CHAPTER ONE

Before

IT'S AN ABSOLUTE madhouse.

A woman juggles a baby and a toddler while a third, slightly older man raids a supply closet with blankets and plastic urinals.

A man in a wheelchair with no legs hollers in the corner while the nurses bustle past him as if he's silent.

Stretchers full of moaning, injured people line the hallways, waiting in a room.

Even more ambulances arrive at the Emergency Room door.

We were lucky, if you could call it that. Being conked on the head by a doctor named Emerson a fast pass into the CT scan. It came back clear, so they're here to discharge him and make space for someone else.

I step into the night, where a parked ambulance flashes its lights in a soundless refrain.

The moon looms high and heavy. A full moon. That probably explains the excess of accidents in the hospital tonight. And at the circus. I wish I had given that idea any thought twelve months ago, but the circus is a superstitious lot.

They've rubbed off on me.

And I need some reason for the disaster we're facing.

Something to blame.

I pull out my cellphone and call Wolfgang.

The knife thrower answers on the first ring. "Sitrep," he says, remembering his time in the military, though he usually tries to hide it. Situation report. "I have it on scientific authority that his head is hard as hell."

A pause, which is the most emotion we really ever get from the line.

He's the least showy showman... at least until he has sharp metal hands. He's ex-military, which always struck me as interesting. The way with all its wild, haphazard ways seems like a strange path for someone who still operates like a soldier. Someone who's awake early for a pushup and a ten-mile run every day, rain or shine. Then again, it has the camaraderie and sense of a unit, that's rare in town life. Isn't that why I joined the circus? I came for a darker reason. But the feeling of family? That's why I stay.

"Good," he says, his voice gruff.

"We're waiting on some meds, and then we should be discharged."

Another pause, this one less relieved. More tense. "You might want to take your time."

Unease has been swirling in my gut ever since I peeled away from the fairgrounds, mud slopping along the undercarriage of the truck, rained fat as hail pelting the windshield. "What the hell's happening there?"

"You don't want to know."

Fuck. "Is it Alessandra?"

The brash, impetuous fortune teller is the reason we're in this mess: always starting drama with people in the circus, or worse, stirring up trouble in the towns we pass through. "Don't worry about it," Wolfgang says and gives up. "Stay gone."

He ends the call.

I swear at the pock-marked moon.

A few lingering drops of rain land on my face in placid answer.

When I make my way back through the too-full emergency room to the small bay that holds Emerson's hospital bed already occupied by a woman, of course.

"Here's my cellphone number," she purrs. "I get off my shift in an hour. I wouldn't want anything to happen to you, for you to be in any pain... I'll be here mind nursing you. Personally."

"What an enchanting offer," the ringmaster says in his usual fluid, charming voice. "Though I wouldn't want to offend anyone with my presence. A little perhaps?"

A giggle. "My husband is a truck driver. He's been gone for four weeks."

"Too long to leave a sensual creature like yourself alone," he says, offering a heavy spoonful of sympathy. "Perhaps you're the one who's in pain."

Christ.

CHAPTER TWO

Present day

A THICK FOG descends over the fairgrounds. So thick it almost has a the loam and the clay of the earth turned into a fine mist. The equipment mostly packed away, the circus working with subdued order in the void of the storm. Not only the physical encounter. The scare. The risk. We're not accustomed to danger anymore.

Sure, every trapeze act involves risk, but we minimize it with rigorous practice.

Our systems and procedures keep everyone safe.

A registered nurse moonlights as a costume designer, always available.

We don't have accidents anymore, until last night. I've been contained every show, every town since then. This night is different, but it reminds me of before.

I couldn't punish Sienna, not the way Marino would have.

So I did the only thing left to protect the circus: I sent her away.

Why does it feel like absolute bullshit?

I'm not a danger to the fucking circus. That's what Sienna told me.

It felt like the truth, even though I knew it to be a lie.

Should I have believed her? Maybe I would have if it had only been Albert. He's a good worker, but also a shit starter. Would Emerson believe her? Maybe. No. I hope not, anyway. But even if I could have doubted her, I don't doubt Alessandra's daughter, Cat.

At least I never have until now.

The purple constellation-patterned fortune teller's tent is the only structure remaining. I ordered the men to leave it alone, like it's some shrine to Sienna. Which is ridiculous. She wasn't even our permanent teller. That has always been Alessandra, despite her absence these past weeks. She's not quite reliable, but she always comes back.

Marino kept her around because she's an absolute expert at fooling unsuspecting townies of their money. She can always cajole them into paying more for a special prediction from the pagan gods or even a spell designed to cast good fortune.

I keep her around for a different reason entirely.

Guilt.

No, this tent didn't belong to Sienna.

Nothing did, which is a knowledge that sinks in my gut.

She was alone in this world, battered and bruised by the men in her world. She could have been different. I should have been different, but somehow she wasn't. Somehow I didn't realize she was going to take unnecessary risks. Somehow I didn't know she would climb that Ferris wheel in the storm. Alessandra did all those years ago.

History repeating itself.

Soft footsteps approach the tent.

Cat peeks her head inside. "You asked to see me."

"Come in. Sit down." I gesture to the tufted bench that circus artists use when they're having their tarot cards read. The cards themselves are in one of the compartments beneath the table, along with mystical-looking crystals, dried herb bundles, and a white powder that I don't even know what it is. These are the tools of the fortune teller. The props used to convince others of an illusion they want to believe in.

I'm no fortune teller.

I'm the owner of this circus. Someone determined to get to the truth.

Cat sits down, clearly uncomfortable, tucking her curly black hair behind her ear.

"How old are you now?"

She blinks. "Seventeen."

"Have you ever thought about leaving the circus?"

Her dark eyes widen, so like her mother's and yet so much more innocent. Not jaded. I've worked hard to make sure she doesn't have a hard life to be. She starred in our first production of this show, the one I created on Alice in Wonderland after I took over.

She was the young girl who climbed through the looking glass.

ast few discovered a world of amazement, her dark curls bouncing, her blue puffed up by layers of white ruffles. By the time she hit puberty she was already proficient with a cello, so we moved her to the band. The daughter of one of the butchers stepped in as the little girl in the show.

“What else would I do?” she asks.

It doesn’t feel like an idle question. “Anything you want. You could do anything. Just because your mother prefers this life doesn’t mean you have to. Sorrow enters her eyes. “Have you heard anything about Mom?”

“No, I’m sorry I haven’t,” I say gently. “I have people looking for her.”

She bites her lip. “I know she always comes back, but what if she doesn’t? What if she’s in jail or worse? What if she’s hurt?”

I clear my throat against the guilt. “We’d know if she were in jail or worse. Security is the premiere private security firm in the country. Maybe even in the world. They have contacts in law enforcement. And in morgues. There’s a Jane Does matching her description.”

Relief makes her slump. “I don’t understand why she doesn’t talk to me with her.”

The woman goes on drug-fueled benders where she sleeps with her friends. Until she gets tired of them. Then she leaves them tied up in motel rooms and takes their money. It’s one of the rare gifts Alessandra gave her daughter, teaching her that part of her lifestyle. “I’m sure she wants what’s best for you. Maybe you could get your GED. Go to college.”

“And do what?” Her nose scrunches. “How to work in a bank?”

A reluctant smile tugs at my lips. The circus life is addictive. People are born into it. Most never leave. They find some role in the circus. Behind the scenes, their role may change. Even the circus itself may change, though most people don’t leave Cirque des Miroirs.

They never go back to town life.

“Caterina. I need to ask about what happened.”

Her face turns white. “I told you about it already.”

“No, you told Emerson. Who told me. I want to hear it from you.”

Her hands twist together. “Well, like I said, she wanted to take a ride on the Ferris wheel. She kept saying it would be fun, but Albert said it would be safe. That we have systems in place for a reason. She said she’d probably be wrong by climbing herself.”

the dress “Had you ever seen her do anything like that before?”

she was “No, I mean, I’ve barely even talked to her. Just brought her clothing supplies when you asked me to. It’s a big circus.”

A big circus, but there are not that many women around their age who could have been friends. Allies. “Were you afraid that she would take your mother’s job permanently?”

I lean forward. “Did this seem like a way to get rid of her?”

her.” Panic flashes across her expression. “Yes. I mean, no. I mean, how could I lie about something like this? How could we all be lying?”

“That’s a good question,” I say, my voice turning hard. “If you’re lying with the same story, then it means it was premeditated. Collusion. I’m not sure why you’d do it.”

CHAPTER THREE

I'M STRIDING TOWARD the lopsided, lumpy big top.

My gut churns, not knowing what I'm going to find inside. Or how I'm going to stop it.

Emerson's hand grabs my arm.

"What?" I demand, swinging back to face him.

"You don't need to go in there. Come with me. Let's get drunk. We can meet up with that nurse. I bet she would like both of us in the room. I'll be charming her. You glaring at her. She would have the best night of her life."

"I don't fuck married women."

"Based on my observation, you don't fuck anyone."

Because I have darkness in my veins. My father held down workers who hurt them all across the country and back again. That's what I came to see. "I'm going in the tent."

He shakes his head and then winces at the movement. "There's nothing you can do to help her, if he's trying to set an example for everyone."

Set an example. With a woman. My skin crawls with the realization.

And the hint of sorrow in Emerson's dark eyes. This man is known to be calloused, even cruel. If he doesn't want to see what's happening in the tent, it's bad.

"This is fucking bullshit."

"It's the animal kingdom. Why do you think the bears and tigers are in their place? Because they recognize who has the most power, who isn't afraid to use it. And for all that, he's a cold-hearted bastard, he's also the alpha of the pack."

A low sound escapes me, one of barely contained fury. "That's so rich, gold-plated bullshit, you know that? We're not animals. We're people.

want to test that. I don’t want to find out if he’d help string me up.

And Wolfgang? He looks pissed but then that’s his usual expressio alarming accuracy from long distances, not to mention that his mead suit, his could do damage. It's always been a mystery how that much brutality manages precision.

I'm well and truly outnumbered.

Her dangling body catches my attention. It's a mistake to look for a mistake to see where the rope has cut into her ankle, because the skin isn't meant to support her entire body weight. Blood as bright red as a circus tent drips along her shins, upside down.

I should back down, live to fight another day.

But I can't.

Can't let it happen.

"Is this what you want?" I ask the performers and the operators alike. "Be beaten like animals? For our pain to be used as entertainment?"

"It's punishment," says a man who has been enjoying the show too much. There's even a tent in his fucking pants. "What else is he supposed to do? She endangered the circus."

I don't bother arguing his point about the danger. "I want there to be much stricter safety policies and procedures, but this isn't how we do it."

"Then what?" Wolfgang asks, his voice low. There's genuine curiosity in his eyes. "If you write a neat little guidebook of your safety rules, and someone writes it for it, then what?"

Everyone watches me, some disdainful, some solemn.

They want to know.

"Then they leave the circus. Anyone who endangers the circus has ruined the show. I turn to face Marino with narrowed eyes. This man has been my mentor. And even a father figure. And now he's my enemy. "And right now, Marino is the one endangering the circus."

A gasp ripples through the crowd.

A few murmurs of surprise and speculation.

I never thought of myself as a leader.

I also never thought of myself as a man who would allow a woman to be strung up and whipped bloody against her will, which means I have a lot to make.

"You'll regret this," Marino says, his voice raspy, eyes bright with vicious intent.

"No doubt," I say, ripping the whip from his hold. He's strong, ity fists strong enough to hold onto it against my hold. “Now get the hell out of here.”

He takes a step toward me, and I crack the whip.

He stops, because he’s a fucking coward. He would use this on a volunteer. But he’s too fucking scared to get hit with it himself even to claim himself in the circus.

As the Everyone sees it. Everyone knows.

Whatever respect or fear they had for him dies in that moment.

It’s a hostile takeover, not one that happens in boardrooms. It’s an animal kingdom. Emerson was right, after all. And I half expect him to kill me for it.

It’s happening. As I watch, in a fluid motion, Wolfgang pulls a knife from his boot. He aims and throws with such casual accuracy it makes circus-goers gasp. I wait for the pain. The shock to my system. I wait for death.

Instead the knife sails past me.

I even hear the whistle a few inches from my ear.

He missed. How is that possible? Was it an accident? On purpose?

I turn and see the knife slice through the thick rope holding Alessandra. She crumples into Emerson’s arms, who lowers her gently to the ground. He looks at me, his expression grim. I turn to see Wolfgang gives me a short nod.

to go.” This is a coup. And it’s happening now.

I crack the whip again. “Cirque des Miroirs belongs to me now. Who is the anyone disagree?”

Marino is still blubbering threats, but they’re useless so long as he can’t even come near me. People can see that Emerson and Wolfgang are on my side. That sways them, even if their own loyalty to me wouldn’t have.

The workers look wide-eyed, shocked, and... somehow, so much more relieved.

choice “Do we kill him?” Emerson asks, sounding unconcerned with my answer.

It’s as casual as anything. Do we put the tent away? Do we drive to town?

CHAPTER FOUR

Present day

WE SHOULD BE on our way to the next city already, but I gave the order to stop.

I gave the order because I was suspicious.

Because I wanted to find some proof that Sienna was telling the truth.

I walk through empty rows of empty tents. Everyone is already packed in their RVs, staying dry against the damp. I could find Emerson probably with a woman. Something tugs me toward the big top instead.

The stands have already been put up along with the barricade that circles the circle in the center, the apparatus that the acrobats use packed away.

It's a large empty space except for one man who stands in the middle. Whatever he sees on my face doesn't seem to surprise him.

He does a slow clap that echoes in the hollow arena. "I see from your thundercloud above your head that you figured it out, mon ami."

I don't stop walking. I keep going.

He doesn't back away.

He doesn't charge.

He doesn't even lift his hands in defense. There's only acceptance here under the gravity of the moment, there's a twinkle in his eye, mischief.

I'm going to get my answers, but first, I'm going to plow my fist into his face.

I'm going to feel the force sling his body to the ground.

I'm going to hope that there's even an ounce of satisfaction when he crumples.

None. There's none.

And I am left breathing hard, fighting the urge to hit him again and unleashing the feral animal inside me.

He opens his jaw wide and then closes it, touching gingerly. “Your hook is legendary,” he says, “I can see why.”

“Get up,” I tell him.

He reclines on the dirt floor looking as cozy as if it’s a plush chair, propped up on his elbows. He’s still wearing his ringmaster’s suit. If he’s lost the jacket and the hat somewhere, he’s in short sleeves and brief pants. “So, you can hit me again? That’s not an enticing offer.”

“I said get up.”

He sighs as if I’m a trial.

But he stands, and then I hit him again. This time, it seems to land order to Not my actual fist, but the gravity of the situation.

He holds his jaw, panting. “Fuck,” he says. “Predictable. That’s the problem with this show. I knew what was coming.”

I bare my teeth in a cold, humorless smile. “A show, that’s all that’s been, one that you directed.”

He moves slower now, clearly feeling the pain. But he stands up and spreads his arms. “Well, swing again, my friend, swing again. A l. draws a times as it takes to get your anger out, as many times as it takes for me to become Gerard Marino.” He looks up. “Or perhaps you would like to be pulled up by the scaffolding. I’m sure we can find a whip somewhere here without the lions and tigers.”

A low growl escapes me. “Tell me what the hell happened. Even if you don’t leave anything out.”

“Everything,” he says faintly, mocking as if it’s a complicated story.

“Start talking. Unless you would like to be hit again.”

He puts his hands up as if to say, I’m talking, I’m talking. Don’t e. Even again. “Here’s the story.” Even speaking slightly quieter and more chief. than he normally does, there is still the air of a ringmaster leading me into his show. “Boy meets girl. Girl becomes boy’s temporary fortune teller. Boy loses his fucking mind, jeopardizes the whole circus.”

“How? Because I already know she climbed up there because she believed that someone was inside, because she was trying to help. That’s how she jeopardized the circus.”

“It happened long before that,” he says, a little anger leashed in his voice. “You were distracted. You didn’t care what happened anymore. At least not then.”

"Do it. Whatever you're planning on doing. Kill me. Kick me out of the circus."

"Oh, I will," I tell him, my voice grim. "But first, you're going to die on your own terms."

He sighs looking away. "Do you remember that night?"

"The night I took over the circus? Yes, I remember every detail."

"Marino told you you'd live to regret it."

"No doubt I will," I say, echoing the long-ago words.

"The circus is more than a job. It is more than a mistress. It's a wife, even a lifestyle. It's a god. We need monks to run it. You can fuck around with "No. He worked because he made the circus his life, and most people aren't willing to do that. Even when they perform and travel, they still find time for their families, they still want a few moments to themselves each night. Boy you never did."

"You don't want a person," I tell him, "You want a martyr."

"Yes," he snaps. "What did you think you were being when you stood in front of all of these people here beneath the tent, when you took the away from him and snapped it? You became our martyr. And then one day, because you saw some nice pussy, you decided that was over."

Some of the fight drains out of me. I am still furious. I've t of the Marino would laugh if he could see me now.

He can’t see me, of course. He’s living in semi-captivity at our explain Nebraska. That’s where I kept him after I ejected him from the circus that farm—where the animals could live out the remainder of their cages. And what is Gerard Marino but a wild animal who performed circus? He has his own comfortable cage.

CHAPTER FIVE

Sienna

A GIRL HAS a lot of time to think in a trunk.

I think about my father, who was no longer alive. He'd been the r beside my bed for so long that it felt strange to have him gone. Ther his absence doesn't seem to matter to my general state of well-being.

He's still dragging me home to Forrester from beyond the grave.

I think about Travis, who managed to escape his bullies and find He belongs at the circus. He's a clown. A damn good one.

I'm glad one of us got away.

Maybe that's all the hungry rage of a dark small town is willing one at a time.

I very carefully don't think about Logan. I don't think about wheth miss me. Or whether he feels guilty. Even though he probably do because he cares about me specifically but because he'd save the whol if he could.

Instead he saves his own world. Cirque des Miroirs.

They belong to him in a way I never did.

The car swerves to the right, sending me into the left side, slamm legs against hot metal. Fuck. All three men drove Ford trucks to pro manhood.

The Cadillac I'm in was a concession to their kidnapping plans. I hide a flailing, fighting body in the open bed of a pickup. Not that fight very well with both hands tied behind my back.

A bump in the road catapults me into the air. And slams me into t of the trunk.

Metal on bruised flesh. I'm battered, suffocating in the hot air, but make a sound. Not a moan. Not a plea. I made all the sounds before stuffed me in here.

Swearing. Baseless threats. An animalistic howl of defeat.

The car stops with a hard screech, and I roll into the hard front trunk.

Car doors slam.

The trunk opens.

Sunlight blinds me. Dry West Texas air feels almost cool and breezy, being baked for hours in a tin can.

“Bathroom break.” Kyle sounds curt. “Don’t make a fuss or someone “Fuck you,” I say hoarsely.

“Give them the key,” he says without looking up.

A little girl appears from behind the counter, pushing open the door that was clearly unlocked. So much for safety behind the glass. She has pigtails and a suspicious frown. I give her a forced smile so she won't question me. I don't want them noticing there's a problem now that the kid is involved.

“You 'spanic?” she asks.

I've been asked this plenty of times, especially in Texas. Something about the blend of Asian and white heritage.

“She's Indonesian,” Kyle says, his voice tempered with pride and encouragement. As if he likes kids. As if he likes me, which turns this whole thing into a farce.

How does someone evil look kind?

The guy behind the counter doesn't even look up from his phone to acknowledge. “This is on his daughter.

I'm not even sure he would if Kyle looked less wholesome, but still a total mind fuck.

Kyle half-drags me toward the bathroom and pushes me inside. The door has a flimsy lock with the copper plating rusting away. It wouldn't keep me from going off for very long. There are bars on the small bathroom window, which makes the entire gas station seem even more sketchy. Who's breaking into the bathroom?

No magical escape routes in here.

Nothing to do except actually use the toilet...

And pray I don't catch something.

Then again, that would serve Kyle right. I know what he plans for me. I want to be a good little wife.

I wash my hands in a sink that's probably teeming with bacteria. My reflection in the rusty metal mirror looks even worse than I feel, with a gash on my chin and dried blood on my arm. My cheek is bruised. My eyes are bloodshot.

I don't look scared.

I'm too exhausted for that.

Too weak to fight back, to do anything but give in and let go.

through I look defeated. This is how Kyle sees me.

But it's not how I feel deep inside.

It's how he sees me, though, which is an advantage. A small divider have to make it work for me.

"That means yes."

"How does that mean yes?"

“People who don’t need help look confused and ask me why I think that. You got this weird look on your face like you have to pee. I’ll then lied.”

Little lie detector. In that case I’d better go with the truth. “It’s okay you don’t get involved.”

“I can call someone. After you leave, I can call someone.”

Hope beats in my chest. The offer is too good to pass up. Once gone they’ll be safe. “Yes. Please.”

“Who should I call?”

That’s a good question. There’s my mother. I can’t imagine he’s anything but freaking the hell out. There’s Maisie, who would have been resourceful... but how could she fight Kyle and the Assholes? It would no way get her hurt.

Logan Whitmere, my mind supplies.

My mind is an idiot.

Logan Whitmere kicked me out. Would he come and rescue me if I eat him? Maybe. Only out of a sense of duty. He doesn’t actually care about me. He doesn’t trust me, which hurts more than anything.

For all I know, he would assume it was another stunt.

Like the fucking Ferris wheel.

For as long as I live I will never go on another Ferris wheel. Not on it’s a beautiful sunny day.

“B. Jones,” I say. “Brian Jones. He’s a State Trooper. Call 911 and tell them to find Brian Jones. Tell them the girl from the circus is in trouble.”

The girl from the circus might be Alessandra. Or Cat. It might be any of those people.

“The one with the black eye.”

She snorts. “So you had a black eye, but you don’t need help. Right? Snarky little brat. I can’t help but smile. She reminds me of a girl.” “Thank you for this.”

An eye roll. “Whatever.”

She disappears with barely a sound as her feet drop to the hard-earth outside. A bang on the door startles me, and I whirl around, facing a metal door with its ancient maintenance log. Faded ink on yellow paper proclaims this was last serviced two years ago. Lovely.

CHAPTER SIX

Logan

IT FEELS LIKE leaving a part of my body behind. Something nonessential, a limb. A leg. I'm still alive, but I'll never be quite the same after Em's betrayal. There was a time I didn't trust him not to kill me. Then he did me that fateful night. Trust grew and grew.

I would have counted him as my best friend, alongside Wolfgang.

Now he's no longer in the circus.

I'm on the way toward another body part. My heart.

The entire circus is headed back to Texas but it will take many days for them to make the trek. I'll be taking the faster way of a flight into the airport and then an SUV rental. Wolfgang is in the passenger seat. I'm in the back, my personal resource to the small town of Forrester. Sienna was born and raised.

Where she's most likely being held against her will.

My knuckles turn white on the steering wheel.

Hold on, Sienna. I'll find you.

Wolfgang breaks the silence. "She'll make it through this."

I swallow hard. She survived so much already.

She shouldn't have to survive more.

A faded sign says Welcome to Forrester, an old-fashioned painted mural with a scenic lake with tall trees and a few birds flying overhead. Beautiful. Picturesque. And entirely a façade. As much of a show as the acrobats and music in the circus.

The serene landscape hides a dark underbelly.

Prejudice. Cruelty. This town never accepted Sienna Cole for who she is, different.

They also refuse to let her go.

“Tell us what we’re walking into,” Wolfgang demands.

Travis fidgets. He’s been in pain ever since hearing that Sienna taken, white-faced, tight-lipped. Willing to help, which is why he’s “Kyle was her friend. He was... my friend, too. The three of us would time in the lake by his house. His mom was nice to us. Always n grilled cheese sandwiches, let us have soda, that kind of thing.”

“What went wrong?”

He gives an uneven shrug as I watch through the rearview mirror started to show. I couldn’t... hide who I was. That I’m different than other guys. That I’m gay. Kyle’s dad had never been a fan of us, but he put his foot down when he found out.”

“What about Sienna?” My voice is filled with gravel.

“We were all developing, you know. Growing up. I think he wanted that way, and she said no. So he spread the rumor that she was loose.”

A low growl escapes me.

“It really backfired on him because after that every guy would pick her alone. Kyle was never able to get over her, and she wouldn’t give up a time of day. It pissed him off, so they would pick on me, bully me, but they knew she would come to my rescue.” He makes a pained sound. “I tried to push her away, so she wouldn’t get hurt, but it never worked.”

Leather creaks beneath my hold. “She was fucking alone.”

“And maybe I hated her because she was like me. Because she was an outcast like me, but she was still so fucking strong all the time. She would laugh in their faces. I could never do that.”

Wolfgang clears his throat. “Where does Kyle live?”

“On the west side of town. A big house. His father came from a lot of ranchers, but he sold the land. Now he sells insurance, but he doesn’t work at all. His real job is coaching Kyle in football and pretending to be a Forrester with his buddies.”

“I can’t wait to meet him,” I say with complete honesty.

“Wait,” Wolfgang says, his voice low.

“This bastard—”

“You think I don’t know? We don’t need this guy and his small-minded cronies alerting the authorities before we find her and her safe.”

“Fuck.”

Travis pipes up. “He plays poker with the sheriff every week.”

It doesn’t end up mattering.

When we roll to a stop on the expensive cobblestone-paved driveway, a dolder woman comes out, worry in her eyes. “Kyle? Are you here?”

We step out of the vehicle.

“Travis,” she says, her eyes lighting up as she sees the third passenger. “Look at you all grown up.” He seems bashful in front of the lady.

“Hello, Mrs. Moore. It’s good to see you.”

Her eyes dim. “I’m sorry you stopped coming around.” She hesitates.

“I’m sorry, you weren’t welcome here anymore. I tried to tell them they were wrong. But they just...”

“It’s okay,” he says. “I understand.”

She looks fierce. “You shouldn’t have to understand. You shouldn’t have been safe here in this house, in this town. You shouldn’t have had to take him to the circus with those...” Her gaze flicks to us, a little fearful, because we’re used to that kind of look, but it’s especially offensive when it comes from someone who ran this kid out of town. At the very least, the family did.

“I’m his brother,” I tell her.

Her eyes widen. “Oh.” Realization works through her head as she understands the connection that Travis’s mother was knocked up by someone who worked for the circus. Someone like me. Judgment flashes through her eyes, then it’s replaced by sorrow. She shakes her head. “The world is a crazy sometimes,” she says.

“I like the circus,” Travis says. “I like being a clown. It’s fun to put on a costume and pretend to be someone else, to make people laugh instead of making them angry.”

She sighs, “I don’t suppose you’re here because you have good memories about Kyle, are you?”

“Where is your son, Mrs. Moore?” Wolfgang steps forward, his face severe. She turns to him and all the pretenses drop. The judgment leaves her. There’s only a sad mother left standing defeated in front of the beautiful house.

Sienna

THIS ISN'T WHERE I expected to end up when we pulled up in the back truck. The skills that made me a good a good tarot card reader, my hypervigilance, are back. And they're telling me to play a long, to play a good show, that I'm in more trouble now than I was in the trunk of a car. Because the mastermind behind all this is more than a few violent men.

I'm getting my first tarot reading.

Oh, I've given plenty of them, making up bullshit based on what the internet taught me about tarot cards and what I could read of people. My hypervigilance from years of abuse helped me do a decent portrayal. My work was always an act.

What's happening now is not an act.

At least, not in this woman's mind.

She smiles at me, gorgeous even in her advancing years. Beautiful. Beautiful hair. Only her eyes reveal her wildness. I wonder if they wonder if people believe that she had a connection to the mystical world, because she was the fortune teller for Cirque des Miroirs.

"Let's see what the spirits have to say," she says, shuffling the cards.

"I wish I could participate," I say, my teeth ground together.
"Unfortunately my hands are tied. Literally."

Another brilliant smile. "Your participation is not required. The cards do all the work."

"Considering I've been a fortune teller for a few weeks now, I can't tell you how they differ." I shift, trying to assuage the ache in my arms. The angle they're pulling back isn't extreme, but not being able to stretch them out has made scream in pain. I long to reach up.

The fact that I would undoubtedly do violence to the woman in front of me is just icing on the cake. Unfortunately, she knows that. Probable cards told her the super insightful tidbit that kidnapping someone and then exactly make them friendly.

“You were a fake,” she says, her voice flat. “You stole what was mine. You left.”

“I was going to come back,” she says, her eyes wilder now. Her mysticism making them that way. It’s insanity. “I always come back. You knows that.”

“I guess he didn’t know,” I say, taunting. “Or maybe he didn’t care if I came back.”

Maybe it’s not a good idea to taunt your captor, but I’ve given up on being the good girl a long time ago. People are going to judge me, going to fuck with me, so I might as well fight back. Even if it’s only words.

She flips a card over, revealing an image of a tall building.

A tall building that’s on fire.

Lovely.

“Destruction,” she says, a gleeful glint in her dark eyes. How could I look so much like Cat but also so evil? Then again Cat did lie to Logan me. She’s just better at hiding it. “Chaos. This represents your past childhood.”

“It’s Forrester,” I say, feeling almost thoughtful despite the ropes around my wrists. Forrester is on fire, though not in a literal sense. I helped through its own people. It leaves them empty husks, brittle and dark-eyed.

She nods, almost pleased. She might be tutoring me on tarot reading how approving she looks for a moment. Her hand makes a wide, sweeping gesture as she pulls the second card.

Three swords pierce a heart.

“A little dramatic,” I say, my voice dry even as my heart pounds.

“Heartbreak,” she says, the corner of her lip curled up. “You experienced that, haven’t you? A recent little sorrow. A small bit of grief. Recent. Small. Is that how I would describe what happened with Logan? It’s how I should describe it.

"Yes," she says, beaming.

"Then again, maybe I'll be the one to choose the sacrifice. Maybe I'll be the one to get rid of you. Logan might even give me a medal. Does the circus have medals? Like the Barnum & Bailey Medal of Honor? The Royal Order of the Purple Heart?"

t. Your "Blasphemy," she growls.

Her semi-religious fervor for Cirque des Miroirs became apparent the first time I met her. Kyle and the Assholes dumped me up here and tied me to a rusted iron-framed bed, where I'd finally fallen into a reluctant, dreamless sleep. It wasn't precisely relaxing, but my body needed rest if I had a chance of surviving the night.

weeping When I woke up, she was watching me, humming an off-tune melody.

Creepy as fuck.

"Madame Galilea sees the stars," I say in my fake performer's voice. "You're more whispery and mysterious than hers. "And the stars know what happens next." and what will be."

"You may be smug," she tells me. "But we both know that I've been protecting you from the worst that Kyle Moore has to offer. He won't let me. I'll betray you. He believes it, and I may have given him a reading or a circus convince him it will come to pass."

lingling "Asshole," I say with a very fake cough.

"What is going to happen when he decides he's waited long enough?"

I have no retort to that, not with the dread rising in my chest. She looks at me as soon as she drags me back toward the iron bedframe. It would be a reasonable question to ask if my hands weren't tied behind my back. If my ankles were tied together. If she didn't have a gun hidden in the folds of her gown, then I'd have a chance of gun she used to subdue grown-ass men.

"Why are you doing this?" I ask her before she leaves.

"Logan told me he'd met someone. I investigated, of course. A little protective of him. And the circus. Found out it was a little hussy, but stealing what you must understand, I don't judge you. All women are thrown on stakes. They don't need fire to burn us alive."

"If you don't judge me, why the...?" I shake the bed, which creaks ominously. "Why the whole kidnapping and murder thing?"

"I was prepared to let Logan have his little fling. Men need sex, women need domination. He could have you... as a treat. Then I heard you offered me a job. My job. And I knew that I had to remove you from the picture completely."

"Ah, so classic greed. You dressed it up in the occult, but it's basic. Is this that?"

"What do you think the tarot cards read, my child? They read sinister intentions. They reflect the darkness in humanity. That's why I've been loving them. That's why they pay me money to tell them they're boys on the way to destruction." She leaves me with those parting words.

Then I'm left alone to stare up at the dust motes dancing in the sun. Funny, how they don't seem to care whether they swim through for a joyful family scene or a lonely captive tragedy. CHAPTER EIGHT

Logan

THE SUV ROLLS to a stop in front of a modest yellow house, overgrown weeds lining the front walkway. Sienna's house. It looks sad despite the general upkeep. The dainty white flowers planted along the front walkway highlight the sorrow cloaking the place.

Wolfgang squeezes my shoulder before we climb out of the truck.

My heart pounds as I raise my fist and knock.

The door creaks open, and Banyu Cole's fearful eyes peer up. "Who are you?"

I take a deep breath, meeting her gaze. "I'm Logan Whitmere. Owner of Cirque des Miroirs. Your daughter's..." Lover. Betrayer. "Boss. We can talk."

"Sienna? Is she okay?" Banyu hesitates, glancing between me and Wolfgang. She swallows hard before stepping aside. "You must come in."

We follow her into the dimly lit living room, the air heavy with tension. Banyu perches on the edge of an armchair, wringing her hands in her lap.

I stand, unable to sit on the stained armchair where her bastard of a father once sat. "Have you heard from Sienna recently?"

Her face falls. "Then it's true. She's missing."

"I'm sorry."

She shakes her head, expression pinched. "The last time I talked to her on the phone she was in Arizona. There was some story about a scorpion."

Everyone had freaked out, which is ridiculous. Sienna had been unharmed by the lethal little arachnid. She would have taken a baseball bat to the scorpion if I hadn't stepped in to handle it for her. The memory makes my chest ache. She was protecting the circus. Why didn't I see that?

I lean forward, pulse racing. “Do you have any idea who might have taken her?”

“I don’t know.” Banyu’s voice wavers. “She’s friends with Young. She lives a few miles from here with her family. She’s taking correspondence classes for college online. That is what I wanted Sienna to do, but we don’t have a computer. And her father...”

Her father. I wish I could kill him again.

“We heard your husband passed away,” Wolfgang says gently, offering condolences.

Banyu’s eyes flick to Wolfgang, then back to me, gaze shifting. “Thank you.”

I swallow against the lump in my throat and reach for Banyu’s hand. She startles at my touch before relaxing into it.

“Can you think of anything else?” I ask, giving her hand a gentle squeeze. “Anything you can tell us could help. Anyone who didn’t like her.”

Banyu’s eyes shimmer with tears as she meets my gaze. “A lot of people in town didn’t like her. They don’t like me, either. Because we’re different. And because it’s easier to pretend they did not see our bruises if they also say they hated us.”

She trails off with a helpless shrug.

She looks like Sienna but also different. Older, of course. More exhausted. It’s a stark contrast to Sienna’s vitality. They have the same features but an entirely different energy. At least, they did. What will Sienna be like to Sienna’s beautiful strength after this? Even if I find her alive, will she have the same spirit? I want to believe that nothing could tear her down, but it’s a futile hope. It’s ignorance, not knowing how harsh the world could be.

The woman on the floral couch in front of me knows all about Sienna’s harshness.

She looks worried about Sienna but also resigned.

She’s been worried about her daughter for a long time without saying much. I don’t say that to blame her. Sometimes survival is all a person can manage.

Anger burns in my stomach. “Do you know someone named Moore?”

Dark eyes widen. “They were friends. As children. Even before they became close with Maisie. Travis, Kyle, and Sienna. They used to sit

CHAPTER NINE

Sienna

MY HEAD IS pounding. Every inch of my body aches.

Noise below me.

The dust in the cabin makes my nose twitch. A sunset has come and gone. That's not a good sign. I feel like I've heard about the first twenty-four hours being crucial in a missing person's case.

Then again, someone would have to know I'm missing for it to be important. Maybe State Trooper Brian Jones is on it.

Maybe not.

Either way, I have to get out of here now. Myself.

There's no waiting to be saved.

I've never been a princess.

I hear footsteps coming up to the cabin.

It's wrong that Kyle looks wholesome and handsome in the dreary cabin holding a bag of greasy sandwiches and a six-pack of beer. He should look like a villain, instead of Forrester's golden child. He had the best chance of getting out of town, more than me or Travis, but he never wanted it. He's the hero here. The one everyone loves. They never understood why Kyle was interested in me. Him bullying me? That made sense to them.

"Morning, sweetheart," he says, putting the food down on the table. I remember so recently held the tarot cards. The Hanged Man. That's my future, and I can't change it. Unless I harness it. I refuse to die in this cabin.

He gives me that huge smile that made all the girls spread their legs. I refuse to get fucked in this cabin, either.

If he only wanted to bully me, I wouldn't be here.

Alessandra is crazy, but she's right about that much.

He wants more.

And he's delusional enough to think it'll actually happen.

It would be simpler if he didn't care about consent, not even a little. The bindings currently biting into my wrists are a sign that he doesn't care. But part of him has held back from holding me down all these years. That first time with the Assholes, he hasn't let them touch me, either. It means there's some morality inside him, doesn't it?

Even a grain of moral sand.

"Listen," I say, my heart thumping unevenly. "Thanks for the ride, but can we just chalk this up to one of your little stunts? We all laugh about it, it's a big joke."

He sits down on the mattress beside me, making the springs squeak. "Both of us know I'm serious about this. About us."

My skin ripples with unpleasant awareness. "There is no us."

His fingers stroke my arm, and I force myself to stay there and talk. "I know you're scared, because of what happened. Because I let Randall touch you. Because I let Lucas touch you."

"Touch." An uneven laugh escapes me. It's getting harder to breathe. "They did more than touch. So did you, come to think of it. I'll say a word for it, I think. When a girl says no. When the guys don't listen, they do it anyway."

He sighs, as if I'm a pain in the ass. As if I'm his little wife complaining that he slept around. I must be appeased with my weaker feminine feelings, even if he has the right to do that. "Things got out of hand that night. I'd look at them from touching you after that, didn't I?"

"Their grip felt pretty intense when they shoved me into the trunk." "You know what I mean. I won't let them have sex with you. That's the promise. One I've kept for years now, even though you've never appreciated it."

The way men in Forrester think that not raping you is a favor. Unless I give it.

It makes my stomach turn over.

until I can find my way out of this cabin and away from his grasp.

Kyle leans in, his breath hot on my neck. I hold my breath and try to recoil. “You were made for this.”

I don’t respond, don’t even look at him. Instead, I focus on a knot in the pine wood ceiling above me. At least until he blocks the view.

He’s looming over me, inches away from my face. His eyes are dark, his lips pursed, and he’s getting closer. I want to recoil but I can’t. The bed holds me up. And because I need him to believe this is real.

The musky scent of his cologne clashes with the grease of the fast-food kitchen brought inside. I feel like I’m suffocating.

I watch as his lips move toward mine. His face is wreathed in shadow, but I can see the sharp angle of his jaw, the square of his chin. He moves closer.

He brushes his lips against mine, and his tongue slowly darts out to taste my mouth. Stale beer. Old toothpaste.

Blue eyes go dark. He looks determined, passionate. His lips curl into a frown. He looks pissed off, like he always is.

“Kiss me back.”

I can feel the heat of his body against mine, the hardness of his hair against my hair, tangling. He holds me still.

I fight his touch... not to pull away but to get closer. It’s the direction of freedom, anyway. It’s the direction of freedom.

He’s breathing hard, little staccato intakes of breath. The hairs on his neck stand on end.

And I kiss him.

But it’s not a real kiss, not the kind that makes your heart flutter and your knees weak. It’s a kiss borne out of desperation, a kiss meant to keep appearances, a kiss that makes me want to gag.

As he pulls back, I can see the triumph in his eyes. He thinks he’s won me over, that I’ve finally given in to him. Little does he know, I’m just taking my time, waiting for the right moment to escape.

I can feel his hand moving down my body, fingers grazing my breasts. I tense up. I can’t let him do this. I need to get out of here, now.

Pretend. You can do this.

CHAPTER TEN

Logan

THE COFFEE BEAN is dimly lit. I pause at the entrance, waiting for my adjust. The little bell above the door falls silent as Wolfgang and Trav behind me.

A patter of toenails on dark-grout tiles brings up the rear.

The scent of stale coffee grounds permeates the air. The crush espresso machine clamors above the chatter of voices. Suspicious eyes us as we stride inside. I don't know whether they recognize us from the or whether they're just suspicious of strangers in general. Probably bot

It could be improved by local art or a splash of color.

Instead we have yellowed walls with black mold spots. This is Sienna worked for years, starting part time in high school and then fu for the six months since she graduated. It's where she might have con to work if she hadn't been taken.

My stomach drops.

This is what I consigned her to.

Fuck me.

The cute little drawing of coffee beans on the chalkboard had glimmer of hope in a dim place. It's been clumsily erased, leaving the imprint of a walking, smiling coffee bean behind. Over the top some scrawled Coffee – 50 cents.

Even for a small-town coffee shop that's cheap.

I'm imagining instant coffee from the grocery store bought in bulk

The place has definitely been struggling since Sienna left.

The counter is empty, as if she's about to appear from the back roc a new jug of milk. An older woman has an empty cup of coffee in t her, the dark dregs at the bottom, red lipstick marring the lip. So someone is working today.

A familiar laugh catches my attention and my stomach drops.

Emerson sits in the back, one eye swollen shut, an insouciant grin on his face.

Shock holds me still for one second, two. What the hell is he doing? He's supposed to be thousands of miles away right now.

He's sitting with a blonde young woman wearing a white-dotted top and ragged jean shorts. I wonder briefly, distantly, who the hell she is.

Not that it matters.

The shock coalesces into rage.

He leans forward, steeping his fingers. The other patrons have gone to their conversations, but their gazes continue to flick our way. “It seems dear Sienna has gotten herself into quite the predicament.”

I measure the distance from here to the dimly lit EXIT sign. “I could stuff your body in a dumpster back there and be gone before the peasant even gets up out of his chair.”

“Patience, my dear boy.” Emerson leans back and gestures to the woman beside him. “It seems Kyle has been very interested in your lac surface. Something that her bestie here... What was your name again? Oh yes, the dog Young.”

Maisie looks very young indeed. And nervous. And slightly turned. Emerson has that effect on women.

Sienna’s friend. Her mother had thought that, too. It’s convenient for her here. Worry darkens her blue eyes. “Kyle was obsessed with doing, always thought they’d get married.”

“Impressive,” Emerson says, “considering they never dated.”

“He’s never been particularly concerned with consent.” Maisie cracks.

Red washes across my vision at her words. My hands clench in again as a growl rumbles in my chest. No one hurts Sienna. Not anyone.

Not if I have anything to say about it.

“Maisie also has some ideas about where they’re keeping her,” Emerson says.

“Where?” The word bursts from me in a snarl.

A sly smile stretches across Emerson’s face. “Now now, no need to be testy. Aren’t you glad I decided to help after all? Come on. Aren’t you here. How came along?”

As much as I despise him, we need this information. “Tell me what your hand-is.”

Emerson leans back, steeping his fingers once more. “Let’s make a bet. I get my job back in exchange for the information I learned. It seems fine with th your price to pay.”

I slam my hands on the table, rattling the cups and causing Emerson to all the jerk back in alarm. “Enough games. Tell me where Sienna is right now. Help me—”

Emerson looks back. “There’s no need for violence.” Emerson holds up his hands in a placating gesture, but his eyes have gone hard. “I’m trying to help you, suspicious bastard.”

I think I “We don’t need your form of help,” Wolfgang growls from beside me.

sheriff I take a deep breath, trying to calm my frayed nerves.

Maisie stands up, which is a courageous move in a room full of young men, violence hovering beneath the surface. “I don’t care about your love-pissing contest. I only care about Sienna. If she’s in trouble, I don’t want the Forrester Police Department to do anything about it. I don’t really care or trust you guys either, but you might be all she has.”

Emerson. “I’m going to find her,” I promise, my voice hoarse.

Her eyes narrow. “Then what?”

to find As much as I despise the delay, I’m grateful that Sienna had at least one friend in this godforsaken shithole town. “Then I’m going to win back your trust.”

“And if you can’t?”

Emerson’s voice A straight shot to the heart, as piercing as one of Wolfgang’s knives. He has them strapped all over his body—in his boot and beneath his leather gloves. He might as well have stabbed me, because that’s what I deserve.

Emerson. Sienna shouldn’t trust me again.

I failed her.

Emerson “Then I’ll let her go.”

Maisie studies me for a long moment. “He has a hunting cabin. It’s actually, passed down from his uncle. A real primitive place. I don’t know what I understand. No plumbing. I don’t think they even do actual plumbing. I’m glad I except when they’re trying to impress Kyle’s dad.”

“Where is it?”

Emerson “She’s never been,” Emerson says. “But I have a source in city hall who looked at the deeds with the last name Todd and found a tract of land in the southeast.”

a small “What the fuck kind of source would you have in city hall?” Wolfgang demands.

Emerson grins. “We stayed in this tiny city for days. That’s enough for me to fuck my way through the entire female population.”

Wolfgang says, “I already regret trusting you,” Maisie says.

“I never trusted him,” Wolfgang says.

“Will you keep the dog?” I ask Maisie. “He belongs to Sienna.” She refuses to believe that I won’t get her back safely. “Only until we get back. Otherwise he’ll just end up hurt.”

“Of course.” Her expression clouds. “We have three at home. I loved them but her parents never let her get a dog. I’m glad she finally got angry.”

“For only a few days. “He doesn’t have a name yet.”

Emerson studies me. “You won’t get far without my information. You’re not an idiot. He’ll stay low. You go out there searching the wilderness and never find her.”

“Fuck you.” I don’t trust him, not after what happened with Sienna. We’re running out of time and options and his information could be our last one chance.

“Kyle still lives with his mother, but she hasn’t seen him. The Apts are both rent rooms above the hardware shop. Nowhere to keep a body.”

A body. Fuck.

“I’m coming for you, Sienna. Just hold on a little longer. I’m going to get you out of this. No matter what.”

My blood boils at the thought of Sienna in that monster’s grasp.

Sienna’s face flashes in my mind and determination floods my mind, wiping away any remaining doubt. I’ll do whatever it takes to get her back.

Even if that means trusting Emerson, at least for now.

“Take me with you,” Emerson says, his voice gone low, and I agree to move for him, sincere. “Let me make this right for you.”

My hands unclench as I meet Emerson’s gaze. “Fine.”

Emerson’s sly smile returns. “That’s more like it.”

“He may not kill you,” Wolfgang says. “But I might.”

Tears make Maisie’s eyes glitter like diamonds. “I knew how hard it was. But I didn’t know how to help her.” She picks up the dog who she had tear off her face. “The cops always sided with Kyle. They didn’t care if Wolfgang did anything about her father. And now this.”

A pang shoots through my chest. So Sienna went through that hell.

ugh forwith no one to turn to for help. The thought shreds my heart into pieces.

I give Maisie a hard nod. It's a promise, that nod. "It's not you Sienna is strong. She'll come through this like she did everything else.

Maisie nods. "I'll watch over the dog until you bring Sienna home."
' And I "Stay in town," I tell Travis. "Ask around. Call me if you find anything."

He nods, looking relieved that he isn't involved in a firefight.

Sienna I turn to Wolfgang and Emerson, my friend and my betrayer. "We really gottonight, under cover of darkness. Emerson, you scout the land where Wolfgang is keeping Sienna. Then we launch a surprise attack." My hands go into fists as I picture wrapping them around Kyle's throat. "No one is to touch Sienna and gets away with it."

Wolfgang's lips twist into a grim smile. "Let's teach those bastards a lesson."

Emerson tilts his head, eyes glinting. "This should be entertaining for only love a good fight." He cracks his knuckles. "Kyle won't know what hit him."

Not precisely true.

I'll make sure he knows exactly who's hurting him.

Every bruise, every bone that breaks.

When he takes his last breath, he'll know why.

An older woman's shrill voice cuts through. "The circus freaks are here. I whip around to see a wrinkled woman pointing a bony finger at Emerson. "We don't want your kind here," she snarls, her wrinkled lips curled in disdain. "Stay away from Maisie. She's a nice girl. Not for the likes of you."

Rage bubbles in my chest, fury clouding my vision. I take a third step toward the woman but a firm hand on my arm stops me. I glance back to see Emerson watching the woman with an amused glint in his eyes.

"My dear woman," he purrs, accent curling around the words. "That's not that if I wanted your innocent little small town angel she'd already be in my alley with her legs around my waist." He flashes her a razor-sharp smile. "Perhaps it's jealousy that you feel."

The woman's face turns an alarming shade of puce, mouth gaping open as if she's been fished out of water. "You—you—you sick man. You're twisted. Depraved."

Wolfgang barks out a reluctant laugh. "Is she trying to insult you?"
Emerson shrugs, tilting his head. "They're compliments, really."

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Sienna

I'VE LIVED IN Forrester all my life, but there are places I haven't been.

I suppose you could say it's lack of interest, a decided de exploration instincts inside me. The truth is, I've always known I welcome here, that the relative safety of town evaporates quickly the into the forest I get, the deeper into the woods I go.

And that's exactly where I am, as I stumble around, dehydrated, s exhausted, battered. I'm worse off now that I've been slapped by a hundred trees, their stinging branches leaving little red marks ac sunburned skin.

There's something strangely reassuring about the way birds c trilling and hopping around, searching for worms or mates, doing w birds do, entirely unalarmed by the presence of a bedraggled, wa human.

I'm much more disturbed by my three-second encounter with a eyes startled and vacant, its tail up with alarm. We stare in each general direction, and it's too much like looking in a mirror. We're bo after all, both being hunted.

If I were a cartoon princess, I could probably convince the mice birds and the deer to lead the way to safety, probably singing cheer they do it. But in the real world, they're all more concerned wit survival than my own.

And so I trudge forward, wincing at the ache in my feet.

At a large clearing, I pause.

I see lush, rolling, manicured hills, only artfully spotted with trees.

It looks like a park, except it's not a park that I recognize, certai the center of town, not one of the schools' yards. Where the hell is it?

squint. It is not the small rectangles that clue me in. It's the flowers them, bright, garish, plastic flowers in little holders.

I'm at Forrester's Cemetery.

Which means I'm not particularly close to town.

There's a groundskeeper, I think, but I don't think someone is on the time. I wonder if they have an office that I can pilfer. What I would for a bottle of water right now, clean water, not the murky stuff I have puddles along the way.

As I go deeper into the cemetery, I come upon a gravel path.

Civilization at last, even if it's only occupied by the deceased.

Somehow in his arms, I feel like I weigh nothing, like I'm made of air. He's the earth itself, cradling the atmosphere in his firm grasp.

"Hospital," he says, and out of the corner of my eye, I see Wolfgang nod. "No," I say, my voice hoarse. I know the nurse who works there and she likes to pinch the children when the grown-ups aren't looking. I know the doctor. He's so ancient, he probably thinks bloodletting is appropriate treatment.

Logan hesitates, "You need to be seen."

"I just need..." It's impossible to name everything that I need, especially when my throat is so dry. I need food and water and bandages. "I need more sleep," I say. "You would think 16 hours in a trunk would give a girl a stop, nap, but surprisingly, no. What can I say? I'm like the princess and she wakes up if it's the slightest bump in the road, and I kept waking up."

He drops his head, his forehead touching mine. "You're making jokes."

"Not funny ones. You weren't laughing."

"Sienna," he says, "What am I going to do with you?"

"Not take me to the hospital, hopefully."

He sighs. Then he tells Wolfgang, "North Security." Then the very next second, he's moving.

A water bottle appears in his hand, and there can't be anything sweeter, not even honey. As the cool liquid pours down my throat, my stomach rebels, and I cough. Logan pulls the bottle away, releasing a severe

He sees my reaction, of course. Logan has always seen everything. "I know everything," a voice whispers. He didn't see the truth.

His breath catches, "Sienna, I know what happened."

"Don't," I say.

His eyes burn. "Later then."

CHAPTER TWELVE

Logan

I MET LIAM North through our resident knife thrower, Wolfgang. The both in the military, though neither likes to talk about it. I get the impression they both did black ops. Things that the government ordered them to do but would not like to claim in public. Things that make their records black and confidential.

Wolfgang left the military and decided to join the circus rather than continue in some sort of violent capacity. He prefers to play with a knife on the edge. To make audiences gasp with fear and with delight when he manages to avoid someone's head and hit an apple sitting on top of it.

In contrast, Liam North lives a different life. He started the top security firm in the country. North Security provides bodyguard services to celebrities and politicians alike. I get the impression they're also tapped by the military to do some of those black ops when they want even more plausible deniability about their involvement.

Regardless, the firm is hugely successful and their operations based an hour south of Forrester. The way that I use the firm is really to get potatoes for them, but they do it as a favor to me. It mostly has involved helping to track down my half siblings, left from my father, half siblings Travis, who I approach and offer them a place in the circus if they want.

They also help me keep tabs on Alessandra whenever she goes off the grid. Usually we're able to track her down, this time has taken longer.

Over the years, Liam has become something of a friend. The barracks in the compound that he could put us in. Instead, he greets us at the front door of his mansion. I carry a sleeping Sienna in my arms as he shows me the way to a suite of rooms.

“We have a medic on site,” he says. His green eyes hard as he studies the young woman in my arms. “I can send him up.” I spy a first aid kit on a marble table.

“Let me take a look at her first. I’ll call down if we need help.” He looks at the scratches across her arms and legs. Those emerald eyes meet mine and he nods once. I read in it the same promise that I have felt since the moment I saw her gone. Retribution. There would be punishment for what was done to her as soon as I find out the full extent of it.

I reached down and place a kiss on her forehead as Liam gently slides the door behind him. “Wake up, Sunset.”

Drowsy, brown eyes open. Exhaustion weighs down her lids. I could let her sleep, but I need to understand the full extent here.

“Logan?” she says, her voice drowsy.

“I’m here, Sunset, and I’m going to help you get better. I just need you to be awake for a little while longer and then you can rest.”

I carry her into a bathroom that’s bigger than most bedrooms. There’s a large claw-foot tub, easily fitting two people. There’s a standing shower, a bench inside, mirrors everywhere, and plush heated mat beneath the tub. The heat is definitely an extravagance here in Texas, but welcome right now as I have to set her down. There’s a velvet bench that she can sit on at the foot of the bed. I check her there waiting to see if she’s steady before I step back and retrieve the first aid kit.

She holds up her arms, palms down, studying the bruises and scratches on them. Those look painful enough, but I am afraid to feel what’s beneath the clothing. If I had taken her to a hospital, they would have done a rape kit. There would’ve been DNA. I don’t need DNA samples. I have the order to exact justice. I’m going to do it the circus way, the black and white way. Not through the broken legal system that allowed this to happen to her in the first place. That allowed her to be tormented her entire life.

“Where does it hurt the most?” I ask.

Her eyes are solemn. She takes my hand, large between her small fingers, and presses it against the middle of her chest. “Here,” she says.

My rib cage squeezes tight and I fall to my knees in front of her, holding my hand against her beating heart. Thump, thump, thump. I’ve never felt like this. I’ve never felt like I’ve lost her. The entire world could have lost her. The wonder of it all, that I’ve snuffed out because bad men are allowed to do bad things.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Logan

MY PLANS FOR a quiet escape are dashed by the sight of men loitering against the SUV.

Emerson raises an eyebrow as if challenging me.

I glance at Wolfgang, who shrugs.

“We’ll make him go first,” he says. “In case they’re armed.”

“Come, mon ami.” Emerson strolls over. “After all we’ve been through. We do this together.”

“You can watch.” It’s the only concession I’m going to make.

“Gladly,” Wolfgang says. “I have a feeling you’ll need witnesses.”

A short nod before I climb into the driver’s seat.

My fingers tighten around the steering wheel as I speed down the winding country roads. Anger simmers in my gut, fueled by the memory of Sam’s bruised and battered face.

How could I let this happen? I should have protected her.

The bonfire is visible a mile away, sparks flying high into the sky and going out. Next comes the bass of music being played from someone’s car. Only when I pull up on a rise do I see the crowd of people lounging on the pebbled beach and dark lake. Found you.

I pull up beside the cars and step out.

It doesn’t take long to find him, surrounded by friends.

I don’t nod toward Maisie even though she’s the one who sent me alerting me to Kyle’s location. No reason these assholes need to know.

His eyes widen in surprise before he schools his expression, pretending indifference, pretending he’s not afraid. “What the hell do you want?”

“To have a conversation,” I say, as if a conversation means death,

Sienna.”

Kyle hesitates, then puts down his beer. “What about her?”

“About where she got those bruises.”

His eyes darken in the firelight. “That’s none of your concern.”

I keep my voice low, even though we’re surrounded by people. I’m watching. Witnesses. That’s important. “Because she’s yours. That’s what you think, right?”

His jaw clenches. He definitely still wants her. “You think you know her? She’s been mine since we were in fucking kindergarten. Back the hell

“I don’t think so,” I say, my voice still low. “Not with the nursing ways I’ve had her. I know how she tastes when she comes. Do you know how sweet she tastes, Kyle?”

Fury makes him turn red. “Shut up, motherfucker. Right now.”

“And the way she sucks cock.” I force myself to remember the feel of her mouth, the impossible warmth, the magic of her even in the presence of cum. To make it realistic. “She’s the best I ever had. But not the best I’ve ever had, is it? Because you’ve never had her. She never let you have her. You had to kick her, someone half your weight, punch her in the face, hold her.”

His friends have come to back him up. Good. “You don’t know the danger you’re in,” he spits. “This isn’t your little fucking carnival. We’re protecting Forrester, and we protect our own.”

Sienna’s “The way you protected Sienna?”

There it is, that flicker of guilt. The sliver of humanity. The memory of the little boy who was once friends with her. It’s quickly subsumed by the monster he’s become. “If she had only listened to me, this never would have happened.”

I smile. It’s a cruel smile. I imagine it’s the one my birth father had before he held my mother down. Pure cruelty. Only the animal side came left. “I’m going to enjoy this.”

“Get him,” he says, huffing a harsh breath.

That sends one of the Assholes toward me. I vaguely remember finding that file that this one is Randall Todd, the one who owns the hunting calendar. The calendar was empty. Doesn’t matter. The way Sienna names them makes more sense. Asshole #1 and Asshole #2.

“about The first one comes at me, a glint in his dark eyes. He enjoys the fi

I slam a fist into his face. It hurts me more than it does him. Great. My body has been through a thousand fights. And more than that I've carried the equipment for a circus from city to city for countless shows. I'm tall and strong and experienced, but these guys still have about one hundred pounds of pure mass. They're repounds on me of pure mass.

It's what I need. Better rely on experience, then.

Which means I need to use his own weight against him. Asshole #1 doesn't wait for his turn. He comes at me with a kind of plodding charge. "Asshole #1" expression more determined than gleeful. I whip around, sweeping my leg. He trips directly into the fist Asshole #1 aimed at me.

How do they both go down in a painful-sounding thud of heavy bodies.

The crowd laughs. A good thing because I need people on my side.

They're witnesses for what comes next.

I need important witnesses.

This is what Wolfgang meant on the way here. See, killing people isn't illegal. There's a loophole, though. A technicality. Self-defense.

Which means they see Kyle throw the sucker punch.

They see him come toward me when he thinks I'm not looking.

Except I was waiting for this. I wanted this, because then whatever happens next will be self-defense. When I kill him, it will be legal.

This is why I have experience with murder, after all.

He lands the punch, and my brain rattles. I stumble back, letting my head absorb the impact fully. It hurts, but not as badly as what I'm about to do to him. Besides, I deserve it. This punch was for not believing Sienna. It's by that that's what it means to me.

I stagger back to standing, not bothering to hide the wince. But they see it. Another punch will cement this as self-defense. Three men have seen me win before. And this one, Kyle, punching me for no apparent reason, while I'm still, my hands at my side.

This one blasts my jaw. Hurts like a motherfucker.

Deserve it. I deserve it.

Not for what Kyle thinks, of course. Not for taking away Sienna from me. Not that a thousand times over again, even if it earned me a place in hell. Damnation.

And, well, it probably will.

I deserve it for losing her, for letting her be taken.

For the bruise on her breast.
That, it's The memory crystallizes my purpose here.
Yes. I'm My eyes narrow. Two punches is enough, right?
Hundred "One more, mon ami," comes the low murmur from Emerson.
A cautious man, perhaps.
But correct.
Role #2 The third punch knocks me on my ass. The entire crowd watches, held breath as their town golden boy, the town bully beats up a slow, so some people have even taken their phones out. Good. Video evidence further than eyewitnesses, anyway.
When I stand, there's a sense of peace.
I've grappled with violence my whole life, but here, tonight, it feels like a conflict. It feels like purpose. I throw a punch at Kyle and he immediately crumples. He didn't expect me to hit back. And with people like Assholes he probably doesn't get hit very often.
I wait for him to stand up before hitting him again, but this time when he falls, I go down with him. A natural-looking tumble, one that allows me to straddle him, to slam my fist into his face. Again. And again. That hair on his face, that all-American face, the one that could have pulled any girl except for the one he wanted to possess.
No one will call him handsome after this.
My body I feel his jaw break under my fist.
I do to A tooth comes loose.
At least He moans and moves his hands loosely.
Mostly I have tunnel vision but some small part of me is aware of the crowd watching, of their silence, of their shock as they watch the town bully get systematically destroyed.
I stand Even the Assholes have stood up now, and they watch in shock.
Maybe they saw Kyle as some kind of god. Untouchable.
No, he's just human. He's just another asshole.
One who's going to die tonight.
I'd do I hit him again and again and again, until he's slumped against the ground, battered and bloody. Even now I will not stop. I hear Sienna's voice in my head, calling for mercy, but it must be a mirage. This man didn't deserve her mercy, so why would he deserve it?
No, I need to kill him. Kill. Kill. Kill.

Blinding lights pull me up short. I stand up off Kyle's limp breathing body with reluctance just in time to greet the state trooper once inquired about Alessandra's whereabouts. He raises an eyebrow Whitmere. It seems like whenever there's trouble, you're there."

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Sienna

IN MY DREAMS, I envision a grand circus tent filled with life-sized dolls whose movements controlled by invisible strings, creating a surreal and dreamlike atmosphere.

I'm standing in the center of an enormous circus tent, dazzled by the spectacle surrounding me. Graceful dolls spin and twirl through the air, dancing as if on invisible strings. Their movements are fluid and graceful, creating a surreal, dreamlike atmosphere.

As I watch, mesmerized, one doll breaks free of the intricate ball-and-chain floats down until we're face-to-face, her porcelain features exquisite, but where her eyes should be are empty sockets, dark and fathomless.

A shiver runs down my spine at the sightless gaze. The doll's lips curve into a knowing smile and she whispers in a voice like rustling silk, "For who do you think he is?"

I jerk awake with a gasp, blinking against the darkness. Just a moment ago I tell myself. But the doll's warning lingers, sowing seeds of doubt in my mind.

I blink, disoriented. For a moment I expect to see the modern interior of Logan's RV. Then it comes rushing back—the compound, Kyle, Logan's glance at the clock on the nightstand. I've been asleep for over twelve hours.

My gaze falls to a tray on a wooden table, laden with food and a vase of fresh flowers. There are bright red poppies and yellow mums and thick sprigs of lavender. A note propped against the vase catches my eye.

Eat. Don't get up without help.

My stomach rumbles at the scent of spice, but hesitance weighs h my gut.

Logan's kindness leaves me wary, his motives unclear.

He vowed to protect me. But can I truly trust him?

Have I traded one cage for another?

The questions swirl through my thoughts as I stare at the sh

She gives me a soft smile. “I do. Along with Liam, my husband.”

“Oh,” I say, not able to hide the surprise in my voice. “It’s just that you don’t look like me.”

A soft laugh. “I noticed that, and I hope you don’t mind that I picked my little and asked Logan about your heritage. I’m from Indonesia too. I mean, according to that DNA test I took, there’s a decent amount of origin in there too.”

Strange that I’ve never actually met someone Indonesian, besides my mother. It feels like a sense of coming home even though she’s a stranger.

“You took a DNA test?”

“Yeah. I don’t know how accurate they are, but I didn’t exactly have a good relationship with my mother, so that was the only way I could find out more with amore about where I came from.”

I looked down. My mother... I’m not sure you could say we had a good relationship, but it wasn’t a bad one either. She was willing to tell me about her childhood, as long as my father wasn’t around. As long as she wasn’t hiding in her bedroom from the bruises, it was always a painful relationship. It was a good a painful life, really. And the worst part is I’m not sure that my father actually freed her.

“If you want, I can introduce you to my mom. She usually likes to talk about where she came from.” Samantha’s eyes light up.

“That would be so great.” She gestures toward the plate of food. “I love to cook up recipes and read books, but I always feel like an outsider looking in. I don’t know how to ask? Which is funny, considering it’s me. It’s in my genes. It’s how I know so much about what I’m made of.”

My stomach growls, and I take a bite of the satay. My eyes close in nothing the sheer pleasure. “Oh my God, that’s so good.”

She laughs. “I’m going to pretend like that’s a real compliment. It’s not just the fact that you’ve basically been starved.”

The dog whines and I give him a little piece. “He likes it too,” I say. Samantha laughs.

Then she sobers. “Do you want to rest? Or maybe privacy?”

I feel suddenly shy. I don’t have much experience with making a decision. “If you have to go, that’s fine,” I say. “But if you want to hang out, I’m here too.”

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

Logan

BY THE TIME I make it back to North Security headquarters, the sun is high overhead.

It's almost noon.

I'm alone, Emerson and Wolfgang having departed Forrester's Station hours earlier. I walk through the front door and am greeted by the sound of laughter.

Everything that I've experienced over the past twenty-four hours has drained me.

It's drained me of life force, of hope.

And God, this laughter, it fills me back up.

I follow the sound as if in a trance and stand at the door of a large room.

Sienna is on the floor, her long legs crossed, wearing a dress she assumes she borrowed, something light and flowery, the sea foam white highlighting the beautiful tan of her skin.

There's an expression of pure joy on her face.

It's enough to stop my heart.

What I wouldn't give to see that expression every day of my life.

What I wouldn't give to see that expression directed at me. I'm a bastard at heart. It's not enough that I want her to be happy, I want her to be happy with me, for me, near me.

Her hands are animated as she shows the dog something she wants to do.

There's a stack of books, thick tomes with cloth bindings on the floor. It looks like she's trying to get him to stand on it.

He puts his front paws on the books and then looks at her expectantly, wagging his little tail, panting, hoping to get some of what looks to be cubes that she's holding in her hand.

"All the way," she says, coaxing. "Come all the way up with your feet too."

She taps the books to show him what to do.

The little dog hops off and then hops back on, front paws only at a different angle, as if to say, Is this right?

"So close," she says, her voice encouraging. And patient. "Come a little way up."

I'm aware of Samantha, Liam's wife, watching and cheering them on. I can't take my eyes off of Sienna. I suppose to some people, the dog might look similar.

They both have black hair and black eyes, beautiful olive tone skin, slender bodies.

But to me, they couldn't look more different.

Liam's wife is a striking woman, but Sienna is as breathtakingly changeable as the sunset. No one else has those jaded eyes that hide a full of hope. No one else has that beautiful mouth that I want to kiss, taste, want to breathe through.

No one else has a body that makes me hard just thinking about it.

The visible cuts and bruises I can see from here don't stop my cock from wanting her. Even knowing she's injured, she's tired, she's traumatized, I want to fuck her into the ground.

She nudges the little dog's back feet, tapping them until he pulls them up on top of the pile of books, standing proud on the improvised pedestal.

Sienna whoops and praises him. "What a good boy, such a good boy."

He chomps down happily on his cheese reward.

Samantha also claps, an enthusiastic audience. It's when she starts laughing that she notices me. Some of her amusement fades. She starts to say, "I'll give you two a moment."

And then we're alone, Sienna and I.

Sienna's expression turns grave, but there's still a twinkle of amusement at the dog's antics.

She stands and confronts me. "You look a little worse for wear."

I touch a hand to my swollen brow and wince. "Took a few hits."

stantly, “Do I want to ask who you’ve been fighting?”

She shakes her head trying to look disapproving but failing. “That’s not what I believe.”

isement “Well, I was stopped before I could finish the job. State Trooper Jones showed up. Apparently you’d called him.”

Her eyes widened. “Wow, I wasn’t sure that actually happened or if he would even care if he found out.”

“Apparently he’s been looking for you. He figured out it was Kyle, went to the bonfire to find him, only to find me on top of him, punching him.”

Tears reflect in her dark eyes. “Okay, I can do that.”

I brush the backs of my fingers against her cheek. “We aren’t meant to be a woman, this alone.”

“This?”

en self- “This whole thing, this human experience. We aren’t meant to be alone. That’s what the circus means. But it’s not just true for the circus. It’s for towns, it’s for cities, it’s for companies, it’s for families. We’re meant to be supported, means support and your support should have been protecting you from predators like your father and Kyle all along. You didn’t fail by getting hurt. They’re here for you.”

much I Her eyes close. “Part of me thinks that’s true and the other part thinks maybe I just should have been stronger.”

r Brian “Stronger?” I ask. A rough laugh coming out of me. “You’re the strongest woman I’ve ever met, the strongest person I’ve ever met. If you were that much stronger, you would be made of pure liquid gold, burning but unchangeable, immutable.”

Her eyes are luminous as she looks up at me. “You’re the only one who sees me that way.”

“Then everyone else is blind,” I murmur.

And then she’s kissing me.

I don’t know whether it’s because she pushed up from the sofa or whether it’s because I leaned down or both at the same time. We meet in a hard lockup of need, of heart pounding desire.

This isn’t like the shower when she wanted me to erase something that had been done to her. This is something else. It’s about seeing to the bottom after her. It’s about letting her see into the heart of me. About our bodies meeting what our minds are already doing, melding, merging, loving, with her’s in feeling.

My hands roam beneath the dress and find her wearing no panties. Later, against her lips. “What are you doing to me?”

She shivers in my arms. “I didn’t mind borrowing a dress, but it’s a little weird to borrow underwear. I talked to my mom on the phone about bringing some of my stuff later.”

“I like this better,” I say, my voice low and gravelly.

I drop down to my knees in front of her, she’s still sitting on the section. I spread her legs.

The dress hangs low between them, covering her up, and so it’s not a gift. A gift that I get to unwrap slowly, lifting the fabric until I see her like an offering for me.

I look up and see the darkened blush on her cheeks.

“Tell me you want this.” Not because I doubt it, her arousal is clear. It’s for her body, her expression, from the slickness that glistens against her skin to have

But I want her to know that I’m taking this only because she’s giving me.

I want that to be clear.

“Yes,” she murmurs. “Logan, yes.”

I swallow hard. Trust. Fucking trust.

My hands are braced on her thighs, pushing her wider, so that I can get down and give her a kiss. The most intimate kind of kiss, so that I can get anywhere from the very bottom to the top, lingering at her clit, swooping around with my tongue.

I go back down to her entrance, my cock throbs in my pants, and person inside, but it won't get there. Not now, maybe not ever.

But I can give her this pleasure, for herself alone.

I can lick her folds where she's most sensitive. Make her come on the sofa.

Whether "Someone could..." she says, breathless. "Someone could come in and press "They won't. Samantha knows better. She's married to Liam Nor all."

Knowing that Sienna shivers in my arms, and I set about making it worse. I want her heart to shudder, I want her to writhe. I want her to cling to the sofa as if she's attached. And so I suck her clit and put two fingers inside her. I curl them, wanting, that secret spot that makes her jerk, that makes her groan.

"Please," she moans. "Please."

I groan And yes, God, yes, anything, everything.

One hand squeezes her ass, holding her close to my face, the other it felt after unrelenting, merciless. And when she comes, it's with the rush of pleasure, she's rained, a cleansing, a baptizing. Her arousal slick against my lips, delicate taste. I lap at her through her orgasm, drinking it down, desperate for until she's all the way on the other side, too sensitive, slinking away from the sofa and caress. She's boneless in my hold as I return to sit on the couch and hold her on my lap. My cock throbs, it wants her and it would be so easy to have her as she wouldn't resist. But the truth is, I don't deserve that, in a way that's spread strange, perverse, self-flagellation way—I don't even want it.

I can make her come a thousand more times without ever reaching satisfaction, the blue balls my personal penance. She wriggles on her lap far from feeling the erection.

Next. "What about you?" she asks.

Knowing it to What about me? That's the question. Where do we go from her woman who's been imprisoned in a thousand different ways, she deserves to be free. She deserves to make her own choices. Where do I fit into that? Maybe nowhere. Maybe everywhere, and I'm not going to fuck her until she's mine.

And bend I press a kiss to her temple. "Don't worry about me."

And lick She laughs, the sound a little watery, a little desperate. "I wish you'd just a circle stop, but you seem to keep getting into trouble."

My lips curve. "It's nothing I can't handle. I'm focused on you, wanting need, what you want. That's it."

She pulls back and looks me in the eye. “Then take me to bed.”

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Sienna

KYLE AND THE Assholes are in jail.

They can't come after me again.

They can't hurt me—or anyone else for that matter.

It's hard for me to process, but what's even stranger is that I don't do it alone.

State Trooper Brian Jones shows up, all professionalism at least until I throw my arms around him and burst into tears. It's hard to explain how much it meant that someone was looking for me. Yes, it's because someone reached out, but the fact is a lot of people in law enforcement, people in general could have ignored that call. They could have assumed it was a prank or that it was too hard to figure out where I was since the car was made from a gas station somewhere between here and Arizona. They could have assumed the girl was lying to get attention.

"Thank you," I say, my voice raw with emotion.

He blushes, reminding me of the time I first met him, which is when I was in my fortune-teller's tent on a first date, shy and infatuated.

I kind of want to ask him about it, but I don't want to make him feel awkward in case it didn't work out because the truth is I can't actually tell the future.

Even though they made an adorable couple.

"We're still together," he says, in answer to my unasked question. He looks pleased as punch with himself, and I can't help but laugh, the sound echoing off the walls of the foyer.

We go into the sitting area, Logan a stalwart supporter at my side. Trooper Jones asks me questions step-by-step, documenting it all so that it can be used in a trial, something I'm not particularly looking forward to.

At the end, I look away. “Listen, give it to me straight. If this does not go as planned, they’re going to tear me apart on the stand, right? That’s what they always do to women.”

His expression darkens. “I understand your concern. This won’t be a problem. I promise you. The man will probably cop a deal unfortunately but the DA would rather keep this quiet than have a media circus.”

The words media circus make me nauseous.

“However,” he says, “we have physical evidence about what happened including not only your bruises and testimony, but also security camera footage from the gas station.”

My eyes widen. “There was a security camera?”

That place did not look like it could afford one. The trooper looks at me. “Unfortunately, human trafficking is not nearly as rare as people think. On the back roads see a lot of people being taken and transported against their will.”

I shiver remembering the darkness of the trunk. A tall, handsome man with broad shoulders walks into the room with us. His green eyes stare at me. “And if there is media,” Liam says, “We’ll provide close security. No one won’t touch you. They won’t get to talk to you, at least not directly.”

He introduces himself as Liam North to the State Trooper. Brian looks at me to recognize his name, and his security firm, North Security, by the way of straightening of his posture.

Samantha follows her husband inside, her expression painful. She looks empathetic.

It’s a pain that all women know. The reality of being torn apart from the past, whether it was real or made up or the fear of it. Or knowing it will happen based on what’s happening between their legs, based on their bodies knowing that violence will be excused against their body by so many people who hear about it, and with that I know I’m not alone in this. For an inexplicable reason, I have allies. No, there is an explanation. It’s because Logan may have betrayed me that one night, but he has also supported me, helped me, protected me. He’s given me these allies. He’s given me hope.

I nod resolutely, “Okay, I can do this.”

Samantha sits next to me and squeezes my hand. “Do you need to go down or do you want company?”

It’s shocking the level of peace that washes over me having someone

“Thank you,” I tell her genuinely. “I do appreciate this so much. I feel like I’ve been standing on my own two feet though. I’m just not quite sure how yet.”

As if feeling my tension, Tricks licks my ankles from beneath the table. Maisie looks regretful that she brought it up, but I don’t want her to frown. I appreciate someone treating me like I’m a little bit normal.

“Tell me something else that’s going on. Some sort of drama has been going on at the Garden Club again.”

“Oh you know,” she says. “Everyone’s freaking out about the mayor coming back to town.” And then she freezes, realizing what she just said. He was not open for business. No show is happening.” Logan declares.

Wolfgang and Logan stare at each other and I sense disagreement. Presumably Wolfgang doesn’t want to wait. What are they arguing about? Logan can leave whenever he wants.”

Liam sets down his fork. “I wasn’t sure when to bring this up, but I got a notification right before dinner that Alessandra Gallo has been found.” Anxiety turns my muscles hard as wood. “Where is she? Is she at the fairgrounds?”

Liam nods. “She showed up to her the RV she shared with her daughter. Cat is the one who called us, actually. We still don’t know where Alessandra was hiding all this time.”

My palms turn sweaty. I clench the arms of the ornate wooden chair. “I may know something about that.” Every pair of eyes in the room turns toward me. I let myself focus on Logan because I’m overwhelmed. “There’s some news I have to tell you.”

“What is it?”

“It was Alessandra. She’s the one who helped Kyle. She’s the one who convinced them all to lie”—her eyes close—“and of course she must have known anyone knew all about the Ferris wheel and how you would react to it.”

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Logan

MY BLOOD POUNDS, my heart races. It was Alessandra who did this? enough to know that Emerson, someone I considered my friend, was doing this. But in a way it's kind of his modus operandi to cause trouble. I don't understand that he was doing what he could to save the circus. I don't know it, but I understand it. "She's the one who left."

Sienna straightens her dress, clearly uneasy with my rage. "Apparently she wanted her daughter to be with you. She thought you two could run the circus together."

"Fuck."

"You're not responsible for her, you know."

"We'll disagree about that. She was part of the circus. And she hurt me. I'm making her nervous, her eyes wide. The aroused Sienna from dinner is long gone, replaced by this woman who's been hurt by me many times.

I'm one of them.

So I do the only thing I can do to make her feel safe: I leave.

Blood pounds in my temples as I storm through the house, fists clenched at my sides. Every muscle in my body is coiled tight, rage burning through my veins.

How could I have been so stupid?

I pivot on my heel, pacing the length of the foyer like a caged animal. The cheerful trill of the birds does nothing to soothe my anger. If anything, the sounds of this place only fuel my anger—a constant reminder of the life I was built to get here.

The circus keeps going and going. It never stops.

Not for anyone.

Not even the owner.

Breath rasping in my chest, I run a hand through my hair and tug at the roots. The sting is a welcome distraction from the maelstrom of emotions tearing me apart inside.

Guilt. Regret. Self-loathing.

They war within me, as bright and garish as the lights of the circus. I might, I can't escape the truth. I'm the reason Sienna doesn't trust me.

My mistakes drove her away, and now...

Have I lost her for good?

A shudder runs through me. I can't bear to finish that thought. It hurts Sienna.

The name alone is enough to shatter my fragile composure. My hands curl into fists, nails biting into my palms. If only I could take it all back and rewind to that night and make a different choice. But I can't. My mistakes are etched into the fabric of time like the gold embroidery on the fortune teller's tent. All I can do now is beg for her forgiveness. Pray that it's not too late to rule the

And take revenge.

Against a woman?

Has it always been leading to this?

Marino would probably laugh if he could see me now.

I stop pacing, chest heaving with each ragged breath. There's no time for self-pity. No time for doubt or inaction. I have to believe there's hope for me and Sienna.

And this time, I won't fail her.

As I stand there, hands clenched at my sides, a familiar voice intrudes on my turbulent thoughts.

"Logan?" I glance up to find Liam hovering in the doorway, furrowed with concern. Of course he would follow me when I'm like this, distraught.

"I just can't believe it was Alessandra." I drag a hand over my face, my impatience simmering beneath my skin. The last thing I need is a distraction about Cirque des Miroirs right now. Not when my mind is consumed by Sienna. "How the fuck was it Alessandra all this time?"

"What is the connection between her and this Kyle Moore?"

Frustration bleeds into my tone as I level a glare at him. "Only Kyle was obsessed with her. Thought he would marry her.”

Liam stands his ground, jaw set in a stubborn line. “And Alessandra sharply

It’s waiting for me to arrive.

I stride through the empty fairgrounds to the fortune teller’s tent.

There stands Alessandra in all her eccentric glory—vibrant red

“Fine.” She pouts. “Ruin the show. You never appreciated it.”

I laugh, a harsh sound in the small fortune-telling tent. “I have appreciation for the show you put on. It fooled me for a while. Not any

Her lids lower. “You and Cat would have been glorious.”

“Cat is a child.”

“She’s only a few years younger than Sienna.”

“More importantly, I knew Cat when she was a child. That’s still familiar to me. I’m sorry if you thought anything else would happen.”

She sits down heavily, landing in the seat the audience uses, not the one I use. Her anger drains away, leaving only exhaustion. “I could have stayed with you, Logan. I wanted to. We would have taken over the world when you didn’t want me, when it became clear you preferred a young woman, I thought Cat would be perfect.”

“You want an alliance. You want power.”

“Yes, damn it. Is that so wrong?”

“No,” I say, my voice softer now. “It’s not wrong to want power. I know what it was like for you to be powerless. I saw it happen, but you’re going to get it at Cirque des Miroirs.”

She draws herself up, struggling to appear haughty. “You wouldn’t have been able to get it out of me.”

I stand behind the table where you can see the little cupboard space filled with crystals and other materials. There’s an old tarot card deck—the one I use, the one I demand softened for authenticity. Never use a shiny deck, she told me once. I have an appreciation for the show now.

The cards feel warm in my hands as I give them a quick shuffle.

I pull one. The card features a series of cups along with Roman numerals. That means eight. In the background, a man walks away.

Alessandra doesn’t know it yet, but that man is me.

“What does it mean?”

“The eight of cups means disappointment, abandonment. It means the end.”

“Impressive. Maybe you do have a gift of foresight. Because this is the last show I’ll lend for you. You’re officially leaving. Not temporarily. Not on one show. You’re gone for good. Cirque des Miroirs no longer has a place for you. Tell me you’re gone.”

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Logan

THE PHOTO STARES back at me, a permanent reminder of the blood hands.

It's from an old newspaper advertisement for the circus my father Come one, come all. 50 cents to see The Freak Show! it reads. The photo of my father, covered in ink, staring at the camera with dark eyes. I'm looking at it, having found the only quiet space in the fairgrounds. Ironically, it's under the big top, the largest tent.

With no performances happening, it's empty.

Except for me.

Guilt churns in my gut as I gaze into the haunted eyes of the man who fathered me. The circus freak who was hurt by society, so he took pain on every woman he found.

Including my mother.

I rake a hand through my hair and sigh. How did we end up starting down this path to find myself in him...and ironically, I did. I thought I was saving Alessandra that night. Was I just enabling her? Was I just leading us to this night, where I'd have to send her away?

Was I just becoming the person I fought so hard to resist?

A sideshow. A freak.

A monster.

Shame burns in my chest. I swore I'd never become him, yet one day the mirror reveals the ugly truth. We share the same ink, the same same capacity for cruelty.

I bury my head in my hands.

"I'm sorry," I whisper to the ghosts that haunt this place. To the They're followed by most members of the circus. The flame thrower, the juggler. The clowns, along with Travis. Even Cat is there, though Alexander's absence is notably missing.

I stand to face them. "That's about how surprised I feel right now, coming to host a little coup? Because I have to tell you, it won't be as hard."

The past can't be undone, but the future is still unwritten. I have a chance to do better, to be better. For Cirque des Miroirs. For Sienna.

It's time to face the darkness inside—and finally set it free.

She paid the price for my weakness.

Sienna changed me. Showed me I could be more. And when she was I can't the light went out. The shadows crept back in, darker than before.

I can't lose her again.

She's out there somewhere, her light calling me home.

And this time, I'm going to claim her.

A surge of adrenaline kicks in as I stride through the big top, moving in my traveling over the trapezes and platforms suspended high above. This is Gerard Marino's sin in my blood—as much a part of me as the scars that mark my skin. I've been taken enough from me.

I halt in the center of the ring, staring up at the canvas ceiling ripped by the breeze. Gerard Marino built this circus from nothing, devoted his life to it... and where did that get him?

Banished from his own circus.

At this point I would almost welcome it.

"I'm sorry," I tell them. "I'm sorry I couldn't be kinder. Or crueler. I'm sorry I couldn't be the owner you need, at least not anymore. Get Wolfgang up there to do it. Or someone else. I'm done."

There are murmurs, protests, a few people calling out.

Wolfgang looks stoic. Emerson appears almost hurt, which is because even if I stayed in the circus he wouldn't be allowed here.

A vision of Sienna flashes in my mind, her smile like the sun breaking through storm clouds. My fingers curl into fists.

No. I won't let this place consume me. Not again.

Sienna showed me there's more to life than sawdust and spectacle. I want to wake up without the screams of a crowd in my ears, make a home with a woman I love, start a family... be free of the shadows that dog my every step in this world.

But the Cirque des Miroirs is my legacy. My curse.

TRICKS YIPS AND jumps, chasing after the scrap of fabric I dangle above his head. His paws skid on the sawdust as he tries to catch it, sending up a cloud of dust with each slide.

I laugh, the sound bursting from my chest in a way that almost surprises me. When was the last time I truly laughed like this?

Maisie laughs, too. “Come on, Tricks! You can do it!”

He finally snatches the fabric from my fingers, shaking his head proudly. “What a clever boy you are, Tricks!” I ruffle the soft fur between his ears, the warmth flooding my chest at his delighted whimpers.

“A prodigy,” Maisie announces.

“This scrap of a dog, with his beige fur and curly tail, has brought me more joy than anything else in longer than I can remember.”

Her eyes mist. “I’m sad but also happy. Is that weird?”

I smile. “Makes complete sense. That’s me all the time these days.”

“How are you?” she asks, her voice gentle. “Really?”

“Better, honestly. I mean that. And I want to thank you because you’ve been a good friend. A true friend, even after I abandoned you.”

“You could never,” she says.

“I’m serious. If you ever get kidnapped across state lines in a bad way, you better believe that I’m going to be there on the other side.”

She makes a face. “I would just take an espresso as thanks. No one in this town can make them now that you’re gone.”

“Fine, I’ll make you an espresso.”

“Next time,” she says. “I have to help my mom with pies.”

The Young family has infamous pies at the county fairs. “Good luck

As I curl up on the sofa with Tricks, my thoughts drift to the menagerie animals in the circus. Lions, tigers, bears—all living in cages too prodded into performing tricks day after day.

Could I give this lucky dog a better life than that? Take him in, love him, train him to do simple tricks to delight audiences, all while ensuring he's happy and well-treated?

The dog rests his head on my knee, gazing up at me with liquid eyes filled with devotion and trust. My heart clenches. I owe him a lot more, after he risked his life to save mine.

Gently scratching behind his ears, I make a silent promise. This dog will have a home—with me. No more scrambling for scraps, no more shivering in the cold. Just love, warmth, and treats every day.

A smile tugs at my lips as I picture this little fur ball captivated by the and bringing them the same joy he's brought me. It seems we've both found where we belong.

"What do you say?" I ask the dog softly. "Want to join the circus?"

His enthusiastic bark is all the answer I need.

I dig into my pocket and extract a dog treat, holding it up for the dog to see. His eyes light up, tail wagging in a frenzy of excitement.

"Sit," I command gently.

He immediately plops his rear end on the ground, gaze fixed on the treat in my hand. I grin and give him the treat, praising him enthusiastically.

"Good boy! What a smart little dog you are." I ruffle the soft fur on his head as he munches on the treat. "Now, lie down."

Again he obeys instantly, belly dropping to the ground as he continues to sweep back and forth. Another treat and more praise follow.

We continue like this, me teaching him the simplest of commands and tricks, him performing them with gusto for another treat and a kind word. The love, warmth and affection bloom inside me like a flower opening in the sun.

Who would have thought, after everything I've endured, I'd find my real friend in a scruffy little stray dog? Yet here we are. Two castaways who've found where we belong—together.

A lump forms in my throat as I wrap my arms around the dog in a hug. He snuggles into me without hesitation, as if he knows I need this comfort as much as he does.

Logan

“WHERE ARE WE going?” she asks.

“It’s a surprise,” I say, holding her hand as I lead her through a down trail. A squirrel scampers across the path, surprised but uncom with our arrival. To the right through the woods, we can see appara the North Security Team members use to train and maintain their p ability. I gesture toward them. “One day, I’ll take you to Nebraska, wh circus’ headquarters are. We have our own training center, though mo is indoors.”

“Is being a tough security guard similar to being an acrobat?”

“Easier,” I tell her and she laughs. I have my hand linked throug and she allows it, something that makes my gut clench because I don’ if she’ll still allow it after this outing. I don’t know if she should. The t after what she’s been through, she deserves a fresh start. She des quaint little one-bedroom apartment somewhere up north probably, v snows and looks beautiful around the holidays. But damned if I can go.

“I feel a little bit like the little girl,” she says.

“The one from the show?” The show that’s based on A Wonderland. The show I designed to replace the haphazard goofba that Marino had used for years, a show with an actual storyline to ti the acts together.

“Do you know why I picked that one?” I say.

She shakes her head. “A Lewis Carroll fan?”

I chuckle. “Not exactly. I wanted something that involved a little g who didn’t necessarily have acrobatic skills. I wanted to give the part so that she and Alessandra would be secure in Cirque des Miroirs, they would feel safe after...”

“After what?”

“No one ever told you?”

“I heard rumors, nothing specific. I’d rather hear it from you.”

“Oh, it’s that old cliché story. Boy joins the circus so that he can get closer to his terrible father even though he’s already passed. Boy discovers the circus is actually pretty decent, but he’s new and not that many people trust him. And then, one day he walks in when the owner has decided to punish the resident fortune teller by hanging her upside down in front of everyone and whipping her bloody.”

She stops walking, staring at me with her mouth open. “Are you serious?”

“Deadly.”

She keeps walking. “So, people said you hooked up with Alessandra after that.”

I shake my head wanting her to know the truth even if I never care about anyone else. “We were never together. Not even once, not even a little bit.”

“After the incident, the incident that turned you into the owner, was it a coup?”

“I prefer to call it a hostile takeover.”

She gives me a small smile. “So, after you took it over?”

I nod. “Alessandra was nervous about her position in the circus. Understandably, after what had happened, there was some bitterness over a shakeup, over the hostile takeover, and people were angry at her. She wanted to tell people we were together and I allowed it. I wasn’t interested in anything with anyone else, so it didn’t matter to me that they assumed I was taking care of her, then that was fine.”

She gives me a sideways glance. “Is that what you did with me?”

“Absolutely not,” I say, stopping to face her. “What I did with you was the opposite of protection. It was reckless. It was selfish. I took you on the trail because I wanted you.”

“Oh,” she says, her voice faint, her dark lashes hiding her thoughts. “I know you want to probe, but that’s why we’re going on this little trip. I’ll take the lead and keep going down the trail. I imagine that hundreds of explorers, men and women have run miles over this particular stretch of trail. They’ve worn it smooth, with only the occasional tree root lifting so that defiance.

“So I put Cat in the circus so that they would know they had always had a place here and so that everyone else would know that too.”

“What was the old owner punishing her for?” That makes me stop over a tree root, but I catch myself. Yeah, she had to notice the one I can feel the story that would make me look like an ass.

discovers “He was punishing her because she was reckless. Because she’s so impulsive. On one particular night, that night when it was storming, she climbed the Ferris wheel and Emerson nearly cracked his head in half to get her down.”

“Holy shit,” she breathes.

“Yeah,” I say, my voice dry. “So that night when they told you, I know I have known it was too perfect. It was too close a parallel, but I was careful after the past, like this path we’re on that’s been worn down smooth, made easy for people to take it. No rocks and tree trunks in the way, and so I started down this path, in my mind it just was so easy to keep going, a little bit.” That you were like Alessandra, that you had really jeopardized the circus that way. That’s what they wanted me to think, and I fell for it.”

She’s silent as we walk. It’s a contemplative silence, a thoughtful one that allows the birds to trill in our wake. Then we’ve reached the clearing and I gasp. There’s a beautiful lake complete with a dock and a rope with rings for the circus knots so you can jump off. There’s also—because I came here early and prepared it—a picnic blanket.

“Oh, Logan,” she says.

I give her a crooked smile. “This is my way of saying I’m sorry, Logan. If it wasn’t clear.”

She looks at me with haunted, hopeful eyes. “Oh, it’s clear.”

“Good,” I say. “Then don’t answer yet. Don’t tell me you don’t love me. Don’t tell me you can’t be with me. Just spend the day with me and I’ll have it on good authority that you like to swim in lakes.”

“Do you?”

“Someone may have told me that you also like to have grilled sandwiches and soda.”

She grins. “Is that what’s in the picnic basket?”

“That along with some fruit and a wheel of brie. I think I’ll go up in North’s chef with my request.”

“Good,” she says. “I’m starving.”

We spend the next few minutes focused on practical matters, where food will be laid out on level ground, splitting up portions, and then I stumble into the delicious food. She swallows a bite and then nods toward the spot in “So did you bring me a bathing suit?”

“I did borrow one from Samantha, but I thought if I was very lucky he was might go skinny dipping with me.”

“Really?” she says drawing out the word, making it unclear whether she’s leaning.

“Really,” I say, reaching over to tuck her hair behind her ear. My hand lingers against her neck, wanting more contact, more touching. I don’t need sex. Well, that’s not strictly true. My cock definitely argues the opposite. It’s always hard when she’s around and even harder now that I’m touching her and imagining her naked, but I won’t demand sex. Not ever. Not once I’ve been through.

She looks away. “I’m not”—she swallows—“You can see without clothes off, you can tell what happened.”

I grit my teeth against the urge to find Kyle in jail and keep punching him until he’s gone, until he’s off this fucking planet. “That’s not your fault and she would never blame you for that. I would never judge you. You’re beautiful every way that you look. You’re beautiful no matter what people do to you.”

“In that case,” she says, “last one in is a rotten egg.” And then she gets up. She’s tearing off her clothes and I’m distracted.

I’m so fucking distracted by all that beautiful skin, by the curve of her ass, by the bounce of her tits. I’m so distracted that it takes me a minute to even untangle my legs, to stand up, to shove down my jeans and yank my shirt and then I’m running after her. When we’re both running, I realize I can overtake her, but I don’t want to. She’s not the rotten one here. And she’s not here. I’m back here, I get a wonderful view.

I chase her over to the dock and then she leaps grabbing the rope and she leaps so beautifully, so fearlessly, holding on tight to the rope swinging and letting herself go to flip into the water. I’m right there after her, grabbing the rope soon as it swings back to me, I jump and land a few feet away soaking wet when she’s coming up for air.

God, she looks gorgeous when she’s laughing. Courageous, that’s what she is. Maybe that’s why I believed she could be reckless enough to during the storm, but there's one key difference. Alessandra's recklessness came from a place of cruelty. Whether that's justified because of her past treatment or not, I don't know, but Sienna has never hurt anyone and never would. The world keeps stepping on her, keeps making excuses.

I pull her close in the water, settling her against my body, letting her rest on me as I kick enough to keep us both afloat. I groan at the feel of her breasts against me.

She holds onto me, one hand on my shoulder, the other drifting down to find the waistband of my boxer briefs. "Hey. You cheated."

I tug her even closer, breathing the moist air between us, allowing my mouth to open, my tongue to taste her temple, to lick against her hair. I'm starving for her. I couldn't trust myself.

"Sunset, I couldn't trust myself not to slip inside you." She shivers after words. "But I wanted to be there, nothing between us when I asked for forgiveness or at least the chance of it, when I tell you that I'm sorry."

She leans her forehead against mine. "I know."

"It will take time for me to regain your trust. I know that much, but let me try?"

She rocks her head back and forth, almost shaking her head, but her forehead stays against mine and I cling to that like a lifeline. Even though she's touching everywhere, my arms wrapped around her beautiful lithe body, her legs wrapped around mine, I still need the connection of our foreheads touching.

"I don't know how this would work," she whispers. "I don't know how long it will take to go back to the circus."

"Forget the circus."

She laughs, disbelieving. "I can't just forget the circus. It's kind of a big deal."

"I'm done with it," I tell her. "I'm not going back."

She pulls away looking shocked. "What do you mean?"

"I already told them. I'm giving it up. They can shut down or they can keep going without me. It's not my problem anymore."

She blinks, looking adorably confused. "You did that. Why? Not because it couldn't have been for me."

"Why not?" I demand. "Why aren't you worth giving up the circus? You're worth so much more than that."

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

Sienna

LOGAN STANDS BEFORE me, his piercing dark eyes filled with anguish. His body is strong and dripping wet. “Sienna, I’m so sorry for what I did to you. I was blinded by duty, and I took it out on you.”

His words wash over me, a turbulent sea of emotions churning inside. I want nothing more than to melt into his embrace, to forgive him for what he did to me aside like yesterday’s trash. But the scars on my heart remind me that trusting him again would only lead to more pain.

I wrap my arms around myself, steeling my nerves. “Words are cheap. How do I know you won’t hurt me again? How do I know you won’t disappear away again?”

“Because I’m not bringing you with me. I’m coming with you. My arms reach for my hands, his rough, callused fingers intertwining with mine. “When you left, you took the light from my world. I was in a dark place, Sienna, and you were the only one who could pull me out. I don’t even want to go back to that darkness again.”

His touch ignites a spark inside me, fragile and trembling.

Logan brings my hands to his lips, brushing a soft kiss across my knuckles. “You’re the best thing that’s ever happened to me. I don’t need your forgiveness, but I’ll spend the rest of my life making it up to you. Please, give me another chance.”

I close my eyes, tears slipping down my cheeks. In my heart, Logan is telling the truth. He has always worn his emotions on his sleeve, for better and for worse. If he says that he’s changed, then he means it with every fiber of his being.

The walls around my heart start to crumble, brick by brick. I’ve l lonely without Logan, adrift on an ocean with no shore in sight. But together we can weather any storm.

I take a deep breath and open my eyes. The smile that spreads across Logan's face is like the dawn breaking over the horizon, filled with hope and promise.

"I want to."

Logan's arms wrap around me, enveloping me in his embrace. I look at him as tears of love spill down my cheeks, the missing piece of me finally sliding into place. We have a long road ahead, but as long as we stay together, maybe we can find our way.

His hand comes up to cup my cheek, his thumb brushing away the remnants of my tears. A spark of heat ignites in my core at his touch, a familiar ache of longing blooming to life.

"There's still one more way you can make it up to me," I say, my voice dropping to a husky whisper.

Logan's eyes darken with desire as understanding dawns. "Are you sure, Sienna. Just name it."

I lean in closer, my lips nearly brushing his. "I need to feel you again, not just an empty space of you."

A low groan rumbles in Logan's chest. His arms tighten around me, crushing me against him. "Are you sure?" he asks roughly. "I don't want to rush into this if you're not ready."

"I'm ready," I breathe. "We've already wasted too much time apart. That's all the encouragement Logan needs. His mouth descends over mine, hungry and demanding. I meet him with equal fervor, desire igniting an inferno."

Our kisses turn frantic as we shed our clothes, hands roaming over our fevered skin. Logan lifts me into his arms and carries me to the grass, laying me down on the bed with reverent care.

"I love you, Sienna," he murmurs, his eyes boring into mine. "Always. Just name it."
"I love you too," I whisper.

And then there are no more words, only the sweet surrender of two bodies entwining once more.

Our breaths come fast and shallow, mingling in the scant space between us. Logan's hands glide down my sides, leaving a trail of fire in their wake. I arch into his touch with a soft moan.

together, How did I ever survive without this? Without him?

Logan's lips find the sensitive spot on my neck, teasing the delicate skin across there. A riot of sensations assaults me from every direction, overwhelming with warmth yet not enough. I need more of him, all of him.

There is no rush, no frenzy. Just unhurried exploration and revelation. Logan worships my body like it's a temple, lavishing attention on every curve and hollow. I do the same, relearning the planes and angles of my heart through taste and touch.

We know each other's bodies as well as our own, yet it feels new to us. A rediscovery. The familiarity is comforting, the novelty exciting.

I gasp as Logan slides into me, stretching and filling me so exquisitely. We lock eyes, azure meeting obsidian, and for a moment we stand suspended in the perfection of the moment.

Then we move as one, a dance in the water borne of intimacy and passion. Each caress, each thrust builds the fire within me, stoking it higher and higher until I'm engulfed in flames. The water is cool against my skin, but I can't fight the fire.

Logan quickens his pace, chasing his own release, and I tumble carelessly into mindless ecstasy. He follows soon after, my name a ragged gasp from his lips.

We cling to each other as the tremors subside, hearts pounding in a syncopated rhythm. No words are needed in this perfect silence.

Just two souls weaved as one. Whole once more.

The surface of the lake ripples around us, as if we're the epicenter of a new universe.

In this moment, we are.

I nestle closer into Logan's embrace, savoring the warmth and security of him. His arms tighten around me in response, as if he can't get enough of this closeness either.

We have a long road ahead to rebuild what we once had, but in this moment I have no doubts that we'll make it. That we'll come out the other side stronger and better than before.

Logan brushes a kiss against my hair, his breath stirring the strands. "I'm sorry for breaking your trust in me. I was a fool to ever let you go." His words are rough with emotion. "I don't deserve another chance, but I'm going to spend the rest of my life making it up to you. Loving you the way I should have from the beginning."

deserve.”

I tilt my head up to meet his gaze. “I wouldn’t have let you backsliding didn’t think you were worthy of forgiveness.” I cup his cheek, rubbing my thumb over the sharp angle of his cheekbone. “We both made mistakes. We’ve been given an opportunity for a fresh start. A chance to start over. Everything better and more lasting.”

“A chance I don’t intend to waste.” Logan seals his vow with a kiss that steals my breath.

When we part, I see nothing but truth and longing in the depths of his eyes. The fears and doubts that once plagued me melt away under the intensity of his gaze.

“I love you,” I say simply.

A brilliant smile curves Logan’s lips. “And I love you, Sunset.”

Logan’s hands blaze a trail of fire over my skin as our bodies melt together in a rhythm as old as time. Each touch, each caress is an act of worship—a prayer for forgiveness and a promise for the future.

Our breaths come in ragged gasps, the air redolent with the scent of sex. But beneath the hunger and desire simmers a deeper connection—a bond forged through heartbreak and tempered by time.

“Look at me,” Logan rasps, his eyes burning into mine. I meet his gaze unflinchingly, no barriers left between us.

In the depths of his eyes, I see the truth—that the past can never be erased, but it can be forgiven. That love, when given another chance, can emerge stronger and more resilient.

A cry spills from my lips as pleasure washes over me in waves, melting out everything but the feel of Logan surrounding me, anchoring me in this place and now.

Logan follows soon after, his face buried in the curve of my neck. He whispers my name like a benediction.

We hold onto each other as our heartbeats slow, reluctant to let go. We know that we’ve found our way back into each other’s arms.

The air is filled with the scent of our desire, the air heavy with the intoxicating mix of sweat and longing, as we surrender to the moment. We hear each other.

Time seems to stand still as we reach the pinnacle of our passion. Our bodies trembling with release and our hearts finally finding solace.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

Sienna

IN THE SUNLIT sitting room I guide Tricks through a repertoire that includes spins, jumps, walking on a very thin piece of wood forward and backward, and barking on command. I'm not sure what we're leading to precisely. But he enjoys the challenge, as well as the treats that come afterward. And I enjoy the sense of purpose.

Samantha plays violin one room upstairs, something with a playful, jaunty sound that perfectly suits Tricks. Along with a faint hum of a note that suits me.

The notes waft down the spiral staircase.

Logan came back exhausted late last night. I wanted to talk to him about it, but he pressed between my knees and made me come so hard I couldn't speak. Perhaps that was on purpose. He went back today to handle "housekeeping," as he called it. Though perhaps the term cleaning desk would be more appropriate. If instead of a desk it was an entire circus with all its tents and its trucks and its secrets.

Men with military bearings walk through the house for important secret security briefings with Liam North in his office. The contrast between the refined music and the severity of their bearings tickles me. It reminds me of the circus with its fluid acrobats and high level of pomp.

One man stops to watch as I attempt to teach Tricks how to cover his eyes with his paws while he's lying down. He's fine with piling his paws over his snout but struggles to understand actually closing his eyes and covering his eyes.

"Yes," I say when one paw nudges higher. "That's exactly right, Tricks. Naturally he gets a cheese cube.

"Impressive," comes a lower voice from the hallway, and I whirl to

“You could convince him to come back.”

“Why would I do that?”

cs. He flushes, always such a bright red on his pale face. No wonder I never do in real life. “Because we need him. You know we do. We don’t want to see him in anywhere else.”

oss one “Weren’t you?”

“Look, I’m sorry that I backed away from you, from our friendship. I know how bad it was with Kyle. You saw most of it when you were trying to protect me.”

A sigh escapes me, washing away some of my righteous indignation. “I know. I know this was trying to protect you. Logan was trying to protect Alessandra. In the end, we succeeded all this time, but at what cost? Ourselves, that’s what.”

He flinches. “I’m sorry, okay? I’m sorry. What else can I say?”

“Nothing. You don’t need to say anything, because I forgive you. You can’t do it anymore, the same way Logan can’t give himself up for the cause. We won’t be martyrs anymore.”

“You were never a martyr to me.”

“No? You let me take punches for you, but you wouldn’t even talk to me. Letting me get hurt at lunch. What the hell does that make me? You may have consoled me, but you weren’t the one to actually hit me, but turning away from me is a human hurt even worse than the physical pain.”

Confusion. Then a quiet realization. “You’ve changed.”

I nod. “Thank God for that.”

“You were always so tough. I wanted to be like that.”

“I’m tired of being tough. I want to live in peace. If that means walking away from the people who were supposed to love me, supposed to protect me, then that’s what I’ll do.”

“So you’ll let him walk away from Cirque des Miroirs?”

“You can have the circus. I have Logan.” And something else. A sense of self-worth. I don’t really blame Travis for being afraid, for acting out. I’m not in trauma. That is his journey to walk. I’ve been walking through a maelstrom, a tumultuous, rocky version. And I’ve finally found a clearing with a lake, a picnic basket. And a man who chooses that clearing over everything else.

He’s leaving the circus for good.

It feels like confirmation, like absolution.

It also feels wrong.

Three men walk through the door leaving boxes inside. Logan’s still there. They pause when they see me. Two of them look guilty. The third is pissed.

“You’re the one making him leave,” he says.

I shake my head. “He’s a grown man who makes his own choices.”

The man takes a step forward, slightly menacing. “And what about you?”

CHAPTER TWENTY-THREE

Sienna

I DON'T HAVE a car or my bicycle from home. Logan would take me anywhere—probably even Paris, if I asked—but he'd have feelings about a particular field trip. I could probably ask Liam and Samantha for a ride, no doubt that would come with personal security. I'm all for safety and a last road trip, which took place in a trunk, but in this case it would come with intimidation. So when I get the text from Maisie about the county fair, I think of unlikely reinforcements. My mother.

The irony is that we're in my father's truck.

It was a symbol of her isolation, before. That he could leave, and she couldn't. Now it's the path to her freedom, even if she doesn't yet know where it should take her.

At first glance the Forrester County Fair looks like a cheerful scene with colorful bunting, the aroma of caramelized popcorn lingering in the air, and the distant laughter of children.

Beneath the façade of civility lurks an unsettling air, a sense of unease that only grows as more people notice me and my mother. We whisper our way through the bustling crowd. The same people who looked at us with disdain now see us with...fear.

They know that I'm with a powerful man, a strong man, a dangerous man.

One who can beat up the town's bullies and send them to jail.

I don't want their fear, but I've come to realize there is no other option for some people.

They don't see me as human.

They don't see me as one of them, so they can only look down on fear me.

Regular human respect, somehow, isn't even an option.

The carousel here is about two decades older than the one at Cirque Miroirs—and maintained worse, too. The cheerful music has split second jarring silence. The flashing lights seem manic. The antique horses fix macabre expressions, their painted eyes following passersby with a intensity.

Some children shake their heads when offered a ride.

No, thank you.

We walk through the grounds, passing the rows of livestock that are judged.

Our destination is the market area, where booths are setup to sell fruit, local honey, and jerky. The folded tables are covered with white tablecloths that whip in the wind.

She doesn't have a fancy sign or even a costume.

Instead the fortune teller wears a cropped T-shirt and jeans.

In her hands she holds worn-looking tarot cards.

There appear to be no takers at the moment, so I leave my mother's stand selling homemade jewelry and walk up to the booth.

"Hello, Cat."

She doesn't look surprised to see me. "Want your fortune told for a few dollars to pull a card. The mystic world has the answers you're seeking."

"Is this your new thing?"

"Maybe. I'm trying it out. I need to find something new since I can't perform at the Cirque des Miroirs anymore."

"Is it shutting down, then? I wasn't sure."

"I don't know. Maybe. Wolfgang is the only person who could do it, but he doesn't want to. My mother is talking about stepping in, trying to get a quorum, as she calls it." Cat rolls her eyes. "She's always been obsessed with ruling the circus. She sees this as her chance."

"Oh." The news makes me sad. Not because I don't want Alessandra to lead, but because I already know she can't. What Logan did with the circus was singular. It takes strength to lead. True strength, the kind that isn't based on fear and greed and grasping.

"I know," Cat says, her voice dry.

My eyebrows raise. "I thought you lied about the Ferris wheel."

her.”

She runs a hand over her face. “I lied about it to impress Emerson and it didn’t even work. It only resulted in making him look at me as a malleable child.”

“That sucks.”

“Don’t lie. That’s what I deserve.”

A surprised laugh escapes me. “Maybe.”

“Definitely. I was a cunt. And I’m sorry. Truly.”

Her apology rings true. Truer than Travis’s defensive words, any of which I didn’t know you even wanted to be a fortune teller.”

“I didn’t. It was always my mom’s thing, but it’s something I know how to do.” She makes a face. “I know it’s hard to believe, but we actually did the whole second sight thing.”

“Wait. Really? I thought it was part of the show.”

“We have visions. Whatever. They aren’t useful in the slightest.”

“You can tell the future but it’s not useful?”

“We get these glimpses, but they’re just one possible outcome. I saw a fortune teller at a circus, but then we interfered and ruined it. When it was our turn, we could have made it better.”

“I thought a vision would have shown me destroying it.”

“It doesn’t matter. The visions don’t matter. All that matters are our choices.”

Yes. Our choices. Something about that nags me, but I’m struck by the ten of cups in her hands. Maybe I’m gullible, and all she wants is ten dollars.

Something compels me to pull out a ten dollar bill and lay it on the table.

Her eyebrows raise, but she doesn’t question it. She slips the money into her pocket and splits the deck. Then she pulls a card. It’s one I’ve never seen before. I’ve actually pulled for someone else. Only seen it when I was reading a fortune online or shuffling through the deck.

The High Priestess.

The card pictures a woman with flowing robes holding an ancient scroll. She was wearing an illuminated crown on her head.

Her eyes narrow. “She represents divine knowledge. Is your intuition trying to tell you something?”

That strikes a chord inside me, one that resonates past me into the future. I give her a rueful smile. “Is there anything I can do to help the wider world and our impact on it. I give her a rueful smile. “Is there anything I can do to help the wider world and our impact on it.”

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

Sienna

“WHERE ARE WE going?” Logan asks.

“I’m allowed to have surprises, too,” I tell him with a serene smile. Wolfgang is driving us down one of the country roads in the SUV. Tricks is trying to shove his nose into my pocket where I have some cheese cubes stored. Even through a plastic bag, he can smell them. A ready to do any number of tricks—or thievery—to get it.

Logan’s breath catches when he sees the spires of the circus, the red noticeably missing from the tops. He holds my hand. “Sienna. What are you doing here?”

I stare up into his piercing blue eyes, searching for any hint of deception. But all I see is sincerity. Raw pain and longing that mirror my own.

How can I turn him away when he’s baring his soul to me like this?
When all I’ve wanted is to live in the joy of the circus again?

His joy. My peace.

We deserve them both.

“You’re not leaving the circus.”

“Yes, I am,” he says, his voice a low growl.

“No, you’re not. And I’m not running away with the circus this time. I’m running away with you.”

“No,” he breathes. “The circus hurt you. I hurt you.”

A wry twist of my lips. “Families do that sometimes. And isn’t that what you told me? The circus means family. Bring me with you, Logan.”

“Sienna.”

“Call me Sunset.”

“Sunset. You don’t need to do this for me.”

“Then let me do it for me. I have this idea.” The SUV pulls to a front of the fairgrounds, and I step out with Tricks at my side. I spr arms wide. “Introducing the fabulously talented, compact-sized new Little Tricks!”

A smile spreads across his face. “And you?”

“And me.”

“You want to stand under the big top, to delight the crowds with smile?”

“If you’ll have me. You’re still the circus owner, last I checked.”

“Oh God. Yes, Sunset. Run away with me.”

His lips find mine, and I melt into his embrace. Our past may be s but the future is ours to write. Together.

it ends. He lies down and covers his face with his little paws.

Logan's laugh drives away the shadows.

The steady beat of his heart against mine is soothing, chasing away the last vestiges of doubt and fear. Our path won't always be easy, but together we can overcome any challenge. The future is ours, and this time, I'm no doubt to embrace it without looking back.

For the first time, I nestle closer against Logan's warmth, content in the silence. There is no need for words between us, not when we can communicate so much with just a single touch or glance.

After a while, Logan speaks again, his voice soft. "I know I've hurt you in the past, Sienna, and I can't take that back. But I want you to know that I'm committed to making things right. You're the best thing that has ever happened to me, and I don't intend to lose you again."

His words melt the last of my doubts, like the sun breaking through dark clouds. I lift my head to meet his gaze, a smile curving my lips. "I know you flow with the current."

Logan's eyes widen, as if he can scarcely dare to hope. "You do?"

"Yes." I brush my fingers along his jaw, rough with stubble. "The man I knew before would never have fought so hard for us or bared his soul the way you did. You've changed, and I can see now how much I truly love you."

A slow smile spreads across his face, brighter than any spotlight. "It means everything to me, Sienna. My life, my heart, my soul—they all belong to you."

Joy swells within me, overflowing in a laugh. I throw my arms around his neck, clinging to him as he spins me in circles. Leaving only love and laughter in their wake.

Tricks barks and spins in circles, excited by the prospect of cheering for our joy.

We've endured loss and heartbreak, faced impossible odds, but our love has endured. Stronger than any storm or trial, vast and deep as the ocean, endless as the horizon.

After all we've survived, I know that this love will last forever.

Logan sets me back on my feet, cupping my face in his hands. His eyes gleam with equal parts passion and tenderness. "Run away with me. Not just for a short time. Forever. Be my partner in all things—in rule and in love."

MY HEART SLOWS down in the moments before a performance.

Every second seems to last an hour.

I feel the energy coming off the crowd as they clap and stomp tiger who's performing on stage right now. I've seen the same act so many times, so many years of my life that even from backstage, I can see my mind standing on his hind feet.

I can see him bouncing a ball.

I can see him jumping through a hoop lit on fire.

There's still a patch of rough skin on his left paw where it caught during a performance. I can still smell the singed fur and hear the screams of people in the audience.

That won't happen tonight because for the most part, we don't make mistakes.

It's not really professional pride or pleasure at the audience's delight that drives us.

It's my father. He's cruel, merciless.

Mistakes get eliminated, which means they end up rolled into somewhere between one town and another as the circus moves along.

So we all learn to do our parts, to play them well.

We learn to smile so hard that no one in the audience ever guesses we're terrified.

I lean down to stretch my hamstrings, forcing my nose all the way between my legs. When I go out there I need to be limber. But we stay stiff for five minutes.

Every drum from the band, every gasp from the audience, they're all choreographed.

They're all a familiar countdown.

One I've played night after night for most of my life.

Maybe for some people the circus is a job.

I've heard distantly that it can even be a dream.

For me, it's only ever been duty.

Duty that I was raised to perform since I was a baby. As a toddler my father taught me to walk on a tightrope. He put down padding when he was with me, but only because bruises are not conducive to performances. I see them though, bruises. I fell so many times that the bruises started forming on my feet. My skin would crack open and my father would pick me back up and put me on the tightrope even as blood dripped down onto the ground. That's how I learned balance.

After stretching forward, I stand up straight and then lean backwards and backwards. Flexibility. Sometimes people come up to me after a show and marvel over how my body is so flexible. Am I disjointed? they ask. Was I just built this way? No. My body started out like everyone else's, but I pushed harder than I should have, harder than I should have, and even then my father stepped in and pushed harder.

Flexibility was the only way that I could escape the injury he inflicted on me.

So I learned it.
Standing with my feet planted firmly on the ground, I bend backwards until I can reach my ankles, then I come back up again and freeze like I'm someone is there—a man.

He has dark hair, a little glossy with a surprising amount of volume. One part falls rakishly over his eye.

Dashing, that's the word that comes to mind.

He looks dashing.

Which I distrust immediately.

Dashing isn't real, it's a fairy tale.

And I learned a long time ago that fairy tales don't exist.

The twinkle of mischief in his eyes proves me right. The fact that he has broad shoulders, obviously strong, even through his suit, that doesn't matter. None of it matters.

He's a stranger and even worse, a townie.

Circus folk are insular, almost xenophobic.

We take money from the people in town. We serve them popcorn and we perform for them, but we never trust them. He is some member of the audience who decided to sneak backstage for reasons unknown. Probhe could hit on the performers.

It'll be a lucky thing if my father doesn't see him.

Underperforming circus folk aren't the only people he's ever rolled under my feet. I'm not a circus performer, but I've been rolled under the wheel of a ditch as the caravan moved through a lone moonlit highway.

The man leans back against a temporary wooden wall.

"Like what you see?" he asks.

My cheeks flush, I've been staring like an idiot. "You shouldn't be here. The mats are here."

He looks around. "I don't see a sign."

"There doesn't need to be a sign. This is backstage. You should be in the stands or by the mestands."

"No," he says, "I should be in neither of those places. I belong in the ring."

I roll my eyes at the arrogant statement, even though it rings true.

This is a man who would be perfect as a performer. He commanded my attention just by standing there. He's commanding my attention right now.

"Go ahead." I tell him, "Sasha probably wants a snack."

Something dark flashes across his eyes. "She probably does. That's why you do to the animals, right? You keep them hungry before a performance because of course, you don't want to go too far. You don't want them too hungry."

You don't want them to decide that one of the audience members looks more delicious than whatever the trainer's got on a stick."

I shiver. "You don't know anything about us."

"Don't I?" He pushes away from the wall and walks toward me.

I want to back away, but I force myself to stand my ground.

I belong here, he doesn't.

Besides, I can't miss my cue. I don't think my father would actually roll me into a ditch, but that's not because of familial love. I'm the headliner's tall shadow in the circus right now. The draw.

The reason why we get even tiny snippets of media in local TV when we pass through towns. The great Luna Rider, so much potential. Olympic hopeful...

At least she was a long time ago.

Now she's just a circus sideshow, something to do on an afternoon in a rural town.

The stranger circles me, watching far too close for comfort, his da taking in everything from my hair in its tight bun to my leotard, my stockings and my bare feet. And they aren't pretty feet. They're the feet of a dancer, not an athlete. They're feet that were cut time after time on tight ropes and they were just little.

The audience can't see them, so it doesn't matter that I can't cover my feet up with ballet shoes or something else in order to do my act.

He looks back This man sees them.

He seems to notice every cut and bump and scar.

He meets my eyes. "I do know you," he says, his voice low, so low. I almost don't notice how close he is. Not until his breath brushes my temple, warm and almost soothing. In contrast to his words.

"I see that they keep you a little hungry too. That you're strong, muscular, but not as much as you should be. Not for someone who works out ten hours a day. That's because they keep you hungry, isn't it? You wake up and they demand you perform hungry, and you go to sleep hungry."

A full body shiver racks me, confirming his words even as I want to tell him.

Yes. My father trained me the same way he trained the animals.

And the worst part, the reason why I can't even condemn him, is that he works. He wanted to build something to revive his flailing circus.

He worked at it and now he has it.

I remember when we would only draw a handful of people when we were a child. They were more concerned with drinking and fighting in the streets than watching the show.

Now, our biggest tent packs 100 people a night, even more if my father can sell the tickets, the fire marshal's rules be damned.

"I'm serious," I say, my voice unsteady. "You shouldn't be back here for the owner of the circus will be upset if he finds you."

"And then what?" he says. "Will he kick me out of the circus and take my show's refunds, right?"

"Right."

"Is that what you want?" He circles me again. And from behind, he leans down, his words soft, his lips moving against my neck. My entire body goes numb, that's the only way to explain it. It comes alive. After nineteen years of sleep, I thought my body was only good for one thing—performing for the park eyes what other people want to see. But this reaction that runs through me sockings nothing to do with being seen. It has to do with feeling the warmth nearer, of behind me, the strength and size of him. A contrast to the softness when I mouth.

er them He kisses his way up toward my ear.
I should be offended.
I should be horrified.
I should turn around and slap him.
Except then everyone would hear us.
The audience might look over.
The show would stop.
My father would definitely find out.
So I stand very still.
At least, that's the excuse I give myself as I allow his teeth to gently my earlobe and tug. It feels like there's a direct path to between my legs.
My nipples turn hard, visible beneath the leotard.
They're barely there, my breasts.

I didn't develop much when I went into puberty. I've always relatively flat, which served me well when it comes to acrobatics. It's as if I haven't had breasts until right now, until this moment, when suddenly they've decided to make themselves known. And I want nothing more for his long-fingered, elegant, masculine hands to be on them.

"What are you doing?" I ask.
"Introducing myself," he murmurs. "It's so very nice to meet you."
The audience laughs, reminding me that I need to be on stage in a few seconds.

It's almost my cue.
There's no stage director back here to point it out. I'm just supposed to know, and I always do. No stage director, which means there's no one to us? Now when his hand comes around, splay over my stomach and tugs me back can feel him hard and thick against my ass.

"I think I'm going to be seeing a lot of you, Luna Rider," he whispers.
I whirl to face him. "No, you're not."

"I am if you accept my job offer."
An offer of sex. In exchange for things. Money. A car, maybe. Money.
, doing him have money. You can tell from his clothes. His confidence. My flush, because I liked him touching me a little too much. When I thought of him wanted me. When I thought he saw me, not a body he could purchase as easily as a ticket on the tilt-a-whirl. “No, thanks.”

“You don’t even want to hear it?” he asks.

“There is nothing you could say that could tempt me.”

“I don’t know,” he muses. “I’ve said so many alluring things.”

“Please leave.” Agitation makes me twitch. “Leave.”

And then, miraculously, he does.

He turns and walks away.

Thank God, I tell myself, pretending I’m glad the alluring stranger is gone.

He can only cause trouble.

Nothing good ever comes from strangers or townies or men I can’t easily grab matter.

gs. I look down.

My nipples are still hard. There’s still a warmth and maybe even dampness between my legs. How is it possible that someone could do this in less than a few minutes? What is his name? How did he know mine? Maybe almost some kind of Olympics superfan.

Suddenly He saw an article or a blog post on the local news station and decided to come say hello in a very inappropriate way. With a proposition. An offer of money for sex.

Well, if that’s the case, it should be over soon.

’ It should be over now.

about 30 As long as he doesn’t go to my father next. I shiver again, and that’s his desire tinged with fear. Somehow that only makes me hotter.

I hear the announcer boom over the speakers indicating that the beautiful orange-and-black striped tiger is off the stage, along with the rest of the animals and the handler. “And now the amazing Luna Rider soars through the air. Give her a glorious welcome.”

I snap into action and run as fast as I can. With every beat of my heart, I run.

There’s a trapeze waiting for me down low, reachable. It only takes a small hop, and then I’m on it soaring, soaring through the air, and I feel like myself to turn and tumble, falling and catching, falling and catching.

cheeks This is the one place where I control what happens.
