"

It takes me too long to make my way back to Meredith. I get pulled in a million different directions, greeting everyone I pass. Finally, finally, I see her chatting with Helen, Dotty, and Leanna behind the front desk.

They're all oohing and aahing over her baby bump. I think I was happier than she was when it really became noticeable. Every morning for the last six months, she would turn sideways and ask me point blank, "If you didn't know me, would you think I look pregnant?" and every day until recently, I would lie and exaggerate. “Oh yeah, definitely—watch where you point that big ol’ belly.”

She spots me approaching and her face lights up. She excuses herself from the group and meets me halfway, where I press my hand to her stomach and lean down to kiss her.

“How’s he doing?”

She beams. “Good. Moving like crazy! If you leave your hand there for a little while, you’ll feel him. I think he’s as excited about today as I am.”

I smile, and sure enough, a second later, I feel a little thump against my palm.

“There! He just did it again,” she says, eyes alight with wonder.

“He was giving his pop a high five.”

She laughs and tips up on her toes to kiss my cheek. “Are you staying for a while?”

I had some things I needed to do on the ranch earlier, which is why I’m arriving a little late. “Until you leave.”

She eyes my workout clothes. “Does that mean you’re going to take a class?”

I nod. Admittedly, yoga wasn’t my thing when Meredith and I first started dating, but she’s convinced me to come around. I still get my down dogs confused with my up dogs, but I’m a hell of a lot closer to touching my toes than I was a year ago.

“Are you teaching soon?”

She’s my favorite teacher, and not just because she’s my wife.

She checks the clock mounted on the wall behind the desk. “I have a pre-natal class in forty-five minutes.”

“All right, I’ll man the desk for that one.”

She grins. “Don’t worry, I’m teaching a flow class right after.”

We’re interrupted soon after that. Everyone wants to say hello and feel her bump and congratulate her on the grand opening. Cedar Creek has really shown up to support her. Every class is full and Meredith is shocked by the turnout, though she shouldn't be.

The next few months are going to be tough for us. She'll have to take time off when Noah is born, but Edith and Helen have already volunteered to take shifts at the studio helping out as much as possible. On top of that, Meredith has trained a manager and four additional yoga instructors. She'll be able to tackle a lot of the day-to-day operations from home, and I'm not worried. I'll be taking time off too, and I can handle baby duty when she needs to come into the studio—I don't expect her to put her dreams on hold to raise our son. I fully expect that he'll end up growing up inside this studio. His first steps will probably take place on a mat somewhere in this lobby, and I'm okay with that. In fact, I wouldn't have it any other way.

It feels like we're right in the middle of the good part of life, the part you usually don't realize you're in until it's over. We have so much to look forward to that I keep wanting to jump ahead. I can't wait to be a father. I can't wait to raise Noah with Meredith. I can't wait to take him down to the creek and teach him how to do a backflip off the rope swing. I can't wait to see Meredith pregnant with our second child, and possibly a third if I can convince her it's a good idea. If I brought it up to her now while she's still pregnant with this first one, she'd probably sock me square in the jaw.

I'm not worried though. Wherever our path takes us, I know we'll always have each other. After all, I made that promise to her way back when she first came to the ranch. I told her if she wanted us, if she wanted to make a deal, Edith and I could be her people.

Even though I've been described as a devil by more than a few people, the name does have one redeeming quality: when you make a deal with me, you know I'll keep my word, forever.

Broken Miles

Claire Kingsley

Single-minded drive earned Roland Miles success—and cost him his first love. When his marriage to Zoe ended, he did the only thing he knew. He dove into work to put his heartbreak behind him.

Zoe Sutton's life hasn't exactly gone to plan. She certainly didn't plan on losing Roland or moving home to work for his family's winery. Four years after their divorce, she wonders if her chance at happily ever after is behind her.

After discovering his family might lose their land, Roland comes home to help sort out the mess. But between his brothers' antics, a baby sister who's all grown up, and a father keeping secrets, complicated isn't even the half of it.

And then there's Zoe.

He didn't come home looking for a second chance with her. But the more time they spend together, the more he realizes what they lost. What they could have again.

Because the truth is, they broke each other's hearts. And maybe they're the only ones who can put them back together.

Author's note: A stoic hero who's soft on the inside. A sassy heroine who doesn't take any sh*t. Messy family. Lots of shenanigans. Mattress burning bonfires. And a second chance at love with a big HEA.

Roland

All your shit's gone, and I'm just trying to figure out what the hell happened.

~Text from Roland, four years ago

They wanted a damn miracle. I looked over the email again, already formulating a strategy. What my boss was asking for was tough. But, as the saying went, that was why they paid me the big bucks. I was the youngest CFO in Dimension, Inc.'s history for a reason.

I was a goddamn miracle worker.

Glancing at the time, I had to do a double take. It was already after nine. I hadn't realized it was so late. But I worked late most nights, and it wasn't like there was anyone around to bitch at me about it. I didn't have plans with Farrah tonight; she was out of town. And even when we did have plans, she got it. She worked as much as I did, and she understood what it took to make it at this level. I never had to worry about that with her.

My cell buzzed, vibrating on the desk next to my laptop. Looking down, I winced. My parents' number. Their business number, to be specific. Which meant it could be either one of them calling. I didn't particularly want to take the call, but if I didn't answer, I'd have to call them back. Better to get it over with.

I picked up the phone and answered. "Yeah."

"Hey, it's Leo."

That was odd. My younger brother never called. An occasional text, maybe, but it wasn't like we were close. This probably meant bad news.

"What's wrong?" I asked.

"You need to come out here."

“Why? What’s going on?”

“Mom and Dad are on the verge of losing the winery,” he said.

I sat back in my chair and pinched the bridge of my nose. You’ve got to be kidding me. “What do you mean, lose the winery?”

“The business is in debt up to its eyeballs,” he said. “Dad’s been hiding shit. It’s bad.”

“What do you expect me to do about it?”

“Don’t be an asshole,” Leo said. “Do you think I would have called you if it wasn’t a big deal? This is serious. You need to come home.”

Fuck. Home? That was the last place I wanted to go.

“Now?” I asked. “I can’t just drop everything. I’m sure Dad will figure it out.”

“Roland,” Leo said, his tone sharp. “Dad’s the one who fucked everything up. He’s not going to fix it. We need you out here, man. If this is about Zoe...”

“It’s not about Zoe.”

I pinched the bridge of my nose again. Just thinking about Zoe gave me a headache. Why my mom had hired my ex-wife to work at the family winery was beyond me. Although, normally I didn’t give a shit. I was in San Francisco, almost a thousand miles from my hometown in central Washington. It’s not like it had any impact on my life if she worked there.

“Because we can, I don’t know, find ways to keep some distance between you two or whatever,” he said.

“I already said it isn’t about her. I’m an adult, I can be in the same room with Zoe.”

“Good,” he said. “Then get your ass home.”

“Leo—” I stopped because I heard the click of the call ending. I tossed my phone back onto my desk. “Fuck. Fuck you, Leo. And fuck you, Dad.”

I checked my calendar. Tomorrow was out, but if I flew out early on Thursday, I could get to the winery and finish up my day from there. I sent my assistant, Danielle, a text, telling her to book me a flight to Seattle and reserve a rental car.

My concentration was shot to shit. I wasn't going to get any more work done tonight. But it was late anyway. I closed my laptop, grabbed my things, and went home.

I'd bought my condo for the view. During the day, I could see all the way to the water. At night, the lights of the city twinkled in the darkness. It had cost me a shit-ton of money, but every night when I stood looking out the floor-to-ceiling windows, I knew it had been worth it.

I went to the kitchen and took a bottle of Glenlivet out of the liquor cabinet. Poured a glass and took a long swallow. It burned going down, spreading warmth through my chest.

Danielle texted me back with my flight details for Thursday. I blew out a long breath and took another drink of Scotch.

Home. I'd grown up in Echo Creek, a small town in the Cascade Mountains. Growing up on a winery sounded idyllic, but I'd been glad to leave it behind.

How long had it been since I'd been there? Eighteen months? More? That didn't sound right. But I hadn't gone back for the holidays last year. It probably had been that long.

I felt a twinge of guilt at that. It wasn't that I disliked my family. True, my dad and I butted heads, and my siblings liked to give me crap for having moved away. But I knew my mom would like it if I came home more often.

I was just so damn busy. It was hard to carve out the time for a trip that wasn't business related. And I'd have to endure the inevitable guilt trips. Why don't you visit more often? Can't you stay longer? Don't you want to come back and join your brothers in the family business?

No, I fucking didn't. But none of them had ever understood why I hadn't fallen in line. Why I hadn't taken up my proper place at the winery.

I was made for bigger things than running a goddamn wine business in a small town out in central nowhere. There was no challenge to it. No risk. And the potential rewards—particularly financially—were much too low for me. Money wasn't everything, but honestly, it was most things. And I was good at making money. Great, even. I'd made my company a hell of a lot of money in the last several years.

I was respected here. People deferred to me. Trusted me with millions of dollars. I had my own office, an assistant, a penthouse condo with a priceless view. Enough money that I could have more or less anything I wanted.

I was living my dream, and I didn't understand why my family couldn't just be fucking happy for me. Why they had to harp on the fact that I wasn't there all the time. My brothers had stayed. My sister would probably wind up back home after college. They even had my ex-wife. What the hell did they need me for?

I took another sip of Scotch and wandered over to the window, wondering what my dad had done that had Leo so riled up. Leo and I rarely saw eye to eye. He wouldn't have called me over nothing. The big question was, did my dad know he'd done it? Were they expecting me to ride in with my MBA and save the day? Or was Leo going behind their backs to drag me into their mess?

I guess I was about to find out.

Thinking of home brought my thoughts back to Zoe. I went into the bedroom and set my drink down. With a glance over my shoulder—as if half-afraid someone would catch me—I pulled a small box down off a shelf in the closet.

There was only one thing inside. Zoe's wedding ring.

I'd found it sitting on the kitchen counter of our old apartment the day she'd left me. The rest of her things had been gone. Her side of the closet, empty. Her drawers in the bathroom, cleaned out. She hadn't taken much that had been ours—the things we'd accumulated together. I'd brought some of it to her later—the things I'd thought she'd want to keep—and given away the rest. But not her ring.

Keeping it was the stupidest thing. I didn't know why I still had it. It wasn't even very nice. We'd eloped when we were twenty—just a couple of poor college students. I'd saved for months to get it, and at the time, I'd been pretty damn proud of myself. Looking at it now, it was rather pathetic. Just a plain gold band with a tiny excuse for a diamond. Zoe had loved it when I'd given it to her—said she hadn't expected a ring at all.

But we'd been different people, then. Young. Rebellious and wild. Idiots, really. We'd thought teenage hormones had been the real thing. Maybe they had, in their own way. But that hadn't been enough.

It hurt to look at it, and I wondered why I did this to myself. I didn't pull it out very often. Once when I'd randomly remembered it was her birthday. Another time on what had been our anniversary. Occasionally, thoughts of her would creep into my mind and refuse to let go, and I'd find myself right here. Nursing a glass of Scotch and staring at the cheap piece of shit I couldn't bring myself to throw away.

I closed the box and put it back on the shelf. Maybe I'd get rid of it for good someday. A colleague of mine had proudly flushed his ex-wife's ring down a public toilet. Another guy I knew had taken his ring off and dropped it in a garbage can in a park near his office.

I didn't have my ring anymore. I'd lost it a few years after we'd gotten married. Zoe and I had been visiting my family for Christmas, and it had snowed. We'd been outside, embroiled in an impromptu snowball fight with my brothers. None of us had been dressed for the cold—no coats, hats, or gloves. Just a bunch of dumbass kids tossing snow at each other until our bare hands hurt. Back inside, I'd realized my ring had come off. We'd looked, but never found it.

It had been prophetic, in a way.

But I was past that now. Zoe and I hadn't worked out. She hadn't been happy, so she'd left. Moved back to Echo Creek. Started working for my parents. She was fine, and so was I.

In fact, I was more than fine. I was at the top of my game. Whether or not my family could appreciate it, my life was pretty fucking good.

I would do what I had to do. Spend a few days at home, look at their books, probably find a few errors. Argue with my dad. Talk shit with my brothers. Let my mom fuss over me a little. Then I'd be right back here, where I belonged.

Zoe

The stack of shit on my desk never seemed to get any smaller. I'd been downstairs for most of the morning, hauling out decorations for a wedding tomorrow. It was going to be indoors, which was good. Spring in the foothills was beautiful, but chilly. It was early April, and not very warm, even though the sun was out.

The couple I was working with were fucking adorable. Both in their sixties, both on second marriages. They'd waited a long time before deciding to marry again, and to see them look at each other, I knew they had a shot at forever.

People like them were my favorite part of my job. I handled more than weddings, and I certainly had my share of first-time nuptials. Those were lovely, too. But there was something special about those second-chancers. They reminded me that love could surprise anyone, and it was never too late for a happy ending.

I took a sip of coffee and winced. It had gone cold. Gross. Glancing down, I noticed a spot on my white t-shirt where I'd dripped some. I wondered if I'd been walking around in a dirty shirt all morning.

Oh well, fuck it. It was too late to worry about it now.

I put the traitor coffee down—I'd have to get more later—and dug around the mess on my desk for another shirt. There was one beneath a bent spiral notebook, so I tugged it out and gave it a look. No stains. Sniffed it. Smelled fine. I pulled off my offending t-shirt just as Cooper stuck his head in my office.

"Zo—what the fuck?" He turned around. "Zoe Marie Sutton, why are you getting naked in your office?"

"I'm not getting naked," I said, laughing at his attempt to call me by my full name. "I got something on my shirt so I'm changing. And my middle name is Elizabeth."

“Zoe Marie sounds better. And have you heard of doors?” he asked. “They do this amazing thing where they close so people don’t see you in your bra.”

“Who wouldn’t want to see me in my bra?” I pulled on the clean shirt. “I have great boobs.”

“True,” Cooper said. “You do have an excellent rack.”

I laughed. Technically, Cooper was my ex-brother-in-law. Also my boss’s son, and my co-worker. But mostly he was one of my favorite people on the planet. The little brother I’d never known I wanted.

“You can look now,” I said. “Although I don’t know why you’re being weird about it. You’ve seen me completely naked. More than once, if I recall.”

“Yeah, and it’s awkward every time you give me a goddamn boner.” He came in but didn’t sit in the chair on the other side of my desk. Cooper rarely sat down. “And I think I’ve only seen you naked once.”

“Are you sure?” I asked. “There was that one time you walked in and—”

“Stop it, Zoe; I don’t need to be reminded.” He made a show of adjusting his dick. “Since technically we’re not related, I’m not immune your hotness. Even though I’m not the least bit sexually attracted to you.”

I smirked. “If you’re not sexually attracted to me, why is just the memory of my naked boobs giving you a chubby?”

“I’m a guy,” he said with a shrug. “Nice boobs equals hard-on.”

Cooper was way too cute for his own good. He did that messy-haired, ripped abs thing quite well. People never expected him to be the farmer in the Miles family. Although he looked like a pretty boy who ought to be posing in front of a camera—except for the dirt perpetually beneath his fingernails—he spent his days working in the fields. He took care of the vineyards like they were his babies.

Adorable as he was, I'd never seen Coop as anything other than a brother. And despite the way he joked about my boobs making him hard, he saw me the same way. We just had fun messing with each other, and sometimes our banter got a little raunchy. Another reason I loved him.

"Did you come up here to talk about my boobs, or...?" I asked.

"No," he said, and wrinkled his nose.

"What's going on?" I asked.

He rubbed the back of his neck. "Well..."

"Just get it over with, Coop," I said.

"Fine. But I want you to know ahead of time, this is all Leo's fault. So if you're going to get feisty with anyone, go find him."

"Get feisty?" I asked. "Why would I get feisty with Leo?"

He grabbed the chair and tilted it backward, rocking it on its back legs. "Roland's coming home."

It took every bit of self-control I possessed not to let my face—or body—react to the sound of my ex-husband's name. But I was determined to remain unaffected, and the first step in achieving that was to show no emotion.

"Why?"

"I don't know the whole story," he said. "Leo said something about things being worse than he thought, and we need Roland to help us sort it out. I guess something's going on with Dad."

Cooper's parents, Lawrence and Shannon, owned Salishan Cellars, the winery where I worked as the events manager. I'd come back here to Echo Creek after I left Roland, and much to my surprise, Shannon had offered me a job. Considering her oldest son and I were getting a divorce, it had been unexpected. But I'd worked for them before Roland and I had moved to San Francisco, and Shannon had been thrilled to have me back after my personal life went nuclear.

I was grateful to the Miles family for not ostracizing me just because I was their son's ex. For a lot of people, working for their ex's family would be a nightmare. For me, it was a godsend. And it didn't really matter that Roland's family and I were still close—that I worked for them, saw them daily, and was good friends with all three of his siblings. It didn't matter because Roland was never here.

San Francisco wasn't all that far, but Roland might as well have lived on the other side of the planet. He never came home.

"I'm confused," I said.

"You and me both," he said. "Leo won't tell me what's going on, but he wouldn't have called Roland if it wasn't serious."

That was very true. Cooper and Leo didn't exactly get along with their older brother. Roland had always resented the family business, but Cooper and Leo loved it. They lived and breathed this place, and I didn't think they'd ever understood how Roland could just leave.

I took a deep breath. I didn't love the idea of Roland being here, but it wouldn't be the first time. He came home to visit occasionally, though it had probably been at least a year and a half since I'd last seen him. Sometimes I wondered if it was me that kept him away. But of course, even when we'd still been married, he'd never wanted to come home.

"Look, I don't hate him or anything. We can get along just fine."

"Yeah?" Cooper asked.

"Yep," I said. "Not a big deal. I'll be too busy to notice, anyway. I have a shit-ton going on."

"Good, because he just got here and he's downstairs." He dashed out of my office.

"Now?" I called after him. "Coop?"

Fan-fucking-tastic. I had eight billion things to do, but I had to go make nice with my ex-husband. Now, apparently.

I wasn't lying to Cooper. I didn't hate Roland. The man knew how to push my buttons better than anyone in existence. But I'd never hated him. Not even when I'd first left. And four years later, I still didn't.

However, I didn't exactly want to spend time with him either.

But I figured I should get it over with. He'd be here for a couple of days, at most, and I was sure he'd be busy with whatever Leo had called him here to do. He'd probably just be locked in an office with his parents, and I wouldn't have to see him more than once or twice.

I stood and tightened my messy excuse for a bun, then went downstairs to get the obligatory greeting out of the way.

The Big House, as we all called it, was just that. Big. It was the winery's showpiece, with the main lobby, tasting rooms, and our biggest indoor event venue downstairs. The second floor had a smaller event space, and several offices—mine; one for Jamie, who did the winery's marketing and helped me with events; and a couple that weren't being used.

Shannon and Lawrence both had offices in the building next door, which had been the original winery. The Miles family home was also on the winery property, though only Lawrence and Shannon lived there now. Cooper lived in town with his friend Chase, and Leo lived in one of the small guest houses on the property. Brynn, the youngest and only girl in the Miles clan, was going to college about half an hour away out in Tilikum.

I went down the wide staircase and paused when I caught sight of Roland. He stood in the lobby, leaning against the front desk. True to form, he was dressed in slacks and a button-down shirt with the sleeves cuffed, showing his forearms. His dark hair was a bit different and his stubble a little thicker—it was a good look on him. He had his phone out, which was not at all surprising. The guy was always working.

His attractiveness annoyed me. Mostly because I didn't want to see him as sexy anymore. I wanted to be indifferent to him. To be unaffected. Maybe time would take care of that eventually, but it hadn't happened yet. The first thought that came to my mind was how good his arms looked with the sleeves of his shirt rolled up.

I rolled my eyes and continued downstairs. Fine, so Roland was attractive. Gorgeous, even. He was lean and muscular—I could tell he still worked out by the lines of his shoulders and chest. And those arms—god. Beautiful blue eyes. Thick dark hair. A few days' growth of stubble on his chiseled jaw.

It wasn't what was on the outside that was the problem. Never had been.

“Well, look who's here,” I said.

He looked up from his phone, a flicker of surprise crossing his features. “Oh, hi Zoe.”

We eyed each other for a moment.

“You have something on your shirt,” he said.

I stretched my shirt out and inspected it. He was right; there was a tan coffee splotch near the bottom. “Goddammit. I thought this one was clean.”

“Guess not,” he said. “How've you been?”

“Fine,” I said with a shrug. “Busy. You know, the usual. You?”

“Yeah, fine. Busy.” His phone buzzed in his hand and he looked at the screen. “Shit. I have to take this.”

I watched him walk outside, putting the phone to his ear. Heard his voice as he started to talk. Short, clipped words that I didn't process.

Well, that was anti-climactic.

With a scowl at no one in particular, I went back upstairs to my office. I guess I should have been glad I didn't have a contentious relationship with my ex. It was the same every time I saw him. A brief hello. Sometimes a few words, usually small talk. When our marriage had first ended, we'd had a few fights—mostly on the phone. But since then, there was just distance. A cool acceptance that this was how things were now.

It made me a bit sick to my stomach. I pulled at the hem of my shirt and rubbed my thumb across the coffee stain he'd noticed. Things felt awkward between us now, and I kind of hated it. There had been a time when Roland had been my best friend. The one I'd turned to when I was happy, or sad. The first person I told when I had good news. I'd once thought he was my soulmate. The person I was meant to spend the rest of my life with.

Now we were basically strangers.

How could that happen in just a few short years? We'd dated for three before getting married. And our ill-fated marriage had lasted another six. Almost a decade together, and what did it mean now?

Nothing to him, apparently.

That shouldn't have still hurt. After all, I was the one who'd left. I'd packed up my things and moved out. And I didn't regret my decision. Roland had cared about his career far more than he'd cared about me. I had become nothing more than an accessory. Someone to hang on his arm and look pretty at corporate events. When he hadn't needed me to play the part of the good wife in front of his colleagues, he'd barely remembered I existed. That had been no way to live.

I sighed and picked up my phone, flipping to my calendar. I had a client meeting in half an hour, so I needed to go home and change. It was one thing to run around in jeans and a dirty shirt when I was hauling twinkle lights and garlands out of storage, quite another when I was meeting with a client.

I'd simply have to push thoughts of Roland out of my mind. And hope he didn't stay in town long.

Roland

I ended the call—being away from the office was going to be such a pain in the ass—and put my phone back in my pocket. I wondered where Cooper had gone. Since arriving about fifteen minutes ago, I hadn't seen anyone else. I didn't expect to see Leo. He rarely came out of his cave. Cooper had met me when I first got to the Big House, but before I could ask where to find Mom and Dad—and what the hell was going on—he'd told me to wait and gone upstairs.

As soon as he'd come back, he'd rushed out the door again. A minute later, Zoe had appeared.

Seeing her had been fine. She'd been cordial, and so had I. No problem.

It had been weird to feel the urge to move closer and tuck a strand of hair behind her ear. Like an instinct I no longer needed but hadn't lost yet. And yeah, she looked good, even if she was wearing a stained shirt.

Of course, Zoe always looked good. She had blue eyes that contrasted with her brown hair. High cheekbones. Full lips. She cleaned up nice, when she tried. But there had always been something appealing about messy Zoe. That girl with careless hair and clothes that didn't match. Little tattoos on her wrists and a tiny stud in her nose.

I let out a breath and shook my head. No point in following that train of thought. It didn't matter how beautiful Zoe was. I wasn't here to see her, anyway.

Cooper reappeared. He was dressed in a faded Salishan Cellars t-shirt, worn-out jeans, and work boots. He adjusted his cheap sunglasses. "So, everything okay?"

I knew what he was really asking, but I wanted to ignore anything having to do with Zoe right now. "Other than the fact that I still have no idea what the fuck I'm doing here, yeah."

He nodded. “Cool. I don’t know what Leo’s doing. I guess we should go find Mom.”

“Is Dad around?” I asked.

“I think so,” Cooper said. “Haven’t seen him today, though.”

“Does he know I’m coming?”

“That’s a good question,” Cooper said.

I let out a sigh. Great. This should be fun.

We walked across to what was now known as the Little House. It had been the original winery until they built the Big House about ten years ago. Guests didn’t come here anymore, which was a good thing. The remodel had been half-finished for years. The former lobby was cluttered with construction materials, and big sheets of plastic covered one of the walls, which had been torn down to the studs.

I’d known when my dad had started work on the building that it was a bad idea. Mom had agreed, but Lawrence Miles had a tendency of doing what he wanted.

The second floor looked the same as it had last time I’d been here. Dad hadn’t done any demo up here, so the walls were intact. My mom, Shannon, was the head winemaker, so I wasn’t sure how much time she actually spent in her office, but that’s where we found her.

My mom had long dark hair streaked with silver and she always wore it in a ponytail. Fine lines around her eyes hinted that she was in her mid-fifties, but she didn’t look much older than forty. She was dressed in a plain black t-shirt and had a pair of dark-rimmed reading glasses perched on her nose.

“Hey, Mom,” Cooper said.

She looked up from her laptop and her eyes widened. “Roland?”

“Yeah, hi, Mom,” I said.

“Why didn’t you tell me you were coming?” she asked, setting her glasses down. She stood and walked over to wrap me in a hug. Her head only came up to my chest. I'd inherited my father's stature; Mom was tiny.

I glanced at Cooper and he shrugged. "It was last minute. Leo called me."

"Did he?"

"Yeah, he said something about the winery being in trouble?" I asked.

Mom sighed, and her shoulders slumped. Her skin was pale and I noticed faint circles beneath her eyes. "We've been having financial troubles for the last year. I think it's gotten worse, but you know how your father is."

I did know. He was tight-lipped and defensive. "Where is he? And where's Leo? I've texted him three times to tell him I'm here."

"I'm sure Leo's at home," Mom said.

That was probably true. He didn't come out unless he had to. But why wasn't he answering me?

"I can go check," Cooper said. I had a feeling he just wanted an excuse to go back outside. He didn't like being indoors.

"Look, I disrupted my entire week to come out here because Leo made it sound like there was an emergency," I said. "Was he messing with me, or are you really on the brink of losing the winery?"

Mom's mouth opened slightly, and Cooper made a strangled sound in his throat. "On the brink of... Leo said that?" she asked.

I brought out my phone and called Leo. He never answered, but I'd leave him a voicemail. I was sick of this already. It was the same old bullshit. No one talked to each other around here—at least not about anything important. They had no problem dissecting the details of my failed marriage over dinner, but sharing information about the family business? Not so much.

Leo's voicemail picked up. "Leo, where are you? I'm standing in Mom's office, she didn't know I was coming, and I have no idea where Dad is. Why am I—"

“Hey, Roland.”

I stopped mid-sentence at the sound of Leo’s voice behind me and ended the call. “I was just leaving you a message.”

“Sorry.”

Leo stood sideways, keeping the left side of his face and body tilted toward the hall outside Mom’s office. As a teenager, Leo had been a clean-cut, smooth-jawed football star. Now he wore a shaggy beard and long hair that draped over the sides of his face. He’d served in the Army, and during a tour in Afghanistan, he’d been caught in an explosion. He’d suffered burns down the entire left side of his body. He was lucky to be alive, but the scars were brutal.

He’d covered most of his left arm and leg with tattoos, but there wasn’t much he could do about his face. Even after several corrective surgeries, the lower part of his face was mangled on the left side.

“I’ll go find your dad,” Mom said. “I’ll meet you downstairs.”

I followed Leo and Cooper down to what had once been the main tasting room. Now it was set up like a farm-style version of a conference room. It had a long rustic table with matching chairs—probably all built by Ben, Salishan’s longtime groundskeeper and handyman. There were framed black and white pictures on one wall—vintage photos of my great-grandparents, who had founded the winery, and my grandparents, who had seen it grow from a tiny operation to something closer to what it was today.

My great-grandparents had bought the first plot of land and planted a vineyard, decades before most of the other wineries in this area had been built. They’d named it Salishan Cellars as a nod to the Native Americans who’d once lived here. Salishan was the name for the family of languages spoken in this region—languages that were almost extinct now.

Leo took a seat on one side of the table, at the end so he wouldn’t have anyone sitting on his left. Cooper paced, wandering up and down the length of the room. I sat, but checked my email while we waited for my parents. God, I had so much to do. I hoped I could get this wrapped up quickly.

My dad's heavy footsteps heralded his entrance. Lawrence Miles was always in a hurry. It didn't seem to matter what he was doing—working, walking through a theme park on a family vacation, or coming downstairs for breakfast—he moved at the same frenetic pace.

Mom came in behind him. Dad's hair was peppered with gray, and he was thicker in the middle than I remembered. He stopped when he spotted me.

“Roland.”

“Hi, Dad,” I said.

“What are you doing here?” His gaze moved around the room, pausing on each of us. I could see his defenses going up. He thought we were here to gang up on him.

I supposed we were, although I still didn't know exactly why.

“I called him,” Leo said. “I know the truth, Dad. I had to do something.”

Dad crossed his arms. “What are you talking about?”

Leo sighed. “The bank is going to foreclose on us.”

For the space of a heartbeat, there was silence. Then the room erupted with voices, everyone trying to talk at once. Dad barked at Leo, Mom yelled at Dad. Cooper shouted, but it was impossible to tell who he was yelling at. Leo stood and pointed at Dad, saying something I couldn't hear over all the noise.

I slammed my hand down on the table with a loud crack. “Shut the hell up, all of you!”

Amazingly, they all went silent.

“Everyone, sit down,” I said. “If you want to yell at each other, do it over the dinner table. This is a business. Let's act like it.”

Leo lowered himself back into his seat, and Cooper took the chair next to me. Mom sat, but Dad stood next to the table. I didn't bother pushing the issue. Had to pick my battles with Dad.

"Leo, why do you think the bank is ready to foreclose?" I asked.

"I went through Dad's office," he said.

"You what?" Dad asked, his voice filled with outrage.

I held up a hand. "Dad, hold on. Leo?"

"I talked to Chase recently," Leo said. Chase was Cooper's roommate and longtime best friend. He was also the mechanic who worked on the winery's machinery. "He didn't want to make it awkward for Coop, so he came to me. We owe him a lot of money. Apparently it's been months since we've paid him."

"What the shit?" Cooper asked.

"Watch your mouth, Cooper," Mom said.

"That's not the first time I've heard we weren't paying our bills," Leo said. "We all knew things were tight, but this is Chase. That's personal."

"Leo, you should have talked to Dad about it," Mom said.

"I did," Leo said. "He blew me off."

Cooper and Dad both started to talk, but I held up my hand again and glared at them both. "Wait."

"I was suspicious," Leo continued. "Like I said, I knew we were behind on other bills, too. I tried to ask where we stood, but..."

Leo trailed off, and I could guess what had happened. Dad had gotten angry, so Leo had dropped it—and apparently decided to find out the truth on his own.

"And the bank?" Mom asked.

"Threatening foreclosure," Leo said. "I don't have all the numbers, but we must owe a lot of money for it to have gone this far."

"Is that true?" Mom asked, turning to my dad.

“Yes, but I’m working on some things,” Dad said.

“How could you let it get this bad without telling me?” Mom asked.

It was a very good question. My brothers and I stayed quiet and waited to see if Dad would answer.

“I have it under control,” Dad said, grinding out the words through clenched teeth.

I forced myself to pause before I spoke. The younger me would have made a sarcastic remark, but it only would have sparked a pointless argument. I’d spent half my life arguing with my father. Right now, I didn’t need to be Roland the son, I needed to be Roland the businessman. The guy with solutions, who could make financial miracles happen. Because if the bank was threatening foreclosure, that’s what Salishan Cellars needed—a miracle.

“The first thing Salishan needs is stability,” I said. “Let me use my connections with the banks to take the edge off.”

“Roland—”

“Dad,” I said, cutting him off, my voice smooth and even, “you run things like usual while I stop the hemorrhaging. I can buy you some time.”

He cast a quick glance at Mom, then looked at me again and nodded.

“I’ll need a couple of days,” I said. “And I can take a look at the books to see what else I can do.”

“I don’t think so,” Dad said. “It’s one thing for you to call in a favor with the bank. It’s quite another to give you access to all our confidential financial information.”

“Lawrence,” Mom said, “he’s our son.”

“Our son who doesn’t work here,” Dad said.

Don’t react. This was business. I wasn’t going to let him make it personal. “I can put a bandage on the wound. But it’s only going to start bleeding again, and you’ll be right back here in six months.”

“Let him help,” Mom said. “We can’t lose this land, Lawrence. We can’t.”

I hated the fear in my mom’s voice. This place had been in her family for generations. Thankfully, my brothers held their tongues. If one of them started in again, they’d all wind up yelling, and we’d never get anywhere.

Come on, Dad. Do the right thing.

“Fine,” Dad said. “I’ll get you what you need tomorrow. I have too much to do this afternoon.”

I kept my face still despite the flare of annoyance. Tomorrow. That meant today was half wasted. “Okay.”

Dad’s eyes darted around to everyone again, and Leo met his gaze without flinching. I had to respect that. Standing up to our father had never been easy.

“I have to get going,” Dad said. Without another word, he walked out the door.

Leo got up and squeezed Mom’s shoulder before leaving. She touched his hand and thanked him. Cooper hugged her and kissed her forehead, then nodded to me.

Mom didn’t get up, so I waited while Cooper shut the door behind him.

“I can’t believe he didn’t tell me,” she said.

“He was hoping he could fix it and you wouldn’t have to know.” I didn’t particularly want to defend my dad, but that was probably the truth. “He doesn’t want you to worry about the business side of things.”

“I should worry about the business side of things,” she said. “I’ve always let him handle it, but I should be more involved.”

“Well, maybe now you can be,” I said. “This gives you a good reason.”

She nodded. “You can use one of the offices upstairs in the Big House while you’re here.”

“Sure, thanks.”

“Do you want to stay at the house with us?” she asked. “Or use one of the guest cottages?”

“I was just going to check into a hotel in town.”

She scowled at me. “Roland, you do not come home and stay at a hotel in town. Especially not when we have so many unused beds right here. You don’t have to stay at the house, but at least use the Hummingbird Cottage. It’s all made up and ready.”

That was my mom for you. I was thirty-one years old, and she was still trying to mother me. The winery grounds had several guest houses, all with corny names like Hummingbird Cottage. My grandmother had insisted every building have a name, and the guest houses were decorated inside to match. They’d been built for paying guests, but Salishan had gotten out of the overnight hospitality business years ago. Now they were used for family and other guests who came to visit.

I didn’t really want to stay on the property, but if it would make my mom happy...

“Hummingbirds it is,” I said.

She smiled and put her hand over mine. “Thank you for coming. I’m glad you’re here.”

I cleared my throat to suppress the flare of emotion that stole through my chest. “Don’t worry, Mom. You guys aren’t going to lose the winery. I won’t let that happen.”

Her eyes shimmered with tears, but she swallowed them back and sat up straighter. “No, we’re not. I won’t let it happen, either. Let me know what I can do to help. Even if it’s just running interference between you and your dad.”

I nodded. Keeping space between me and my dad would be better for everyone.

But I wouldn’t be here for long. I kissed my mom, then went out to grab my stuff and take it over to the guest house. I needed to get set up in that empty office. I had a shit-ton of work to do.

Roland

A week. I'd been here an entire fucking week. I hadn't spent this much time in Echo Creek since I was married to Zoe.

God, why did I choose her as my metric? It couldn't have been since I lived here, or since college? I had to measure things in terms of my ex?

I didn't know why she was on my mind. I'd barely seen her.

Since I'd convinced Dad to let me dig in and help with the finances, I'd been spending most of my time in what Cooper was now calling Roland's office. I reminded him daily that it wasn't my office. I had an office, in a high-rise building in downtown San Francisco. With a great fucking view. And an assistant sitting at a desk outside my door who had been madly rearranging my schedule as my quick trip home stretched out indefinitely.

I was still doing my actual job, just from here. All I needed was wifi, and thanks to Leo, the internet here was reliable. But between conference calls, answering emails, and basically trying not to sabotage my career, I was buried in the disaster that was Salishan Cellars.

And Zoe? I didn't know where she was most of the time. I could hear her come and go. Her office was two doors down from where I was sitting. But when she was in there, she kept the door closed. And the rest of the time, she was out and about, doing her thing. Always busy.

Or maybe avoiding me.

I needed to quit thinking about her.

My phone buzzed, vibrating against the table. I pushed my laptop aside and checked. My brother.

Cooper: Stop working. Come drink.

Me: Thanks, I'm good.

Cooper: Not acceptable. Get your ass down here.

Me: Where?

Cooper: Mountainside Tavern

I stared at my phone, waffling between telling him no, and sucking it up and going down there. I had a lot of work to do, but if I didn't, he'd probably keep bugging me.

And there was a small part of me that was glad for the invite. Glad to be included, like I still belonged here.

Me: Fine.

I saved the files I'd been working on and closed my laptop. The time caught my eye. Was it really after ten? I hadn't realized it was so late. I guess I'd done enough for one day.

Cooper was indeed at Mountainside, in a booth with Chase. The winery had a serious cash flow problem, but I'd made sure Chase had been paid about a third of what they owed him. We'd get him the rest, it would just take a little time. But like Leo had said, this was Chase. It was personal.

Coop raised his beer to me, then glanced over his shoulder and waved to get the bartender's attention. "Good man. Come. Sit. Order a beer. Take a load off."

I took a seat across from Chase. His dark hair was slicked back, like he'd been wearing a baseball cap all day. Even though he was eight years out of high school and no longer playing school sports, he hadn't gone the way of a lot of the guys around here, who had beer guts before they were thirty. Like Cooper, Chase kept in good shape.

"Thanks again," Chase said. "For helping get shit under control."

"Yeah, no problem," I said. The bartender came to the table and I ordered a Mack and Jack's African Amber. "We'll get things squared away with you as soon as we can."

"This whole thing still pisses me off," Cooper said. "I was basically stiffing you. Such bullshit."

“It’s not like you sign the checks,” Chase said. “Are things really as bad as people are saying?”

“What people?” I asked.

Chase shrugged. “Word around town is that Salishan is pretty much screwed. On the brink of closing.”

“Hell no,” Cooper said. “The fucking bank will have to haul my cold dead corpse off that land before I’ll leave it.”

It was weird, but I realized the vehemence in Cooper’s voice wasn’t for show. He wasn’t exaggerating. I had a sudden vision of him standing at the entrance to the property with a double-barreled shotgun in his hands, guarding the family land. In some ways, Cooper had been born in the wrong era. He should have been a homesteader back in the Wild West.

“It’s not going to come to that,” I said.

“Don’t listen to those assholes, anyway,” Chase said. “Gossipy bitches.”

Things were bad. That was true enough. And after a week of trying to get a handle on things, I still didn’t know what they needed to do about it.

“No Leo tonight?” I asked.

Chase paused, his beer partway to his mouth, and Cooper cleared his throat.

“Uh, no,” Cooper said. “Leo doesn’t leave the property.”

He said that like I was an idiot for not knowing.

“He doesn’t go anywhere?”

“Nope,” Cooper said. “Hasn’t left once since he came home.”

“How is that possible?” I asked. “He’s been home for three years, hasn’t he?”

“Yeah, and he hasn’t left the property in three years,” Cooper said.

I could tell Cooper was getting annoyed with me, but this was freaking me out. “That can’t be right. How does he get groceries, or go to the doctor? How did he get all his ink done?"

"He orders shit online," Cooper said. "And has people come to him. I'm telling you, Leo hasn't set one foot off Salishan land since he came home."

How did I not know that? "Shit," I said.

Chase's eyes widened, and he grabbed a baseball cap from the seat next to him, then shoved it on his head and pulled the brim low.

Cooper snort-laughed. "Dude, isn't that Shelly?"

"Shut the fuck up," Chase hissed.

"Wait, did you hit that?" Cooper asked. "When?"

Chase scowled. "A few weeks ago."

I glanced over at the bar. A pretty blonde wearing an off-the-shoulder red shirt and skin-tight jeans stood chatting with the bartender.

"She's cute," I said. "What's the problem?"

Chase hunkered down lower in the booth. "Nothing. It would just be better if she doesn't see me."

"So you're saying you don't want me to get her attention?" Cooper asked.

"You wouldn't dare," Chase said.

Cooper snickered.

"Look, I hooked up with her a few times, and it was cool," Chase said. "But I'm not into the whole relationship thing, so I called it off. She wasn't thrilled about that."

"We should see if she'll throw a drink in his face," Cooper said.

"Fuck you, dick," Chase said. "I just don't want to hurt her feelings or whatever."

"Admirable," Cooper said. "I'll let it stand."

The girl in red—Shelly, apparently—walked past our booth. Chase twisted in his seat and pretended like he'd dropped something. I couldn't help but laugh. Cooper and Chase had been like this since we were all kids. Always giving each other shit. Now they had well-earned reputations as Echo Creek's resident playboys. I kept wondering when they'd outgrow it, but they both seemed happy to keep living the single life. Maybe they just hadn't found the right girls to settle them down.

Movement caught my attention from the corner of my eye, and I glanced over. There was a couple sitting at the bar who hadn't been there a moment ago. I didn't know the guy, but I did a doubletake when I saw the girl. Was that Zoe?

"What's up?" Cooper asked. He leaned over me to look, then muttered oh shit under his breath. "Sorry, man. I didn't know she'd be here."

"It's fine," I said.

Chase raised his eyebrows at Cooper.

"Knock it off, assholes," I said. "I've seen her around a bunch of times. It's not a big deal."

I had seen her around, and it hadn't been a big deal. But it had just been her. Now she was with some guy? Who the fuck was he? Not that I gave a shit who she was with. I had no right to care.

But seriously, who was he?

"That's Van." Cooper said.

Ah, hell, was it that obvious what I'd been thinking? "What?"

Cooper nodded toward the bar. "The guy with Zoe. His name is Van."

What the fuck kind of name was Van? "I didn't ask."

"Yeah, but you wanted to know," Cooper said.

"I just didn't know Zoe was dating anyone," I said, trying to sound casual. Because I was. I didn't care.

“She’s not really dating him,” Cooper said. “He’s just her boycycle.”

“Boycycle?” I asked.

“You know,” Cooper said. “They’re friends, but she takes him for a ride once in a while.”

That was weird. It didn’t sound like Zoe.

Chase laughed. “That’s not a thing. You made that up.”

“It’s definitely a thing,” Cooper said.

“If that’s a thing, I’m down to be someone’s boycycle.” Chase took another drink, then set his beer down. “Especially if she’s as hot as Zoe.”

“Knock it off, asshole,” Cooper said. “Zoe’s off limits.”

“I know,” Chase said. “I said as hot as Zoe. I didn’t say Zoe. Even you have to admit, Zoe is hot as fuck.”

“No shit,” Cooper said, and I shot him a glare. “What? It’s just the truth. Any man can see she’s hot.”

“I bet your spank bank is full of Zoe pics,” Chase said. “Do you take them at work when she isn’t looking?”

I leveled Chase with a stare. I was two seconds from hauling him outside and beating the shit out of him. Not that he couldn’t give me a run for my money. But I was mad enough, I didn’t fucking care.

“Chase, no,” Cooper said, shaking his head.

“Too far?” Chase asked.

“Definitely too far,” Cooper said.

I picked up my beer and took a long pull, deciding to ignore Chase, and willing myself to not look in Zoe’s direction. What the fuck did I care if she had a boyfriend? We’d been divorced for years. I’d moved on. I’d been dating Farrah for almost a year. She’d moved on, too. Perfectly normal.

But I was still fuming inside.

Cooper and Chase started talking about something else, but I was only half listening. Had Zoe noticed I was here? Was she going to come over and say hi? Oh god, was she going to introduce me to her douchebag boyfriend?

It made me think about what it would be like to bring Farrah out here. Introduce her to my family. Show her the winery. What would happen when I introduced her to Zoe?

I could picture it. It would be awkward, but Zoe would be friendly. Hell, she'd probably even be happy for me. So why did a sick feeling spread in the pit of my stomach at the thought of introducing Farrah to my ex-wife?

I pulled out my phone and checked my messages. I'd texted Farrah to let her know I'd be out of town for a few days, but I couldn't remember if she'd replied. She hadn't. That wasn't too surprising. She was busy, and about the most low-maintenance woman I'd ever known. She didn't need to talk to me all the time—didn't need constant reassurance. We often went a week or more without speaking, but it was because we were both busy. She was as career-driven and focused as I was. It was why we worked.

For a second, I thought about texting her again to see if she was back in town. But I didn't know how long I'd be out here, so I didn't bother. I'd see her when I got back to San Francisco.

Which had to be soon. I couldn't be away from the office for too much longer. But there was still so much shit to do here. The winery's financial records were a mess. I was still trying to sort out who they owed money to, and the list kept growing.

"Quit thinking about work," Cooper said.

I blinked. "What?"

"You're babysitting your beer and thinking about work," Cooper said. "Lighten up. When did you turn into such a suit?"

"Whatever, farm boy," I said.

"Your insult game is a disgrace," Cooper said. "Seriously, I thought I raised you better than that. We need to get something other than half a beer in you, or I'm going to throw your ass out."

Cooper got up and went to the bar. He elbowed Zoe, and she punched him in the arm. While Cooper talked to the bartender—rubbing his arm where she'd hit him—Zoe glanced toward our booth. Our eyes met, and she nodded before turning back to whatever-the-fuck his name was.

And that was it. We were just two people who used to know each other. Nothing more.

Cooper brought back three shots of whiskey and slid them onto the table. I grabbed one and swallowed it, then snatched Cooper's before he could drink it. Downed that one, too.

Suddenly, I didn't want to be quite so sober anymore.

Zoe

It's not an ultimatum. It's too late for that. I made a choice.

~Text from Zoe, four years ago

Roland's presence in the bar made my back prickle. I faced forward on the stool, like drinking this beer was the most important thing I had going on tonight.

I was going to have Cooper's ass for this. It was bad enough that Roland was still here after a week—spending his days in an office two doors down from mine. Now he had to show up at my bar? With my friends?

Hell no, Cooper. Hell no.

Of course, I wouldn't ask Coop to choose between me and his own brother. But still. Did they have to come here?

Sitting here with Van, in front of Roland, felt oddly shitty. I couldn't sit still—constantly shifted on my stool, like I was doing something wrong.

Obviously, I wasn't. I'd bumped into Van at the store earlier, and he'd asked if I wanted to grab a beer. I didn't have other plans, so I figured, why not? It was just a beer. The fact that Van and I went to the bedroom rodeo sometimes didn't have anything to do with... well, anything. It certainly had nothing to do with Roland.

"You okay?" Van asked.

"Yeah," I said. "Sorry, I guess I'm just worn out. It's been a long week, and it's not even Friday yet."

"That sucks," he said.

It had been a long week, and not just because Roland was here. It felt like my to-do list was longer at the end of each day than at the beginning—like I added twice the number of things

I checked off. Plus, I'd had a vendor flake out on me, and a bridezilla bitch me out on the phone earlier.

I sipped my beer and listened to Van for a while, giving short replies so I wasn't being a total asshole to him. Van was a cool guy. He was fun to hang out with, at least.

He'd never been married, and never wanted to be. Didn't want a family. Liked his life the way it was. Despite my divorce, I was open to the possibility of trying again. In fact, I wanted that. I wanted to find the right man. Get married. Do it right this time. Van didn't, and he'd told me that when we'd met.

I'd appreciated his honesty and returned it. Said I liked him, but I didn't see us having a future together—and that I did want a future with someone.

We'd reached an understanding. Which in practice meant we hung out sometimes, and usually wound up in bed.

It worked. We had fun together, and a casual sexual relationship was fine. I'd dated a couple of men before Van, and they'd been cool guys, too. But those relationships hadn't gone anywhere. We'd had some fun, but there hadn't been a future in it for me, and I'd known it. I hadn't wanted to lead them on, so I'd ended things.

Which brought me back to sitting in a bar with Van, my ex-husband in a booth behind me.

"You seem out of it," Van said. He reached over and rubbed a few circles across my back. "You sure you're all right?"

"I'm sorry, was I not listening?"

He smiled. "Not really. You wanna get out of here?"

That meant, do you want to go somewhere and have sex? Usually, I would have said yes. A nice fuck was a good way to de-stress. But the thought of sleeping with Van left me with a weird feeling in my tummy. Not a happy let's go have an orgasm feeling. A shitty you'll regret it if you do feeling.

"I think I'm just going to call it an early night," I said. "Go home and get some sleep."

He hesitated, his hand still on my back, and I wondered if he was going to push.

“All right,” he said, dropping his hand. He gestured to my beer. “Do you want another, or are you done?”

“I’m done.”

He motioned for the bartender.

“You don’t have to buy my drink,” I said.

“It’s cool,” he said. “I think you got mine last time.”

That was probably true. We tended to alternate picking up the tab, more or less.

“Thanks.”

I put on my coat while he settled with the bartender. Roland was still in the booth with Cooper and Chase. They had a line of shot glasses in the middle of the table, and Roland had his buzzed face on. Eyelids a little droopy. Mouth relaxed with a hint of a smile.

For a second, I thought about going over to talk to them. It shouldn’t be a big deal. It was no secret I was good friends with Cooper. I hung out with him and Chase all the time.

And Roland was fun when he was buzzed. Or he had been, when we were younger. But thinking about drinking with Roland led to thinking about what we’d always done after drinking.

Sex. Lots of sex.

Crazy, freaky, out-of-control monkey sex.

And suddenly my fun zone was all lit up, like the memory of some drunken sexual encounters had flipped my arousal switch past on and straight to overdrive.

Okay, so calling them drunken sexual encounters was selling the whole thing short. Way short. Trashed or sober, Roland and I had been hot enough to melt steel.

I should have been able to admit that now—think about it and acknowledge it for what it was—without soaking my fucking panties. Jesus.

Shooting a glare at Cooper for bringing Roland here, I pulled my hair out from the collar of my coat. I had a very uncomfortable throbbing between my legs, and it was all Roland's fault. He was throwing me off, making everything feel awkward. I should be dragging Van to his place—he lived closer—for a tension-relieving orgasm.

But all I could think about was how Roland's orgasms hadn't just been tension-relieving. They'd been fucking mind-blowing.

I shoved my hands in my coat pockets and followed Van to the door. Why was I letting Roland cockblock me like this? It wasn't like he cared. There was no ring on my finger. Those divorce papers were signed, sealed, and recorded. I could sleep with Van if I wanted to. I wasn't hurting anyone.

Just before leaving, I glanced over my shoulder. Roland was turned in his seat, looking right at me. Watching me leave the bar with another man.

The back of my throat burned, and I was a little worried I might vomit all over the sidewalk. How would I explain that? I'd puked on this sidewalk before, but only when I'd been stupid enough to do shots with Cooper and Chase. Or that one time when I'd been here with some girlfriends and we'd had all those margaritas. Tonight I'd had one beer, and I hadn't even finished it.

The cool air outside helped, but I was still all knotted up inside. Frustrated. Annoyed. Stupid cockblocking ex-husband. Stupid hot sex memories. Stupid raging hormones.

I said goodbye to Van—he still looked hopeful until I pulled out my keys—and drove home. I was cranky and uncomfortable, wondering what the hell was wrong with me.

* * *

Morning came all too soon, and I was not in the best mood. I hadn't slept well. Despite resorting to my battery-operated boyfriend, the self-indulgence hadn't been very satisfying. My mind kept wanting to show me scenes from my sordid sexual history with Roland. I didn't want to fantasize about my ex-husband in order to get off. It was weird and frustrating. I hadn't fantasized about him once since our relationship had ended—at least, not about having sex with him. I'd pictured hitting him over the head with something solid a few times, but not sex. But last night? Every image in my head had become him.

Something was very wrong with me.

I rooted around on my desk, looking for a pen. I really needed to spend some time cleaning this thing off, but it never seemed to make it to the top of my priority list. I found one—purple, not blue or black, but it would do—and proceeded to look for the notepad I'd had in my hand two seconds ago.

“Morning.”

I glanced up at Roland's voice, staunchly ignoring the way my heart skipped at the sight of him. He stood in the hall outside my half-open door, dressed in a button-down shirt and slacks. His hands were in his pockets, and he shifted closer.

“Hi,” I said.

“I'm surprised you're here already.”

I looked over at my computer screen, checking the time. It was eight-thirty. I was here by eight most mornings, although my schedule varied on days I had an event to manage.

“Why?” I asked. “I'm usually here at this time.”

He lifted one shoulder in a slight shrug. “You were out drinking last night.”

“Out drinking?” I asked. What was he talking about? I’d arrived at the bar after him and left before he did. “I had a beer. That wasn’t really out drinking. You were the one doing shots with the goofball boys.”

He winced a little, and I noticed he did look a little rough this morning. Not enough that most people would be able to tell, but I knew him. He needed a glass of ice water, a black coffee, and a greasy breakfast. In that order.

“Yeah, we had a few drinks,” he said. “But I went home alone and got a full night’s sleep.”

I spotted my notepad and opened it, flipping to a blank page so I could jot down a few things. I was about to reply with So did I, when I realized what he’d just said. I went home alone and got a full night’s sleep.

Was he giving me shit about leaving the bar with Van?

He still had his hands in his pockets, but there was fire in his eyes. He was giving me shit about Van. That was rich. I was sure he hadn’t been celibate since we’d broken up.

For a second, I thought about lying to him. Making some comment about being tired after a trip to pound-town last night. What can I say, I’m only human. But I didn’t.

“Yeah, I did too.”

“You... oh,” he said. “You went home alone?”

“Not that it’s any of your business, but yes, I went home alone. Went to bed.” Didn’t sleep because you cockblocked me out of a perfectly decent orgasm.

He shifted his feet and his shoulders slumped—just a tiny movement, but I could tell I’d deflated whatever fight he’d been hoping to pick with me.

“I wasn’t trying to get in your business,” he said. “I just saw you leave the bar with...”

“Van,” I said.

His lip twitched in a hint of a smile. “Van? What kind of a name is that?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “What’s your girlfriend’s name?”

His face froze. I had no idea if he had a girlfriend—I didn’t really want to know—but judging by his expression, he did.

He cleared his throat. “Farrah.”

A hot spark of anger flared to life in the pit of my stomach. He’d stopped by my office at eight-fucking-thirty to give me a hard time about leaving a bar with another man, and he had a girlfriend? I could look past it if he’d just been pumping me for information—looking to satisfy his curiosity about my relationship status. But he’d been with Cooper and Chase last night. They would have filled him in.

“You can quit with the passive aggressive thing,” I said. “If you’d like to say something about my personal life or who I spend time with, just come out and say it.”

“I don’t have anything to say about your personal life,” he said.

“Right.” I stood up and slipped my phone in my back pocket. “That’s why you’ve been here for over a week and the first time you talk to me is after you see me leave a bar with someone.”

He opened his mouth like he was going to argue, but closed it and looked away. “I’ve talked to you. I’ve just been busy. So have you.”

Of course he had. Roland was always busy. It was still a lame excuse. But I didn’t want to argue with him.

“Yeah, I have been,” I said. “I’m sure you are, too.”

He nodded, meeting my eyes. For a heartbeat, my irritation at him melted away, and I just saw him. Roland. With his thick hair and sexy stubble. The guy I used to know.

The guy I used to be really fucking in love with.

“You have something on your shirt again,” he said.

I blinked and looked down. There was a tan splotch on my shirt, right across my left boob. “Fuck. This is a nice shirt, too.”

Roland grinned, and I shot him a glare. I was back to being annoyed. “Speaking of busy, I have a lot to do, so...”

His expression fell, his smile quickly replaced by his usual serious-and-distracted look. “Yeah, me too.”

He walked away, and I rolled my eyes. The nerve of that guy. God, why was he still here?

And once again, I needed a new damn shirt.

Roland

I went down the hallway to my office. No, wait... it wasn't my office. It was an office I was using. Temporarily.

Although I'd managed to buy some time with the bank, the winery's books were a mess. My dad was good at some things, but he'd started doing a lot of the accounting himself a few years back. He probably thought he could save money if their accountant had less to do, but the result was a fucking nightmare to deal with.

I wanted to consolidate their debt and lower their monthly overhead. Should have been easy, but with my dad's haphazard records, it was proving to be a lot of work. Plus, I still had my own job to do.

Zoe's door closed as I sat down at the desk. No doubt she'd closed it to keep me from bugging her. I didn't know what had possessed me to stop and talk to her. She was right, I hadn't tried to make conversation since I'd been here. Nothing more than a quick hi if I happened to see her, more out of politeness than anything.

But the image of her walking out of the bar with that guy was burned into my memory. Like a bad dream I couldn't shake, hours after waking up.

I knew I had no right to be bothered by it. But really, that guy? He had prick written all over him. And Cooper had said he wasn't even her boyfriend, just a guy she hooked up with sometimes. I didn't get it. Zoe wasn't the kind of girl to be some douchebag's fuck buddy. In fact, it would have bothered me less to see her with an actual boyfriend. At least that would have been good for her. Why was she wasting her time with someone who didn't give a shit about her?

My phone rang, and I was surprised to see Farrah's name on the screen. I still hadn't talked to her since I'd left San Francisco.

“Hey,” I said. “Are you back in town?”

“Yeah,” she said. “Got in late last night. Are you in the office today?”

“No, I’m still in Echo Creek,” I said.

There was a muffled sound, like she was talking to someone else. She must have been in her office. “You’re where?”

“Echo Creek, Washington,” I said. “You know, the family winery. My brother called. They’re having financial trouble. I texted you.”

“Oh,” she said. “When will you be back?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “I should have been back by now, but things are taking longer to sort out than I thought.”

More muffled talking. “Okay. No, put that on my desk, and yes reschedule my three o’clock. Sorry, I’m trying to get caught up. I lost yesterday to flight delays. I’m buried.”

Farrah’s schedule was always hectic. It was a toss-up which one of us spent more time at the office. “Yeah, it’s fine. How long are you in town?”

“Let me check.” She paused for a second. “I’m here until Wednesday morning, then I’m in New York for a week. After that I’m going straight to London.”

Damn. With all the work I still had to do here, I wouldn’t be back before she left again.

“What do you think about flying out here for a few days?” I asked. “I’m staying in one of the guest cottages. It’s kind of like being at a bed and breakfast. And obviously there’s no shortage of wine.”

“This weekend?” she asked. “God, Roland, you know I can’t do that. I’m too busy to take time off right now.”

I was hit by a surprising sting of disappointment. “Yeah, I know you’re busy. Things are just stressful out here. My dad has this place swimming in debt. The bank was—”

“Roland, hold on.”

I stopped mid-sentence and waited while I heard more muffled talking on her end.

“Sorry,” she said. “Why don’t you fly home for the weekend? We could at least do dinner.”

A quick trip home wasn’t a bad idea. I’d lose the travel time, which wasn’t ideal. If I could spend those hours dealing with the winery shit, I’d be able to go home for good that much sooner. But who knew when Farrah and I would have a chance to see each other again.

And maybe a couple of days away from this place would help me get my head back on straight. Spend a night in my own bed—or hers—to press the reset button. Then I could come back next week and finish up. Put a plan together for my dad and leave it at that.

“Yeah, I’ll see if I can get a flight tomorrow,” I said. “Can you do a late dinner? I’m not sure when I’ll get in.”

“Late is fine,” she said.

“Okay, I’ll see you then.”

She ended the call halfway through her hurried goodbye.

I tossed my phone on the desk, feeling oddly unsettled. Going home for a couple of days was fine. But it would have been nice if Farrah had been willing to give up some time for me. Was it just her schedule that led her to say no to coming out here, or did she not want the pressure of meeting my family? Although, I’d never met hers. Truthfully, I didn’t know much about them.

But I was probably being unreasonable. I’d started dating Farrah because we had similar lifestyles. That was why it worked. It wasn’t fair for me to suddenly expect her to be different just because I was dealing with family stuff.

I sent Danielle a text so she could book my flights and make a dinner reservation. I’d go home for a couple of days, spend a night with Farrah, and everything would be fine.

I glanced at the time. I'd come over to the office in the Big House early to get a few things done before I had to leave to catch my flight. I still had some time, but I wanted to get in a run before I left. Working as much as I did, I spent a lot of time at my desk. Getting in my workouts, no matter where I was, had to be a priority.

A low hum of noise downstairs greeted me as soon as I opened the office door. I wondered if it was a wedding, or something else. The winery's events schedule was booked solid, which was good for cash flow. They already had weddings scheduled well into next year. I had to give it to Zoe, she did a damn good job.

I went downstairs and when I got to the front, I held the door open for a guest. Right behind her came Zoe—a very frazzled Zoe.

Her hair was curled in soft waves, and her blouse was neatly tucked into her slacks. It wasn't her appearance that was disheveled, although a strand of hair fell across her forehead, and she aggressively swiped it away. It was her eyes. I could see the strain behind them. She was about to lose her shit.

She paused just inside the door, blinking at me like it had taken her a second to realize who she was looking at.

"Thanks," she said.

"Sure," I said. "Are you okay?"

She let out a long breath and glanced around the lobby. "Yes... No. This day is a fucking disaster."

"What's going on?" I asked. "Difficult bride?"

"No, it's not a wedding," she said. "Corporate retreat. But the caterer completely screwed me over. They brought the wrong food, which is bad enough. But I have seventeen vegans with nothing to eat because everything contains animal products, even the salad that was not supposed to have goat cheese. And we ran out of the salad because it was all the twenty-four vegetarians had to eat. They forgot the bread, Roland. What kind of caterer forgets the bread? It's a good thing we're a fucking winery. If everyone in there wasn't rocking a wine buzz, I'd have a goddamn riot on my hands."

"What about the stuff from our kitchen?" I asked. The tasting rooms served food, but the winery always worked with outside caterers for larger events.

"Well, the kitchen would be better stocked if the last delivery hadn't been delayed due to some issue with our account," she said. "But it wouldn't have been enough anyway."

I had to stop myself from groaning. An issue with the account probably meant yet another vendor that hadn't been paid.

"Look, I'd love to stand here and fill you in on how extraordinarily shitty my day is, but I have to go figure out how to salvage this." She turned and started toward the back.

"Wait, Zoe."

She paused and glanced over her shoulder.

I pulled out my phone and glanced at the time. I could spare an hour if I skipped my run. "Would it help if I went to the store? If you text me a list, I can get whatever you need to fill in the gaps."

"Um..." She walked back toward me, slowly, like she was uncertain. "Yeah, actually that would help a lot."

"Okay." I held up my phone. "Text me while I'm en route."

"Right... I don't have your number," she said.

"It's the same."

She pulled out her phone. "Yeah, well, I deleted it. Can I have it again?"

Why did hearing her say she'd deleted my number feel like a kick in the balls? I couldn't remember the last time we'd texted or talked on the phone. She didn't have a reason to keep my number. But it still bothered me.

I cleared my throat, trying to get rid of the feeling, and gave her my number.

"Thanks," she said. "I have to go make sure my client isn't planning to have me killed, but I'll text you in a minute."

I watched her hurry down the hall, then went out to my car and drove to the store. Her text came through just as I was pulling into the parking lot. Then another. And another. She'd sent me a long fucking list.

It took me a little while to find everything she needed. The lady at the bakery next door saved my ass—or Zoe's ass, at least. I explained the situation and she quickly packaged up enough bread to feed an army.

I texted Zoe to let her know I was on my way back. In addition to the bread, my car was full of cheeses, fruits and vegetables, a variety of butters and spreads, olives that had cost as much as a good steak, and three more bags of stuff I'd never even heard of.

She met me outside and we quickly unloaded through the side entrance into the kitchen. I went out to get the last of the bread. When I came back in, she was at the sink washing her hands, an apron tied around her waist.

"Can you slice?" she asked.

I glanced at the time. I'd be cutting it close if I didn't leave soon, but I could at least help Zoe slice bread. "Yeah, sure."

"Awesome." She tossed me an apron and nodded toward the sink. "Wash your hands. You remember where everything is?"

"I'll figure it out."

I washed up and put on the apron, then got to work on the bread. She pulled out bread boards and I lined up the slices in neat rows. I didn't know where the caterer had gone, but it was just the two of us in the big kitchen. Maybe she'd fired them while I was out.

By some sort of Zoe-magic, she turned the stuff I'd brought into platters of tidy finger food. She had me run upstairs to her office for note cards and a pen, which she used to label everything with vegan or vegetarian, and listed the ingredients.

"This is a start," she said, stepping back to eye our—well, mostly her—handiwork. "They'll go through this in about ten minutes, but better to tide them over. Then I can get another round of food going. Let's get this out there before they all die of starvation."

I hesitated, checking the time again. If I didn't leave now, I was going to miss my flight.

But I was looking at a two-hour drive just to get to the airport. Then ninety minutes of waiting, and a two-hour flight home. My return flight was tomorrow afternoon. I'd be in San Francisco for less than twenty-four hours. Then all the travel time to get back here. It would be nice to see Farrah, but that was a lot of travel for one dinner.

It wasn't really about Zoe. Now that I was looking at the timing, it just didn't make sense for me to go.

"Yeah, give me a second." I sent Farrah a text, letting her know I had to cancel. She traveled all the time, so I knew she'd understand. And we were both so busy, canceled plans were nothing new for us.

I grabbed two trays of food and followed Zoe. It reminded me of when I was a kid and my parents would rope me into helping when they were short-staffed. I'd learned how to serve wine before I'd learned to drive.

Her corporate crowd—I would have bet a thousand dollars they were a PR and marketing firm—applauded when we came in. She gave a little bow, playing it up. The mood in the room seemed considerably lighter as people dished up; food had a tendency to do that. I noticed a woman who looked like she might be in charge pull Zoe aside to thank her.

I stayed to help. We prepped, then brought out more food and wine. When she was satisfied that her clients had everything they needed, we wandered back to the kitchen. The hum of conversation in the event room faded behind us.

We put a few things away, wrapping up the excess food and moving the dirty dishes to the sink. With her clients appeased, there was no rush. Things felt relaxed. Comfortable.

She leaned against a counter, a rag in her hands. “So... what have you been working on, all shut away in that office?”

“Going through Salishan’s finances,” I said. “I have a handle on some of it, but it’s taking time to get everything under control.”

“Cooper said the bank was threatening foreclosure.”

There was a slight hitch in her voice. She’d been worrying. “That was before I got here. They’re not going to foreclose.”

“That’s good to hear,” she said. “I know it’s not really my business, but I’d hate to see anything happen to this place.”

“Yeah, of course. I would too. I’ll get them back on track.” I rested my elbow on the counter. “It’s been frustrating, though. I’ve been going through their records and I keep wondering what the hell my dad was thinking.”

She shrugged, and I caught a slight eye roll. “Well, you aren’t the only one who wonders that.”

“It’s like he’s been investing in the wrong things,” I said. “After they built the Big House, they should have focused on saving for more capital investments. Equipment doesn’t last forever, and they have no plan for investing in new technologies. Everything is haphazard.”

“Yeah,” she said. “And there’s so much more competition these days. All these semi-retired people buying land and starting wineries. Even I remember when we were one of just a handful of wine producers around here. Now there are dozens.”

“Exactly,” I said. “They need to be able to adjust for that. Differentiate themselves in the marketplace. But that requires organization and planning. I don’t know what the fuck my dad’s been doing all these years.”

“I shouldn’t talk shit about your dad, but I don’t know what the fuck he’s been doing either,” she said with a little grin. “I don’t envy you the task of dealing with him.”

I shook my head. “Yeah, he’s... challenging. He always was.”

“He’s certainly no picnic,” she said. “You know, once last year I had to kick him out of the Big House because he was making a scene in front of guests.”

“No shit?”

“Yeah,” she said. “I can laugh about it now, but it wasn’t funny at the time. He lost his temper about something and went off on the tasting room staff. I had a brunch in the other room and we could hear him yelling. I pulled him outside and told him to stop being a jackass in front of our guests.”

I raised my eyebrows. I wasn’t surprised Zoe had stood up to my father like that—she was feisty—but it couldn’t have been pleasant. “What did he do?”

She shrugged. “He was angry with me, but he walked away. He knew I was right, but it wasn’t like he was going to admit it.”

“No, I don’t think I’ve ever heard him admit he was wrong.”

“Not exactly his best quality,” she said. “I hope fixing all this stuff isn’t giving you too many headaches.”

“I’ll be all right.”

“Yeah, you will.” She put the rag on the counter. “I’m going to go check on things in the other room. They should be winding down.”

“Sure.”

Pausing for a second, I watched her go. It was nice to talk to someone about what I was doing here. I had a lot on my mind lately, and it was good to get some of it off my chest. Share my frustrations with someone who understood. Someone who cared.

I followed her out to see if she needed help wrapping up. The guests were all staying at the hotel next door—which was good because it looked like barely a quarter of them were in any shape to drive. They left in small groups until finally the room was empty.

I brought an empty platter back to the kitchen, but I didn't see Zoe. The side door was open a crack, and I peeked outside.

She stood with her back against the building, a plastic cup dangling from her fingers.

"Looks like you pulled it off." I went out to stand beside her.

"Oh my god, what a day. I'm just glad it's over." She took a sip. "Thanks for your help, by the way."

"No problem," I said. "So let me guess. Tonight's agenda includes a hot bath and a stiff drink?"

"I already have the drink covered." She held out her cup, offering it to me.

I took it from her—whiskey—and enjoyed the burn as it went down my throat. I handed it back, and for a second our eyes met. Spending the afternoon with her had been fine. Pleasant, even. But standing with her here, in the cool evening air, I was hit with a potent mix of resentment and longing. A part of me wanted to pick a fight with her, while another part...

Another part wanted something else entirely.

That was messed up. I shouldn't be thinking about Zoe like that.

As if she could read my mind, she shifted away from me. Stood straight and tucked her hair behind her ear. "I need to finish up so I can go home."

"Do you need any more help?" I asked, knowing the best thing for me would be to walk away, not stay with her longer.

"No, I've got it." She met my eyes again. "Thanks. I'll see you around."

"Yeah."

She went in through the side door, and despite the piece of me that wanted to follow, I let her go.

Zoe

Sunday, I only had a small wedding to contend with. The ceremony and brunch reception went off without a hitch—catering included. It was a relief after Saturday’s shit show. My client had been understanding, but it sucked, having an event go south so badly. I was certainly never using that caterer again.

Thankfully Roland had jumped in to help. I’d been trying to find Shannon—or hell, even Cooper—to see if they’d run to the store for me. But neither of them had been around.

When Roland had offered, I’d almost said no. Because Roland. But it would have been stupid to refuse the help when I’d really needed it. And he’d come through for me like a champ. He’d even been nice to me.

I was off Monday and Tuesday, and I didn’t leave my house. It was glorious. Cooper texted to see if I wanted to catch a movie, but that would have required putting on pants. And a bra. So it was a definite no-go. But more than anything, I just needed a break. From work. From people.

From anyone whose last name was Miles.

I got in early on Wednesday, feeling refreshed. Not long after I arrived, while I was still yawning over my first cup of coffee, Roland passed my half-open door. He paused for a second, like he might stop. But he kept going, down the hall to the office he’d been using.

I rolled my eyes at the sharp sting of disappointment. So he hadn’t stopped to say good morning. So what? It wasn’t like we were friends.

And maybe that was what had been eating at me. We weren’t friends. I hated the feeling of distance between us. The awkwardness. It had dissipated on Saturday, although I’d been so focused on salvaging the event, I hadn’t had room to be aloof toward him. I'd simply needed to get things done. But working side-by-side with him... well, it hadn't been bad. We'd both relaxed.

Although I hadn't allowed myself to admit it, I'd been hoping that lack of tension would have carried over to today. That maybe there was a version of reality where we could be friendly. Stop by each other's offices to say hi. Maybe rib each other a little bit. That would be better than feeling like he'd become a stranger.

However, I needed to remember who I was dealing with. He was going to help his parents, and roll on out of here back to his life in San Francisco. It wouldn't matter if we were friends or not because in a few days, he'd be gone. And who knew when I'd see him again.

I opened my calendar and sighed. My bridezilla was coming today for an in-person meeting. I was not looking forward to spending an afternoon with Miss Victoria Jones. And to make matters worse, I'd started my period. My lower back and hips ached something fierce.

When it came to the bridezilla, my only consolation was that she was marrying a man named Victor Cockburn. Not only was her husband-to-be's first name only two letters different from her own, his last name was Cockburn. Cock. Burn. It sounded like something he should see a doctor about.

So while Miss Victoria was micromanaging me to death, I amused myself by making up new versions of her impending last name. Burningcock. Cockdisease. Redcock. Cockrash. Not that I'd be anything less than totally professional on the outside. But what went on in my head was none of her business.

She was late—because of course she was—and she brought her maid-of-honor, Heather. They weren't related, but they looked, and dressed, so much alike, I had a hard time telling them apart. Big blond hair. Bright pink manicures. Leggings with tan Uggs. They were a couple of pumpkin spice nightmares. I plastered on a smile and led them to one of the meeting rooms upstairs.

“Can I get you ladies anything?” I asked.

“No, we’re doing a juice cleanse,” Victoria said.

I wondered how her bestie felt about that. Heather nodded, but her enthusiasm seemed forced.

“Water, then?” I asked.

“Is it filtered?” Victoria asked.

I opened the mini-fridge and pulled out two waters. “Bottled.”

Victoria put her giant wedding binder on the table and set her water next to it. We all took a seat, and Victoria flipped through the thick pages. She had magazine clippings, print-outs, notes—both handwritten and typed—samples, and who knew what else in that binder of hers. The first time she’d met with me, I’d asked her if she’d been working on the binder since she was little. I’d meant it as a friendly joke, but she’d looked at me with a straight face and said she’d started it when she was five.

Okay, then.

“So, I have some changes to the décor to make sure everything matches my vision.” Victoria flipped through a few more pages. “Here. I need it to look like this.”

I took a second to peruse the photos she’d laid out. Her ceremony was supposed to be outdoors, in our main garden area. The photos were all indoor venues.

“Why don’t you tell me which parts of this are the most important to you,” I said. “Because there’s a lot here we can replicate, but some won’t translate to an outdoor space.”

“This is what I want,” she said, gesturing to the entire page.

“Okay,” I said. “Well, these pictures have a lot of lights hanging from the ceiling to create that overhead twinkle effect. We don’t have a ceiling outside.”

“I’m sure you can figure something out,” she said. “Can’t you build a structure to drape the lights from?”

Build a structure? For fuck’s sake. Cocksting. Smokingcock. Victoria Cockpain. “I don’t think new trellises are in the budget, I'm afraid.”

She took a deep breath, like she was trying very hard to control herself. “How many more disappointments am I going to have this week?”

Heather made a sympathetic cooing noise. “Oh sweetie, I know, you're dealing with so much.”

I was very practiced at keeping my thoughts from showing in my expression when I was with clients. So I kept my face carefully pleasant, even though my uterus was wreaking havoc on my lower half and my bridezilla's dramatics made me want to bang my head against the table.

I also knew it was usually best to keep quiet and let the bride realize I wasn't going to jump through hoops to appease her. I'd make her happy to the best of my ability, within the budget she—or in this case, her parents—had set. Outside of that, there wasn't anything I could do. I'd had to learn early to set boundaries with some of my brides, or they'd demand the moon and throw a tantrum when they realized it wouldn't fit through the door.

“Well, what can you do with lights outside?” Victoria asked with a roll of her eyes.

“We can light up the garden for you,” I said. “We'll put twinkle lights in the trees and shrubs. And if you decide to use a trellis or arch for the ceremony, we can use lights on that, too.”

“Well, that's better than nothing,” she said.

Better than nothing. God, how did this girl find someone to fucking marry her? I felt sorry for Victor and his burning cock.

“All right, twinkle lights in the garden,” I said.

The rest of the meeting was more of the same. About half her ideas were things that would work for an indoor wedding, and the other half were for outdoors. It was like she hadn't really decided on what she wanted. Or she'd just gone crazy on Pinterest and hadn't paid attention to the details—just pinned pretty pictures and brought them to me to demand I replicate them.

The more she talked, the more I thought it was probably the latter. Victoria wanted what she wanted, and that was that.

By the time we finished, my face hurt from keeping my expression neutral, and my cramps were reaching the point where all I wanted to do was curl up in a ball and cry. I walked Victoria and Heather out to the lobby and said a polite goodbye, then went upstairs to my office. I wished I could call it a day, but I had a group coming for a breakfast tomorrow. I needed to get the second tasting room rearranged.

After checking my email, I went down to the tasting room to make sure it would be ready for tomorrow's breakfast. The tables were all separated, and I started moving chairs out of the way so I could push them together.

Roland looked in. "Hey, need a hand with that?"

"Um, sure," I said. "I'm just putting the tables together."

He came in started scooting chairs back. I glanced at him, wondering what he was doing. At first, he'd barely acknowledged my existence. Now he was suddenly my helper? It wasn't that I didn't appreciate him lending a hand. I just wasn't sure why he was doing it.

We got the tables situated and put the chairs back in place. There were a few extras, so I pulled them off to the side of the room near the window.

"What's wrong?" he asked, breaking the silence.

I glanced over. "Nothing."

"Don't do that," he said.

"Do what?"

"That thing you do where you're hurt but you minimize it," he said.

"I'm not minimizing anything."

"The fuck you are," he said. "You keep wincing. What's wrong?"

I rolled my eyes. Well, if he really wanted to know... "I got my period. I have cramps. Happy now?"

He grunted, rubbing the back of his neck, and I figured that was the end of it. Saying I got my period had to be one of the top five ways to get a man to shut up.

“Sit down,” he said.

“What?”

“Sit.” He turned a chair around. “Backwards. Straddle it.”

I eyed him with suspicion. “Why?”

“Just do it.”

I sat, facing backward, my legs on either side. Roland pulled another chair close and sat behind me. He dug his thumbs into my lower back and started rubbing.

“Here?” He pressed his thumbs behind my hips.

“Yeah.”

Silently, he rubbed circles on my lower back, hitting just the right spot. God, that felt good. Really good. The aching tension melted away beneath his skilled hands.

He remembered.

He’d always rubbed my back like this when I had cramps. And he still knew exactly how to do it. Knew right where to put pressure—what would make me feel better.

Leaning forward against the chair, I let my body relax. I tried not to worry about the fact that this was Roland giving me a back rub. That maybe I should be a little more cautious about letting him touch me. None of this felt sexual, but it did feel... intimate. A reminder of our shared past. This was the kind of thing couples did—people who didn’t mind being raw and real around each other. Who left the bathroom door open and picked up each other’s dirty socks. Who’d been through the starry-eyed romance phase, and seen each other at their worst.

We’d been there, once. It seemed like such a long time ago.

He stopped rubbing. “There. Better?”

I realized my eyes had closed. I took a deep breath and opened them. “Yeah. Thank you.”

“Sure.”

Shannon poked her head in the door. “Oh, hi, Roland. Zoe, the front desk got a call asking about booking an anniversary party. They’re sending the woman’s contact information to you.”

I quickly stood and smoothed my hair down, feeling like we’d been caught doing something we shouldn’t. “Sure, I’ll call her back.”

“Thanks.” Her eyes moved from me to Roland, then back to me again.

“Is Dad in his office?” Roland asked.

“He should be,” she said.

“I need to talk to him.” Roland didn’t look at me before he walked past his mom and out the door.

Thankfully, Shannon just smiled and left, following Roland out. I didn’t want to answer questions about what we’d been doing in here. The answer, of course, was nothing. He’d stopped to help me move chairs, then given me a back rub. So what? That wasn’t significant.

Except it sort of was.

My cramps felt better, but there was another ache growing inside of me. An ache with two distinct sides. The side that longed for those hands to touch me again, and the side that was afraid to face the pain of what it would do to me if they did.

Roland

I left the tasting room, both annoyed and glad that my mom had interrupted. Rubbing Zoe's back had been like a reflex. I'd done it for her so many times before, I barely thought about it. Not until I was sitting right behind her with my hands on her back. It was crossing a line to touch her like that. I'd need to be more careful.

Pushing thoughts of Zoe out of my mind, I focused on the issue at hand. I'd sent my dad a preliminary plan to get the winery back on track. It lacked detail—there was a lot on the production side that I still needed to review—but it was a start.

I hadn't seen much of my dad since I'd been here. He was clearly avoiding me, which was just as well. We'd never had a great relationship, not even when I was a kid. Always arguing—bumping heads. He'd been critical of everything I did, later claiming he'd been hard on me to build my character. All it had really done was make me feel like nothing I did would ever be good enough for him.

Eventually, I'd stopped seeking his approval.

I found him in his office. “Hey, Dad. Have you looked over the draft plan I sent you?”

“Not yet,” he said, not looking up from his computer screen. “I'll get to it. Hotel reading.”

“Hotel?” I asked. “Are you going somewhere?”

“Yeah, I'm out of town for the next few days,” he said.

“You know, that's one of the things I wanted to talk to you about,” I said. “Your travel expenses are really high. That's one of the places you could cut back.”

He tapped his finger on his desk, finally looking at me. “That's tough. Travel is part of running this place. I can't really change that.”

“Well, something has to change,” I said. “I can’t make money appear out of nowhere. You have to cut your expenses, or dramatically increase your revenue. I have some ideas about that, too, but the expenses have to be addressed.”

“It’s not like I’m flying first class and staying in high-end hotels,” he said. “If we have to cut expenses, we should start looking at the rest of our overhead. Salaries, for starters.”

I took a deep breath. Why did business owners always want to start by cutting staff? “If you’re overstaffed, that’s one thing. But you don’t have that many employees. I don’t think that’s the problem. If you start laying people off, morale is going to suffer. And people are going to assume those rumors about Salishan are true.”

“What rumors?”

“Apparently people are saying Salishan is in trouble,” I said. “Although I guess they aren’t really rumors if they’re true.”

His face reddened, and the vein in his forehead stuck out. “What people? Who’s saying we’re in trouble?”

“People in town. Chase and Cooper mentioned it.”

“Damn it.” He scrubbed his hands through his salt-and-pepper hair and leaned back.

I didn’t understand why he was so upset. Since when did he care what people around town said? “A little town gossip is the least of your troubles.”

“Reputation is everything,” he said. “Especially in this day and age. What people say about a place can make or break it faster than you could imagine.”

“Sure, but we’re not talking about a scathing review in a wine magazine,” I said.

“Doesn’t matter.” He closed his laptop and stood. “I have to get moving or I’ll be late.”

“Dad, I really need you to review that draft,” I said. “And I have a lot more questions for you. There are some things in the books that don’t add up.”

He grabbed his things and draped his coat over his arm. “It will have to wait until I get back.”

I stepped aside as he brushed past me and out the door. I took another deep breath—I was doing that a lot lately—and clenched my fists, feeling my fingernails dig into my palms.

Why the fuck was I doing this? He didn’t want my help. He was going to fight me at every turn, either by opposing my suggestions or blowing them off. It was like he’d rather fail than admit I might be right.

Voices carried from outside his office. My mom was talking to him. I couldn’t make out what she said, but there was no mistaking the frustration in her voice. I heard a few sharp words from him, then his heavy footsteps walking away.

A moment later, Mom appeared in the doorway. Her hair was pulled back and her face was calm. But I knew her. She always tried to hide her stress from us kids. When I was younger, I hadn’t been able to see through her façade. I could now—could see the undercurrent of frustration just below the surface of her smile.

This was why I was here. For her.

“Hey, Mom.” I opened my arms and she stepped into my embrace.

She squeezed and patted my back. “I guess he’ll be back Friday.”

“Why does he travel so much?” I asked. He always had, my whole life. I’d never understood why running a winery caused him to be out of town so often.

“A lot of reasons,” she said. “Sometimes he visits other vineyards. We source some of our grapes elsewhere for more variety, and he likes to check up on their operations. He has meetings with our distributors. He likes to meet with people in person.”

“It’s expensive,” I said.

“I know,” she said. “Unfortunately, he doesn’t listen to me when it comes to the business.”

Another thing I'd never understood. My mom had grown up here. She'd lived and breathed this place her entire life, but Dad had always kept her out of the business side of things.

"Well, someone's going to have to start making him listen," I said.

She smiled at me, but it was a dispirited, tired smile. "Have I thanked you lately for being here?"

"You have." I put my arm around her shoulders and kissed her head. "I'm working on it."

The problem was, it was becoming increasingly clear that my dad was doing a shit job of running this place. He blamed everything from a dry season a few years ago to increased labor costs to changes in the economy. But from what I was seeing as I pored over the last ten years of financial records, the problem was him.

Bad decisions. Bad loans. Unfinished projects. Wasted resources. If this had been another business, I would have advised the board of directors to fire the CEO and get someone competent to run the company.

How was I supposed to tell my mom that she needed to fire my dad?

"I'm supposed to meet a friend for dinner," she said. "But the fridge at the house is full if you want to go over there and get yourself something."

She was such a mom, still trying to take care of me. "Thanks, Mom. I'll be fine."

"Okay," she said. "I'll see you later."

Mom left, and I walked back to the cottage. It was dinnertime, but I wasn't hungry. I had too much on my mind. My dad. The winery. I wanted to make sure they were secure before I went home, but it was so fucking complicated.

I sat down on the bed and pulled out my phone. Almost on a whim, I called Farrah.

"Hello?"

“Hey,” I said. “Did I catch you at a bad time? I know it’s late there.”

“I’m working, but I’m in my hotel room,” she said. “What’s going on?”

I paused, not sure what I wanted to say. It was odd, feeling like I needed to talk to her about everything. I dealt with stress at work all the time, but I never vented to her about it.

“Things are just a lot worse here than I thought they’d be,” I said.

“I thought Dimension was having a great year,” she said.

“No, I’m talking about my family’s winery,” I said.

“Oh, that,” she said. “Aren’t you finished with that already? Didn’t they just need a short-term loan or something?”

“That’s what I mean,” I said. “I thought it would be simple, but the books are a mess and—”

“Roland, hold on a second.”

The line went silent except for what sounded like the click of her fingernails on her keyboard.

“These numbers are bullshit,” she said, although I couldn’t tell if she was talking to me, or herself. “I’m going to have to get them to run them again.”

“Sounds like you’re busy,” I said.

“Yeah, I have to get this report done by tomorrow,” she said. “I’m back in town next week. Why don’t you text Gina and have her put you on my calendar.”

Text Gina? Was she serious? “I have to go through your assistant now?”

“Don’t be irritable,” she said.

“Farrah, I don’t even know when I’ll be back in San Francisco.”

“Why not?” she asked.

Had I been talking to myself this entire time? How many times had I told her where I was and what I was doing? “Do you even know where I am right now?”

“I’m in New York, Roland,” she said. “You’re somewhere on the west coast. Does it matter?”

“You know, I’m dealing with somewhat of a crisis here, and I’m getting the sense that you don’t give a shit.”

“What is that supposed to mean?” she asked.

“I’ve told you what’s going on, more than once, but it’s like you haven’t heard a word.”

“I’m not sure what you expect from me,” she said. “My schedule is insane. You know that. I’m in New York, then London, and I don’t even know what’s on my calendar after that.”

“I know you travel a lot,” I said. “That’s not the point.”

“Then what is your point?”

I leaned forward and rested my elbows on my knees. That was a good question. What was my point? That I wanted her to be there for me when I was having a rough day? Farrah didn’t have a nurturing bone in her body.

But what the hell was I doing with someone who didn’t give two shits about what was happening in my life? At home, when all I did was work, it hadn’t mattered. Dating Farrah had been simple—uncomplicated. She didn’t need anything from me. Didn’t demand my attention, or complain when I worked late or canceled plans. I’d blown her off last weekend, and she hadn’t said a word.

But she didn’t have anything to give, either.

“Farrah, I’m sorry, but this isn’t going to work.” As soon as I said it, I realized how right I was. Our relationship had only seemed to work until now because it had never been tested. Now that it had, it was failing—hard.

“What are you saying?” she asked. “Are you ending things with me?”

“Yeah,” I said, realization settling over me, like I’d been living in the dark and someone just turned on a light. I could finally see. “Look, you need someone who’s fine with being an afterthought. I really thought I was. But... I think I need more than that.”

“This is so out of the blue,” she said. “I thought we had an understanding.”

“We did. But you don’t have room in your life for someone who’s more than a diversion when you’re in town. If I walk away, what are you really losing? Someone to have dinner with a few times a month?”

She went quiet for a moment. I didn’t even hear her fingers clicking on her keyboard.

“I guess this is it, then,” she said, her voice subdued.

“Yeah, I think so.”

“Goodbye, Roland.”

“Goodbye—”

Click.

I looked down at my phone screen for a long moment. I’d just broken up with my girlfriend, and all I felt was... nothing. No disappointment. Certainly no sadness or regret. Spending time with Farrah had been nice while it lasted, but I didn’t feel like I was losing anything by letting her go.

If that wasn’t a significant sign that I’d done the right thing, I didn’t know what was. And it stood out in sharp contrast to the way I’d felt when another relationship had ended.

God, I didn’t want to think about Zoe right now. I massaged my forehead, as if I could rub away my thoughts of her. But she was always there. Seeing her every day was messing with my head. Not just my head. Maybe it was shitty to admit it immediately after breaking up with Farrah, but it was messing with my dick, too.

Whenever I was around her, I noticed... everything. She looked amazing. Smelled fantastic. I’d had it bad for Zoe from the first time I laid eyes on her. We’d met in high school when her family had moved to Echo Creek, and she’d taken my breath away. It was hard to push that into the background, even with our history. She was still sexy as fuck.

I needed to just admit it. I was attracted to her. Insanely attracted to her. Obviously acting on that wasn't an option. My relationship status had nothing to do with that being a bad idea. Zoe and I had been there, done that, and it didn't matter what my cock wanted. She wasn't mine anymore, and she never would be again.

And there was the shitty post-breakup knot in the pit of my stomach. But it wasn't for Farrah. It wasn't for the woman I'd spent the last year dating, nor the handful of women I'd had flings with before her. It was for the woman who should have been nothing but a memory by now. It had been four years. That should have been enough time to get over her.

But I wasn't sure if forever would be enough time to get over Zoe.

Zoe

Sometimes I think moving back here was a mistake. You're a thousand miles away, but you're everywhere.

~Text from Zoe, unsent

Friday evening, I finished work late. There was a small party at the Big House tomorrow, but Jamie was handling it. I was off for the next couple of days and looking forward to the break.

Downstairs, I found Brynn standing in the lobby. She was the youngest of the Miles kids, although she wasn't a kid anymore. She was a gorgeous twenty-year-old woman, with long brown hair and a banging body. It still surprised me to see her looking so grown up—probably because I'd known her since she was seven. She was ten years younger than me, so she'd been a little girl when I'd started dating Roland.

"Hey, Brynn," I said. "How's school?"

She shrugged. "It's okay."

"Are you home for the weekend?" I asked.

"Yeah, or maybe a little longer," she said. "I'm not sure."

Shannon came down the hall, adjusting her purse strap over her shoulder. "Ready, kiddo?"

"Yep," Brynn said.

Something was going on, but I couldn't put my finger on what. Shannon looked tense, although that was normal for her these days. But Brynn wasn't usually so subdued.

"We're going to dinner if you want to come," Shannon said.

"Oh, I don't want to interfere with mother-daughter time," I said.

"It's fine," Brynn said. "Come with us."

“All right,” I said. “If you’re sure.”

We went next door to the Echo Creek Lodge. Salishan had a great relationship with the large hotel. A lot of our guests stayed here if they came for more than a day. They also had a nice restaurant, with good food and a cozy ambiance.

The host seated us, and after looking over the menus, we ordered dinner. While we waited for our food, Shannon asked Brynn about school. Her grades were good, and she liked her classes. I still got the feeling something was wrong, but I didn’t ask. It might be something Brynn didn’t want to talk about in front of her mom. I resolved to get Brynn alone later, so I could ask her what was going on.

Our food came out and we started eating.

“Your brother is home,” Shannon said after the waitress had left.

“Yeah, Cooper texted me,” Brynn said. “He’s still here?”

Shannon nodded. “He’s been helping us with some financial issues.”

Brynn glanced at me. “Is that weird?”

“Of course not,” I said.

“Liar,” Brynn said.

“I’m not lying.” I was totally lying. “I barely see him. And when I do, we get along fine.”

Shannon eyed me, and I wondered what she was thinking. She knew me well enough; she could probably tell I was struggling with Roland being here.

“I don’t know how you do it,” Brynn said. “I see my ex on campus once in a while and it makes me throw up in my mouth a little.”

“It makes me sad,” Shannon said.

I paused with my fork halfway to my mouth.

“What makes you sad?” Brynn asked.

“Roland,” Shannon said.

I put my fork down. Shannon and I had talked about Roland, more than once. I'd told her why I'd left, and she'd been supportive and sympathetic. I hadn't burdened her with every detail, but I'd been honest, and she'd been receptive. But she'd also never really told me how she felt about it. Or him. And I'd never asked.

She took a deep breath. "Parenting when you have young children is tough. Babies don't sleep a lot, they poop out their diapers, make messes. Toddlers get into everything. Don't even get me started on what Cooper was like as a two-year-old. I'm surprised I didn't lose my mind. There are challenges at every stage. But nothing prepared me for being a parent of adults."

"Yeah, well, one of your adult children is Cooper," Brynn said. "Although I don't know if adult is the right term for him."

Shannon smiled. "I worry about all of you for different reasons. But Roland is... he's so much like your dad."

I bit the inside of my lip to keep from replying. I wanted to argue with her—to defend Roland. I'd never liked Lawrence very much and hearing her compare Roland to him raised my hackles. Although it wasn't my job to stick up for Roland anymore.

"Lawrence always worked too much," Shannon continued. "I think at first he felt like he had a lot to prove to my parents. He wanted to show he could take over the winery operations. But he always prioritized work over everything else. Even me."

Her comment hit way too close to home, and I swallowed hard.

"Roland has always felt like he had things to prove," Shannon said. "I'd hoped that the people he chose to have in his life would keep him on track. But unfortunately, that hasn't been the case."

"He's a dumbass," Brynn said.

"Brynn," Shannon said.

"He is," Brynn said. "It's not like we don't all know it. Just because he's my brother doesn't mean I have to like him, or think he isn't an idiot when he is."

"You're going to be nice to him," Shannon said, pointing her finger at Brynn. "He hasn't been home in eighteen months, and now he's here, despite the fact that it's interfering with his work."

"That's the point," Brynn said. "He hasn't been here."

I fiddled with my hair, uncomfortable. It felt like this was a conversation I shouldn't be hearing.

I'd never wanted to make Roland's family take sides. I'd almost declined the job offer because I didn't want to come between them. But I'd realized later that Roland's family felt a bit like I did—like he'd chosen his career over them.

"I know, mothers are always willing to overlook things in their children," Shannon said. "That makes it easier for me to look past the last few years. But we need him right now, and he's here. I'm grateful for that." She met my eyes. "Even though I know it hasn't been easy on everyone."

I tucked my hair behind my ear. "It's really fine."

"How long is he going to be around?" Brynn asked.

"I don't know," Shannon said. "The winery's financial problems are apparently bigger than any of us thought."

"Mom, if you need me to move home, I can," Brynn said.

"Sweetie, no." Shannon covered Brynn's hand with her own. "College is important."

"I know, but I can commute," she said. "It's not that far. And I was thinking about it anyway because I need to find a new place to live."

"Why?" Shannon asked. "Did something happen with Carrie?"

Brynn's eyes shone with sudden tears, and she touched her fingers to her lips. She took a shaky breath. "I, um... I came home the other night and found Carrie with Austin."

"Oh, no," I said. Brynn had been dating Austin for about six months, and Carrie was her roommate. "Please tell me you mean you found them flirting in the kitchen or something."

Brynn shook her head. “Nope. On the couch. And they were...”

“Banging?” I asked.

Brynn nodded, and Shannon raised her eyebrow at me.

“What?” I asked. “We’re all adults here.”

“Honey, I am so sorry.” Shannon reached over and rubbed her back. “You know you can stay at home as long as you need.”

“Thanks,” Brynn said. She sniffed and swiped away the lone tear that had managed to break free from the corner of her eye. “I should have seen it coming. I knew they got along really well, but I figured I was just lucky that my boyfriend and my roommate didn’t fight. I guess it’s been going on for months and they never told me.”

“Oh my god, I will cut a bitch,” I said. “You need me to deal with this, Brynn, you just say the word. I’ll make them both regret being born.”

“Thanks, Zoe,” Brynn said. “I just don’t get it. How can people be so awful to someone they supposedly care about?”

“Unfortunately, the world is full of people like that,” Shannon said. “The trick is to find the good ones and keep them close.”

“Right now, I think I just want a dog,” Brynn said. “Dogs don’t cheat with supposed friends.”

“I can’t believe that asshole,” I said. “And Carrie? Girls who cheat with their friends’ boyfriends are the worst. You know, I should get you drunk tonight. Do this right.”

Shannon leveled me with her best mom expression. “She’s underage.”

“She’s twenty,” I said. “And she grew up in a winery. Somehow I don’t think she has virgin lips.”

“Nope,” Brynn said.

I raised my fist and she bumped it with hers.

“Adult children,” Shannon said with a roll of her eyes. “Someday you’ll both know.”

“Don’t worry, I’m not really going to get her drunk,” I said. As soon as Shannon glanced away, I mouthed yes I am at Brynn. Her little smile sealed the deal. I was definitely getting Brynn drunk tonight. Poor girl needed it.

The conversation turned to more mundane topics as we finished our dinner. Brynn talked about her plans to find a new apartment. She already had a lead on a cute studio close to campus. Shannon talked about a new red blend she was planning. I loved listening to Shannon talk about her work. It was fascinating, and she was so animated and passionate about it.

I tried to keep the conversation away from topics like Roland, or boyfriends, or workaholic husbands. When we finished, we walked back to Salishan. Shannon asked Brynn if she wanted to stay in the other guest cottage, and Brynn said she’d love to.

I said I was going to head home, but gave Brynn a quick wink, hoping Shannon didn’t see. We all said goodnight and went our separate ways, but I texted Brynn and told her to meet me at the kitchen entrance of the Big House in an hour.

Brynn was already waiting for me when I got to the Big House. The bottles in my grocery bag clinked against each other.

“Shh,” Brynn said, holding a finger to her lips. “I could hear you coming a mile away.”

“We’re fine,” I said. “No one’s around this late.”

“Are you sure we shouldn’t hang out in the Blackberry Cottage?” Brynn asked.

“With Roland right next door?” I asked. “Nope. Trespassing at work is preferable.”

Brynn laughed. “Okay, I get it.”

I found the right key and unlocked the kitchen door. We went inside, and I led her to the small tasting room. It had a long rectangular table with a leather upholstered bench seat along one side—a comfy place to sit and have a few drinks. I set down the grocery bags and pulled out my supplies.

“Normally I’m a whiskey girl, but a boyfriend cheating with your roommate calls for tequila,” I said, putting the bottle down. “But pace yourself with this stuff.”

“Yeah, I know,” Brynn said. “I’m twenty, not five.”

“I wouldn’t be feeding you tequila if you were five.”

“Yeah, I’m sorry,” Brynn said. “I’m just so used to being treated like a baby when I’m home.”

“Believe me, I know what that’s like.”

“Really?”

“Yeah.” I poured us each a shot. “My brother is fifteen years older than I am. I’ll forever be a little kid to him.”

“I forgot about your brother,” she said. “Do you see him very often?”

“No,” I said. “He lives in Ohio, so there’s that. But he was so much older than me, I didn’t know him very well when I was growing up. He was off to college when I was three. He’d visit, and he was always nice to me. But we were never close.”

“Where are your parents these days?” she asked.

“They’ve been visiting him, actually,” I said. Several years ago, my parents had sold their house and bought an RV. Now they were spending their retirement traveling around the country. “I’m not sure where they’re headed next.”

“That’s pretty cool,” she said.

I handed Brynn her shot. “Yeah, it is. I’m happy for them.”

She held up her glass. “Thanks for this. It’s been one of the worst weeks of my life.”

I clinked my glass against hers and we swallowed. It burned going down. Brynn winced.

“Wow, that’s strong,” she said.

“You seem like you’re handling this whole thing really well,” I said. “I don’t know if I’d be as calm as you are if I found out my boyfriend was fucking my roommate.”

“I got the worst of it out of my system already,” she said. “I freaked out when I saw them. God, I barely remember it. I was crying and screaming at them. I think I threw things. Then I sobbed in bed for the next twenty-four hours or so. Finally, I decided they could both go fuck themselves. But I needed to get out of there for a while.”

I poured another shot. “Having your heart broken sucks.”

“Yeah it does,” she said, and we both drank. She winced again. “Holy shit.”

I got out the waters I’d brought. “Alternate with water. Serious drinking requires hydration.”

Brynn laughed. “Thanks. Speaking of broken hearts, are you okay, really?”

I slid my fingertip along the rim of my shot glass. “Yeah, I guess so. I want to be okay with him being around, but it’s complicated.”

“Why are men such idiots?” she asked.

“That’s a very good question.”

The more Brynn drank, the more she opened up about her breakup. He was only the second guy she’d ever dated. Her brothers had made it almost impossible for her to date in high school, so her first experiences in the—often shitty—world of dating had been in college. So far, her first boyfriend had seemed nice, but he’d broken up with her because he didn’t want to be tied down to one girl. And now she’d had a guy cheat on her.

I wanted to rip Austin’s dick off and feed it to him. And I wouldn’t have minded doing something equally terrible to her roommate. Some fucking friend she turned out to be.

We snacked on the stuff I'd brought—drinking made me crave salt, so I devoured a bag of potato chips—and drank more. It wasn't long before we were both cry-laughing at something, but neither of us could remember what. Which made us laugh harder.

“Zoe, what the hell are you doing?”

I looked over to the doorway and saw Ben, Salishan's groundskeeper and handyman. “Hey, Ben!”

His mouth turned up in a smile, and he shook his head. Ben was in his mid-fifties. A nice-looking guy—rugged and outdoorsy with smile lines around his eyes. Thick beard. Strong hands. For all I knew, he'd always worked here. He was just as much a fixture as any of the Miles family.

“I'm sure you're not here after hours providing alcohol to your boss's underage daughter,” he said.

I giggled and tried to stand up. Oh shit, I was really drunk. “No, course not.”

Brynn was sprawled out on the bench with one leg dangling over the side. “Ben. Hi, Ben. Benjamin. Ben. Benny. Benaroo.”

“Don't listen to her,” I said. “She's just had a day. I mean had a day. A bad one.”

He came over to the table and started cleaning up our mess. “Come on, girls. I think it's time to call it a night.”

Brynn mumbled something incoherent. Ben just shook his head again.

I put my head down on the table while he put the bottle and food wrappers back in the grocery bags. I must have fallen asleep for a second, because his hand on my shoulder startled me awake.

“What? Shit.”

“Come on, Zoe,” Ben said. I glanced up and he had Brynn in his arms, cradled like a baby. “Let's get her to bed, then I'll take you home.”

“Yeah.” I got up and steadied myself against the table. “Didn’t mean to so drunk. Get so drunk. Ben, you’re a superhero.”

He smiled, his eyes crinkling at the corners. “Just glad I was here late.”

I stumbled after Ben while he carried the half-conscious Brynn to the Blackberry Cottage. I’d probably had about two shots too many, but I wasn’t too worried about it. I’d regret it in the morning, but for now, I was happily numb.

“You know, Brynn is fun,” I said. “Brynn, this is more often. No. We should do this more often.”

“I don’t think Brynn will want to do this again for a while,” Ben said.

“What?” I asked, laughing. “She will. I’m super drink to fun with. Wait. Super fun to drink with.”

“I’m sure you are,” Ben said.

We stopped outside the cottage and Ben struggled to get his keys out while holding Brynn. I moved in to help, but the ground seemed to roll beneath my feet. I had the fleeting thought that I was about to land on my face when a pair of strong hands caught me.

“Whoa there, Zo.”

An arm slipped around my waist and I felt the warmth of a body next to mine. I looked up and blinked, my eyes feeling heavy. “Roland?”

“What the fuck, Zo?” he asked, but there was amusement in his tone. Or maybe I was so drunk, everything sounded funny.

I laughed. “Hey, Miles. Wanna have a drink with me?”

“It looks like you’ve had more than enough,” he said. “Thanks, Ben.”

“No problem,” Ben said. Somehow he’d gotten Brynn’s door open. “I’ll get her to bed. You want me to take Zoe home?”

“No, I’ve got her,” Roland said.

“Ben’s so nice,” I said, giggling. “Why is he so nice?”

“He’s a good guy,” Roland said. “Come on, Zo. Let’s go.”

Roland half-carried me to the cottage next to Brynn’s. My feet didn’t want to work right, my legs felt like jelly, and somehow it was all hilarious.

“Aren’t you taking me home?” I asked.

He opened the door and I shuffled in, still pressed against him for balance. “Nope. You woke me up, and I just want to go back to bed. You’ll have to crash here tonight.”

I laughed again, because in my tequila haze, something about that seemed incredibly funny.

Roland

I dragged a very drunk Zoe inside the cottage. She leaned against me with her arms wrapped around my waist, tripping over her own feet.

I'd been in bed when Zoe's voice from outside had woken me up. I'd come out to tell her to shut up, but found Ben carrying Brynn, with Zoe stumbling behind them. I hadn't even realized my sister was home. Luckily, I knew Ben would take care of Brynn—make sure she was safe tonight. Ben was one of the few people I'd trust with anything, my baby sister included.

"Let's go, drunkie," I said, nudging Zoe in. The scent of tequila mixed with the smell of her shampoo. It was oddly arousing, which made me think I really ought to take her home. But damn it, I was fucking tired. I wanted to go back to bed, not drive her drunk ass across town. I wasn't even sure where she lived.

And I kind of wanted to mess with her. She'd obviously gotten my sister drunk. I didn't need to know what had happened to know whose idea that had been.

"I'm not as drunk as you think," she said, then erupted with laughter. "You're drunk."

"Nope, I'm the sober one tonight," I said. "Come on, keep walking. We're almost there."

She lurched toward the kitchen. "You need a drink."

I grabbed her around the waist to keep her on her feet, then held her for a moment until she stopped struggling. Her body relaxed against me, but I didn't keep walking. Knowing I shouldn't, I kept my arms around her, just holding her. She felt good. Familiar.

"Uh-oh," she said. Her body convulsed, and she covered her mouth.

Instinctively, I pulled her into the bathroom and opened the toilet. She crumpled to the ground and for a second, I thought maybe she wasn't going to—

Then she did. I crouched down behind her and pulled her hair back. Waited while she emptied what looked like half a bottle of tequila into the toilet.

“Are you okay?” I asked when she finished. I helped her stand and get cleaned up.

“I'm good,” she said, but her eyes were half-closed. “I got this.”

I finished wiping her face with a wet washcloth. “Yeah, you've got everything under control, don't you?”

“Everyone is can't be so like you responsible,” she said. “Wait, no. Said that wrong. Everyone responsible... no. What was I saying?”

“That you need to go to bed.”

She laughed. “No I don't.”

“I think you do,” I said. “Come on, Zo.”

I led her into the bedroom and she collapsed onto the bed.

“Mm, soft,” she said, nuzzling her face into the comforter.

“Yeah, it's nice,” I said. “What were you doing with Brynn, anyway?”

“Drinking tequila.” She hiccupped.

“I can see that,” I said. “Why?”

“Cheater, cheater,” she said. “Fucking men.”

“What?”

“Her fucking boyfriend cheated,” she said. “Imma cut his balls off.”

Hearing that unleashed a wave of anger, pouring heat through my veins. I wanted to cut his balls off. “Are you serious?”

“Mm-hmm,” she said. “So drinks a few. No. Had a few drinks.”

“I’d say it was more than a few,” I said. “Is Brynn okay?”

“Yeah,” she said. “She’s a tough girl. But wait till Coop finds out.”

Cooper was going to lose his shit when he found out someone had hurt Brynn. We were all protective of her, but Cooper took it to an entirely different level.

“He’ll be pissed,” I said. “You’re not going to puke again, are you?”

She tapped her finger against her temple, like she was thinking hard about my question. God, she was ridiculous when she was drunk.

“Nope,” she said. “We should get pancakes. Remember the pancakes, Roland?”

“Yeah, I remember the pancakes,” I said.

The first time we’d gotten drunk together, we’d been high school seniors. Although, it was more accurate to say Zoe had gotten me drunk. I’d grown up around wine—alcohol hadn’t been much of a novelty for me. But tasting your mom’s latest cabernet and getting wasted with your crazy girlfriend on cheap whiskey were two very different experiences. We’d decided we needed pancakes at two in the morning and walked across town to a diner that was open all night. I still remembered those pancakes as being one of the best things I’d ever eaten.

Whiskey will do that to you when you’re seventeen.

She giggled, and I couldn’t help but smile. I hadn’t seen Zoe this drunk in a long time. There was no way she’d remember this tomorrow.

“Why you smiling?” she asked.

“Because you’re funny when you’re wasted,” I said. “And because you’re going to freak out when you wake up in the morning.”

“I will not.”

“Yeah, you will,” I said. “You’re in my bed, and I’m going to sleep next to you. When you wake up, you’re going to wonder how the hell you got here.”

“You can’t sleep with me,” she said.

“Yeah, well, I’m not moving you,” I said. “And I’m not sleeping on the couch. So you’re stuck with me.”

“Hmm,” she said, humming like she was deep in thought. Either that or she was on the brink of passing out. It was hard to tell. “Not freaking out in the morning.”

“You will,” I said. “You aren’t going to remember this conversation.”

She draped her arm over her forehead and groaned. “Yes, I will.”

“Nope,” I said. “I know you, Zo. You’re past the point of no return.”

“Why did I drink all that fuckin’ tequila?” she asked.

“I don’t know.”

She rubbed her eyes. “Brynn needed me. This is whatcha do.”

Brynn needed her. Maybe she had. Zoe had been a part of my family for years—since Brynn was little. And here she was, years later, still with them. Still working for my parents. Hanging out with my brothers. Being a big sister to Brynn. She’d left me, but she hadn’t left them.

I wasn’t sure how I felt about that.

“I can’t sleep here,” she said, curling up and tucking her hands underneath my pillow. Her eyes drifted closed. “This is your bed.”

“I know it is,” I said. “That’s why it’s funny.”

“What if your girlfriend comes over?”

“She wouldn’t anyway, but she’s not my girlfriend anymore.”

“What?” Her eyes opened and focused on me. “What happened?”

“I broke things off,” I said.

“Why?”

For a second, Zoe looked awfully sober. Maybe she would remember this tomorrow. But then her eyes drifted closed and her head relaxed against the pillow. A few seconds later, she was asleep.

“Because I guess I need someone who cares,” I said. “And she never did.”

I laid down on my side, facing her. Pushed back a strand of hair that had fallen across her forehead. She was out cold—didn’t even flinch. I traced her cheek with the tips of my fingers, feeling her soft skin. Her lips parted, and her breath came out in a raspy snore. It made me smile again. She always snored when she passed out drunk, and always denied it later. I’d have to tease her about it tomorrow.

Of course, tomorrow she’d be sober, and there would still be this gulf between us.

Zoe

My stomach was raw, and my head hurt, but the warm body next to me felt so good, I didn't mind. I nestled in closer to his back, curling up against him. I had the vague sense that my hand was down the back of his underwear, my palm splayed across his tight ass. It almost made me giggle, but I didn't want to wake him. I never slept over with Van, but apparently I had last night. It wasn't like I was in love with the guy, but he was cuddly to sleep with. Who knew?

I took a deep breath, his scent flooding through me. God, he smelled great. Why had I never noticed how good he smelled? It was a heady masculine scent that lit up a deep primal part of my brain. Despite the fact that a raging hangover was rearing its ugly head, warmth spread through my core. I traced my nose along the back of his shoulder, breathing him in. It was too bad Van wasn't generally a snuggler. This was nice.

He shifted, making a low sound in his throat, and I froze. Wait. This wasn't Van. I hadn't even seen Van last night, let alone spent the night with him. Had I?

The previous evening came back to me. Drinking with Brynn. Way too much tequila. Ben picking her up and carrying her back to the guest cottage. And—

Oh my god. Roland.

I very carefully cracked one eye open. There was indeed a man sleeping next to me. He was in a t-shirt, his muscular back moving with his soft breathing. I was tucked so close, I was practically on top of him. One of my feet was wedged between his legs and yes, my hand was down the back of his underwear.

Oh fuck. Oh fuck, oh fuck, oh fuck.

Why the fuck was I in bed with Roland? And why was I grabbing his ass?

Moving as slowly as I could so I wouldn't wake him—oh my god please don't wake up and catch me with my hand in your pants—I slid my hand out of his underwear. He didn't move. I carefully shifted my leg, then rolled onto my back, separating myself from him.

He stayed where he was, still apparently asleep. I let out a long breath. My head was killing me, and my stomach felt like something had died in there. I loved tequila, but I probably needed to admit I was too old for this shit.

And for the love of everything, why was I in bed with Roland?

We were in the Hummingbird Cottage, where he'd been staying. I could tell by the hummingbird curtains and the watercolor picture of a hummingbird on the wall. He must have brought me in here last night. But why? Brynn was staying in the cottage next door, so he must have come out when I was bringing Brynn home. Or, more accurately, when Ben was bringing Brynn home. I was pretty sure Ben had offered me a ride, so why hadn't Roland just let him take me home?

But he hadn't. My memory was spotty, but I could recall bits and pieces. Suddenly I remembered puking in his bathroom. God, I'd really had way too much to drink. But Roland had handled it. Held my hair, helped me clean up. Then put me to bed. With him.

I vaguely remembered him telling me it was going to be funny in the morning because I wouldn't remember how I got here. Ass.

I found myself suddenly wondering about his girlfriend. What would she think if she knew he'd slept in a bed with his ex-wife last night?

But wait. Hadn't he said something about her? Maybe I'd asked. But I remembered him telling me he didn't have a girlfriend anymore. He'd broken up with her. Did I remember that right?

Not that it mattered. He could be with anyone he wanted. He didn't owe me anything.

I needed to pee something fierce, but I really wanted to avoid the awkward morning conversation that was sure to happen when Roland woke up. I'd thank him later for helping me last night and letting me crash here. But if he never knew I'd been sleeping cuddled up next to him with my hand on his ass, that would be a very good thing.

And I was not going to think about how good it felt to sleep next to him. Absolutely fucking not.

I slipped out of bed—thankfully I was still fully dressed—and grabbed my shoes from beside the bed. Roland slept on as I tip-toed out of the bedroom. My purse was on the floor next to the front door, with my phone and keys inside. Good. I didn't have to go hunting for any of my stuff. I couldn't remember if I'd been wearing anything else besides my t-shirt and leggings—maybe a hoodie or cardigan. I didn't see anything lying around, so I crept out the front door, shutting it as quietly as I could.

The cool morning air felt good. I took a deep breath and let it clear my head a little. I still needed a vat of coffee and a greasy breakfast before I'd feel human, but fresh air had its merits.

I went next door to check on Brynn. Poor thing. I might have gone a little overboard last night. I wasn't sure how often she got shit-faced. I'd done it enough times to know exactly what to expect—and how to counteract the worst of it—but Brynn was young. It took some experience to handle a night of ill-advised tequila.

I knocked softly and waited. If she wasn't awake yet, I could check in with her later. “Hey, Brynn? Are you up, sweetie?”

“Yeah.” Her voice was muffled through the door, but she sounded miserable. “Just a sec.”

I ran my fingers through my tangled hair while I waited. God, I needed coffee. If she didn't have any, this was going to have to be a very short visit.

Brynn opened the door. She was dressed in an oversize Tilikum College sweatshirt and black leggings. Her hair was a mess, she had makeup smudged beneath her eyes, and I had a feeling she'd spent some quality time praying to the porcelain god last night. But she still smiled.

"Morning, sunshine." I sniffed, detecting the scent of brewing coffee coming from her little kitchen. "Glad you're still alive."

She shook her head. "Barely. Want to come in for coffee?"

"Yes," I said, my voice vehement. "I think I'll die in the next five minutes if I don't get some."

"Same," she said. "It's just about done. Come on in, I'll get it."

I glanced toward Roland's cottage, slightly afraid I'd see him peeking out the front door, looking for me. But I didn't see any sign of him. I went in and shut the door behind me, then ran to the bathroom.

When I came out, I sat on the couch. Brynn brought me a mug of black coffee.

"Thanks," I said and took a sip. My stomach was still not happy with me, but I was pretty sure I could handle the coffee.

She sat down with her mug. "Sure. Although I can't decide if I love you or hate you right now."

"Sorry," I said. "But let's be honest, tequila and good choices don't exactly go together. And we had fun, right?"

"True, and yeah, we did," she said. "When should I try to eat?"

"How much did you puke last night?" I asked.

"A lot."

"You poor thing," I said. "I'm sorry. Drink some coffee and we'll go from there."

"It's fine," she said. "Maybe this is dumb, but I'm glad you didn't stop me last night. You're the only person around here who doesn't treat me like a child. It's kind of cool that you let me be stupid."

I smiled. "I guess... you're welcome? I don't know, sometimes I think I'm too old to be stupid like that anymore."

"You're not old," she said.

“I’m going to be thirty-one soon,” I said. “Maybe not old, but I can’t keep pretending my twenty-first birthday was just a few years ago.”

“Well, maybe you’re just living it up now because when you were twenty-one, you were already married and stuff.”

I took another sip. “I lived it up a lot then, too. I think you were just too little to notice.”

She laughed. “Even with Roland?”

“Especially with Roland,” I said.

“No way,” she said. “Roland is the world’s biggest stick-in-the-mud ever.”

“He wasn’t back then,” I said. “Have I really never told you any of the crazy shit we did?”

“No,” she said. “But I’ve always avoided asking you about Roland. I didn’t want to make it awkward. But you better tell me now. That’s your payment for this brutal hangover I’m suffering through.”

“Aw, poor baby Brynn,” I said, patting her cheek. “Let’s see, crazy stuff I did with Roland. Where do I even begin? When we were in high school, I got us fake IDs. We’d drive over to Tilikum and party with all the college kids at the bars.”

“That sounds fun,” she said. “What else?”

“The principal caught us making out under the bleachers one day when we were supposed to be in class,” I said. “We both got detention. To get back at him, we broke into his office and had sex on his desk during school hours. But at some point, my ass hit the intercom and turned it on, so the entire school heard us.”

“Holy shit, that was you?” Brynn asked. She clutched her head. “Ow, that hurts. But oh my god, Zoe, that was you and Roland? People were still talking about that when I went to high school there. It’s a school legend.”

I laughed. “Yeah, that was us.”

“I always swore it couldn’t be true,” she said. “Did you get caught?”

“No,” I said. “The intercom thing happened right as we were finishing. Then we escaped out the window.”

“That’s insane,” she said. “I can’t believe Roland would ever do that.”

“Oh, we had sex in all kinds of messed up places,” I said. “We’d been about to go at it under the bleachers when we got caught.”

“Where else?” she asked.

“Um... I don’t know, bathrooms, dressing rooms. The boys’ locker room during a football game. We broke into the Lodge once and did it in the hot tub. Probably about half the rooms in your parents’ house. They caught us once, but we were a little older, and they just pretended like they hadn’t seen anything.”

“Oh god, that’s mortifying,” she said.

I shrugged. “I guess. It didn’t really bother me back then. I don’t think I’d feel the same if your mom walked in on me now.”

“I would die,” she said. “I don’t even want my mom to know I’ve ever had sex.”

“I don’t blame you,” I said. “Although your mom is so awesome, you know she’d be cool about it. My mom, however... not so much. My poor mother had no idea what to do with me.”

Brynn laughed. “Well, if you were having sex on the principal’s desk, I can see why.”

“Yeah, my older brother was always this really mellow guy,” I said. “He never got in trouble. Then I came along. I was an oops baby, so my parents didn’t see me coming from the beginning. I’m surprised they survived my teenage years.”

“Did they like Roland?” she asked.

“Yeah, they loved him,” I said. “I think they hoped he’d calm me down. Which he kind of did, eventually. Or maybe I calmed down on my own, I don't know. I'm surprised your parents still speak to me after all the trouble I got Roland into."

"My mom loves you," she said. "You're just one of her kids, now."

I looked down into my coffee and smiled. It was true. I'd always felt like Shannon had adopted me into their family. And my gratitude that it hadn't changed in the last four years was deeper than I could properly express.

"So, since we're sharing," Brynn said, "where did you sleep last night?"

I groaned. "Next door."

"You mean, next door with my brother?" she asked.

"Yep."

"On the couch, or in bed?" she asked.

"Nosy bitch," I said, elbowing her. "In bed. Dressed. He did it to fuck with me, but the joke's on him because I didn't wake up and flip out like he thought I would."

"Wait, Roland played a joke on you?" she asked. "I don't think that's actually my brother. He must be someone else who looks like him."

I laughed, but it made me sad to hear her say that. She didn't know Roland at all. Or maybe she did, and the Roland I'd known had been nothing but a phase.

"How's that coffee treating you?" I asked. "Ready to try food?"

"Maybe?"

I patted her leg. "Let's give it a shot. I know just the place."

Roland

Damn it, she was gone.

I'd gone to sleep looking forward to what'd she'd do this morning when she woke up with me. But she'd crept out while I was still asleep. I'd woken to the sound of her closing the front door. She'd been quiet—obviously trying to leave without waking me up—but I'd heard her.

Where did she have to go in such a hurry? It wasn't like I was some stranger. I hadn't taken her clothes off, just her shoes. She'd fucking puked in my bathroom while I held her hair, and she couldn't even stay to thank me?

I wondered if it had anything to do with her douchebag not-boyfriend.

I glanced at the time. It was odd to have slept so late. I was always up early, even on weekends. But I'd slept better than I had in a long time. I didn't want to think about why. It must have been having a warm body next to me. These guest cottages got cold at night.

I rolled over and caught a whiff of Zoe on my sheets. Instant erection. Fuck. I hated the way she still did that to me. I was not a horny teenager with no control over his dick. Those days were long over. As were my days of being turned on by Zoe.

Ex-wife, Roland. She's your ex-wife. Emphasis on the ex part.

My phone buzzed on the nightstand. A text from Cooper.

Cooper: OMG so hungover. Need sustenance. Wanna come?

Me: Where?

Cooper: Ray's Diner

Me: That place is still open?

Cooper: Ya. Best breakfast ever.

Cooper: Come with me. Chase being a dick and won't.

Cooper: I need a breakfast buddy.

I shook my head. A breakfast buddy? Was he twelve? Although Ray's Diner did have great breakfast, especially when you were hungover. Zoe and I had—

Nope. Didn't matter who I'd been there with in the past. But their breakfast did sound good, so I texted Cooper that I'd meet him there.

Coop looked rough when I got to the diner. He wore a pair of aviator sunglasses and his hair was messier than usual.

"You look awful," I said as I sat in the booth across from him.

"Shh. You don't have to yell."

"I'm not yelling," I said. "I'm talking in a normal voice."

"Oh my god, stop talking," Cooper said, touching his temples.

"Have too much fun last night?" I asked, practically whispering.

"You could say that," Cooper said. "That is the last time I play Never Have I Ever with hard liquor. But those assholes had it in for me. The game was rigged."

"How do you rig Never Have I Ever?" I asked.

"By asking questions they know I'll have to drink to. Every. Single. Fucking. Time."

"Who were you with?" I asked.

"Just some friends," he said. "No, wait. Ex-friends. Fuck those guys."

The waitress came to our table holding a glass coffee pot. She looked to be in her fifties, with smile lines around her eyes and gray roots showing in her bleached blond hair. She looked familiar, and I wondered if she was the same waitress who'd worked here ten years ago when I'd been more of a regular.

Cooper grinned up at her as she filled our coffee mugs.

"Hey, Jo," he said, whipping off his sunglasses. "You're looking especially beautiful this morning."

Jo grinned at him. “Thank you, sugarplum. You look like hell, but I’d still take you home with me.”

“Of course you would,” he said. “And it would be mind-blowing. We should really take our flirtation to the next level someday.”

“As if you could handle this much woman,” she said with a wink. “What can I get you, baby?”

“Jo, I feel like death warmed over and the only cure is your Sunday special,” he said.

“It’s not Sunday,” she said.

“Isn’t it? I lost track,” he said. “But please, Jo. If I ask really nice? What if I give you a back rub? It could be a sexy back rub. I’ll grind your ass while I do it. Trust me, it will be worth it. I give amazing back rubs.”

Jo appeared to be trying very hard to keep a straight face.

“Please, Jo,” Cooper said, sliding off the bench seat and dropping to his knees in front of her. “Do you want me to beg? I’m not too proud. I need what only you can give me.”

“Get up,” she said, a laugh finally escaping her lips. “One Sunday special.”

“You are a goddess,” Cooper said, getting back into the booth. “The sun rises and sets at your command, O gorgeous one.”

Jo rolled her eyes and looked at me. “Sunday special for you too, honey?”

“Sounds great,” I said, and she left to take our orders to the kitchen.

“Where’s Chase?” I asked.

Cooper slumped and slipped his glasses back on. “Home. He didn’t want to get up. I think his exact words were, let me die in peace, you asshole.”

The bell jingled as the door opened behind me. Cooper sat up straight and pulled his sunglasses off again, his face lighting up with a smile.

“Brynnness!”

I glanced over my shoulder. Our little sister Brynn came in, followed closely by Zoe. I should have known. They’d been drinking last night. Of course Zoe would have brought her here for a morning-after breakfast.

Zoe met my eyes and I regretted my decision to have her sleep at my place. Now it just felt awkward and weird. I should have let Ben take her home.

“Hey, Coop,” Brynn said. She looked as bad as Cooper.

“Brynnness, my baby sister,” he said. “Why didn’t you tell me you were in town?”

She rolled her eyes, hesitating at the booth behind us. I really hoped she and Zoe would sit there instead of with us.

“I only got here yesterday,” she said. “I was going to text you later. I’m just... not feeling great.”

Zoe slid into the booth. She was right behind me, but that was fine. Better than next to me. Or worse, across the table where I’d have to avoid looking at her.

“What’s the matter?” Cooper asked. “You sick?”

“Um, no.” Brynn sat with Zoe. “I’m fine, Coop. I just need some breakfast.”

Cooper’s eyebrows drew in and he glanced at me, then back at the girls. “What are you doing way over there? Come sit.”

“I love you, Coop, but you’re a little much for me this morning,” she said. “Let me eat first.”

He slumped in his seat again and crossed his arms.

“Quit pouting,” I said. “She’s fine.”

“My best friend won’t get out of bed to have breakfast with me,” he said. “And my baby sister doesn’t want to sit with me. This is the most depressing day ever.”

I didn’t blame Brynn for wanting to sit behind us. Cooper was a lot to handle, and Brynn must have felt like shit after her night with Zo.

Jo brought our breakfasts—two huge plates piled high with eggs, hash browns, French toast, sausage links, and bacon—and Cooper gushed at her again, promising to marry her when he decided to settle down. Thankfully, the food seemed to distract Cooper from his pouting.

I ate in silence for a while. There wasn't much need for me to talk—Cooper did enough of it by himself. He babbled between bites about everything—the winery, his vineyards, a movie he'd seen last week, the game of basketball he'd played with some friends. Apparently he still had it. I just nodded occasionally. I wasn't used to this much Cooper-time.

Brynn's voice behind me caught my attention. She was speaking softly, but I could still hear her.

"I just feel stupid, you know?" she said.

"Don't," Zoe said. "None of this is your fault. You need to get that through your head right now. Do not blame yourself for Austin being a douchebag."

"I know," Brynn said. "But how am I going to face everyone back at school? They're all going to know."

"Fuck them," Zoe said. "All of them. If they judge you because of this, they're shitty people and don't deserve your time."

I wasn't trying to listen, but Cooper had miraculously quieted down, so it was impossible not to hear them. Austin must have been the guy who cheated on Brynn. God, I hated the idea of her having a boyfriend at school. And one who cheated on her? The idea of it made my blood run hot.

No one deserved to be cheated on—ever—but Brynn was so young. How old was she, now? Nineteen? Twenty? She must have turned twenty on her last birthday. Holy shit, that's how old Zoe had been when we'd gotten married. Had we really been that young?

"Look," Zoe said, "obviously Austin was not the love of your life. Think of him as a learning experience. We all have them."

"Yeah, I guess," Brynn said.

Was that what I was to Zoe? A learning experience?

“You’re young,” Zoe said. “You should be having fun right now. There’s no need for serious. Go back to school and have a fling or something. Get that jackass out of your system.”

Have a fling? That was the advice Zoe had for my little sister?

I shifted in my seat so I was partially turned around. “A fling?”

Brynn raised her eyebrows, and Zoe glanced back at me.

“What about a fling?” Zoe asked.

“That’s what you’re telling her to do?” I asked.

“Why not?” Zoe asked. “She’s a twenty-year-old woman who just suffered a breakup. A fling is a great way to get over someone.”

“Breakup?” Cooper asked, as if he’d suddenly realized the rest of us were still here. “Brynnness, did someone break up with you?”

“Cooper, it’s fine,” she said. “Don’t.”

Cooper got up and slid into the booth next to Brynn, but I wasn’t paying attention to them.

“How is that good advice?” I asked Zoe.

She turned so she was facing me, her eyes blazing. “Excuse me?”

“It’s a fair question,” I said. “You’re telling an impressionable girl—who has always looked up to you like you’re a rock star—to go be some guy’s fuck buddy for a while?”

“Okay, first, you said fuck buddy, not me,” she said. “Second, she’s a woman, not a girl.”

Cooper’s voice rose. “Brynnness, I will beat the shit out of that sniveling little punk.”

“Cooper, stop,” Brynn said.

I ignored Cooper, my eyes still on Zoe. “Regardless, just because you have some guy who gets in your pants without any commitment doesn’t mean it’s a good idea for Brynn.”

“Is that what this is about?” she asked. “I’ve already told you, Van is none of your business.”

“No, who you sleep with is definitely none of my business,” I said. “We are in complete agreement there. But it is my business when you start putting shitty ideas in my sister’s head.”

“Seriously?” she asked. “You haven’t seen Brynn in a year and a half, and suddenly you think you get to worry about her?”

“She’s my fucking sister, Zoe.”

“And she’s not mine?” Zoe asked. “I’m not a Miles anymore, so I don’t get to be the one to help her through a crisis? That’s bullshit, Roland. You can’t waltz in here and act like you have all the answers when you don’t even give a shit.”

Her words stung—a lot. A hot ball of anger coiled in my gut.

“How the fuck would you know what I care about?” I asked. “This is my family. Of course I give a shit.”

“Could have fooled me,” she said.

What the hell had just happened? How did we go from my sister having a fling to Zoe throwing my relationship with my family in my face?

“This isn’t about me,” I said.

“I thought everything was about you,” she said.

“Why the fuck are we fighting about this?” I pulled out my wallet and tossed some money on the table. I needed to get out of here. “Don’t tell my sister to do stupid shit.”

“Um, the sister is right here and can probably decide for herself what is and isn’t stupid,” Brynn said.

I just grunted as I got up and slipped my wallet into my pocket. “You’re welcome for cleaning up your vomit last night.”

I didn’t wait for Zoe’s reply. Just stalked out the door, my heart pounding against my ribs.

Roland

Whatever. Forget it, I have to go to work.

~Text from Roland, four years ago

I spent the next week basically in seclusion. I went from the cottage to the office and back again. Ate when I needed to. Slept at night. And worked.

My CEO was fine with me telecommuting for a while, but I had at least three conference calls a day. I worked a full day for my real job, then turned my attention to Salishan. It kept me up late most nights, but at least I successfully avoided everyone.

Brynn went back to school. Or at least, I assumed she did. Her car wasn't outside anymore, and the guest cottage next door was once again empty. I caught glimpses of Cooper a few times, but he was busy with his own responsibilities. My mom tried to talk me into having dinner with her and Dad, but I made up an excuse. I didn't want to deal with him. Leo was even more of a recluse than I was. I tended to forget he was around, he so rarely came out.

And then there was Zoe.

She was around, all right. She had to be, because my fucking parents employed her. That had never bothered me before, but hearing her coming and going—her footsteps, her office door—left me constantly on edge. I didn't like fighting with her—I never had—but I didn't know why it mattered, now. Why I couldn't just do what I needed to do and quit thinking about her?

Besides, were we really fighting? That implied something that was ongoing. As it was, we'd argued, I'd gotten pissed, and I'd left. That meant it was over. It wasn't like we had a relationship to repair. I wasn't sleeping on the couch because my wife was mad at me.

No, I was sleeping on sheets that still smelled like her.

Fuck.

Friday night, the sun had gone down before I realized how late it was. I'd eaten a quick dinner at my desk earlier, but it felt like I looked up and suddenly it was ten-thirty.

I pinched the bridge of my nose and stretched my back. This chair was shit. If I'd known I'd be here for so long, I would have ordered a better one. At this point, it probably didn't matter. I was on the verge of just walking away from the whole place, anyway. Booking a flight back to San Francisco and leaving this mess to my father. I knew that would put my mom in a bad place, but my dad pushed back against every suggestion I made. I didn't know if I'd be able to help more than I already had.

Regardless, I was done for the day. I closed things down and headed outside.

I found Cooper leaning against his truck. He looked up at me and a shit-eating grin crossed his face.

"It emerges from its den," Cooper said, adopting a terrible Australian accent. "The corporate executive is rarely seen this early in the evening, preferring instead to remain hunched over a laptop until the wee hours of the morning."

"Hilarious," I said.

He laughed. "I know, I'm fucking hysterical. What are you up to tonight? Wait, never mind. I already know the answer. You're working."

"I was," I said. "You going out tonight? Or heading home?"

"Neither, man, I have shit to do." He pulled his phone out of his pocket and glanced at the screen before putting it back. "Just waiting to hear from Chase."

"What shit do you have to do on a Friday night?" I asked. "Especially with Chase? Picking up girls or something?"

He shrugged. "Sometimes, yeah. But we have a more important mission tonight."

“Mission?” I asked. “Does this have anything to do with Brynn’s boyfriend at school?”

“Nah,” he said. “Leo and I already took care of that.”

“What did you do?”

“Nothing permanent,” he said, his voice casual. “Just fucked with him a little bit.”

I decided the less I knew about that, the better. “Then what are you doing tonight?”

“Why, do you want to help?”

“Help with what?”

He eyed me for a second, nodding slowly. “Yeah, you definitely want to help with this.”

“Are you going to tell me what we’re doing?”

“Nope.” He brought out his phone again and typed something.

I glanced back toward the Big House. Lights glowed in the windows and soft music drifted out from the back terrace. Zoe was probably in there somewhere, working a late event.

Cooper’s phone rang, and he put it up to his ear. “Yeah. Okay. Yep, Leo’s set. Fuck yeah, he did. I know, we should have. Oh shit, really? Oh my god, that’s perfect. Yeah, he’s coming with me. Just stay out of sight, we’ll be there in a few.”

“Was that Chase?” I asked after he hung up.

“Yep.” His eyes lit up with an intensity that made me very nervous. “Let’s go.”

“I’m going to regret this, aren’t I?” I asked.

He grinned. “Maybe. But I doubt it.”

Against my better judgment, I got in Cooper’s truck. We headed out of town on the highway. I thought about asking where we were going, but had a feeling he wouldn’t tell me. He turned up the music and drummed the steering wheel to the beat. Belted out the lyrics. Thankfully his voice wasn’t terrible.

We got to Tilikum about half an hour later, and he drove straight toward the college campus. When he pulled into the parking lot of a bar called the Rowdy Bear, I figured he'd been fucking with me. He was going out, probably just meeting Chase here. I had no idea why he hadn't said so up front. Or why we'd come all the way here for a drink when there were perfectly good bars in Echo Creek.

"So, your mission is drinking at a bar?" I asked as we got out.

"Nope," he said. "But we're going to act like it. So go in and order something. You're part of our cover."

"Your cover? Cooper, what the hell are you talking about?"

"You'll see," he said.

There was a hint of humor in his voice—a tone I was all too familiar with. He used to sound like that when he was pulling a prank on me or Leo.

Knowing I was probably about to be the butt of one of Coop's jokes, I followed him inside.

The place was packed. Every stool along the bar was taken, as were most of the booths and tables. The pool tables had games going, and small groups of people stood in knots around the room. Mostly a college crowd. It reminded me of late nights getting drunk on cheap well drinks with Zoe.

I tried to push that image out of my head. But it was tough to walk into a place like this on a busy Friday night and not think of her in a black tank top and jeans, her makeup a little smudged, her eyes glassy.

Chase appeared from somewhere in the crowd. "It's about time."

"We came right over," Cooper said. "What's going on in here?"

"Some girl's twenty-first birthday party," Chase said.

"Holy shit, are you serious?" Cooper looked wide-eyed toward the bar. "Fucking perfect."

Sure enough, there was a group of girls in clubbing outfits—sequined tube tops and halters, showing a lot of skin. Tight skirts. Stripper heels. Most of them had matching plastic crowns. But the birthday girl stood out, with a hot pink feather boa around her neck and a large crown with a sparkling 21 on the front.

I watched Cooper and Chase as they eyed the party. This was their mission? If Cooper had told me he was going to crash some college chick’s birthday party, I definitely would have passed. And this seemed odd, even for them. They were twenty-six, so not that much older than these girls. But creeping on a bunch of drunk twenty-one-year-olds seemed kinda low. These girls were basically Brynn’s age.

“Guys, there are better ways to meet girls,” I said.

“No shit,” Cooper said. “Hey, that table is open. I’ll grab it before someone else does. Go get us beers.”

I was about to argue, but Cooper and Chase pushed their way through the crowd toward the open table.

Whoops and hollers in high-pitched female voices came from the birthday party end of the bar, so I veered toward a clearer space. One of the bartenders—a petite girl with a red pixie cut and at least seven visible piercings—got my three beers, and I took them to the table.

“Did you get any good ones yet?” Chase asked.

I set the beers down and sat in the open chair. “Good what?”

“This one is pretty good,” Cooper said, holding his phone out so Chase could look.

“Please tell me you aren’t taking pictures of those girls,” I said.

“Shit, no,” Cooper said, rolling his eyes. “Come on, we have morals. A few at least. Those girls are like Brynn’s age.”

“Then what the fuck is going on?” I asked.

“Dude, he’s gonna do a body shot off the birthday girl,” Chase said.

“Oh my god, this is perfect.” Cooper raised his phone, keeping it low toward the table like he was just texting.

The birthday girl was indeed laid out on the bar, and some guy was sprinkling salt up her stomach. She pulled her shirt over her bra, and he sprinkled salt in the valley between her tits. He placed a lime wedge in her mouth, then turned and flashed a smile at her friends.

Holy shit. Was that Van?

He got up on the bar and knelt in front of her, then pushed her legs open and leaned down to lick up her belly. Her friends cheered as he stuck his face between her tits. When he came up smiling, someone handed him a shot glass and he tossed back the tequila. The girl’s legs were around his waist and he made a show of grinding her a few times while he took the lime wedge out of her mouth with his teeth. Then he spit the wedge on the floor and kissed her.

I was so fucking angry a haze of red tinged my vision. My jaw clenched tight and I balled my hands into fists. This piece of shit was sleeping with Zoe, but here he was literally dry-humping some girl on a goddamn bar.

He got down and took a dramatic bow while the party-goers cheered. The birthday girl was clearly drunk off her ass. Van and one of her friends had to help her down. She stumbled, and her skirt was hiked up so high it was practically a belt. Van grabbed a handful of her ass with one hand, pulled her hair back with the other, and planted a raunchy kiss on her already open mouth.

“Holy shit,” Chase said.

I’d been about to say the same thing, but Chase was laughing.

“What the fuck are you laughing about?” I asked. “Isn’t that the prick Zoe was with?”

“Yeah, exactly.” Chase turned to Cooper. “Did you get the whole thing?”

“Every second,” Cooper said.

“Should we stay and get more?” Chase asked. “Or do you think that’s enough?”

“I want to see where this goes,” Cooper said, his eyes still on the bar.

Wait, were they taking pictures of Van? “Are you guys trying to catch him cheating on her?”

“Basically,” Cooper said. “The problem is, they’re not exclusive, so what’s really cheating? Zoe knows he probably sleeps with other girls. But this? She is not going to be able to ignore this.”

“We got the fucker this time,” Chase said.

“I take it you guys don’t like this guy,” I said.

“No, I want to smash his fucking face in,” Cooper said.

Another one of the girls had her shirt pulled up to her chin and a plastic shot cup wedged between her tits. Van grabbed her boobs and squeezed while he took the cup between his teeth, then rocked his head backward to swallow the liquor.

“You didn’t say anything about hating him when we saw them last time,” I said.

Cooper typed something on his phone. “You didn’t ask.”

I took a deep breath to keep from smacking my brother upside the head. My eyes flicked to the bar. Van had one arm around the birthday girl—leaning on him was probably the only reason she was still standing—while he made out with her friend. He broke the kiss and turned to the birthday girl again. Shoved his tongue in her mouth with the second girl still hanging on his other arm. Cooper was recording the whole thing.

Why the fuck was Zoe giving this guy the time of day? She used to like to party, but not like this. Even if she had been single at twenty-one, she wouldn’t have let some guy slobber all over her while he grabbed some other girl’s tits.

“Jesus, is this what Zoe does on her nights off?” The image of that prick licking salt off her skin made me want to fly across the bar and break my beer over his face.

“No, he wouldn’t pull shit like this when Zoe is around,” Cooper said. “He acts like he’s not a total scumbag when he’s with her, so she doesn’t know.”

“Why the hell is she with him?” I asked.

Cooper shrugged. “I told you, she’s not with him. I guess that’s why she doesn’t worry about what he’s really like. I’ve been trying to tell her for months, but she just blows it off, like it doesn’t matter because she’s not in a relationship with him.”

“But she’s sleeping with him.”

“Yeah,” Cooper said. “Sometimes.”

That wasn’t Zoe. The wrongness of it screamed at me. “That’s fucked up. She deserves better than that.”

Cooper narrowed his eyes at me, like he wasn’t sure what to think of what I’d said. “Yeah, she does.”

“So why does she do it?”

“I guess he’s a good fuck,” Chase said.

My eyes landed on Chase and for the second time since I’d been back, I wanted to drag him outside and beat the shit out of him.

“Dude, no.” Cooper shook his head.

Chase winced. “Sorry.”

“Come on, Coop,” I said. “You know her as well as anyone. Zoe should not be some asshole’s side piece.”

“No, she shouldn’t,” Cooper said.

“But she’s dated, right?” I asked. “You know, since me. She’s been in an actual relationship?”

“Yeah,” Cooper said. “Twice.”

“What happened?” I asked.

He shrugged again, and that nonchalant attitude was seriously pissing me off. “I don’t know. She broke up with them.”

“Did she break it off, or did they?” I asked.

“Why does it matter?” Cooper asked.

“Because I want to know what the fuck happened to her.”

Cooper stared at me, his silence stretching out long enough to make me shift in my chair, uncomfortable.

“She got fucking divorced, man.” The usual lightness was gone from Cooper’s tone. “That’s what happened to her. And as for the details, here’s the thing: Zoe is my friend, and I love the shit out of her. So yeah, I know about the guys she dated and why they broke up. I know what she’s said about this thing with Van, and why she’s doing it. But I’m not going to tell you all her personal shit. If you want to know, go ask her.”

“Coop, he’s leaving with two of them,” Chase said.

“I don’t have a good angle,” Cooper said. “Can you get it?”

“Yeah.” Chase held up his phone and pretended to look at something on the screen while he took pictures of Van leaving the bar with two very drunk college girls. “Got it.”

“If you’re such good friends with her, why doesn’t she listen to you?” I asked. “Why is she still sleeping with that prick?”

Cooper’s brow creased, and he looked at me like I was crazy. “You were married to her. Are you telling me you don’t remember how stubborn she is? Besides, we’ve never caught him doing anything on this scale. Hitting on some girl, sure. But she wasn’t expecting him to be faithful, so that wasn’t enough.”

“Let me get this straight,” I said. “You planned this?”

“Yeah,” Cooper said. “Took us too long to come up with the idea, though. We should have done this months ago.”

“How did you know he’d be here?” I asked.

“We didn’t,” Cooper said. “Chase followed him.”

I was finally realizing what this was all about. They hated the guy Zoe was sleeping with, and they’d tried to get her to break things off with him, but she was being stubborn. No surprise there. So they had come up with a plan to catch him being especially douchey so they could show her.

Cooper patted my shoulder, like he could tell what I was thinking. “Makes sense now, doesn’t it? We are pretty fucking brilliant. And I told you you’d want to help us tonight.”

“What are you doing with the pictures?” I asked.

“And video,” Chase said. “You recorded the whole body shot, right?”

“Oh hell yeah.” Cooper tapped on his phone screen. “I’m sending it all to Leo.”

“What’s Leo going to do with it?” I asked.

“Put it online,” Cooper said.

“Why?” I asked. “Why not just show her?”

Cooper gave me another you’re an idiot look. “You’re supposed to be the smart one in the family. If I show her, I’d have to admit we did this, and that’s not going to happen. Then she might find out about the other shit we’ve pulled on him.”

“What other shit?” I asked.

Chase and Coop grinned at each other.

“Let’s see... there was the ten-gallon bucket of lube we shipped to the bar where he works—in his name, of course,” Cooper said. “We followed that with a shipment of condoms, size extra small.”

“We started a rumor that he does gay porn,” Chase said. “The gif Leo made is really convincing, but I don’t think Zoe ever saw it.”

“I’ve lost track of the number of times I’ve put gum under his car door handle,” Cooper said.

“We recruited the barista over at the coffee place in town,” Chase said. “I’m pretty sure she spits in his coffee every day.”

“Whenever he’s at the same bar as us, we buy some random guy a drink and have the bartender say it’s from him,” Cooper said. “He’s almost gotten his ass kicked like five times.”

“And one guy wanted to take him home,” Chase said. “I think that dude might have heard the gay porn rumors.”

“You two are children,” I said. “You realize that, right?”

They just shrugged.

“Anyway, Leo said he could get this shit up on Facebook and Instagram and stuff, and make sure Van is tagged or whatever,” Cooper said.

“Leo?”

“Oh my god, keep up,” Cooper said. “Yes, Leo. Don’t ask me how he can do it, because I don’t know, and I don’t ask him questions like that. It’s not my area. I just know that he said he could, and it won’t look like we were involved. In about five minutes, a video of Van sucking salt off that girl’s tits is going to be all over the Internet. Then we sit back and let things happen naturally.”

I had to give it to them, they’d come up with a decent plan. Especially if Leo could pull that off—although I didn’t want to know how. It sounded like it might be illegal.

Cooper finally took a sip of his beer. “Well, boys, I think our work here is done.” He turned to me. “Thanks for your help.”

“I didn’t do anything,” I said.

“You bought the beer.” Cooper lifted his phone and snapped a picture of me. “And now I have proof you were here, so don’t rat us out.”

I shook my head and took a drink. Ratting them out to Zoe was the last thing I was going to do. Were they complete juveniles? Yeah. Was I proud of them? Hell yeah. I wanted them to take this guy down. And it felt good to know Zoe had them on her side.

“I didn’t see a thing,” I said. “We were just out having a couple beers.”

We finished our drinks, and it wasn’t long before Cooper and Chase had gone to sit with a table full of girls. They each had one on their lap. They motioned for me to join them, but I shook my head. I had no interest in some random hook-up.

Mostly, I thought about Zoe. Wondering how soon she’d see the damning evidence. If I’d know when she did. Regardless of what she'd said to me at breakfast last weekend, I did give a shit. About my family. About her. Just because things hadn't worked out between us didn't mean I couldn't care. I just didn't like seeing her with someone who could disrespect her like that. She deserved better.

She deserved better than either of us.

Zoe

Van opened the door just a few seconds after I knocked. He was shirtless, in just a pair of sweats, running a towel through his hair.

“Hey,” he said, looking me up and down. “You look hot.”

I glanced down at myself. I was wearing a slouchy t-shirt and a pair of skinny jeans. Casual and arguably cute, but I hadn’t been going for hot, necessarily. It felt like he was just making shit up.

“Come on in.” he said.

“Thanks.” I stepped across the threshold of his apartment and my back prickled. It was a weird sensation, almost like déjà vu. But I didn’t have the impression of repetition. More like foreboding.

I needed to calm my ass down, but I was wound up so tight, I felt like I might snap in half. I’d been on edge all week. Monday I’d been so fucking distracted, I’d almost missed an appointment with a client. Thankfully, I’d been wearing a stain-free shirt, and had been able to rush downstairs to meet them. But I hated feeling so unhinged.

The answer was simple. I’d take it out on Van.

Sexually, of course.

That was what he was good for, wasn’t it? He wasn’t a bad lay, and I usually got off. And I needed it bad. Like, bad bad. Like nothing I’d done to myself in the past few weeks had done nearly enough to relieve the pressure that built every day.

It was Roland, but I staunchly refused to believe it had anything to do with the way he looked in a button-down shirt, or how good he’d felt when I’d slept in his bed. It most definitely had nothing to do with the way he smelled, or the fact that sometimes if I played my cards right, I could dart out into the hallway after he walked by and get a tiny whiff of him.

Not that I'd ever done that. I had way too much self-respect.

Okay, no I didn't.

But no, it was none of those things. It was the fact that his very presence at Salishan Cellars emitted a stream of negative energy so potent, I was in a constant state of stress. I could feel him through the walls. Sense every furrow of his brow. Every heavy sigh. He was brooding and grumpy and I barely saw him, but he was basically ruining my life.

Which was why I needed to have stupid, meaningless sex with a guy named Van.

Perfectly legit.

"You want a drink?" Van asked.

"That would be great." I very, very much wanted a drink. That would make all of this so much easier.

I put my purse down and sat on the edge of the couch while he went into the kitchen. His apartment wasn't big, but it was always immaculately clean. Almost oddly clean, for a guy. It was nothing like Cooper and Chase's place, which made you wonder if you should sit or just stand and hope you didn't touch anything. Even when it was clean, the goofball boys' house smelled like them. Like guys. It wasn't a gross smell, actually. It was a bit like guys' deodorant and maybe aftershave or their shampoo, mixed with a hint of that man smell that on some guys was fucking delicious.

Van's apartment always smelled like cleaning products. At first, I'd wondered if he was a germaphobe. But he didn't seem to wash his hands all the time or worry about wiping off tables or the bar top when we were out. At this point, I figured he just preferred to keep things clean.

I hadn't seen Van in a while. Not since we'd left the bar together in front of Roland—and I'd gone home alone. He'd texted me earlier to see if I wanted to come over—no pretense of anything but sex, he hadn't even asked me to meet him for drinks first—and I'd waffled for an hour before answering.

Why was I being so weird about his? I liked sex, and sex with Van was... well, it was fine. It didn't mean anything, and I wanted it that way. I didn't have feelings for him, and he didn't for me, and none of that was a problem. It was like I'd told Brynn. Sometimes having a fling was a great way to get over a broken heart.

Only my heart hadn't been broken last week. It had been years. What did I still have to get over?

Van came back with my drink, and I shook off that thought.

"Thanks," I said.

He nodded—more of a tip of his chin—and sat beside me. Close. Because why wouldn't he sit close? He'd texted me for a booty call, and I'd come over, so he had every reason to believe this little visit had a happy ending.

I took a generous swallow of the whiskey.

His phone dinged. He had this weird chime sound when he got messages and for no good reason, it always made my skin crawl. He picked it up off the coffee table and swiped the screen with his thumb, his drink perched on his bent knee.

I leaned back and waited. So he was just going to sit there looking at his phone? I took another drink.

His forehead creased, and he flicked his thumb up and down the screen. "What the hell?"

"What's going on?"

"Who put this shit on Facebook?" He stood and started pacing, still looking at his phone. "That crazy bitch."

"Why are you freaking out?" I dug my phone out of my purse and opened Facebook. I was friends with Van, so maybe I could see what had him so riled up.

After finding his profile, I scrolled down. There were a couple of status updates. A bathroom mirror selfie from earlier that made me cringe, even if he did have decent abs.

Noise blared from his phone and he jerked, like it surprised him. "A video? Who the fuck..."

I scrolled down more and came face to face with a photo of Van. Although he was kissing some girl, there was no doubt it was him. She was dressed in a shiny silver top and a skirt that was barely long enough to cover her ass. Hanging on his other side was another girl wearing a plastic crown and pink boa around her shoulders.

That wasn't the only photo.

A sick feeling spread through my stomach as I scrolled through the rest. Van kissing the pink boa girl. Taking a shot glass from between some girl's boobs with his teeth. Walking out the door with both girls, one on each arm.

"What the hell is this?" I asked.

I scrolled again, and a video started to play. Distorted crowd noise mixed with music in the background, and a guy leaned over a girl lying on the bar.

"Oh shit—Zoe, don't," Van said.

He lunged for me, but I stood up and moved a few steps away, my eyes glued to my phone screen. Even in the video's low light, I could tell the guy on the bar was Van. He leaned down and licked his way up the girl's stomach, then buried his face in her boobs. The taste of bile hit the back of my tongue as he took something out of her mouth and dry-humped her a few times.

"Are you fucking kidding me with this?" I asked. The car-wreck of a video wasn't over, but I tapped pause. I didn't want to see any more.

"It was just a party," he said.

"Did you or did you not do the world's raunchiest body shot off a drunk girl, and then leave with her and someone else?" I asked.

"It's not a big deal," he said. "We were all a little happy last night. Things got carried away."

"This was last night?" I asked, holding up my phone. "Where did you take those girls?"

"What does it matter?" he asked.

“You brought them here, didn’t you?” I asked. “Both of them. Less than twenty-four hours ago, you had two drunk girls here, in your apartment. And you called me to come over?”

“Don’t worry about it,” he said. “I don’t need more recovery time or anything. I’ve got plenty to go around.”

“You think I’m worried your dick won’t work?” I asked.

“It’s not like you and I are a thing,” he said. “I thought we both understood that.”

“I know we’re not, but that doesn’t mean I’m cool with this,” I said. “These girls barely look old enough to drink.”

“It was her twenty-first birthday,” he said.

I stared at Van, the taste of bile returning with a vengeance. “Twenty-one? You’re thirty.”

“So?”

“Oh my god.” I put a hand to my forehead. “You honestly think this is okay?”

“Zoe, I had some fun last night. They had fun, too. That’s all it was. And that’s all this is,” he said, gesturing between us. “Is there a time limit I’m supposed to wait before we can hang out again if I’ve had someone else over? Do we really need a set of rules, here? Besides, it’s not like you’ve been available lately.”

“I have work,” I said. “And a life.”

“Right,” he said. “I’m sure it has nothing to do with your ex-husband being in town.”

“What?”

“Your ex shows up and suddenly you’re always busy,” he said. “I don’t know what you expected me to do. Wait for you?”

“Roland doesn’t have anything to do with... with anything,” I said.

“Sure.”

“Let me get this straight. My ex being in town somehow justifies all this.” I held up my phone again. The image was frozen on him on top of the girl.

“Look, you’re cool to hang out with, and the sex is great,” he said. “And I have never given a shit about who else is fucking you. You want to bang your ex, go ahead. But don’t expect me to suddenly become a fucking priest while you’re getting boned by someone else. I’m in this for a good time, and if I don’t have it with you, I’ll have it with someone else. No big deal.”

“I’m not banging my ex,” I said. “God, Van. No one else is fucking me.”

“I’m just saying, I don’t care. And I don’t get why you do.”

Swallowing hard, I looked away. What had I expected? We’d established in the beginning that this was just sex. We hooked up when we both felt like it. Used a condom every time. That was it. What I’d agreed to. What I’d wanted.

But it had been easier to ignore the reality of him sleeping with other women when it wasn’t being thrown in my face.

“You know what, this isn’t working for me anymore,” I said.

“Zoe.” His tone was soothing, like he was talking to an angry child. “Don’t be like that. Sit down, have another drink. I’ll rub your back, and then...”

“Seriously? You fucked not one, but two girls in here last night, and you’re trying to coax me into staying?”

“I cleaned up,” he said.

“Oh god,” I said. “That’s why it always smells like bleach in here, isn’t it? You don’t want the women you bring home to smell each other.”

“No, I just have good fucking manners,” he said. “Of course I wash the sheets in between.”

The danger of me vomiting was growing by the second. Although maybe vomiting all over Van’s bleach-soaked apartment wasn’t a bad idea.

“I’m done,” I said. How exactly was I supposed to break up with someone I wasn’t really dating? “This thing with us is over. Got that? Don't call me. Don't text. Take me off your hook-up list."

"Zoe—"

"Don't." I grabbed my purse and went for the door. "This was a mistake, and I'm done."

I left before he could argue. My stomach roiled with nausea and my heart beat uncomfortably hard. I hurried to my car and left, needing to put distance between me and Van's apartment.

What the fuck had I been thinking? That randomly having sex with some guy who didn't care about me was a good way to spend my life? That wasn't me. A few years ago, I wouldn't have even considered something like that. Sure, I loved sex, and one of the bummers of being single was not having any. But even when I was young, and my idea of an ideal Friday night was having sex where the danger of being caught was high, it still meant something to me. I'd never slept with just anyone.

Why had I compromised myself like that?

Because compromising myself was exactly what I'd done. I'd ignored what I really wanted. Settled for something so much less.

I stopped at a stop sign and sent Cooper a quick text, asking if he was home and I could come over. Some girls had their BFF to go to when they felt like shit. I had Coop and Chase. I just hoped they weren't out. I really needed them tonight.

Zoe

Cooper texted back to say they were home, so I went straight there. They lived across town from Van, closer to the winery. I parked and went up to the door.

Cooper answered. "Hey, there you are. What's up?"

"Can I come in?" I asked. "I've had a shitty night."

"Sure." He held the door open and I went inside.

I tossed my stuff down on their table and flopped onto the couch.

"What's going on?" Cooper asked. "No, wait, let me guess. How many tries do I get? How about five. Okay, first guess: You ran into Roland and he did something to piss you off."

"No, nothing about Roland," I said.

"Damn," he said. "Are you sure? Because Roland is pretty good at pissing you off."

"I'm sure," I said. "I told Van I was done. I'd say I broke up with him, but it's kind of hard to break up with a guy I was stupid enough to be sleeping with but not dating."

"Zoe, you didn't let me finish guessing. Wait." His eyes widened. "Did you just say what I think you said?"

"I broke things off with Van?"

Cooper raised his arms overhead, like he was mimicking a ref calling a touchdown. "Yes. Oh my god, finally. Zoe-bowie, I have been waiting for this day. Fuck yes."

"You're very excited," I said.

"I know," he said, his eyes huge and wild. He turned to shout over his shoulder. "Chase, Zoe's here and it's go time. Where's the box?"

“Hang on.” Chase’s voice came from his room. A few seconds later he stumbled out, pulling on a pair of sweats. “I think it’s in the closet by the door.”

“There’s a closet by the door?” Cooper asked, turning around. “Holy shit, there is. How did I not know that? This is an awesome place for a closet. I could have been putting my coat in here all this time and I didn’t even notice the door.”

Chase shrugged and pulled a dark blue shoebox out of the closet. He brought it over and handed it to me. “Here.”

“What’s this?” I was a little afraid to open it.

“It’s your break-up box,” Cooper said, sporting a big grin. “We put it together for when you broke up with Van.”

Cooper sat on the arm of the couch and tapped his leg. “Just some things we thought might help. Last time you broke up with a guy, you were sad. And I hate it when you’re sad. But let’s face it, Chase and I suck at this stuff. We figured we should be better prepared the next time. Obviously, there was a next time coming with Van. I won’t get into all the I told you so stuff, at least not tonight because your wounds are fresh and I’m way too nice of a guy to do that to you.”

“Wow, this is... really sweet. I think.” I slowly lifted the lid, slightly less afraid it contained a live spider, and took out the first thing. “Tissues. Makes sense, but I’m not going to cry over him.”

“Good, that douche doesn’t deserve it,” Cooper said. He took the little package of tissues and tossed them over his shoulder. “Fuck that. And if you did cry over him, I’d take these from you anyway because you’d be stupid to shed tears over someone so fucking unworthy.”

“Uh, Coop, tissues are good for other things, though,” Chase said.

“Which is why they aren’t in the garbage,” Cooper said. “They are quite handy to have around. If we ever went through a dry spell, I’d be buying this shit in bulk. Not that we ever go through dry spells. But shit, a dude can only go so long without blowing his load before he's basically a danger to society. Whacking it is a public service, if you think about it."

I ignored Cooper's babble about masturbation and pulled out a small, flat package wrapped in plastic. "Microwave popcorn?"

"Movie theater butter," Chase said, puffing his chest out a little bit like he was proud of himself. "When you've had a shitty day, it's always good to have an easy snack."

"Okay," I said, putting it aside, and took out a torn wrapper. "Um, this is an empty bag of M&Ms."

"Damn it, Chase, did you eat her chocolate?" Cooper asked.

"Oh, yeah, I think I did," Chase said, eyeing the box. "I meant to replace it, but I guess I forgot."

"God, you're the worst," Cooper said. "You owe her chocolate now. Seriously, I can't take you anywhere."

I almost said that it was just M&Ms and they barely qualified as chocolate, but I decided against it. This was one of the sweetest things anyone had ever done for me. I didn't want to make them feel bad for their candy choice. "Okay, what else do we have? What's the lighter for?"

"That's to burn anything you have that's his," Cooper said. "That's a thing girls do, right? Just, you know, practice fire safety and stuff."

"I don't have any of his stuff. Thanks for the option, though." I took out two DVDs and held up the first one. "Beauty and the Beast? This is a Disney cartoon."

"Yep," Chase said. "Everyone knows Belle is the best princess. She's bangin' and she loves to read. And Beast is a badass, plus he gives her a library. He's the man."

I laughed and shook my head, holding up the second movie. "Stepbrothers?"

"That movie is hilarious," Cooper said. "There's no way you'll feel bad if you watch it."

"And those go with the popcorn," Chase said.

“Hey, good one,” Cooper said. “That almost makes up for the chocolate.”

“Thanks, man,” Chase said, grinning.

“What is this?” I asked, picking up a handwritten note on a scrap of paper. “Coupon good for one free orgasm, no strings attached. Love, Chase?”

“What?” Cooper snatched the paper out of my hand. “What the hell is this?”

“It’s a free orgasm coupon,” Chase said. “If she’s single, she might need one. Obviously, you can’t do that for her. And I’m amazing at it, so...”

Cooper closed his eyes and shook his head. “Chase, no.”

“What’s the big deal?” Chase asked. “I’d need like five minutes, and she doesn’t even need to get all the way naked.”

“Five minutes?” I asked. “I don’t know, Chase. That doesn’t sound like it would get the job done.”

Chase winked at me. “Trust me. I have that shit on lockdown.”

“Zoe is pretty much my sister,” Cooper said. “Hell, she’s like your sister too. You can’t offer her a free orgasm. You can’t offer her any kind of orgasm. To give her an orgasm, you’d have to touch her there. What’s wrong with you?”

“Like my sister is not the same as being my sister,” Chase said. “My dick doesn’t recognize your social restrictions.”

“Your dick will recognize my fucking fist,” Cooper said, balling up his hand and drawing his arm back.

“Okay, boys, no one is punching anyone in the dick,” I said. “Chase, thank you, but I’ll take a rain check on that free orgasm.”

“A rain check for never,” Cooper said.

Chase’s shoulders slumped, and he scowled. “I was just trying to help.”

I laughed. Oh my god, I loved these two. “Don’t worry about the orgasm situation. If I need to get off, I’m perfectly capable of doing it myself.”

Cooper rolled his eyes. “For fuck’s sake, Zoe, don’t talk like that. You know I hate it when you give me a boner.”

Chase looked down at his crotch, then scowled at Cooper. “You ass, every time you announce that you have a boner, I lose mine.”

“What the fuck do you need a boner for right now anyway?” Cooper asked.

“Well, if you both have boners, maybe the two of you can service me together,” I said, although it was hard to get the words out because I was laughing so hard.

Cooper and Chase went silent and looked away from each other.

“What?” I asked. “Obviously I was kidding.”

Chase crossed his arms and his jaw hitched. Cooper kept his eyes on the wall.

“You guys, don’t be mad,” I said. “I was making a joke.”

“It’s not you,” Cooper said. “Don’t worry about it.”

Chase cleared his throat. “It’s just that one time we tried—”

“Chase,” Cooper snapped. “We do not speak of it. Ever.”

I glanced between the two of them. “Wait, do you mean you tried a threesome?”

Cooper stood and walked into the kitchen. “I don’t want to talk about it.”

“Some things are not all they’re cracked up to be,” Chase said. “It was a disaster.”

I opened my mouth to ask a question—because oh my god, I wanted to hear this story—but Cooper poked his head around the wall.

“We do not speak of it,” he said, enunciating each word. “Not even to you, Zoe-bowie. So don’t ask. And don’t think you can get Chase to talk. It won’t work, because he knows what will happen if he does.”

“What will happen?” Chase asked.

Cooper’s eyes narrowed, and he made a slow cutting motion across his throat. “I know where you sleep.”

Chase chuckled, but I wasn’t so sure Cooper was kidding.

He came back with three beers, one for each of us. “You ready to talk about this? Or should we just get drunk?”

“Talk about what?” I asked. “I told you what happened.”

Cooper took a deep breath and jumped onto the couch, landing with his legs stretched out. I scooted to the corner to give him room.

“Chase, have a seat, buddy. Shit’s about to get real,” Cooper said. Chase sat in a tattered armchair, and Coop’s eyes moved back to me. “I don’t mean what happened tonight. I mean the rest of it. You need to get this stuff out, or it’s going to eat you up inside. And I’m a really good listener because I’m an awesome friend. So talk.”

I stared at the beer bottle in my hand. He was right, I did need to talk. I just wasn’t sure I wanted to say out loud what was going through my mind.

“I was settling,” I said. “I didn’t want to think of it that way, but that’s what it was. I was settling for something less than I really want.”

“Why?” Cooper asked.

I hesitated for a second, thinking Cooper would keep talking. A one-word sentence wasn’t really his style. But he just kept his eyes intent on me.

“Because it was easy,” I said. “I didn’t have to worry about whether Van and I had a future because I already knew the answer was no. And with none of the uncertainty of a relationship, there was no risk either. If I didn’t give him anything, I couldn’t get hurt.”

“But?” Cooper asked.

“But if I’m sleeping with some guy, I’m not really available either,” I said. “So I was giving up the possibility of meeting the right person in favor of something short-term and pointless.”

“Good girl,” Cooper said. “This is awesome. I feel like the wise teacher on a TV show who just helped a kid learn a valuable lesson.”

“Well, thank you, Mr. Miles,” I said.

He pointed his beer bottle at me. “You’re welcome. You know you’re my favorite, so anytime. But maybe quit being stupid and fucking dumbass pieces of shit. Seriously, Zoe, that pussy of yours is worth so much more. It’s a disgrace, if you think about it. I’m kind of grossed out that his dick ever touched you. Have some self-respect.”

I laughed and rolled my eyes.

“And don’t call me Mr. Miles,” Cooper said. “It makes me think you’re talking to my dad.”

I took a long pull from my beer, feeling better than I had in a while. Cooper and Chase might be goofballs, but they were my goofballs. And I loved knowing they had my back.

Roland

Cooper's text was vague—all it said was bro it worked—but I knew exactly what he meant. Zoe had seen the footage of that jackass piece of shit being a douche at the bar the other night. And she'd revoked her status as his booty call.

Monday morning, I saw her downstairs in the lobby, talking with a client. Her hair was up, and she was dressed in a blouse tucked into pants that made her legs look a mile long. And those heels—fuck. She smiled and laughed with the woman like they were old friends.

It was irritating that she was so damn beautiful.

She had that perfect mix of classy with an edge. Like she could throw down in the boardroom and drink you under the table afterward. Her look was a far cry from the metal and alt-rock t-shirts and ripped jeans she used to wear. But this grown-up version of Zoe suited her. Made me wonder when she'd gone from the fearless girl with a propensity for crazy stunts to the professional woman running the very lucrative events department of my parents' winery.

I'd begun to realize that Zoe was a large part of why Salishan Cellars was still in business. My mom was an incredible winemaker, and our products sold well. But the winery depended heavily on the income from events. Despite the other problems, the event spaces were booked year-round. Without that, they would have gone under a long time ago.

She glanced up at me as I stood watching her from the landing at the top of the stairs. Shit. I turned and walked down to my office, feeling like an idiot.

But also a little lighter, knowing that dumbass wasn't ever going to touch her again.

Not long after I got back to my office, Leo answered my text. I'd asked him if I could come talk to him about a few things

I'd found while going through Salishan's records. I had a bad feeling about something, and I wanted to go to him first. Cooper would overreact, and I didn't want to say anything to my mom before I was sure.

I hadn't talked to Leo much since I'd been here. That wasn't unusual. Leo kept to himself. He worked for the winery, handling all the tech aspects of the business, as well as being in charge of security. He had a lot of tech training and experience, so as long as it was something he could do from his place, he took care of it. In-person stuff wasn't Leo's style. Not anymore, at least.

I was worried about Leo. My brother had never been the life of the party—that was Cooper's job—but he'd been a typical guy. Had friends. Dated girls. I didn't know much about what had happened to him in the Army. His injuries were impossible to miss, but he had more than physical scars to contend with. Cooper had said Leo never left the winery grounds. It was hard to fathom. But not only did he never leave the winery, he didn't come out of his house often, either.

He lived in what had once been the largest guest cottage. People had stopped calling it the Evergreen Cottage and now referred to it as Leo's place. He paid rent to live there, which didn't surprise me. The last thing Leo would become was a freeloader.

I walked out to his place and knocked. His muffled reply through the door sounded like come in, so I went inside.

The blinds were all down, keeping the light dim. Instead of typical living room furniture, he had an office setup with a large desk and at least half a dozen monitors. He had a TV mounted on the wall, and the other side of the room was filled with gym equipment.

Leo was in a high-backed office chair playing a computer game. He glanced back at me—over his right shoulder, like always.

“Hey.”

“What is this?” I asked, gesturing to his desk. “Your command center?”

He shrugged, and his cat jumped up and walked across his keyboard.

“Damn it, Gigz. Get down.” Despite shooing her away, he pulled the cat into his lap and started absently petting her. “What’s going on?”

“How much do you know about Dad’s business trips?” I asked.

He rotated his chair partway around, still keeping the left side of his face in shadow. “Some. Why?”

“He’s leaving again,” I said. “He was just gone for a few days, and now he’s headed somewhere else. It seems like a lot of these trips he takes are last minute.”

“Yeah,” Leo said.

“And he’ll be gone longer than he says. Last time he said overnight, but he was gone for three days. Mom never says anything about it, though. I’d assume he calls to tell her when he’ll be back when plans change, but she told me the other day she doesn’t talk to him when he’s on the road. He claims he’s too busy.”

“Honestly, I’ve always assumed Mom and Dad aren’t happy and he just likes to be away,” he said.

I nodded. That much was obvious. “That’s probably true. But there’s something else going on. It’s like money is disappearing into thin air. And he’s gone all the time. No one is really running this place. A good portion of the problem is Dad not being here to manage things.”

“You get why I called you,” Leo said. “It’s been this way for years. The foreclosure letter was just the final straw.”

“Yeah, I get it,” I said. “I just can’t get over the feeling that I’m missing something.”

“Do you want me to find out where he goes?” he asked.

“What do you mean?”

He shrugged one shoulder. “I mean, I can find out where he is.”

“Do I want to know how?” I asked.

“Probably not.”

I nodded. “Okay. Yeah, find out where he goes this week. I want to know what’s going on, and if it has anything to do with the way the bank accounts are bleeding out.”

“You got it,” he said, swiveling his chair back around to face his monitors.

“Thanks, Leo.”

I more or less forgot about putting Leo on my dad’s trail over the next few days. A disaster at work almost had me on a last-minute flight to San Francisco, but I was able to delay it a few days. I booked a flight home for Friday, which would give me time to wrap up more loose ends here.

With my dad gone so much, I was practically running the winery. He’d told me to stay out of things, but I’d started ignoring him and doing it anyway. I was streamlining the ordering and distribution channels. Working with Cooper to formulate output estimates based on the varieties of grapes he was currently growing. We had outdated contracts to revise, vendors we were still paying for services we didn’t need, and a long list of other issues Dad had been neglecting.

I still had moments when I wondered why I stayed. I could go home and get back to my life. Arguably, I’d done enough. But I still worried about their ability to keep things in the black, and I didn’t want to know what it would do to my mom to lose her family’s land.

And there was a challenge here. I was in my element when I was dealing with the winery. I understood the business inside and out. And my experience and education meant I understood how to make this business better. A lot better. I was making headway with things, and I had to admit, it was satisfying.

I told myself it was all about Salishan and my family. It had nothing to do with Zoe. Nothing to do with us both being single—completely single. Nothing to do with how I felt when I was around her.

Because, to be honest, I didn't know how to feel.

I was drawn to her, and yet frustrated that she was so deep under my skin. She was like a drug I couldn't quit. And I didn't know whether it was an addiction that would ultimately be my salvation, or my downfall.

Leo texted me partway through the day. I was on a call with my office in San Francisco, but a strange sense of dread hit me when I read his text afterward.

Leo: You're going to want to see this.

As I walked over to his place, I had a feeling I already knew what he was going to tell me. The folder filled with pictures and marked-up maps confirmed it.

Dad had a mistress.

The first few pictures I thumbed through could have been of Dad with a business contact or colleague. They were having a meal in a restaurant—a nice one. But the rest told a different story. There were photos of him walking with her, holding her hand. Kissing her. Ushering her into a car. Leading her into a four-star hotel.

Despite the fact that I wasn't surprised, it still made my stomach turn and my blood run hot with anger.

I tossed the pictures aside. "Do you think Mom knows?"

Leo pushed some of the paperwork around on the table. "If she does, she's been hiding it well."

"Why would she do that?" I asked. "Why would she let him get away with this shit?"

“To protect us,” Leo said. “And the winery. She’s always been like that. Even though we’re all adults, she still does it.”

“Fuck,” I said, pinching the bridge of my nose. “This is an absolute cluster.”

“What are you going to do?” Leo asked.

I almost snapped at him, asking why the hell this was my problem. I was supposed to be on a plane tomorrow, back to San Francisco. Why did I have to be the one to deal with this?

But if not me, who?

If I hugged my mom goodbye and told her I was sorry she’d just found out her husband was cheating, but I really had to get back to work... then what? She could kick him out. File for divorce. Cooper would be there to comfort her—he was better at it than I was. Leo would be here to quietly support her. She’d have Zoe. Brynn could stay with her for a while.

But who would make sure Salishan didn’t run itself into the ground?

Mom stood to lose more than her marriage. It was obvious that was already dead and gone. But without someone to run the winery—to oversee all the complexities of the business—they’d never survive. Salishan would die, and my mom would lose the place she loved.

Or worse, she’d take my dad back because she wanted him here for the business.

I took a deep breath. “I’m going to cancel my flight. Then I’m going to show all this to Mom. Cooper, too. And we’ll need to call Brynn. I’m not sweeping this under the rug. This has to come out and he has to be held accountable.”

I grabbed all the damning evidence and went in search of my mom.

She was over at the Big House, training the tasting room staff on the new wine selections. They all sat at the bar while she stood behind it, her face lit up as she described her new seasonal red blend. She poured them each a small glass so everyone could sample it for themselves. I took a seat at the long table on the other side of the room and waited, the knot in my gut growing.

After she finished, the staff gradually filed out, leaving the two of us alone.

She smiled and brought out two fresh glasses, then poured. “Want to try it?”

“Of course.” I walked over to the bar and took a seat, putting the file folder on the bar top next to me.

My wine tasting habits were deeply ingrained. I inspected the color, noting the deep burgundy. Swirled it a little to see its viscosity. Then I brought it close to my nose and inhaled the rich aroma while Mom did the same.

“It’s called Poetic,” Mom said. “It’s a blend of Syrah, Malbec, and Petit Verdot.”

I took a sip. It began with a bright berry flavor, leading to a smooth mid-palate with hints of coffee. The finish had a pleasant spicy quality.

“This is excellent,” I said.

“Thank you,” she said. “It’s a limited release, but if customers enjoy it, I want to put it into the regular production schedule.”

“I think you should.” I took another sip, then put my glass down. “Mom, there’s something I need to talk to you about.”

“I know you have to go home,” she said. “When do you leave?”

“No, that’s not it.” I slid the folder closer. God, how was I going to say this? “I think Dad’s having an affair.”

The color drained from her face, but otherwise, she kept perfectly still. Her eyes were on her glass. I hesitated, wondering if I should say more. Wishing I didn’t have to break this to her.

Angry at my fucking father.

“What do you know?” she asked, finally, her voice soft.

“He was with her in Tacoma this week,” I said. “There are photos.”

“How long?” she asked.

“I don’t know,” I said. “I suspected something was going on and asked Leo to help.”

She nodded, slowly, but remained silent for a long moment. I waited.

“I should have known,” she said, finally.

The sick feeling in my stomach spread. “This isn’t your fault, Mom.”

“No, it isn’t,” she said, meeting my eyes. “But I’ve been ignoring the signs for years. We had you kids, and the business. I let him take over everything, and I’ve regretted it more times than I can count.”

She poured herself more wine, but instead of tossing it back, like she needed the rush of alcohol, she moved slowly with it. Brought it to her nose and inhaled. Took a careful sip. Closed her eyes as she swallowed. Like the flavors of her hard work helped calm her more than the alcohol itself.

“I don’t know what to do, Mom,” I said. “I don’t know what to say to you, or what to suggest.”

She met my eyes again. “This is too big for you to fix. You should go back to San Francisco. You’ve been away too long as it is.”

“I’m not leaving,” I said. “There’s no way I’m going home in the middle of this.”

“I can’t ask you to stay,” she said.

“You’re not. You didn’t ask me to come in the first place. It’s my decision. You have enough to cope with. Don’t start making yourself feel guilty over me.”

She laid her hand over mine and squeezed. “Thank you.”

“What are you going to do?”

She took another slow sip of wine, then set her glass gently on the bar. “I’m going to kick his sorry ass out.”

Zoe

This is stupid. Why are we so stupid? I'm drunk. Should delete.

~Text from Zoe, unsent

It had been a long day. My bridezilla's wedding was fast approaching, and her insanity kept growing. I'd fielded at least ten emails and text messages today alone. They were either questions I'd already answered—often more than once—or requests that made me want to tell her to go fuck herself and have her wedding somewhere else.

But I hadn't. I'd replied with courtesy and professionalism, all while calling her cock-themed names in my head. It hadn't helped very much.

I'd also overheard Roland telling Cooper that he had a flight home tomorrow. The wave of disappointment that had hit me was nothing short of ridiculous. Just because I was getting used to seeing Roland around all the time didn't mean I should want him to stay. It shouldn't matter to me if he came or went. It wasn't like it was a surprise. The only surprising thing in this entire situation was the fact that he'd been here as long as he had.

Actually, that wasn't true. The surprising thing was how much my stupid body wanted to get naked with him.

I blamed the tequila. If I hadn't spent the night sleeping in his bed, I wouldn't have been subjected to his stupidly delicious smell.

Every time I saw him, I had visions of him fucking me. Not memories. I had plenty of those to draw from, but this was different. This was now. And I did not know how to deal with it. My stupid hormones were driving me up the wall. It wasn't just the fact that it had been a while since I'd had anything between my legs that wasn't battery-operated. I'd been insanely attracted to Roland since we'd met so long ago, and somehow our history—and all those goddamn feelings—weren't enough to keep me from still being insanely attracted to him.

I was an idiot, and it was good he was leaving. That's what I kept telling myself, anyway.

I closed my laptop and grabbed my things, ready to get out of here for the day. I just needed to leave a note for the front desk before I headed home.

Downstairs, all was quiet in the lobby. I went behind the front desk to leave my note, pasting the sticky note to the monitor.

The front door whooshed open and I glanced up. Lawrence stalked through the lobby without looking in my direction. He seemed angry, but it was hard to tell with him. He always looked like someone had spit in his food.

A few seconds later, Cooper pushed the front door open with his usual bravado. He paused to stomp his boots on the mat outside. I wondered how long it had taken Shannon to get him to do that. Probably twenty years—minimum.

His face broke into a wide smile when he saw me.

“Hey, Zoe-bowie,” he said. “You working late tonight? It's quiet in here if you are.”

“No, I'm on my way out.”

“Is my mom over here?” he asked.

“She was,” I said. “She was doing staff training earlier in the small tasting room. Your dad came in a second ago, so she's probably still back there.”

“Perfect. So how are you? Are your needs being met?” He started down the hall, still talking, so I followed. “We both know you did the right thing. But I recognize the situation you're now in, and believe me, I sympathize. If I ever had to go too long without getting laid, I'm sure it would send me down a spiral of incessant dick-wanking. Because, let's be honest, cranking the love pump gets the job done, but it's not an equivalent. I think it's about a two to one ratio, don't you?”

Before I could answer—sometimes it took a second to process everything Cooper said at any given time—he opened the door to the tasting room.

“Lawrence, I know you’re having an affair.”

Shannon’s voice hit me, and it felt like someone had kicked the air out of my lungs. Cooper froze next to me, and the room went horribly silent.

Shannon stood behind the counter, her face alarmingly calm, given what she’d just said. Roland stood nearby, his arms crossed, his eyes on his dad. Lawrence looked like he’d just walked into an ambush. His face was still, but a red flush crept across his skin and his eyes were wide.

I was not supposed to be here.

“Shannon, let’s go home and talk,” Lawrence said.

“No,” she said. “You’re going to tell me the truth, and you’re going to do it now.”

Lawrence glanced around the room. “We need to talk in private.”

“They’re our children,” Shannon said. “You did this to them, too.”

“But Zoe is—”

“Stop deflecting,” Shannon said. “Tell me what’s going on.”

I couldn’t remember the last time I’d been so uncomfortable. I swallowed hard and risked a glance at Roland. His eyes flicked to me, his face unreadable. He couldn’t want me here to witness this. I wanted to shrink down and slink out of the room, hoping no one would notice. But Cooper slipped his hand in mine and squeezed. God, this was really happening.

“All right, fine,” Lawrence said. He widened his stance and crossed his arms—didn’t get much more defensive than that. “Yes, I was seeing someone.”

The anger that flashed in Shannon’s eyes sent a zing of fear through me. I’d never seen her look so angry, yet so disturbingly calm at the same time.

“Who is she?” Shannon asked. “And how long has this been going on?”

“Do we really have to do this here?” Lawrence asked.

“Yes, we do,” Shannon said. “Who is she and how long have you been seeing her?”

Lawrence sighed, but kept his defensive posture. “Her name is Kristen, and I met her six or seven months ago.”

“Is she the only one?” Shannon asked.

“Yes,” he said with a dismissive wave of his hand. His put-out attitude made me want to punch him in the face. I couldn’t imagine how Shannon was feeling. “Just her.”

“Have there been others?” Shannon asked.

Lawrence worked his jaw, and for a second, I thought he was going to refuse to answer. “Yes, there have. But, honey, I’m ending things with Kristen. It was a mistake on my part, but it’s over now. I know, I shouldn’t have. But I’m under a lot of pressure, and things here are so tense. I got carried away and let things go too far.”

“Was that supposed to be an apology?” Shannon asked.

“I’m just saying, I know I was wrong,” Lawrence said. “Let’s go home and talk privately so we can work this out. I’ll do whatever you want me to do. You can track my phone, read my emails. Whatever you need.”

Shannon’s brow knitted together, and she looked at Lawrence like he was either crazy, or very stupid. Maybe she was trying to decide which.

“Is that a joke?” she asked. “Because you cannot look at me after more than thirty years of marriage and four children and say you’re under pressure and things are tense, therefore you had a goddamn affair. That does not make it okay.”

“I realize that,” he said.

“No, I don’t think you do,” she said. “Those children and this business are the reason I’ve stood by you all these years. I didn’t want to break up our family, and I didn’t know who would run things if you left. And that was the stupidest mistake I've ever made. I still don't know how I'm going to avoid losing Salishan. But I'm not letting this continue another second."

"Shannon—"

"No," she said, her voice cracking like a whip. "I don't want to hear your excuses. You betrayed me in the worst way imaginable. You betrayed your family—your children. And I'm not having it. You have thirty minutes to clear your things out of my house. I want you gone."

"I've been running this place for years," Lawrence said. "You can't just throw me out."

"Yes, she can," Roland said. His voice was low and dangerous, sending a chill up my spine.

"We need to talk about this," Lawrence said.

"Get out," Shannon said. "Now."

Cooper drew me closer and put an arm around my shoulders. I slipped mine around his waist and gave him a squeeze, hoping to offer what little comfort I could. I wondered how drunk I'd have to get him later to deal with this insanity. Roland's gaze was fixed on Lawrence, his face all hard lines. I had no doubt he'd drag his father out of here physically if he had to.

Lawrence's eyes swept around the room again, his jaw clenched. We all stayed silent. I could hardly breathe. Finally, Lawrence stomped out and down the hall. A second later, I heard the front door open and close.

Cooper let me go and rushed around the bar, scooping his mom into his arms. She rested her head against chest and hugged him. Roland let out a long breath and rubbed the back of his neck.

I almost wanted to cry. Or maybe follow Lawrence outside and kick the shit out of him. Shannon was a better person than me. If I'd have been in her shoes, I wouldn't have given him a chance to get his stuff. I'd have piled it in front of the house and had a big fucking bonfire.

Roland walked around the bar to join Cooper with his mom. They both spoke softly to her, murmuring that everything was going to be all right. Shannon's calm finally broke, and tears streamed down her cheeks.

I was once again overcome with the feeling that I shouldn't be here. I'd witnessed something horribly personal—the destruction of a family. It had hurt when I'd left Roland, but at least there hadn't been children involved. Even though they were adults, I knew this was going to be hard on the Miles kids. Shannon was right; their father had betrayed them all. Hell, even I felt betrayed, and he wasn't my dad. But I'd worked for him for years, and I loved this family like they were my own.

My heart ached for all of them.

Roland looked over at me, and I desperately wished I knew what he was thinking. Wished I knew what to do. Did he want me to leave? Stay and help? I wondered whether I should call Brynn. But they probably wanted to. She was their sister.

His eyes held mine for a long moment. I gave a subtle nod toward the door, indicating I was going to go. They needed to have their moment. Help their mom. Roland nodded in return, whether in acknowledgment that I should leave, or in thanks, I couldn't tell.

I slipped out the door, feeling sick to my stomach. Instead of leaving, I went upstairs to my office. I figured I'd stick around for a while in case any of them needed me. For what, I didn't know. There wasn't anything I could do. But it felt wrong to go home.

Plus, I knew I couldn't be trusted to see Lawrence and not cut off his balls. Best wait until I was sure he was gone before venturing outside.

I sank down into my chair and stared at my desk, not really seeing anything. Shannon was undoubtedly heading for a divorce, and it was going to change everything. Salishan could get along for a while without someone at the helm. Roland had already done a lot to get things on track again. But he was leaving tomorrow. And what was going to happen long term?

This place was Shannon's life. It was Leo and Cooper's life, too.

And mine, for that matter. But at the end of the day, I wasn't a Miles.

I lost track of time as I sat in my office, contemplating what had just happened. My phone buzzed, startling me. I had a text from Cooper.

Cooper: You okay?

Me: Yeah, but are YOU?

Cooper: No. But I will be. Gonna head home in a few and blow off some steam.

Me: Where's your mom?

Cooper: Roland got her a room at the Lodge for tonight.

Me: Does Leo know?

Cooper: Yeah. He was monitoring the security feeds to make sure Dad left.

Cooper: I offered to come over so we could drink our faces off, but he said no.

Cooper: Told me to fuck off and go home.

Cooper: He's really very rude.

Cooper: But I don't think he means to be.

Cooper: We all have our own ways of coping.

Me: That's true. Did someone call Brynn?

Cooper: Mom did. She's on her way. Going to stay with Mom at the hotel.

Me: Good. Sounds like everyone is squared away.

Cooper: Mostly.

Cooper: See u tomorrow.

Me: What do you mean mostly?

I waited, but Cooper didn't answer. I was glad he was going home to his best friend. I knew Chase would have his back. It probably meant they'd get shit-faced tonight, but I couldn't blame them. That was probably what I was going to do when I got home.

But why had Cooper said mostly? Had he been talking about Roland?

I wasn't exactly the best person to offer Roland comfort. He was my ex-husband, after all. That had to be weird. We'd gotten divorced, and now his mom was facing the same thing. Albeit for very different reasons. Roland and I had always been faithful to each other. I hadn't even gone on a date until the divorce was final. I wasn't going to judge anyone else for dating while they were separated, or while a divorce was going through. But it hadn't felt right to me, so I'd waited.

But I couldn't shake the feeling that he was downstairs—alone. How I knew, I couldn't be sure. He could have left. It was that sense of him I always had, like his presence had an aura I could feel. He was down there, stewing. Probably with a headache.

I opened a drawer and fished out a half-empty bottle of Jack Daniels. Yeah, I kept a bottle of whiskey in my desk at work. Walk a mile, then judge. I grabbed a couple of plastic cups out of a cabinet and went downstairs to find Roland.

Roland

I sat on a stool in the empty tasting room and pinched the bridge of my nose. All was quiet—I was pretty sure everyone else had gone home. Cooper had taken Mom over to the Lodge for the night. He'd been cracking jokes to make her smile, and of course it had worked. It had been a relief to see her relax, although I knew the worst had only just begun.

My head hurt, making it hard to think. Although considering my entire family had just imploded, the headache was the least of my problems.

I couldn't believe my fucking father. I'd known something wasn't right, and I couldn't help but wonder—if I'd been here, would this have come out sooner? How long had Mom ignored what she must have known to be true because she didn't think she had a choice?

That was no way to live.

“Hey, Roland.”

I looked up at Zoe's voice. She stood in the doorway, her head tilted. Her dark hair was down, falling in waves around her shoulders. One side of her white t-shirt was caught in the waistband of her jeans, like she'd started to tuck it in, but forgot what she was doing. When she wasn't managing an event, she always looked so damn careless.

I hated that I still loved that about her.

Seeing her stirred up a potent mix of feelings I didn't want to have right now. Hurt. Regret. Desire. I still craved her. It pissed me off, but tonight I was weak. The temptation of a few minutes alone with her was too much to resist.

“Hey.” I scooted the stool next to me away from the counter.
“Come on in.”

“I know there’s not much to say.” She had two plastic cups pinched between her fingers, and a half-empty bottle of Jack Daniels dangled from her other hand. “Do you wanna drink about it instead?”

“Yeah, I could use a drink.”

“Figured.” She came in and set everything on the counter, then poured us each a generous measure of the amber liquid.

I slid my drink closer as she took a seat on the stool, facing me.

“Plastic cups?” I asked.

“I like to keep it classy,” she said with a smile. “Besides, do you want to wash dishes?”

“Fair point. Where’d you get the whiskey?”

She put the cap back on the bottle. “My office.”

“You keep whiskey in your office?”

She raised her eyebrows, like I’d asked a stupid question. “You know I work for your father, right?”

I raised the cup. “True.”

She raised hers in a toast, and we both took a swallow.

“So your flight back to San Francisco is tomorrow?” she asked.

“No,” I said and took another sip. “I canceled it.”

“You mean you’re staying?” she asked.

“Yeah. I can’t leave in the middle of this.”

She nodded slowly, and silence stretched out between us. I stared at my cup—had to keep my eyes on something other than her. Sitting this close, I could smell the lavender scent of her hair.

She was unraveling me, slowly but surely. I could feel it happening. Like she was gently unbuttoning the collar of a shirt that fit too tight. I could breathe when she was near, yet she still took my breath away.

I wanted to stay mad. Hide behind anger and pretend I didn't care about her. Keep that emotionless mask where it belonged so no one could get in. Especially Zoe. But my anger was crumbling, exposing the rawness on the inside. I didn't think I could stop it. And at this point, I wasn't sure I wanted to.

It would feel good to let go. So fucking good.

"I guess I should get home," she said.

She stood, and before I could stop myself, I stood and grabbed her hips. Her eyes met mine, deep pools of midnight blue, making my heart beat harder. I knew her eyes, just like I knew her voice. Her scent. The curves of her body. How to make her scream my name. I knew it all, and those eyes mirrored the lust that must have been shining in mine.

"You know this is a bad idea, right?" she asked, her voice quiet. But she shifted closer, so our bodies touched.

"Is it?" I asked. "Maybe we need this."

A hint of pink crept across her cheeks. "Just to get it out of our systems?"

"Exactly." I slid my hands around to her lower back and pressed her against me. Maybe this would work. Maybe I could fuck her out of my system, once and for all.

"Damn it, Roland," she said. "I hate you for being so fucking sexy."

Our mouths crashed together, and I tasted the whiskey on her tongue. She was achingly familiar. The way she leaned to the right as I kissed her. The way she held the back of my neck. Slid her hands through my hair. It took me back to a time when I could do this every day. When Zoe had been mine.

Fuck, I'd missed her so much.

The reality of that swept through me as I kissed her deeply. I had missed her. God, what the fuck was I going to do with that? Just being around her was opening me up—laying me bare. I couldn't hide from anything when I was with her.

Maybe she wasn't mine anymore, but for a little while, she would be.

I pulled her shirt up and she lifted her arms so I could take it off. I let it drop to the floor while she attacked the buttons on mine, our mouths still tangled—wet and messy. Her hands slid across my chest and shoulders, pushing my shirt open. Her thumb brushed my nipple ring and she gasped.

“Oh my god, you still have this?” She traced her finger along the dark silver piercing. Meeting my eyes, she grabbed it and tugged.

I grunted at the jolt of electricity that shot straight to my groin. She bit her lip, the corners of her mouth turning up in a wicked smile, and pulled again. Harder. A groan rumbled deep in my throat and I slid my thumb over the lacy fabric of her bra, feeling her nipple harden. I pinched it through the lace and gave it a light pull.

Her hand left my chest and went straight for my cock, squeezing me through my pants.

“Are we doing this here?” She squeezed again.

“Yeah.” My mind was clouded over with desire, but I was pretty sure we were alone. And this wouldn’t have been the riskiest place we’d ever fucked.

“Good,” she said.

We ripped the rest of our clothes off between hard kisses, full of aggression. Lips, tongues, teeth. She bit my lip and held it, but I fucking loved it when she did shit like that. When she let go, I grabbed her hair and pulled her head backwards, exposing her neck. Grazed my teeth up the skin of her throat.

She reached for my cock, but I grabbed her wrist, my other hand still fisted in her hair.

“Not yet,” I said low into her ear. “I want your taste in my mouth while I fuck you.”

She moaned and relaxed her arm against my grip, ceding control to me. I led her to the upholstered bench on the opposite wall and laid her down on the supple leather. Running my hands up her thighs, I pushed her legs open. “God, Zoe, your pussy is beautiful.”

I slid my tongue up each side of her slit, caressing the silky skin. She sighed my name as I teased her—as I licked and sucked with just enough pressure to make her tremble.

I groaned and lapped my tongue against her clit. Flicked it. Swirled my tongue around the soft nub while she writhed. Her back arched and she moaned. Clamping down on her, I sucked on her clit. She ran her fingers through my hair and her heels dug into my shoulders.

“Holy fuck, Roland.”

Hearing my name on her lips, in that low breathy voice, made my dick throb. I licked and sucked, and her grip on my hair tightened. Her hips rolled, and her breath came in short gasps—soft whimpers in time with my rhythm.

I reached up and pinched her nipple between my thumb and forefinger. She cried out and her whole body shuddered as I pulled on her hard peak.

The need to be inside her was almost more than I could bear. Her taste on my tongue and the sound of her cries were driving me insane. But I had to make her come like this.

I tugged on her nipple while my mouth worked her clit, knowing it would send her over the edge. She rewarded me with a loud moan and bucked her hips against my mouth while she came.

“Oh my god,” she said between breaths. She brushed her hair back from her face. “Now that was a fucking orgasm.”

I smiled and licked my lips. God, I loved the way she tasted. “You like that?”

“Yeah, but I’m still pissed at you.”

“For what?” I asked.

“For everything,” she said.

The challenge in her eyes was such a turn on. If I didn’t have her now, I was going to lose my mind.

“Fine, be mad,” I said. “But get on your fucking knees.”

She gave me that wicked smile again and turned over, getting on her hands and knees. I grabbed her hips and slid the tip of my cock up and down her slit.

“You better fuck me now,” she said.

I smacked her ass cheek with the palm of my hand, just hard enough to make it sting. She sucked in a quick breath and looked over her shoulder.

“Did you just spank me?”

In answer, I smacked her ass again.

She groaned, arching her back harder. “Again.”

Smack.

“Oh fuck, Roland. Again.”

I spanked her one more time before thrusting my cock inside her—hard.

Holding her hips tight, I stayed buried deep inside her. I closed my eyes, reveling in the feel of her pussy wrapped around my dick. God, she felt good. She always had. No one had ever felt better. Goddammit, that was true. No one had ever compared to Zoe. I didn’t know what I was going to do with that either.

Instead of dwelling on the growing ache in my chest, I tried to fuck the demons out of both of us.

I dug my fingers into her hips and drove into her. My cock slid in and out of her wetness, and our bodies slammed together with each thrust. I grunted, losing myself in the feel of her. In the taut muscles in her core, tightening around me. In the sound of her voice, rhythmic and sensual. In the swell of her hips and the lines of her back, her hair cascading around her bare shoulders.

God, this woman was sexy as fuck.

I thrust faster, pounding her with reckless abandon. Her cries grew frenzied. Desperate. So I gave her more, feeling her heat build. Her pussy clench. She started to come again...

And I came undone.

The force of my climax sucked the air from my lungs. My body stiffened and every nerve ending seemed to fire at once. The pressure in my groin unloaded in a hot rush of intensity. I thrust again and again as my cock pulsed inside her, my vision going dark. I held tight to her hips as she rocked her ass into me, pulling out the last spurts of come.

My chest rose and fell fast with my breath and a bead of sweat trickled down my temple, past my ear. Zoe shifted forward, letting my cock slide out of her. She stood and smoothed down her hair, her beautiful body glistening in the low light.

I wanted to pull her against me and hold her. Curl up on the bench and tuck her body next to mine. Stroke her hair. Come down off this high with her wrapped in my arms.

But she gave me a little smile and walked back to the counter to pick up her clothes. I watched her dress, the ache in my chest returning with a vengeance.

I felt like a dumbass for just staring at her, so I picked up my clothes and put them back on. I didn't understand the pain in the pit of my stomach. The emptiness that kept spreading through me. I'd had her. What the fuck else did I want?

Everything. I wanted everything.

She grabbed the bottle of whiskey and came to stand in front of me. Lifted up on her tip-toes to brush her lips against mine.

"Thanks," she said, her voice soft. "Have a good night."

Then she turned and walked away.

I watched her go, knowing I was screwed. Maybe that had gotten me out of her system, but she was deep in mine. Deeper than I'd let myself admit until now. Because beneath everything, I wasn't angry. I was hurt. Wounded and raw, and one ill-advised fuck had ripped me open again.

Zoe

“Ms. Sutton?”

I blinked, coming back to reality with a start. Oh my god, I was a mess this morning. My client sat across the little table from me, her eyebrows raised.

“Sorry,” I said. “What was that?”

She repeated her question and we discussed the options for her parents’ anniversary party. I wrote down everything she said, knowing nothing would stick in my brain. Usually my mind was on overdrive during a consultation. I’d already have the event half-planned by the time I got back to my office. Today I was just trying to survive.

Fortunately, this particular party was six months away, so I had time to make up for my lack of vision. I thanked her for coming and told her I’d be in touch soon.

Grateful my one and only client meeting was finished for the day, I trudged back up to my office. Still no Roland. He had plenty of reasons to be away from his office today. His parents had just split up. I hadn’t seen any of the Miles family this morning. They were probably together, working out the details of what they were going to do now that Lawrence was gone. It couldn’t be that Roland was avoiding me after last night.

God, last night. What the hell had I done?

I tossed my notebook on my desk and sank into my chair. Sleeping with Roland had not been my plan when I’d gone downstairs with a bottle of Jack. I’d just wanted to see if he needed to talk. Be a friend, maybe. But I was terrible at being friends with Roland. My behavior last night was proof of that.

It hadn’t been my idea—or at least, I hadn’t made the first move—but I certainly hadn’t stopped it, either.

Had it been a mistake? It hadn't felt like a mistake at the time. But who thinks they're making a terrible choice when they're in the midst of mind-blowing sex? Obviously not me.

My god, he'd felt good. It was like waking up and realizing I'd spent the last four years eating nothing but plain white bread, and here was a freaking gourmet meal. How had I forgotten how fucking amazing he was?

I remembered now. Oh my god, did I remember.

Thinking about him was not helping me get any work done. I blew out a long breath and smoothed down my hair. This was fine. Roland and I had always been good at sex. That had never been the issue. We'd obviously been dancing around our physical attraction to each other, and we'd indulged in it last night. After everything with his dad, Roland had probably needed to get it out of his system. Hopefully he'd gone home feeling better, and when we saw each other it wouldn't be awkward.

Because it certainly wasn't happening again.

Another deep breath. Get your head together, Zoe. You have a job to do.

A job that was more difficult to do without my phone, and I didn't see it anywhere. My desk was messy—as usual—so I rifled through things, looking for it. Where the hell had I put it?

Leo appeared in the doorway and I paused, surprised to see him.

"Hey," I said. "How is everyone this morning?"

"Mom's okay," he said. "Brynn's with her. They're going to the spa and Roland paid for a couple more nights in the hotel."

"Good," I said. "She needs a break."

"Yeah."

"What about you?" I asked. "How are you holding up?"

He shut the door behind him. "I'm fine."

"You sure?"

“Yeah,” he said. “We’ll manage. This will be better in the long run, even for Mom.”

“Especially for your mom,” I said.

He nodded and sank into the chair across my desk. “I actually didn’t come up here to talk to you about my parents.”

“Oh?” I asked, lifting a notebook to see if my phone was beneath it. “Then what’s up?”

“The Big House wasn’t empty last night,” he said.

I froze and kept my eyes on the desk. Oh shit. “Okay...”

“Yeah, so we need to talk.”

Oh god. Leo handled winery security, and I knew there were cameras on the property. Were there any inside the Big House? I couldn’t remember—almost didn’t want to know.

Squaring my shoulders, I sat up in my chair. It wasn’t like Roland and I had never been caught having sex. We both had an exhibitionist streak, and it had been worse when we were younger. A couple of horny teenagers who couldn’t keep their hands off each other, and who both got off on fucking in dangerous places, was a recipe for quite a few... interruptions.

“All right,” I said, brushing my hair back over my shoulder. “Were we on camera?”

“No,” he said. “The security cameras are outside. Ben was still here, and he heard something, so he called me.”

That was a relief. Although I felt bad about making things awkward for Ben.

“Okay, so what’s the issue?”

“First of all, gross,” he said. “I hope one of you cleaned up.”

I chewed on my lower lip. I certainly hadn’t. I’d walked out before I lost my mind and asked him to come home with me so we could do it again. And then maybe a third time. And then tied him to my bed and forced him to spend the night so I could fuck him again in the morning.

God, what was wrong with me?

Roland's dick, that's what was wrong with me. His great big magical fucking dick.

"I don't... Leo... Why are you making this weird?"

He sighed. "Because you need to be careful."

He had that right. I did need to be careful. Because no matter how hard I tried to pretend last night had just been sex—that I was so distracted today I could barely function simply because I'd had a good fuck—I was kidding myself. I'd felt something with him. An intimacy I didn't think existed anymore. That shit was dangerous.

But I didn't want Leo to know.

"It wasn't a big deal," I said. "We got carried away. Yesterday was rough, and sometimes a nice fuck is just the thing. We've done it before, so..."

Leo grunted.

"You don't need to worry about me," I said. "I'm a big girl. I can handle it."

"I'm not worried about you," he said. "I'm worried about my brother."

"Why? Trust me, he had no complaints last night."

"I could tell," he said with a roll of his eyes. "That's not what I mean. Do you really not see it?"

"Not see what?"

"The way he looks at you," he said.

Leo was freaking me out. He was looking at me straight on—not hiding his face at all. He didn't do that very often. It wasn't that seeing his scars bothered me—not in the least. They were a part of who he was now. But I wasn't used to this kind of scrutiny from him.

"I don't know what you're talking about," I said.

"Zoe, it's Roland," he said. "He's not some dude you can just call when you feel like getting laid."

“Excuse me?” I asked. “Last I checked, Roland and I are both adults. If we want to randomly have sex, there’s nothing wrong with that.”

“Not my point.”

“Then what is your point?” I asked. “Because I think you’re insinuating that I talked Roland into sleeping with me last night. Newsflash, Leo, it wasn’t me. That was all Roland.”

“Okay, and why do you think he did that?” he asked.

I shrugged, keeping my face calm, but inside it was like a storm breaking. Why had Roland done that? It wasn’t the first time we’d been alone together since he’d been home. There had been other opportunities for us to fuck around. He’d had me drunk in his bed. I hadn’t given his reasons a lot of thought last night. I’d been too busy letting my lady parts think for me.

“Because he had a shitty day,” I said. “Because he knew it would feel good, and after everything that went down, he wanted to take out some aggression. Fuck if I know.”

Leo nodded slowly, but I couldn’t tell if he was agreeing with me. “Do you want to know what I think?”

“No.”

“Too bad,” he said. “I think you have no idea how much you hurt him when you left.”

My mouth dropped open. “What? How much I hurt him? That’s rich. He wasn’t hurt, Leo. He was pissed at me, but that’s not the same thing.”

“You honestly think that’s true?” he asked. “He didn’t get hurt?”

I slumped back in my chair. “Nobody wants to get divorced. It sucked for both of us.”

“If you think he walked away from your marriage without a single scar, you don’t know him very well,” he said. “He’s good at hiding them, but they’re there. Don’t pick at them when he’s weak.”

“God, Leo, what do you think I am? I’m not some heartless bitch.”

His expression softened. “I know you’re not. I think there’s just a lot about him you don’t see. Especially now. And I don’t want him getting hit from all sides. This thing with my dad is... I don’t think anyone’s surprised, but it’s brutal. Roland has a lot on his plate. So I’m just saying, be careful with him. Don’t assume he’s bulletproof. He’s not.”

Coming from anyone else, this conversation might have made me angry. But I knew Leo sometimes saw things no one else could see. And he wouldn’t have come to talk to me if he hadn’t thought it was important. Leo wasn’t like Cooper, who said whatever came to mind the second he thought it. Leo was cautious. He’d probably thought about it for a while before deciding to bring it up with me.

“Okay,” I said. “I’ll be careful. It was a one-time thing, anyway. Stress relief, you know? I don’t have it in for Roland. I don’t want to hurt him.”

“I know, that’s why I came over.” He stood and put his hand on the doorknob.

“Do you guys need anything today?” I asked. “Your mom, or Cooper, or anyone?”

He shook his head. “Not so far. But someone will let you know if we do.”

“Please do,” I said. “Really. I don’t know what I can do, but... something.”

“Thanks, Zoe.”

He left, and I leaned back in my chair. It was weird to think of Roland being hurt. He’d never acted like I’d wounded him by leaving. The only thing I’d ever seen was anger, followed by detached indifference. He hadn’t cared very much. Or at least, that’s how it had seemed to me.

His apparent callousness over the end of our marriage had been the most painful part for me. We’d argued a few times, but after that, he’d been emotionless. Unconcerned. Like the years we'd spent together hadn't meant very much, and he was fine with moving on. He'd made it look easy.

Had his air of disinterest been a way to hide his pain? That was a very uncomfortable thought.

It made me question some of the things that had happened between us. And it made me wonder, what did he see when he looked at me now? I'd always figured I was just a girl from his past. A mistake he'd made. If it weren't for the fact that I worked for his family, would he ever think of me at all?

But if I'd actually hurt him...

Maybe things hadn't been as one-sided as I'd thought. I hadn't just been hurt. I'd been devastated. Leaving Roland had been the hardest thing I'd ever done. But if he'd been hurt more deeply than I'd realized, things weren't so black and white.

And what had happened last night took on an entirely new meaning.

Roland

The day was already warm as I rode out with Cooper in the utility vehicle, heading to the south vineyard. A few puffy white clouds hung in the bright blue sky, almost as if they were resting against the peaks of the mountains. The hills around us were a rugged patchwork of brown and deep green, and the air was fresh. Almost sweet.

I hadn't been out here in years. We'd spent our childhoods in these fields, running through the rows of grape vines. Playing games, scraping our elbows and knees. Back then, I'd believed our vineyards were endless. That it wouldn't matter how far I walked, I'd never reach the end.

Cooper stopped and turned off the engine. He hadn't said much since we'd left the lower grounds. Silence with Cooper wasn't comfortable. It was unnatural. I was used to a constant stream of thoughts coming out of his mouth. I'd sought him out this morning because I was tired of being alone in my own head. I'd been up most of the night stewing over everything. My dad's affair. My mom. What was going to happen to my family.

And Zoe. God, everything with Zoe was an absolute mindfuck.

I'd been hoping Cooper could help distract me from the chaos of my thoughts, but so far, he seemed lost in his.

"What are we doing out here?" I asked.

He climbed out and put his hands on his hips, then closed his eyes and took a deep breath. "Need to check on some things. The drone photos showed we might have some minor nutrient deficiencies. But I need to see it for myself to be sure."

"Drone photos?" I asked.

"Yeah, Leo has a drone license. He got one with a camera, so he flies it over the vineyards to take aerial photos. It's pretty cool. I can see a lot from above. Growth patterns, signs of mildew or water stress. But there's no substitute for visiting my babies in person."

I got out and followed him as he walked down the rows of grape vines. He lifted leaves and checked on the bunches of grapes that were ripening. I watched him pinch and sniff. Tug on the vines. I wasn't sure what he was looking for. The agriculture side had never been my area, but Cooper had always loved these fields. He'd been glued to our grandfather's hip as a kid, making the rounds with him. Helping with plantings. Sneaking out during night harvests to help pick the grapes. Mom had often joked that Cooper had spent his childhood covered in so much dirt, he was destined to be a grower.

He took soil samples at various places, labeling his bags with a sharpie and putting them in his backpack. And although he wasn't saying much to me, he did talk to the grapevines. I'd forgotten he did that. It was oddly comforting to hear his low murmurs, speaking to the grapes like they were pets or small children. Our world had turned upside down, but if Cooper still talked to his grapes, maybe some things wouldn't ever change.

"You didn't make your flight," Cooper said out of the blue.

We were deep in the vineyard, the utility vehicle hidden behind several rows of vines.

"No, I canceled it," I said.

"Canceled?" he asked. "Or rescheduled? Because those are different things."

"Just canceled," I said. "Are you making conversation, or are you trying to figure out if I'm leaving?"

"The second one," he said. He knelt down and scooped another soil sample, then sealed the bag. "Because if you're leaving, we have to figure out what the fuck we're going to do."

"I'm not leaving yet."

He stood and looked me in the eyes, his face unusually serious. "I'm going to die here, you know."

"What?"

"I don't mean soon," he said. "I plan to be an old man telling inappropriate stories of my sexual conquests at family reunions. Except I'll still be smooth as fuck because I'll get distinguished as I age. I'll have a really cool hat and cane. It'll be my signature look, and the hot MILFs in town will come sit on my lap and giggle when I whisper dirty shit in their ears."

"That's... weird and very specific."

He shrugged. "I'm just saying, this is where I belong. I'm not leaving this land."

"I know, Coop. The thing between Mom and Dad doesn't mean we're going to lose the land. In fact, Dad being gone could make it easier for me to ensure we keep it."

One side of his mouth turned up in a smirk.

"What?" I asked.

"Nothing." He turned and kept walking.

I followed as he moved down the row. "What was that look?"

"It's not a big deal," he said. "You just said we."

"We?"

"Yeah, we. You said the thing between Mom and Dad doesn't mean we're going to lose the land. You'll make sure we keep it. We means you too, brother."

I had said that, hadn't I? "Yeah, well, it's our family, right?"

"Yep," he said, grinning again.

"Did you talk to Mom today?"

"Not yet," he said. "I'll go see her later. Did you?"

"I called her," I said. "She seems like she's doing okay, considering. She's known something wasn't right for a long time, she just hadn't faced it."

“Yeah. But I don’t want to talk about Dad.” He cleared his throat and turned over a leaf to inspect the other side. “Everything looks really good out here. But the soil still needs to talk to me. What about you? Do you want to?”

“Do I want to what?” I asked. “Seriously, Coop, do people ever understand you on the first try?”

“Do you want to talk to me?” he asked. “I wasn’t going to bring it up, because I figured by now you would have. Do you know how hard it’s been to keep my mouth shut all morning? Jesus, I’m being as patient as I can, but you’re going to have to give a little, here. You need to put in the work, bro.”

“I understood less than half of that.”

“What’s going on with Zoe?” he asked. “And just so we’re clear, I know you guys banged in the tasting room last night.”

Ah, fuck. I groaned. “Seriously?”

“Yeah, Ben walked by and heard something, so he called Leo. Come on, man, you thought you could get away with that? I have to give it to you, I’ve never fucked a girl in the Big House. Although believe me, I’ve thought about it. If I had a sex bucket list, that would have to be on it. Hey, sex bucket list, that’s not a bad idea. Maybe I should write it down. Nah, I’ll remember. Anyway, what’s up with you two?”

I let out a breath. “I honestly don’t know.”

“Good answer,” he said. “I figured you’d say nothing and I’d have to pry it out of you. At least I don’t know means you can admit it’s something.”

Was it, though? It had certainly been something to me. I wasn’t so sure about her. She’d walked out like it hadn’t been a big deal. Like I was just another hook-up.

“I don’t know what it is,” I said. “Other than me being an idiot.”

“You are an idiot, but that’s not why.”

“Thanks, asshole,” I said.

Cooper grinned. “Just keeping it real, bro.”

“Is this the part where you remind me that Zoe is your friend and I better not hurt her?” I asked.

“Nah,” he said. “I mean, she is, and I don’t want her to get hurt. But Zoe’s a big girl.”

I laughed. “Interesting, coming from the guy responsible for recording what’s-his-name’s body shot video.”

“That was different,” Cooper said, his expression serious. “You’re kind of a dick sometimes, and you did fuck up your marriage to her pretty bad. But I know you care about her. Which is kind of fucking crazy, because I used to be convinced that you didn’t. I would have gone toe-to-toe with anyone who claimed you gave a shit. I did not see it.”

“I don’t know what to say to that.”

“You’ve surprised me,” he said. “I know you didn’t want to come home and bail us out. But you did. And I admit, I don’t know fuck-all about relationships. But anyone can see the way you look at her. Hell, we all see it. I think she’s the only one who doesn’t.”

He pulled a pair of shears from a loop on his tool belt and cut a few leaves, then gently slipped them into another bag.

“That’s enough of that shit, though,” he said. “Jesus, Roland, I knew you needed to get some stuff off your chest, but you don’t have to be a girl about it.”

“I’m pretty sure all I said was I don’t know, and I’m an idiot.”

“At least we agree,” he said. “And don’t forget, Zoe is my friend, and you better not hurt her. I don’t care if you are my brother, I’ll still punch you in the dick.”

“You just said—”

“Dick punch,” Cooper said, pointing at me. “Watch yourself.”

I shook my head. Trying to make sense out of Cooper was a lesson in futility.

We walked up a shallow slope, and Cooper stopped now and then to talk to his grapes. I followed along, still thinking about Zoe. About what I wanted.

The thing was, I knew exactly what I wanted. It was just so fucking crazy, I was having trouble facing it. How could I admit that what I really wanted was her? I didn't just want to sleep with her. This was so much more than that. Zoe was smart, fun, and beautiful. She was passionate and fiercely loyal.

I wondered how the fuck I ever let her go.

We'd crashed and burned pretty hard once. I didn't know if she'd ever give me another chance. But I'd realized something last night, and there was no point in trying to talk myself out of it. I still loved her.

I loved Zoe like crazy. I always had.

I didn't deserve a second chance, and I knew it. But if I didn't try, I'd spend the rest of my life miserable and alone. I'd never love anyone like I loved her. I knew that now. Zoe was it for me. If she didn't feel the same, I'd have to figure out how to live with it. But I knew one thing for sure: I wasn't going to let her walk out of my life again. Not without a fight.

Zoe

It would be nice if you would answer. Simple question. Did you get the paperwork or not? I need you to sign. I just want this to be fucking over with.

~Text from Zoe, four years ago

I stood outside the Hummingbird Cottage, my tummy twisted with nerves. My limbs were jittery, and I'd almost talked myself out of this twice. But I really needed to talk to Roland. The more time that went by, the more awkward things were going to get. I didn't know if he'd been out all day to avoid me, or because he'd been with his family. But I knew he was here now, and the sooner I got this over with, the better.

I knocked and heard a muffled coming from inside. The door opened, and I almost choked. Roland's hair was wet, his chest bare and glistening, and he was wearing nothing but a white towel wrapped around his waist.

"Oh, hey," he said. "Sorry, I assumed it was Cooper again."

I blinked a few times, my mouth partially open. "Coop... Cooper?"

"He keeps trying to talk me into going out with him and Chase tonight."

Talk, Zoe. Stop staring. "Oh, right. Yeah, Cooper can be a pain in the ass when he wants something."

"Yeah." He jerked his thumb over his shoulder and adjusted his grip on the towel. It hung low across his hips, revealing the trail of hair that went down below his belly-button. "Do you want to come in?"

God, did I ever. I wanted to lick the water off his abs. But I had to stop thinking like that. "Um, yeah, please."

I went inside, and he shut the door softly behind me. The deep breath I took to calm my raging hormones had the opposite effect. I got a lungful of Roland, and he smelled like man heaven.

“I’ll be right back,” he said.

“Yes, clothes are good,” I said.

He paused, and the corners of his mouth turned up in the hint of a smile. A drop of water trailed down his broad chest and slid over the surface of his nipple ring.

I swallowed and tore my eyes away. Thankfully, he went into the bedroom, but I didn’t hear the door latch. I told myself, quite firmly, that I wasn’t going to look. It didn’t matter if he’d left the door open a crack on purpose or not. I wasn’t taking the bait.

Who was I kidding? Of course I peeked.

I caught a glimpse of him from behind as the towel dropped to the floor. He had dimples on his lower back, right above his ass. I wanted to run in there and smack those sexy ass cheeks. Maybe get him a little riled up so he’d spank me again.

Did I have no control over myself? I looked away and moved so the gap wasn’t in my line of sight. I was here to have a calm, rational, adult conversation with my ex-husband. I needed to remember that.

He came out in a black t-shirt and sweats. The way his clothes hugged his body was only slightly less distracting than seeing him half-naked. I’d told him last night that I hated him for being so sexy, and there was some truth to that. He was making it very hard to stay focused on what I’d come here to do.

“What’s up?” He sat on the couch and motioned for me to sit.

I sat next to him, careful to keep space between us. “I thought we should talk.”

“Yeah, we should.” He shifted so he was partially facing me and put his arm over the back of the couch.

I waited to see if he’d start talking first—he’d certainly started things last night—but he just looked at me, his blue eyes intense.

“Yesterday was pretty crazy,” I said. “I didn’t mean to be there when your mom and dad had it out.”

“I know,” he said. “It’s okay.”

“How’s your mom today?”

“She’s hanging in there,” he said.

“Good.” I glanced down at my hands. Why couldn’t I bring up last night? I’d never been shy about sex before. Why the hell was I acting like a blushing recently-deflowered virgin? “So, last night—”

“Was amazing,” he said.

“Yeah, it was, but...” No, forget the part where it was amazing. “I said it was a bad idea, and it—”

“Wasn’t a bad idea, and I’m glad it happened.” His eyes held mine captive, and he shifted closer.

I opened my mouth to reply, but paused, staring at him. “Wait, did you just say you’re glad it happened?”

“Absolutely.” He brushed a lock of hair off my shoulder, my neck tingling where his fingers touched me.

The way he was looking at me made my heart race. He wanted me. I could see the desire burning in his eyes. I wanted him, too. I wanted his body against mine. His mouth on my skin. I wanted to feel what I’d felt last night, even if it would only be fleeting. Because for the first time in a long time, I’d felt whole.

I leaned in and my eyes closed as his lips came to mine. He grabbed me with rough hands and pulled me into his lap, kissing me deeply. I was an addict, getting a long-awaited hit of my drug of choice. Intoxicated by the heady mix of familiarity and surprise.

His arms wrapped around me, holding me tight. He kissed me like I was oxygen. Like he needed me to survive. It was too much. This kiss was breaking me open, ruining me with its power. I couldn’t let that happen. This was just sex. Just two people indulging their desires. Giving in.

He held my thighs, straddled across his lap. I could feel his solid erection and I rubbed against him, smiling as he groaned into my mouth. This, I could handle. I needed to push this farther—get us naked. Stay in control. Raw lust would drown out all the other feelings I didn't want to have.

“Clothes off,” I said. “Now.”

He tore my shirt off and kissed me again, running his hands up my back to unfasten my bra. I let it fall down my arms, and he tossed it to the side. Then his mouth was on my nipple, his hands grabbing my ass. I started grinding against him, desperate for friction. He sucked my nipple while he palmed my other breast, sending jolts of sensation straight to my core.

I was dry-humping him like a cracked-out monkey in heat, but oh my god he knew how to play my body like an instrument. Laps of his tongue and pinches of his teeth on my nipples left me panting, my pussy hot. I needed him to fuck me, and I needed it now.

“Sex, Roland.” I couldn't focus enough to form full sentences. “Sex, now.”

His mouth moved higher, and he sucked on the skin at the base of my neck while he pinched my nipple between his thumb and forefinger. “Mm. Bedroom.”

“Fine.”

He took his time, playing with my nipple and lavishing kisses up my neck. It felt too good. I wanted hard and rough, not slow and deliberate.

I found the hem of his shirt and slipped my hand underneath. I knew what would get him going. Pinching the smooth metal of his nipple ring, I gave it a quick tug.

He grunted and bit down where my shoulder met my neck. That was more like it. His teeth pinched, but the twinge of pain was electric. I massaged his nipple with my thumb, then pulled again. His savage grunt reverberated through me and he nipped at my neck with his teeth.

He stood, lifting me easily with his hands gripping my ass. I held on, my arms around his neck, while he walked me the short distance to the bedroom. He kicked the door shut with a bang and dumped me unceremoniously onto the bed.

I bit my lip as I watched him undress. He pulled off his shirt, revealing his muscular frame. I'd been with him when he got that nipple ring, and the tattoos on his shoulder and upper arm. I liked that he didn't have any new ones. It made me feel like all his ink still belonged to me.

He shoved his pants and underwear down, unleashing that goddamn magical dick. It was gorgeous. Some women didn't appreciate the visual beauty of a fabulous cock, but I sure did. And Roland's was a masterpiece. Thick and long, with a perfectly shaped head. A deep wine color, darker than the rest of his skin, especially when he was hard. Roland's dick was an absolute pussy destroyer, and I couldn't wait for him to ravage mine.

I slid the rest of my clothes off and scooted up the bed. He got on his knees in front of me and opened my legs, running his hands up and down my thighs.

"Condom?" he asked.

Since Roland, I'd always used a condom, even though I was on the pill. But we hadn't last night, and Roland had been in me bare plenty of times.

"I'm on the pill," I said. "Are you still safe?"

"I'm safe."

"Me too," I said. "We're good, then."

His hands caressed my thighs, his movements slow and deliberate. He licked his lips as his eyes swept over me, taking me in.

"You are so fucking beautiful," he said.

The emotion in his voice cut through me. I didn't want to dredge up old feelings. I just wanted him to fuck me senseless. Maybe the second time would be enough.

I curled my finger, beckoning him closer. "Come here."

His mouth hooked in a half-smile. "Not yet."

“What are you waiting for?”

“I need something from you first,” he said.

“What?” I asked. “Because if this is how you ask for oral sex now, you don’t have to be so dramatic about it. Just tell me you want to see your cock in my mouth and let’s do this.”

He shook his head. “That does sound amazing, but that’s not what I mean. I want you to agree to go out with me.”

“What? What are you talking about?”

“I want you to go out with me,” he said. “On a date.”

“A date?” I asked, and a tremor of fear tickled my spine, settling in the pit of my stomach. This was exactly what I didn’t want. I couldn’t date my ex-husband. Sleep with him a couple of times? Sure. Date him? That was crazy. “No.”

He narrowed his eyes. “No sex, then.”

“You’re serious?” I lifted onto my elbows. “You have me naked with my legs spread open in front of you. You’re telling me you’ll walk away from this?”

“It’s gonna hurt like a son of a bitch, but yes,” he said. “Or tell me you’ll go out with me, and I’ll fuck you any way you want me to.”

Hearing those words come out of his mouth made my pussy contract. God, I was wet and practically throbbing for him. “You are such an asshole.”

“I’m an asshole for wanting to take you out?” he asked.

“Yes,” I said. “We can’t date each other.”

“Why not?”

I flopped back down, my head hitting the pillow. His pillow. I was surrounded by his scent, staring at the hard lines of his gorgeous body. He moved his hands up and down my thighs again, his eyes intent on me. He wasn’t going to let this go.

“Do you really want to have this conversation, or do you want to get laid?”

“I told you what I want,” he said.

Fine. That's how he wanted it to be? I'd play his game, but I'd play dirty.

I slid my fingers lightly over my right nipple, indulging in a little smirk as Roland's eyes snapped to my chest. "No sex? Maybe I'll just have to do this myself, then."

"That's not going to work, Zo."

"Are you sure?" I traced my fingers down my stomach, reaching the soft skin between my legs. Roland watched as I rubbed along my slit and dipped my fingertips inside. "Mm, so wet. This would feel good."

The challenge in his eyes was such a turn-on. He grabbed his dick at the base and held it.

"You know you want this," I said, slipping my fingers inside again.

"I do," he said, his voice rough. "But I'll be fine without it."

"No you won't." I bit my lip as I swirled my fingers around my clit a few times. "But I will. I'll make myself come while you watch."

"You'd rather do that than let me buy you dinner?" he asked, his eyes glued to my stroking fingers.

"Maybe," I said.

He gave his cock a tug, but I knew him. He wasn't serious yet. I rubbed myself harder to show him I meant business.

"Come on, Zo." He squeezed his shaft and tugged again. I had to bite the inside of my lip. Damn it, that was his warm-up. He wasn't bluffing.

His hand slid up his thick length, and he had me mesmerized. My fingers went still as I watched him begin with rough jerks. He twisted his wrist with each stroke. God, I loved watching him touch himself. And the asshole fucking knew it.

"There's no way that's as good as this would be." I slid my fingers inside again.

He grunted and stroked faster. "It's not. But I'm watching you and it's pretty fucking good."

I needed pressure and I needed it now. I rubbed myself harder, but I wanted his cock. I wanted him inside me, stretching me open. Filling me.

“Dinner?” I asked.

He jerked his hand over his cock a few more times. “Dinner.”

“Oh my god, fine,” I said, pulling my fingers out. “Get over here and fuck me.”

He grinned, the smug bastard, and settled on top of me. Wasting no time, he captured my mouth in a deep kiss and thrust his cock inside.

I moaned with relief as his thickness filled me. Yes, this was what I needed. Just once more. The kissing was pushing it, but he was really fucking good at that too, so I didn’t stop him. I moved with his thrusts and held his muscular back, enjoying the way his body felt, melded with mine.

Hooking an arm around my waist, he flipped us over. I settled on top of him and shook my hair so it fell down my back. This was perfect. Being on top put me in control. I was going to ride his dick until he lost his fucking mind.

But he grabbed my hips, holding them tight, and kept me from moving too fast. His eyes held mine, deep and spellbinding. I squeezed my thighs to lift up, and slid down his cock, the friction pulsating through me. His brow furrowed and he groaned, but he wouldn’t break eye contact.

Placing my hands on his chest, I rode him as hard and fast as he’d let me—which wasn’t as hard and fast as I wanted. His eyes bored through me, penetrating my defenses.

My heart raced, and I felt a flush pass over my cheeks. He moved me faster, his control slipping. The groove between his eyebrows deepened and his grunts were low and primal. But still his eyes stayed locked with mine, refusing to let go.

His cock throbbed, and his jaw tightened. “You ready for this?”

I knew what he meant. He wasn’t just talking about his impending release. This was more than sex, and every bit of me knew it.

And I was fucking terrified.

His grip on my hips softened, and before I could answer, he pressed his thumb against my clit. Rubbed me with quick strokes.

The orgasm swept through me like a rogue wave breaking over the sand—sudden and powerful. I leaned my head back and rode his dick hard while he thrust up into me, his hands back on my hips. He slammed upward, shoving his cock deep inside. The feel of his cock pulsing with the walls of my pussy clenching around him was insane. I dug my fingernails into his chest and he groaned, his voice deep. We came together, our timing perfect, both losing ourselves in the hot rush of passion.

Oh my god, there was nothing like a simultaneous orgasm. A lover who made sure you came was one thing. But one who could set you off at their whim was a fucking treasure.

My heart slowed down, and I started to come back to myself. Roland caressed my thighs, his large hands moving slowly across my hot skin. He had red marks on his chest where I'd clawed him. But those eyes were still fixed on my face, full of feeling and depth.

He used to look at me like that, before everything had gone to shit.

I felt intensely raw and vulnerable, and I didn't like it. Brushing my hair back, I moved off him and over to the edge of the bed.

He rolled to his side and reached out to touch my back. His voice was quiet and soothing. "Will you stay?"

I answered without looking at him. "I can't."

"Okay," he said, still caressing me with a light touch. "I understand."

A surge of emotion stormed inside me. This was not what I'd come here to do. Face the fact that we'd slept together and get things out in the open, yes. And deep down, I knew I'd planned to fuck him again. Once had not been enough.

But this? This was more than I could bear.

“I should go,” I said.

“Okay,” he said again, still in that soft voice. “Dinner tomorrow?”

“Sure.” I stood and gathered my clothes, keeping my back to him. If I saw his face, I’d break. I’d melt into a puddle of stupid feelings and climb in bed with him. Curl myself around him and drift in his warmth.

This was crazy. This man had hurt me. Deeply. I couldn’t risk letting him in again.

I dressed as quickly as I could and murmured something that sounded like goodbye, then got my ass out of there before I lost my mind.

But it wasn’t my mind I was at risk of losing. Not really. It was my heart. And I was afraid he already had it in his hands again.

Roland

It was funny to get a hit of nervousness as I walked up to Zoe's door. After all, it was Zo. I'd taken her out hundreds of times. We'd been to high school dances, out on dinner dates or out for drinks. Parties and bar crawls. Midnight picnics. Road trips.

But tonight was different.

Tonight was more important than any of those nights had been. I had to show her I was serious, but I needed to tread carefully. She didn't trust me, and I certainly didn't blame her. I had a long way to go before I could ask for her trust, let alone anything deeper. Like love.

I hadn't been surprised when she'd left last night. Disappointed, sure. But when I'd asked her to stay, I'd known she wouldn't. I'd seen the confusion and hurt in her eyes. I hated that I was responsible for that, and I was realizing that Zoe carried a lot more hurt than I'd ever known. Pain that I'd caused. It made me feel fucking awful, but I had no one to blame but myself.

I would have loved it if she'd have climbed back into bed with me. It might have given me a chance to heal some of the wounds we shared. But I needed to do this on Zoe's terms. Let her be in control. It meant risking a lot—risking everything, really. I had to open myself up to being hurt again so I could show her it was safe for her to do the same.

This wasn't natural for me. I was used to being in the position of strength. Dominance. It was why I was good at my job.

But Zoe wasn't a business deal.

I understood her. Sometimes I thought I knew her better than I knew myself. And I recognized that right now, she needed me to take it slow. As much as I wanted to tell her everything—how I couldn't stop thinking about her, how much I loved her and wanted her back in my life—I couldn't yet. I had to show her, first.

She answered after I knocked, dressed in a black wrap shirt, tight dark jeans, and knee-high black boots. Her hair was down in waves, and I noticed the color was darker at the top, fading to almost blond at the tips.

“Hey, you look beautiful,” I said, resisting the urge to step in and kiss her. I couldn't get away with that yet. “Did you change your hair?”

“Oh, yeah, today,” she said, fingering a lock of hair. “I made the appointment a while ago.”

“It looks great.”

She touched her hair again, almost like she was self-conscious about it. “Thanks.”

I led her to my car and we drove out to the Rockhouse Grill. It was newer, and I'd chosen it specifically because it wasn't a place we'd used to frequent. I didn't want old memories interfering.

The host seated us, and we sat in silence, perusing the menus. I could tell Zoe was jittery. Truthfully, I was, too. Whatever was happening between us was on the edge of a blade. If we tipped too far to either side, we'd fall.

“How's your mom?” she asked.

“She's okay. I told her she could stay at the Lodge as long as she wants. I think she's worried about coming back to the house.” I was more than happy to pay for her room. She could stay there for the next year for all I cared. I knew all too well what it was like to come home to an empty house, the echoes of your spouse still there long after they'd left.

“Yeah, I'm sure she is,” she said. “So many memories. There must be good ones, too. Especially of all her kids. But still. Do you know where your dad went?”

“To his mistress,” I said, spitting out the word. I was so fucking angry with my father, I could barely talk about him without feeling my blood run hot with rage.

“Well, she’s an idiot,” Zoe said. “Especially if she knew he was married.”

“I think she did.”

“I’m so pissed for your mom,” she said. “She doesn’t deserve any of this shit.”

“Me too.” And I was. I was livid over what my dad had done to her.

The waitress came to take our orders. When she left, our conversation turned to Salishan. I told her about the things I’d been working on. I had a new ten-year financial plan that would reduce our debt faster and keep cash flow positive, even if we had a down year. Leo had ideas for expanding distribution to a wider area, as well as partnering with more local restaurants. Cooper and my mom were working closely together to plan for future crops and grape varieties, which would allow Mom to expand the wine selection.

Zoe talked about her ideas for recruiting events in the off-season. Winter-themed weddings, special deals for corporate retreats and other events that weren’t weather-dependent. Marketing campaigns that targeted the post-holiday slump in January and February, emphasizing the cozy atmosphere of the winery.

She visibly relaxed as we talked and ate. I loved hearing the passion in her voice when she talked about her work, and I found myself feeling grateful she’d come back here. I didn’t know what my family would have done without her.

“It sounds like you’re getting things turned around,” she said.

“We’re not on the brink of foreclosure, so that’s good,” I said. “But there’s a lot of capital investment that needs to happen, and I’m still not sure how to handle that. I’m thinking of bringing in an investor. I know a guy who might be interested. It could take Salishan to the next level. But I’m not sure how everyone else is going to feel about it.”

“That would be different,” she said. “But if it would be good in the long run, it might be the right thing. It would just have to be someone you trust.”

“Exactly.”

We finished our meals and sipped our wine—a Salishan Cellars chardonnay. Zoe put down her glass and her hand strayed to her hair. She did that when she was nervous, or not sure what to say.

“When do you have to go back to San Francisco?” she asked.

And there it was. My life in San Francisco was an enormous barrier between us. I wasn’t such an idiot that I thought I could ask her to come back with me. We’d been down that road, and it hadn’t ended well.

“I’ll have to take a trip down there soon,” I said. “But there’s too much to do here. I won’t stay long.”

She nodded slowly. “Okay.”

“I’ve been thinking about how to make things work long-term,” I said. “I’ll be honest, I’m not sure what the solution is yet. Maybe I’ll split my time between San Francisco and here, I don’t know.”

“So you’re not going to just leave,” she said.

“No.”

She met my eyes and her subtle smile lit me up inside. “That’s good to know.”

After dinner, I took her home. She looked at me with curiosity when I pulled up at her place. I knew this wasn’t what she’d expected. She was waiting for me to suggest she come home with me. But that wasn’t going to happen tonight.

I walked her up to her door, and she turned toward me.

“Thanks for dinner,” she said. “It was nice.”

“Thanks for coming,” I said.

“Well, you did coerce me,” she said. “But I’m glad.”

I moved closer and slid my hand around her waist, pulling her against me. Her mouth parted, and she started to say something, but I ran my thumb along her lower lip. It was soft, pliant against the pad of my thumb.

“What are you doing?” she whispered.

“Getting ready to kiss you.”

“Why?”

“Because I want to,” I said. “And because we’re not having sex tonight.”

She tried to step back, but I held fast, keeping her pressed against me while my thumb traced her lip again.

“If you don’t want sex, why did you take me out?” she asked.

I loved the way her voice sounded breathy and halting, like she was having trouble concentrating on her words.

“I want more than sex.” I kissed the tip of her nose. “Don’t get me wrong, fucking you is amazing. But I need you to know that isn’t all I want.”

“Then what do you want?”

“You,” I said.

“Roland...”

I leaned in and pressed my mouth to hers. Slid my tongue along her lips. All softness. No teeth. No aggression. Just silky-smooth lips and sensitive skin. Tongues that tasted of wine. I kissed her deeply, drawing her close, letting my tongue caress hers. Her body relented, softening against me. I kissed her with everything I had, because I knew from now on, every time I kissed her could be the last.

Her eyes were hooded when I pulled away. I touched her cheek and brushed my lips against hers again.

“It’s okay,” I said. “You don’t have to decide anything right now. All I want is another date. Will you go out with me again?”

“That’s all?” she asked. “Just another date?”

“For now, yeah,” I said.

She took a deep breath and I touched her lips with my thumb again. I wanted to keep kissing those lips, but I couldn’t overwhelm her. I had to be careful.

“Okay,” she said. “I’ll go out with you again.”

“I lied, I need one more thing.”

“Roland.”

I smiled and kissed her again, just a soft kiss on her lips. I couldn’t help it. “Just one more thing, I promise. I need to know there won’t be anyone else.”

“Are you tricking me into dating you?” she asked.

“I’m not tricking you,” I said. “I made you a compelling offer, which you accepted. Now I’m extending the offer further.”

“Always the businessman,” she said, her mouth twitching in a smile. “That goes for you too? No one else?”

“Never,” I said. There would never again be anyone but her.

She slid her hand around the back of my neck and drew me to her lips. Kissed me, soft and sweet. “Of course not. I would never do that to you.”

I pulled her to me and held her close, my chest suddenly tight. The way she’d initiated that kiss felt so good. It gave me hope.

“Do you want to come in?” she asked, softly into my ear.

I squeezed her and pulled back. “I really do, but I’m not going to tonight. I think it’s best if I go.”

She smiled and took my hand. Our fingers twined together, and she gave me that little smile again. “Okay. Goodnight, Roland.”

“Goodnight, Zoe.”

I let go and stepped away, the words I love you lying unspoken on my lips.

Zoe

Two more days. In forty-eight hours, Victoria Jones would be Victoria Cockburn, and my bridezilla client no longer. Assuming I survived. At this point, that was debatable.

She'd arrived this morning, appearing at the Big House even though we didn't have an appointment until tomorrow for her rehearsal. But she'd wanted to go over every detail, plus tour the grounds again. While we walked through the back gardens, she'd picked apart the decor choices and layout—all things she'd chosen weeks, if not months ago. By the time she left two hours later, the inside of my lip was raw from biting it and my palms had fingernail marks from clenching my fists.

Two days. I could handle Cocksmash for two more days.

The bulk of the setup would be done tomorrow, but we didn't have anything scheduled in the main garden between now and then. I decided to get some of the twinkle lights up. I didn't always do the decorating myself, but today I wanted to be outside—and alone for a while. Hanging strings of lights in the trees sounded like a great way to kill a couple of hours. It would give me time to think.

Considering I was dating my ex-husband, I certainly had a lot on my mind.

We'd been dating for weeks now. We saw each other at work. Kissed a lot. Went out to dinner, or for drinks. He'd even taken me to a musical at a local theater. We'd had a blast. Some days we spent hours simply talking. Catching up on work. On life. Everything.

And the sex. Oh god, the sex. It was better than it had ever been.

But despite how much fun we were having together, a current of uncertainty ran beneath everything. Where was this going? Technically, Roland still lived in San Francisco. He seemed to be managing to do his job from here, although I knew it was a strain. But that couldn't last forever. He'd been here for two months. His boss had to insist he come back eventually. And there was no way I was moving to San Francisco to be with him. I liked the city fine, but there was a reason I'd left. I wasn't interested in a repeat of four years ago. Fuck that.

Why was now any different?

I was struggling to answer that question with something more concrete than he seems different now. But he did. He was. The Roland I'd left wouldn't have stayed in Echo Creek this long, no matter what had been happening. He wouldn't have discovered his dad's affair. He wouldn't have been here long enough to notice something was wrong. The Roland of four years ago would have shown up, thrown some money around, and left.

But he hadn't. He'd stayed.

He'd been coming out of his office earlier and having dinners with his mom. Hanging out with his brothers in the evenings or on weekends. Last week he'd gone to Tilikum to help Brynn pick up a bed for her new apartment.

All this from the guy who, four years ago, couldn't have been in the same room as his brothers for more than five minutes without fighting. Who'd barely remembered his little sister existed.

I was seeing the Roland I remembered from before San Francisco. From before he'd gotten so wrapped up in his work—in career advancement, promotions, moving up, making money, impressing the bosses. He'd measured his happiness and worth based on his job title and salary. Nothing had mattered more. Not even me.

The Roland I saw now cared about more than money. He was concerned for his family, and their business. Spending time with the people he loved instead of working fourteen-hour days. I'd seen him smile, and even laugh. His father had dropped one of the biggest bombshells of his life, and even that hadn't driven him to bury himself in his work.

But would it last? Was this the real Roland, and the workaholic I'd been married to had been a phase? A product of poor judgment and misplaced priorities? Or was he simply reverting to remembered behaviors since he was here, and the moment he set foot in San Francisco, he'd go right back to being the guy who'd do anything to further his career, even at the expense of his marriage?

I didn't know.

We'd reconnected in a way I couldn't deny. On a level that went so much deeper than physical. He'd told me more than once now that he wanted me. At first that had been easy to brush aside—assume he meant he wanted to sleep with me. But that wasn't what he'd been saying.

He wanted to give us another chance. And despite how great the last few weeks had been, I was pretty fucking scared.

I was risking a lot by letting him in again. I'd given my heart to him once, and he'd tossed it aside. Was I crazy? Could a relationship like ours really have a second chance? We hadn't just dated and broken up. We'd gotten married, and then divorced. That was serious shit.

Times like this, I wished I had a better relationship with my mom. It would have been nice to be able to call her and tell her what was going on. Ask for her advice. I loved my mom, but we weren't close. We never had been. She'd always looked at me like she wasn't quite sure where I'd come from. And her advice about Roland would probably consist of You have a good head on your shoulders, you'll figure it out. She meant well, but I think she was perpetually confused when it came to me.

I stood on a ladder, propped up against a plum tree, and finished hanging a third strand of twinkle lights. I figured one more on this tree would do the trick.

“Hey, up there.”

I looked down to find Ben standing near the base of the ladder. He was dressed in his usual Salishan Cellars t-shirt, worn jeans, and work boots. He was a good-looking guy, especially for his age, with a warm smile I'd always appreciated.

"Hey, Ben." I climbed down the ladder and brushed my hands together. "What's up?"

"Can I talk to you a minute?" he asked.

"Yeah, of course."

"What do you know about... the things that have been going on?" he asked, his voice halting, like he wasn't quite sure if we should talk about it.

The winery employees knew that Lawrence was gone, but the details had been kept vague. I think most people suspected the truth, but respected Shannon's privacy. They knew Lawrence had moved out and was no longer in charge.

If anyone else had asked, I would have hedged the question. But Ben wasn't just an employee. He'd been around since Roland and his siblings were kids.

"Roland found out his dad was having an affair," I said.

Ben's face went very still, but I could see the flash of anger in his eyes. "I see."

"Yeah, I know, it's awful," I said. "Shannon kicked him out."

"So Lawrence really is gone?" Ben asked.

I nodded. "He went to his mistress, apparently. If he had any hope of fixing this, I'm pretty sure that killed it. There's no way Shannon will take him back."

"I should beat the shit out of that sniveling little punk," he said under his breath.

I laughed. He'd reminded me of Cooper just then. "That I would love to see."

"Sorry," he said, scowling. "Didn't mean to say that out loud."

"It's fine. I don't blame you."

He blinked a few times, his eyes focusing on something in the distance.

“I wouldn’t worry about Salishan, though,” I said. “I’m not sure how things will shake out legally, but Roland isn’t worried. They’ve already talked to a lawyer.”

“Right.” Ben’s phone rang, and he jerked, like it had startled him. He brought it to his ear. “Yeah? Uh-oh. Do you need me to call Chase? Okay, good. Yeah, I’ll be right there.” He ended the call and slipped his phone in his back pocket.

“Everything okay?” I asked.

“Bottling machine is down,” he said. “Chase is over there, but we were already a week behind on the bottling schedule. This isn’t good.”

Bottling had to be done on a precise schedule, based largely on the age of the wine. If they were already behind, this delay could be costly—something Salishan did not need right now.

Ben started for the work houses, and I followed. There probably wasn’t much I could do, but I figured I should see if I could help.

The work houses were a short walk from the Big House. While the Big House was Salishan’s public face, the work houses were where the real work of winemaking was done. This was where the grapes came in at harvest to be destemmed and crushed. The cellars housed enormous fermentation tanks, as well as the barrel cellars where wine was stored for aging. Another building was the bottling facility, with a complex series of machines that bottled, corked, labeled, and boxed the wines.

Inside the bottling room, Shannon was busy giving orders, directing people where to go and what to do. It looked like half the winery employees were here. I saw Chase on a ladder, hard at work on the machinery. Everyone else was busy diverting the flow of work to hand-bottle the wine.

It was good to see Shannon in her element. She looked good. Tough. I wasn’t sure how she was doing underneath it all, but I was proud of her for being here and taking charge.

Ben paused next to me. He seemed to be watching Shannon. She looked over at us and her mouth turned up in a smile. Ben gave her a brief nod, then went over to help Chase.

I saw Roland talking to one of the employees.

“This doesn’t look good,” I said.

“It’s a nightmare,” he said. “This could not have come at a worse time.”

“Ben said we’re already behind schedule,” I said.

Roland nodded. “Apparently my dad was too busy with his mistress to make sure things were on time. This bottling should have happened last week.”

“Chase will get things up and running,” I said.

“Yeah, I know,” he said. “In the meantime, we’re going to hand-bottle as much as we can. There’s a shipment that needs to go out today, so we can’t wait.”

“Do you need me to help?” I asked.

“I definitely need you,” he said, then cleared his throat. “Need the help.”

“Get a room,” Cooper said, appearing out of nowhere. He draped an arm around my shoulders. “We have a shit-ton of work to do, so if you two could stop making goo-goo eyes at each other, that would be awesome.”

Roland scowled at him.

“Nice face,” Cooper said. “That’s a good look on you. But enough about me. This wine is not going to bottle itself. At least, not until Chase gets his ass in gear and fixes this mess. What do you think he’s doing up there?” He turned and cupped his hand over his mouth, pitching his voice to be heard across the building. “Chase! Dude, don’t fuck this up. The entire winery is counting on you, bro. But no pressure or anything.”

Chase flipped him off without looking over.

“Cooper, watch your mouth,” Shannon said.

He winced. “Oops, forgot Mom was in here.” He pointed at Chase. “Hey, he flipped me off. Aren’t you going to scold him, too?”

Shannon shook her head, rolling her eyes.

“So unfair,” Cooper said. He squeezed my shoulders, then pointed at Roland. “Remember what I said. Dick punch.”

“Aren’t you supposed to be bottling?” Roland asked.

“Probably.” Cooper started toward the still conveyor belt where a group of people were busy siphoning wine into bottles. “Hey, you guys be careful with that. That’s the blood of my children. You better not spill a drop.”

I laughed, and Roland shook his head.

“He is so creepy when he talks like that,” he said.

“That’s Cooper for you,” I said. “So, how can I help?”

“I think everything is covered except labeling and boxing.”

Roland and I went to the end of the line where the full, corked bottles were being collected. Normally the bottling machine affixed the labels before placing the wine bottles in boxes. Hand-labeling was going to be tedious as hell, especially getting them on straight. But it needed to be done.

At first the task seemed impossible. I ripped four labels trying to peel them off their backing, and Roland couldn’t get his on the bottles straight. Once we got smart and got a system going, things moved faster. He peeled the labels and I stuck them on. Brynn came over and started boxing the finished bottles.

We worked for hours. After we finished the backlog, we washed up, donned gloves, and helped fill and cork more bottles. Then more labeling and boxing. Despite the challenging situation, the mood in the bottling room was upbeat. The entire Miles family was here—even Leo came out of hiding to help. The rest of the winery staff pitched in, too. There was a sense of camaraderie in coming together to face a crisis.

“Stand clear,” Chase called from somewhere deep in the machinery.

We all stood back. I held my breath. Suddenly, the conveyor belts started moving, the bottling machine roaring to life. A cheer rose up as we all clapped and celebrated.

Roland's eyes met mine, and he smiled. It was a smile I remembered so well. One I'd seen a thousand times. And it had never looked as beautiful as it did today.

Zoe

My feet ached after the long hours spent in the bottling room. Most of the staff had filtered out after Chase and Ben got the bottling machine operating again. Shannon was still here with Cooper and Leo, making sure things were working as they should, and finishing up the bottling run.

Shannon walked over and pulled me in for a hug. “Thanks for your help today.”

“Of course,” I said, hugging her back.

Roland walked over with Leo and Brynn. It was good to see Leo out here. He still tilted his face slightly—always trying to hide his scars—but I hadn’t seen him out and about this long in months.

Brynn pulled her hair down and started re-doing her ponytail. “I don’t know about you guys, but I want to go eat my weight in fried food and collapse into a coma.”

“I can help with the first part,” Shannon said. “How about The Lodge? I’m buying.”

“Yes,” Brynn said. “That sounds so good.”

Leo shook his head and mumbled something.

Shannon gave him a sympathetic smile. “I can send something over.”

“That’s okay,” Leo said. He stepped in and hugged his mom. “I’m fine. I’ll talk to you later.”

Shannon watched him go with concern in her eyes until Cooper tackle-hugged her from behind.

“Mother! Goddess of Salishan and giver of life. We have emerged victorious. I suggest we celebrate and indulge in the fruits of our labors.”

“Mom already said she’d buy dinner at the Lodge,” Brynn said.

Cooper stood behind Shannon, his arms still wrapped around her shoulders, and kissed her cheek. “That’s what I like to hear. I’m starving. Like I’m pretty sure if I don’t eat soon, I’m going to either fall over, or go into a hunger-induced rage and start tearing through the kitchen over in the Big House. If you want any cheese left for tastings tomorrow, you better feed me.”

Shannon patted his arm. “Okay, Cooper. Why don’t you go see if Chase wants to come.”

“Good plan.” He let go of her and whirled around. “Chase! Grub, man, let’s go!”

Ben came over, wiping his hands on a rag. “I think we’re all set for today. Need anything else?”

“I don’t think so,” Shannon said. “But why don’t you come to dinner with us?”

“I don’t want to intrude,” Ben said, looking down at the rag in his hands.

“You wouldn’t be intruding,” Shannon said. “Come on, Benjamin, I insist.”

Ben smiled, and I noticed a slight flush to his cheeks. It was warm in here, but I had a feeling that wasn’t why Ben looked a little red. “All right, when you say it like that.”

“Good,” Shannon said with a smile. She looked at Roland. “You coming?”

Roland hesitated, his eyes flicking to me. “You know, I’ll take a rain check.”

“You sure?” Shannon asked.

“Yeah,” he said, his eyes darting to me again. “I’m ready to call it a day.”

“Zoe?” Shannon asked, turning to me.

“Oh, um...” I blinked, trying not to look at Roland. I knew what he wanted, but we hadn’t exactly made our new relationship public, even to his family. “Thank you, but not tonight.”

Shannon’s mouth twitched, like she was hiding a smile. Her eyes moved to Roland, then back to me—so quick, I almost didn’t catch her doing it. “Okay. Well, come on, kids, let’s go before Cooper turns into a hunger tornado.”

I hung back with Roland and watched them go.

“Is that Greek restaurant still around?” Roland asked.

“Sure is,” I said. “Same owners and everything.”

“Gyros?” he asked.

“Are you asking me to dinner?”

He turned toward me and laid his hand against my cheek. “Yes. I want to get dinner to go and bring it back to my place. Share a bottle of wine. Then I want to spend the rest of the night fucking you until we both collapse.”

A rush of heat hit me between the legs and my spine tingled. “That’s very straightforward.”

“I’m just being honest,” he said. “And I want you to stay. Spend the night with me.”

I took a deep breath, like I was about to jump into water and I wasn’t sure how deep it went. Staying the night with him was a boundary I’d kept in place until now. But I was ready to take the plunge. “Okay.”

We picked up dinner and brought it back to the guest cottage. Roland opened a bottle of cabernet—Salishan Cellars, of course. We stretched out on the couch, resting our tired feet while we ate. The food was good, and the wine was better. We talked and laughed, and before I knew it, the food was gone and the bottle almost empty.

“My feet are still killing me,” I said. “I think this is a sign that I’m too sedentary. If there was a zombie apocalypse, I’d die on the first day.”

“If the world goes to shit like that, head for Leo,” Roland said. “Every time I go over there, I half expect to find him coming out of a secret underground lair.”

I laughed. “That wouldn’t surprise me. Do you think Leo is okay?”

“Not really,” he said. “But I think he could be worse.”

“Yeah, that’s probably true,” I said. “I’m glad he had his family to come home to.”

“So am I.” He rubbed his toes along the side of my foot. “You know what might feel good on those poor feet of yours?”

“What?”

“A bath,” he said. “This cottage has a two-person jetted tub.”

I set my wineglass down. “A hot bath? Yes, please.”

“I thought you might like that.”

Roland got up and went into the bathroom. The sound of water filling the tub drifted in. I was tired, but in a good way. Happy and satisfied. Relaxed from the meal, and the wine. Roland appeared again in the doorway and pulled his shirt over his head.

“Coming?”

I finished the last of my wine, then joined him in the bathroom. He was leaning over the tub, feeling the temperature of the water. Steam rose from the bath, already clouding the mirror.

He glanced back at me and grinned. “Better take those clothes off, Zo.”

I smiled and proceeded to undress. Took my time while Roland watched. My clothes dropped to the floor and I nibbled on my bottom lip as Roland’s eyes swept over me.

He took off the rest of his clothes and we climbed in the bath. The tub was large, giving us both plenty of space. I settled down in the hot water, facing him, and closed my eyes.

“Why have I never used this bathtub before?” I asked. “It’s been here this whole time, and I’ve never taken advantage.”

He picked up my foot and rubbed his thumbs across the bottom of my heel and across the arch. "I'm surprised. You love baths."

"I do."

Roland rubbed my foot for a while, then switched to the other one. Between the foot massage and the hot water, I was in danger of falling asleep.

"That feels amazing," I said.

"I love making you feel good."

My eyes were still closed, my head resting against the edge of the tub, but I heard Roland shift. The water lapped up my chest as he moved closer and pushed my legs apart so he could sit between them.

His fingers reached my center and I let my eyes flutter open. I watched as he touched me under the water, sliding his fingers along my soft skin. Brushing my clit with light strokes. My breath quickened at his touch, sparks of pleasure racing through me.

He slid two fingers inside me, and I moaned at the added pressure. I rocked my hips as he moved in and out, his fingers curling against my g-spot. He had me racing toward climax already, and we'd barely started.

Shifting again, he kept working my pussy hard and leaned in to clamp his mouth around my nipple. His teeth pinched my hard peak, and I cried out. Fuck, that felt good.

"Other side," I breathed, barely able to get the words out.

He took my other breast in his mouth and sucked. I pinched my nipple between my thumb and forefinger and rocked my hips against his hand. He bit me gently, the twinge of pain shooting straight to my core. My pussy clenched around his fingers and I came hard, leaning my head back and gasping.

Leaning over me, he brought his mouth to mine, his kiss hungry. I grabbed his cock and tugged, earning a deep grunt.

"Hand or mouth?" I asked, stroking his hard length.

“Fuck, Zoe,” he said. “Mouth.”

We switched places, ignoring the water that sloshed everywhere. He sat on the edge of the tub and I knelt between his legs, licking my lips at the sight of his wet dick.

I took the base in my hand and held him with a firm grip. Lavished the tip with wet kisses and laps of my tongue. He was hard as steel as I plunged down on him. His strong thighs contracted, and his abs flexed. I worked his cock in and out of my mouth, stroking the base as I went. He grabbed my hair, guiding me, and I picked up the pace. His hips thrust, and the intensity built. I nudged his legs farther apart so I could cup his balls with my free hand, and he leaned his head back, groaning loudly.

With his hand fisted tight in my hair, he moved me up and down his cock. I stroked his shaft and tugged his balls. The sound of his growls and moans was making my pussy wet all over again. I fucking loved doing this to him. There was nothing like the sound of a man losing his mind with his dick in your mouth. Especially when it was Roland.

He'd said he loved making me feel good. It was intoxicating to do it to him.

“You good if I come?” he asked. His grip on my hair relaxed, giving me a chance to stop.

I didn't. I moaned around his cock, tugged his balls harder, and let his tip slide as far toward my throat as I could manage.

“Fuck,” he said, his voice rough, almost strangled. He grabbed my hair again and thrust into my mouth, his cock pulsing. I took his come as it hit the back of my throat, feeling triumphant. He finished, and I quickly swallowed while he caught his breath.

“God, Zo,” he said between breaths. “I'm fucking undone.”

He slid back down into the water and pulled me on top of him. I straddled his lap and wrapped my arms around his shoulders. His arms settled around me, holding me close, and he kissed my neck. Nuzzled the hollow below my ear.

“You know I still need to fuck you,” he said.

“Can you still do that?” I shifted my hips, rubbing my pussy against his cock.

“Give me a minute.”

It didn't take long for his cock to stiffen again. He reached between us and held the base, lifting it so I could slide down onto him.

I closed my eyes, reveling in the exquisite pleasure of his erection filling me. “You feel so good.”

He held my ass, his fingers kneading. “Baby, nothing feels as good as you.”

More water splashed out onto the floor as I slid up and down his thick cock. This angle was perfection, the ridge around his tip dragging through me, stimulating me in all the right places. I rubbed my clit against him every time I lowered down, and he thrust his hips, driving himself deeper.

We lost ourselves in the rhythm, our bodies in sync. Moaning, thrusting, grinding. He licked my nipples as they moved past his mouth. Gripped my ass with rough hands. Heat and tension built in my core, the pressure almost painful.

“Oh my god, Roland, I need to come again,” I said. “Please baby, make me come.”

He held me tighter and thrust hard. His cock throbbed inside me, the way it always did right before he came.

“Yes,” I breathed. “Just like that. Yes.”

Roland's brow furrowed, and he whimpered—a strangled sound in his throat, like if he didn't unleash on me now, he might not survive.

My pussy contracted, all my core muscles releasing at once. I threw my head back and moaned, letting the orgasm sweep me away. I rode him hard, feeling him burst inside me. We came apart at the seams, exploding into a thousand points of light.

Slowly, I came back to myself. I was draped over him, my head on his shoulder. He rubbed my back with soft strokes, his strong hands caressing my wet skin. The water level was significantly lower than it had been, but we'd worry about that later.

I moved so I could look at him. He cupped my cheek and drew me in for a kiss, his mouth soft and warm. I climbed off him and he turned the water on, refilling the tub. When the water was high enough, he shut it off and slipped back into place.

I sat between his legs and leaned back, settling against his chest. He wrapped his arms around me and leaned his cheek against my head.

"Are we crazy?" I asked, my voice quiet.

Roland took a deep breath, his chest expanding against me. "Probably. But crazy was kind of always our thing."

"That's true."

We sat in silence for a few minutes, just breathing. Holding each other.

"Actually, I don't think we are," he said. "I think we were crazy before. And we'd be crazy to let this go now."

My throat felt thick and my eyes stung with tears—and I was not a crier. I took a trembling breath. "Maybe you're right."

"I know I'm right," he said. "I love you, Zoe."

I gripped his arms and squeezed, closing my eyes for a moment so the tears wouldn't fall. "I love you, too."

He held me tight, cradled in the warm water. We didn't say anything else. Tonight, we didn't need to.

Roland

I threw away the fucking sheets because no matter how many times I wash them, they still smell like you. And I just fucking can't.

~Text from Roland, unsent

Cooper, Leo, and Brynn were already at the house when I arrived. My great-grandparents had built the original farmhouse on this land. It was no longer standing, long ago replaced by a newer one. But the echoes of them were everywhere. In faded photographs on the wall. Great-grandma's teacups in the cupboard. An old quilt that hung on the wall.

My mom had been born in this house. My grandparents had raised her here, their only child. They'd built it to be a guest house, intending to expand the winery's hospitality side. As a result, it was huge. It had seven bedrooms, all with their own bathrooms, an enormous commercial-grade kitchen, and a dining room that could seat an army.

By the time my mom and dad were married, my grandparents had already abandoned their plans to expand the overnight accommodations at Salishan, and were living here. Although they didn't take paying customers, the numerous bedrooms were often filled with guests. And when my parents had gotten married, they'd moved in, taking over one side of the house for their own.

They'd raised the four of us here. We'd grown up among the grapevines, our lives revolving around planting and harvests, the way most kids' lives revolved around Christmas and the first day of summer break.

Our grandparents had died when we were all still kids, leaving the winery and all the land to my mom. By that time, my dad had been handling the business side for years, while my grandparents took care of the vineyards and mentored my mom in the art of winemaking.

The winery had been a lot smaller back then. Ben had been around, but he had been one of only a handful of employees. My dad hadn't started all the expansions until about ten years ago, around the time Zoe and I got married. He'd built new cellars for increased production, started sourcing grapes from other wineries, and built the Big House to expand our guest offerings.

And of course, he'd expected me to work for him and eventually take over.

For a long time, I'd convinced myself I hated this place. This house where I'd grown up. Where my mom had spent her childhood before us. The land, the vineyards. All of it. I'd resented the pressure to conform. The expectations that had been foisted on me for my entire life.

That resentment was at the heart of every decision I'd made in the last ten years. The degree I chose. The jobs I took. Going to grad school to get my MBA. Moving to San Francisco. All of it had been designed to take me as far from Salishan as I could possibly get. I'd felt, with utter certainty and conviction, that I needed to make my own way. Carve my own path. That I'd been made for something greater.

As I stood looking up at the house my grandparents had built, with its thick wooden beams and smooth river rock, I realized how much I'd let that resentment poison me.

Which was exactly what my father had done.

He hadn't asked to become the head of a winery. He'd married my mom and fell into the role by default. As my grandparents had aged and needed more help, he'd taken on the additional responsibility.

I didn't know what my dad had wanted to do before he'd started working for the winery. What his hopes and dreams had been when he was a young man. But I could see, so clearly now, how much he'd let resentment rule his life. It had tainted everything he'd ever done. It had destroyed his marriage. It could have ripped his entire family apart. The only thing saving us now was Mom. She'd always been our rock. Our stability. While Dad had come and gone, his temper leading the way, Mom had always been here. Safe, comforting.

We'd decided to do something for her. We couldn't erase our father from this house, but we could give her a fresh start.

I found my siblings inside, covering furniture with drop-cloths and taking pictures off the walls. The downstairs was getting fresh paint—colors Brynn had chosen. And we were moving my mom from the room she'd shared with my dad to a bedroom on the other side of the house. We'd paint that room as well, and I'd bought all new bedroom furniture. Mom didn't know yet, and I hoped she'd be happy with the surprise.

"Hey, sorry I'm late," I said. "I had to take a call."

"That's okay, we just got started," Brynn said. She was dressed in a pair of paint splattered overalls and a t-shirt, her hair up in a ponytail. "Can you help Cooper move bookshelves?"

"On it." I yanked Brynn's ponytail as I walked past, and she punched me in the arm.

"Hey, Brynncess," Cooper called from the other room. "Where am I supposed to put this stuff? If you're going to be in charge, you need to work on your leadership skills."

Brynn rolled her eyes. "Just move everything away from the wall so we can paint behind it. And don't forget later that you admitted I'm in charge."

"Whatever you say, baby sister," he said.

Cooper and I moved furniture while Leo and Brynn got started painting. Ben showed up to lend a hand, and Chase came over not long after. The new bedroom set arrived, and we hauled the old stuff out. Cooper convinced us to drag Mom's old bed frame and mattress out to the east field so we could make a bonfire out of it later. I tried to protest, but apparently I remained the only adult among my siblings. Even Leo voted bonfire. Zoe showed up after work, and she wasn't on my side either. But I should have guessed Zoe would be on Team Cooper, especially if a bonfire was involved.

The walls were too wet to move everything back in place before Mom got home, so it wasn't going to be a home-improvement-show-style reveal. We heard her car outside just as we got the last of the paint cans put away and the drop cloths moved.

"Come on, everyone line up," Brynn said, ushering us into the living room so we could greet Mom when she came in.

"We should hide behind the furniture and jump out at her," Cooper said.

"No, Cooper, quit it," Brynn said. "Just stand over here."

"You're no fun," Cooper said.

"Quit pouting," Brynn said. "You said I was in charge, remember?"

Cooper groaned and joined us. I stood in between Zoe and Ben, with Cooper and Chase on the other side of Zoe, and Brynn next to Ben.

Mom opened the door and paused, her mouth open in surprise. "Hey, kids. What's going on in here?"

"We have a surprise for you," Brynn said. "Look around. At the walls, I mean. Sorry about the furniture and stuff. We'll put it back when the walls dry."

Mom came in, shutting the door behind her, and looked around. "You painted?"

"Yeah," Brynn said. "It was Roland's idea."

"Really?" she asked, looking at me.

"Kind of," I said. "I just figured we could make this easier for you."

"This is amazing," she said, still taking slow steps through the room.

"Mom, you're killing my soul," Cooper said. "There's more to see, let's pick up the pace."

Cooper took her hand and dragged her through the house, pointing out the different colors in each room. Then he hauled her upstairs to show her the redesigned bedroom, and we all followed. She stood in the doorway, her hand covering her mouth, and tears glistened in her eyes.

“I can’t believe you all did this.” She took a deep breath and swiped beneath her eyes. “It’s beautiful.”

“This was fun,” Cooper said. He clapped his hands once. “I’m going to go get that fire going.”

“I’ll get the gasoline,” Chase said.

Mom opened her mouth and lifted a hand, but they were down the stairs and out the door so fast, she didn’t get a chance to say anything.

“Did they say fire and gasoline?” Mom asked.

“Just pretend you didn’t hear,” Brynn said. “It’s easier that way.”

“I’ll go make sure they don’t light themselves on fire,” Ben said, and followed Cooper and Chase outside.

* * *

Half an hour later, they had indeed lit Mom’s old bed on fire—and a badass bonfire it turned out to be. Ben had helped them haul more old debris to build it up, and we’d dragged camping chairs out so we had places to sit. Zoe had a wedding at the winery tomorrow with a difficult client, so she’d gone home to get some sleep. The rest of us had wine in plastic wine cups while we sat in a circle around the tall blaze.

Mom sat next to me, sipping her chardonnay. “Thank you for all this.”

“It wasn’t just me,” I said.

“Yeah, but it wouldn’t have happened without you,” she said. “Well, I’m sure Cooper and Chase could have found a reason to start a large, dangerous, and probably illegal fire without you. But the rest of it.”

“Sure.”

“Are you ready to talk about it yet?” she asked.

I glanced at her. The firelight glinted off the lines of her face. “Talk about what?”

“Zoe.”

I turned back to the fire. The truth was, I wasn’t ready to talk to her about Zoe. Everything still felt so tenuous and uncertain. I knew I loved her. I knew I wanted her back in my life—for good this time. But I had a lot of logistics to figure out before I’d know how I was going to make that happen.

“For now, can I just tell you that I still love her, and leave it at that?” I asked.

“Wow,” she said, her voice filled with surprise. “Yes, you can. I didn’t expect you to admit to that.”

“Yeah, I know,” I said. “Denial is a pretty powerful thing.”

“I understand if you don’t want to talk about everything,” she said. “But are you still going back to San Francisco?”

“Just for a week,” I said. I had a flight out tomorrow. Again. Maybe I’d actually go this time. “I was supposed to go back before, but... well, you know. Dad. I can’t keep putting it off or I’m going to get fired.”

“And then what?” she asked.

“I’m going to propose to my boss that I split my time between here and San Francisco,” I said. “I’ve been working remotely this long, obviously I can make it work. I can’t take on everything Dad was doing. I won’t have time. But I was thinking, if we hired someone to do some of it, I could steer the ship. Make sure the big picture stuff is on track. That way you can keep doing what you love, but someone you trust is taking care of the business side of things.”

“It sounds like you’ve really thought this through,” she said.

“Yeah,” I said. “It’s not perfect, but I think we can make it work.”

“I’m sure we can,” she said. “The question is, do you want to make it work?”

I watched the flames licking up the sides of the mattress. “I want to make it work with Zoe. And I know going back to San Francisco full-time isn’t an option. This is the best of both worlds. I’ll be gone sometimes, but it shouldn’t be too bad.”

“Does this mean you’re asking me for a permanent job?”

“Yes, I guess that’s what I’m doing,” I said with a smile. “Mom, will you hire me?”

She reached over and squeezed my arm. “It’s about time.”

I laughed and took a sip of wine. Because what could I say? She was right.

Roland

It felt weird to pack my stuff, knowing tonight I'd be home in San Francisco. I wasn't in a great mood about it. I couldn't shake the feeling that it was too soon for me to be gone. I'd thought about asking Zoe to come with me, just for the week. But I knew she couldn't up and leave work with no notice. And bringing her to San Francisco might not be a good idea, anyway. Too many bad memories.

Even aside from Zoe, I had a lot on my mind. How to convince my boss to let me split my time. The logistics of living in two cities. Whether to pull the trigger on bringing in an investor for Salishan.

There was a knock at the door, so I dropped the shirt I'd been folding to go answer it.

"Hey, you," Zoe said when I opened the door. "I'm glad I caught you."

"You're up early." I held the door open so she could come in, then shut it behind her.

"Yeah, I figured I'd swing by before you left," she said. "Is that okay?"

"Of course." I drew her close and kissed her. "I'm glad I get to see you."

"Are you all packed?"

"Not really," I said, nodding toward the pile of clothes on the bed.

She laughed. "You're such a guy. I'll help."

We went into the bedroom and stood on opposite sides of the bed to fold clothes. She picked up a pair of slacks and smoothed them out while I went back to the shirt I'd dropped.

"So, you'll be gone a week?" she asked.

“I might have to stay a little longer,” I said. “I’m going to try to be back in a week, though.”

“Okay.” She set the pants down and sat on the edge of the bed. “You know, we haven’t really talked about what’s going on with us. Not much, at least. Or how it’s going to work. Are we going to do that?”

“Of course we are,” I said. “I’m sorry, Zoe, I’m just trying to figure everything out.”

“Sure, I get that,” she said. “But there’s a lot we still haven’t said. And now here you are, packing for San Francisco. You think you’ll be gone a week. But what if that turns into two? And then a month from now, you’re still saying you’ll be back, but you can’t yet.”

“That’s not going to happen,” I said. “A week. Ten days, tops.”

“And then what?”

“That’s part of what I have to deal with when I’m there,” I said. “But my plan is to split my time between here and San Francisco. I’m pretty sure my CEO will go for it. He works remotely about half the time, so there’s precedent for it.”

“What would that look like?” she asked. “You’re here for a week, and there for a week?”

“Something like that,” I said. “It might not be quite that regular. Maybe a week there. Two weeks here. A longer trip down there. Then a month here. That kind of thing.”

“And you’ll do both jobs?” she asked.

“Yeah.”

She took a shirt off the pile. “That seems like a lot.”

“I’ve been doing it since I got here,” I said.

“Sure, but it was never meant to be permanent,” she said. “You didn’t come here planning to stay.”

“I think I have a handle on what’s involved with both jobs. And I’m talking to my mom about hiring someone here to take on some of the things my dad was handling. It’ll be fine.”

“But what if it’s not?”

“What are you worried about?” I asked.

“I’m worried that you’re going to trade one life that’s too busy for me for another life that’s just as bad.”

“I wasn’t too busy for you,” I said.

Her lips parted, and she stared at me for a few seconds. “Yes, you were. You were always too busy for me.”

A flare of anger scorched through me. This was an argument we’d had more times than I could count. I took a deep breath before answering. “I wasn’t too busy for you. Yes, I was busy. I worked long hours. I’ve always worked a lot. I did even when we were first married. It wasn’t until we moved to San Francisco that it started bothering you.”

“I’m sorry, are you talking about me, or the other Zoe you were married to?” she asked. “It bothered me way before we moved.”

“Sure, you complained about it when I was in grad school, too,” I said. “But I was working full time and getting my MBA. Of course I was fucking busy.”

“I didn’t complain,” she said. “God, you make it sound like I was a nagging shrew. It was hard, but when you were in grad school it wasn’t a big deal. I figured it was temporary. Once you finished your degree, things would settle down. But that’s the problem. They didn’t. You went from spending all your time and energy on work and school, to spending all your time and energy on just work. You never had anything left for me.”

“Who do you think I was doing it for?” I asked.

“Um, yourself,” she said. “It certainly wasn’t for me.”

“I was doing it for us,” I said. Holy shit, what the fuck was she talking about? “I was building a life for us.”

“You were building a bank account,” she said. “That’s not the same thing.”

I dropped the shirt that I still hadn’t managed to fold. “What the fuck are we doing? Why are we fighting about this?”

“We have to do it some time,” she said. “We can’t keep pretending the past didn’t happen. We’ve been avoiding it since the first time you fucked me in the tasting room. We need to do this at some point.”

“I’m not avoiding anything,” I said. “I told you, I’m just trying to figure out how to make it all work.”

“So am I,” she said. “Look, it’s all well and good for us to get naked and go at each other like crazed rabbits, and then start spouting I love yous. Pretty easy to say in the aftermath of multiple orgasms. But we both know great sex isn’t enough. We were always good at that part. It was the rest of the whole marriage thing that got all fucked.”

“I’m well aware of our history,” I said. “But I don’t see how rehashing all that bullshit right before I have to leave to catch a flight is going to help.”

“I didn’t come over here to fight with you,” she said. “But it’s like there’s this huge thing we’re not acknowledging. That thing being the fact that we did this once, and it ended in a fucking divorce.”

“Who’s not acknowledging our divorce?” I asked. “Believe me, it’s not something I can forget.”

She stood, her face clouded with anger. “Really? Because if that’s true, you’ve had me fooled for the last four years.”

“Fooled about what?” I asked.

“That you gave a shit.”

I stared at her, my brow furrowed, the muscles in my back tightening with strain. “What?”

“You didn’t care,” she said. “Everything fell apart, and you just went to work.”

“What the fuck was I supposed to do?” I asked. “Quit my job? Chase you back here? You know what, I wish I would have come after you. But I didn’t. There’s nothing I can do about that now.”

“Why didn’t you?”

“Because you fucking gutted me,” I said. “My world collapsed, and I didn’t know how to handle it.”

“Your world didn’t change,” she said. “You just kept doing what you’d been doing. The only difference was you had to sleep alone. It’s not like you noticed me otherwise.”

“Do you really think all the shit between us is my fault?” I asked. “Because last time I checked, I didn’t do the leaving, sweetheart. You left me. I came home from work and all your shit was gone. That was it. No discussion. Just an empty fucking apartment and your goddamn wedding ring sitting on the counter.”

“I didn’t leave you, Roland,” she said. “You left me well before that happened. I was just the one who moved out.”

She walked out, slamming the front door behind her.

“Fuck.” I grabbed a pair of socks and threw them at the wall. They hit with a soft—and enormously unsatisfying—thud. But I stopped myself before I threw something harder—and breakable.

Couldn’t she see how hard I was trying? I was upending my life for her. I hadn’t even suggested we try living in San Francisco together. I didn’t want to go back to a relationship that had been broken any more than she did. I wanted her, and I wanted us to be whole.

I didn’t know what else she wanted from me.

My phone vibrated in my pocket and I pulled it out, hoping it was her. But it was Leo.

Leo: Hey man. Have a second before you fly out?

Me: Gotta go in 10.

Leo: Swing by. Just need 2.

Me: Sure.

I tossed the rest of my shit into my bag, not bothering to fold it, and brought it outside to my car. My rental car, to be precise. That reminded me—a car. I’d need to buy a second one to keep here. I mentally added it to my list, wondering if it was even going to be necessary. Or if Zoe had just told me this wasn't worth it to her.

I got in the car and sent her a text.

I have to go, but I'll call you when I land.

She still hadn't answered by the time I got over to Leo's place. But I hadn't really expected her to.

Leo answered his door, his hair looking more unkempt than usual.

"You look like you've been up all night," I said.

He scowled and turned away. "I was."

I noticed a collection of soda cans and wrappers strewn around his desk. He usually kept his place meticulously clean. Gigz jumped up on the desk and an empty can clattered to the floor.

"Damn it, Gigz," he said.

"Why were you up all night?" I asked. "Everything okay?"

"Yeah, just... a game thing," he said. "Never mind."

"All right, whatever," I said. "Did you need something? I have a flight."

"Yeah." He went over to his desk and picked up a plain white envelope. "Here."

"What's this?" I slipped my finger beneath the flap and ripped open the seal. There was no paper or letter inside. I opened it wider and dumped the contents into my palm.

A gold wedding band.

"I found it a while ago," he said. "It was out on the far side of the work houses."

I stared at the ring. It couldn't be.

"It's yours, isn't it?" he asked.

"I don't know," I said, although I knew full well that it was. "I didn't think I'd lost it out there. I thought it fell off in front of Mom's house."

"I don't think I was here when you lost it," he said.

“No, you weren’t,” I said. “It was Christmas, and it snowed. We threw a few snowballs, but we weren’t dressed for the cold. I didn’t have gloves on. I noticed it was gone after we went inside. But I must have lost it earlier than I’d thought.”

“Like I said, I found it out there,” he said.

I looked over at him. “And you kept it?”

He shrugged. “I thought about giving it back to you before, but I wasn’t sure if you’d want it.”

“But why did you keep it?”

“I just... had a feeling you might need it back someday.”

The ring wasn’t large, or thick. Like Zoe’s, it had simply been what we could afford when we were twenty. It had seemed prophetic when I’d lost it. I’d been in grad school, working crazy hours at my job and going to classes at night for my MBA. It had certainly heralded the downturn in our marriage.

Leo finding it, and giving it back now, left me with that same sense—that it meant something.

“Thanks,” I said, curling my hand around the ring. I slipped it in my pocket.

“Sure,” he said. “Now get out of here or you’ll miss your flight. And I’m going to fucking bed.”

I laughed. “Sounds good, man. Get some rest.”

Back in the car, I pulled the ring out again. It was the craziest thing. I’d never in a million years thought I’d see it again. I put it in my wallet, where it wouldn’t slip out. It wasn’t like I could wear it. Last I checked, I was still very much divorced. And as much as I wanted to repair the damage between me and Zoe, I wasn’t sure if I knew how.

I checked my phone. Still no answer from Zoe. I’d have to call her from San Francisco, and hope she answered. In the meantime, I had a flight to catch.

Zoe

I went on a date tonight. It was fucking weird. I know it's over and I didn't do anything wrong. But it still felt like it should have been you.

~Text from Zoe, unsent

It was not the first time I had a puking groom. But Victor Cockburn was going for a record.

I stood outside the bathroom while his best man slumped in a chair wearing a pair of sunglasses and rubbing his temples. At least I knew the reason for the groom's tender stomach wasn't viral. If I had to guess, I'd have said tequila. A good tequila was a beautiful thing, but I was pretty sure these guys had not been drinking good tequila last night. Probably cheap tequila, and a lot of it.

Kind of made me wonder if Cooper had been involved.

"You should have a cup of coffee," I said to the best man, Dirk. Victor Cockburn's best man was named Dirk. Despite the raging bridezilla that was Victoria, this wedding was turning out to be rather entertaining.

"I don't drink coffee," he said.

"You do now." I poured him a cup and added two packets of sugar and extra cream. "Here."

He took the cup and sipped.

I'd already given both Victor and Dirk a tall glass of water and a dose of ibuprofen. I pitied the tongue-lashing these guys were going to get when Victoria found out how hungover they were. Why guys didn't do the partying a few nights before the wedding, I had no idea. But it was amazing how often I had sick bridal parties after a night of heavy drinking.

"How are you doing in there, big guy?" I asked through the bathroom door.

Victor answered with a groan.

I glanced at the time. We had just under an hour. It would be tight, but as long as Victor's stomach decided to stop emptying for long enough to hold down some water, I'd be able to get him presentable by the time he had to stand up in front of his family and friends to get married.

Poor bastard.

My phone buzzed with a message from Jamie. She was working this wedding with me.

Jamie: Bride wants an update on the groom's readiness

Me: Tell bride his tux looks great

Jamie: Puking?

Me: Yep. Bride status?

Jamie: Destroying Tokyo

I sighed. I wasn't sure which of us had the harder job. Me, trying to get two overgrown frat boys ready in time for a very expensive wedding. Or Jamie, who had to field Cockring's last-second demands.

Heh. Cockring.

But at least I was busy. After fighting with Roland before he'd left, I wanted to be busy.

I felt bad for walking away like I had, especially since he had to leave. Now he'd be gone for a week—or two, or three, or who knew how long—and the last thing we'd done is fight. That was not how I'd wanted to leave things. I'd just been so frustrated, and I'd let that get the better of me.

I'd replied to his text that he'd call—just said okay. I didn't want to be an ass about it and not answer. But I didn't want to text or talk to him on the phone. I was hurt, and angry, and I wanted to yell at him. Or maybe have a good angry-fuck and then yell at him.

Things were always easier when Roland and I were naked.

I blew out a breath and tapped on the door again. “Ready to come out yet?”

Victor opened the door and I kept my face still. But the dude looked like shit. I had my work cut out for me.

“Okay, Vic—can I call you Vic?—you did a number on yourself,” I said. “But I’ve had worse. I’m not going to lie, this is probably going to be both the best, and worst, day of your life. I’ll do what I can, but you’re going to have to pull yourself together.”

He nodded and ran his hands through his hair.

“All right, Dirk over there is sipping coffee, and I think that should perk him up well enough to get through the wedding. But I can see you’re going to make me work for it. Luckily, this isn’t my first rodeo.” I straightened his tie, then handed him a glass of fizzing Alka-Seltzer. “Drink this and let me know when you’re ready for step two.”

We waited a few minutes to make sure he wasn’t going to puke up the Alka-Seltzer. Then I gave both men a glass of my emergency hangover smoothie. They looked at me like I was nuts. I couldn’t blame them, it was bright green.

“Kale, lemon, ginger, cucumber, and pineapple,” I said. “Trust me. This works. Finish this, have some more coffee, and then another glass of water. And I’ll remind you to pee before the ceremony starts, because you’ll definitely need to.”

I left Victor and Dirk to check on a few other details and when I came back, they both looked a little better. They had color in their cheeks, at least.

I took my bag of man supplies out of a cupboard and started pulling things out. Deodorant, shaving cream, razors, clippers for stray neck hairs. I also had bandages, breath mints, a sewing kit, a Tide stick, several extra ties—bow and regular in assorted colors—beef jerky and a few mini bottles of Jack Daniels for my grooms who needed a quick shot of liquid courage to calm their nerves. I found what I was looking for and tossed them each a packet of pretzels. “If you think you can keep them down, eat these too. The salt helps.”

“You keep all this stuff on hand?” Victor asked.

“I like to be prepared,” I said. “Trust me, you’re not the first groom I’ve had to revive from the dead.”

“You’re not going to tell Victoria, are you?” he asked.

I gave him a reassuring smile. “Not a word.”

“Thanks,” he said. “By the way, are you single? Dirk has a huge crush on you.”

“Hey,” Dirk said, shooting a glare at Victor.

I grinned at them. “That’s sweet, but I’m divorced and dating my ex-husband. You don’t want any of this drama.”

Victor laughed—he probably thought I was kidding—and I was relieved to see his smile looked fairly natural. He’d do okay in the wedding photos.

The wedding went off without a hitch. Or at least, without any hitches that I could have prevented. Dirk swayed on his feet during the ceremony, but thankfully he didn’t fall over. Victor held his shit together pretty well, although he did start to look a little green while he said his vows. Tequila or no tequila, I didn’t really blame him.

Victoria cried so much her mascara ran everywhere. Apparently she hadn’t taken my advice to wear waterproof. I passed her maid of honor a small packet of tissues as they walked to the reception area so she could get her cleaned up.

With the reception in full swing, my job was done. Jamie and a few other winery employees, as well as the caterer, would be here for the duration, but thankfully, I was free to go.

Instead of leaving for home, I wandered into the small tasting room and sat down at the bar. It was impossible not to think about the night I’d had a drink—and done other things—with Roland in here. That hadn’t been very long ago, all things considered, but so much had changed.

I thought about returning Roland’s call, but I wasn’t sure what to say. I needed time to let everything settle. Time to figure out what the hell I was doing. Hearing myself say it out loud—I’m divorced and dating my ex-husband—had been a little surreal.

It was probably good that he'd gone back to San Francisco for a while. It gave us some space. Things had been happening so fast. Just a month or so ago, I'd been wondering how much longer he'd be around—trying to suppress my physical attraction to him. Now I'd plunged head first into a relationship with a man I thought I'd left behind for good.

His words from earlier echoed in my memory. They'd been running through my head all day. Because you fucking gutted me. My world collapsed, and I didn't know how to handle it.

Leo'd told me Roland had been hurt when our marriage ended, but until I'd heard it from Roland, I hadn't really believed it. And now that I knew, I wasn't sure what to think. It called all my assumptions into question. And it made me wonder what role I'd played in the demise of our marriage.

It was easy to lay all the blame at Roland's feet. He'd been the one who'd worked too much. Who'd been so consumed with upping his pay grade that he'd completely lost touch with his wife.

But things like this weren't completely one-sided—not always, at least. Maybe most of the fault had been his, but I'd played a part. He'd seemed surprised to hear me say I'd felt like he didn't have time for me. It seemed so obvious, how could he not have known? But had I ever told him? We'd fought about his work schedule, plenty of times. But had I ever told him why it bothered me? Why I hadn't liked how much he was working, or how it had made me feel? Or had I assumed he should know better, and kept silent?

It was mostly the latter. Our arguments hadn't been productive discussions where either of us were being heard. More like yelling matches that had never solved anything. We'd fought about things, not the real issues behind them. Canceled dinner plans. Late nights at the office. But we'd never dealt with the real problems running beneath the surface.

I'd spent the last four years believing that our divorce hadn't affected Roland. And it had led me to the conclusion that I hadn't mattered to him. He'd chosen his career over his wife, and from what I'd seen, he'd been perfectly content with his choice.

Now I knew that wasn't the case. He had been hurt, and I had meant something to him. I still did, and he wanted to give us another shot.

I did too. I really did. I wanted it more than anything. But I was afraid I was setting myself up for heartbreak. Leaving Roland had nearly broken me the first time. I didn't know how I'd survive something like that again.

"Hey, kiddo," Shannon said from the doorway.

"Hi."

She came in and sat next to me. "The wedding seems to be going well."

"I think so," I said. "The bride was difficult, and the groom and best man were so hungover, I wondered if they'd be able to stay upright for the ceremony. But it all seemed to work out."

"I'm sure you had something to do with that," she said.

"Just doing my job."

"And you're very good at it," she said. "We're lucky to have you."

"Thanks," I said. "Honestly, I feel like I'm the lucky one. All things considered."

Shannon smiled and reached out to squeeze my hand. "Zoe, can I be straightforward with you?"

The way she said that made me nervous, but I nodded. "Yeah, of course."

"You're going to wonder why I'm telling you this, but hang in there with me. I have a point." She shifted on her stool. "I stayed with Lawrence for as long as I did because I thought I had to. At first, it was because of the kids. Roland was born less than a year after we were married. Ten years later, I had four. And I wasn't just tied to him by our children. There was Salishan, too. I overlooked things I shouldn't have because I was afraid of what would happen if I had to make it on my own.”

“That’s understandable,” I said.

“I suppose,” she said. “The problem is, I wasted a lot of time. And I was never really happy.”

“You’re right, I do wonder why you’re telling me this.”

She smiled. “I don’t want you and Roland to make the same mistake.”

Involuntarily, I shrunk back. Was she saying she didn’t want me to be with her son? She’d never seemed to harbor hard feelings against me over the divorce. But maybe she didn’t want Roland and me to reconnect.

“What do you mean?” I asked.
